
HARPER'S WEEKLY
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION
VOLUME VII.
FOR THE YEAR
1863.

INDEX TO ILLUSTRATIONS.

ADRAHAM, 501.
Alabama, the British Pirate, 668.
Alexandra, Princess, alighting from her Carriage, 396.
Alexandra, the British Pirate, 364.
Alexandria, Banks's entry into, 388.
Arkansas, Bombardment of the Fort of, 87.
Armfield, 63.
  Swimming the River, 438.
Army of the Cumberland, 639, 640, 705.
  Look-out Mountain, Capture of Rebel Works at the (3 Illustrations), 821.
  Capture of (5 Illustrations), 821.
  General Hooker Fighting among the Clouds at, 829.
Army of the Potomac Drawing Rations, 540.
  Fruitless attempt to Move, 104, 105.
  Grand Review of the, 645.
  Head-quarters at, 344, 345.
  In Huts, the, 28.
  Operators at Work, 53.
  Picket-guard, 97.
  Reviewed by President, etc., 677.
  Review of Cavalry of the, 289, 381.
  Wedding in the, 216.
Army Telegraph, the, Setting up the Wires, 53.
Artillery drawn through the Mountains, 741.
A Sign in the Rebel Trenches, 56.
Atlanta, Capture of Rebel Iron-clad, 440.
Attack of the Rebels upon our Gun-boat Flotilla at Galveston, Texas, 73.

BADEN's Quaker, 197.
Ball at the Tuileries, 204.
Balloon "Le Geant," 173.
Banks's Entry into Alexandria, 385.
  Expedition, Landing of, 753.
  Departure from Brunswick, 389.
Barrataria, the Iron-clad, 2/2.
Baton Rouge, Louisiana, General Banks's Forces landing at, 485.
  Grierson's Entry into, 356.
Bayou Navigation in Dixie, 525.
  Crossing, 525.
Bayou Teche, flight at, 301.
Bedouin Tent, 605.
Beever murdered by Sioux Indians, 577.
Belle Isle, Union Prisoners at, 665.
Beulah Battery, 164.
Bewicksley, Widow (3 Illustrations), 166, 167.
Black Island Batteries, 644, 645.
Black River Bridge, Battle of, 246.
  Cotton Bridge over, 405.
Blockade-runner, Sinking a, 536.
Blood Horses, sale of at New Orleans, 221.
Blood-hounds, Union men hunted with, 740.
Bne Ridge, 684.
Bowen, General, at Burbridge's Head-quarters, 481.
Bragg's Encampment, 760.
Brashear City, Louisiana, 297, 380.
Bridal Parure of Miss Chase, 764.
Bridging the Tennessee, 753.
Bristoe Station, Heth's Attack at, 712.
Buckland, 785.
Buford's Attack on Raccoon Ford, 633.
  Cavalry Charge, 464, 625.
Bull Run, Bridge over, 579.
Burnside at Knoxville, 413.
Butte la Rose, Engagement of, 340.

CAHLOUN, Funeral of the late Captain, 540.
Caleb Cushing Steam up, 441.
Camp of the 19th Massachusetts Regiment, 317.
Canal Universelle Texas, 395.
Canal to New Carthage, 312, 313.
Capture of Look-out Mountain (5 Illustrations), 821.
  Of Rebel Works at the White House, on Look-out Mountain, Nov. 24, 1863, 809.
  Of the Steamer Chesapeake by British Pirates, Dec. 7, 1863, 817.
Carlisle, Rebels shelling New York Militia in main Street of, 417.
Cavalry Attack, x, 344, 345.
  Raid, Kilpatrick's, 348.
Champion Hill, Battle of, 393.
Chancellorsville, Battle of, 325, 328, 329, 332, 333.
  Hooker's Head-quarters at, 332.
Charleston, South Carolina, Defenses of, 284.
  Bird's-eye view of, 536.
  Defenses of, 284.
  Fahy's Battery near the Light house at, 76.
  Harbor, 264, 265.
    Campaign in, 569.
    Obstructions in, 673.
    Sinking Torpedoes, 380.
  Iron-clad Fleet, 76.
  Middle-ground Battery, 76.
  Naval Combat off, 117.
  Our Blockading Fleet off North Channel, 76.
  Scenes on Sea-islands near, 517.
  The Siege of, 596, 597, 609, 613, 613.
Chattanooga, 581, 760.
  The Steamer, 760.
Chesapeake, Capture of the Steamer, by British Pirates, Dec. 7, 1863, 817.
Chicamauga, the Battle of, 696.
Cheatem, 84.
Christmas Eve, 1863, 8, 9.
Christmas, 1863, 824, 825.
Cincinnati, the Iron-clad, 385.
Colored Troops (1st Louisiana National Guards), 133.
Comicalities, 3, 16, 19, 32, 48, 64, 80, 96, 113, 128, 144, 160, 161, 176, 177, 192, 208, 209, 211, 224, 227, 240, 241, 256, 275, 288, 304, 320, 336, 352, 368, 384, 400, 403, 416, 419, 432, 448, 464, 480, 483, 496, 499, 512, 515, 544, 560, 576, 592, 608, 624, 640, 656, 672, 688, 704, 720, 736, 752, 768, 784, 800, 816, 832.
Confiscated Anglo-Rebel property, 573.
Contraband Volunteer, x, 180.
Contraband coming into Camp in consequence of the Proclamation, 68, 116.
  Coming in, 293.
Corbin's Neck, on the Rappahannock, 140.
Corner's Bridge, Fight at, 101.
Cotton (King) Captured, 380.
Courier Line, the, 193.
Cumberland, Army of the (3 Illustrations), 313.
Cumberland Gap, Burnside's Army at, 652.

DELAWARE, Arrival of Prisoners at Fort, 465.
Depot of Supplies, 720.
Deserters, Execution of, 509, 617.
Draft, Resumption of the, 573.
Dream, the Soldier's, 709.
Drummer-boy of our Regiment, 605.
Dumfries, 667.
Dunmory, Porter's second, at Vicksburg, 326.
Dunderberg, 728.

El Monasser, the Lalrd Ram, 801.
El Tousson, " "
Ely's Ford, 8th Pennsylvania Cavalry at, 308.
Emancipation Meeting at Exeter Hall, 172.
  Of the Negroes, the, 56, 57.
Escort, the Steamer, 301.
Execution of Indian Murderers, Minnesota, 37.
Expedition, the great Southern, 117.

Florida destroying the Jacob Bell, 189.
Foraging Party, 712.
Fort Hill, Blowing up the Rebel, 469.
  Entrance of Mine under, 469.
  Under, 469.
Fort Wagner, 701.
  Bombardment of, 650.
  Explosion of Magazine at, 628.
Fort Negley, near Nashville, Tennessee, 23.
Fort Sumter, 585.
  Bombardment of, 588.
Fort Wagner, Attack on, 569, 581.
  The last Night before, 628.
Franklin's Division receiving the River, 28.
Fredericksburg, Attack on Rebel Works at, 4.
  Burnside's House, 28.
  Capture of Heights of, 324.
  Doubleday's Skirmishers, 28.
  Franklin crossing to, 6.
  Gallant Charge of Humphreys's Division at the Battle of, 24, 25.
  On Night of 11th December, 4.
  Our Soldiers in the Streets of, 5.
  The Artillery covering the Retreat, 28.
  The Battle of, 25, 505, 508.
French Iron-clads, 725.

GALVESTON, Texas, Rebel attack on the 42d Massachusetts Volunteers at, 73.
  Attack of the Rebels upon our Gun-boat Flotilla, 73.
Gambling, etc., 717.
General Hooker Fighting among the Clouds at Look-out Mountain, 829.
Georgo Grismold arriving at Liverpool, 205.
Germania Mills Ford, Hooker's Brigade crossing, 804.
Gettysburg, General View of, 553.
  The Battle of, 473, 505, 508.
  Views of the Battle-field at, 522.
Gilmore's Test, 645.
Gold Panic in Wall Street, 188.
Goldsborough, the Battle of, 39.
Grand Gulf, Attack on, 341.
Grant directing Dispatches, 341.
Gregg, Attack on Battery, 625.
Guerrilla Attacking Gun-boat, 313.
Guerrilla Warfare, 725.
Gun-boats, our, at Western, 84.

HARRISBURG, 461.
Hartford, the Flag-ship, 545.
Hauge's Bridge over Potomac Creek, 557.
Hazen's Brigade descending the Tennessee, 756.
Hindman, Fort, attack on, 193.
Holly Springs, Mississippi, 29.
  Ruins of, 29.
  Rebel Armory, 29.
Home from the War, 261.
Honor the Brave, 650.
Hospital on Mississippi, Floating, 300.
How the Rebels destroy Railroads, 684.

INDIAN Expedition, 580.
Indianola, x, 84.
  Running Vicksburg Blockade, 149.
Irish Bend, Battle of, 316.
Iron Newton, Destruction of the, 813.

JACKSON, Battle of, 392.
  Destruction of Property at, 392.
  General Stonewall, in Camp, 160.
  Our Works before, 564.
  Prison at, 564.
  Raising Stars and Stripes at, 392.
Jacob Bell destroyed by the Florida, 189.
Jacob's Ford, crossing the Rapidan at, 804.
James Island, 644.
John Burns, 529.
  Residence of, 529.
Johnsonville, 621.

KELLY'S FORD, Fight at, 772.
Kenner, the Iron-clad, 360.
  Sinking, 376.
Kingston, the Battle of, 20.

LAFAYETTE, 84.
Lake Providence, Canal at, 180.
  Carrying Levee at, 180.
Lawrence destroyed by Rebel Guerillas, 564.
  Fort, 564.
Libey Prison, 668, 669.
Logan pursuing Rebels, 369.
Look-out Mountain, 724.
  Capture of (5 Illustrations), 821.
  Rebel Works at the White House, on, Nov. 24, 1863, 809.
  General Hooker Fighting among the Clouds at, 829.
  Valley-gate Captured in, 797.
Louisiana Native Guards, 133.

M'ALLISTER, Attack on Fort, 125.
M'Clellan, Gen., Review of, 677.
M'Pherson and his Chief Engineers, 493.
Madison, Wisconsin, Burning, 573.
Marriage of the Prince of Wales, 333, 823.
Maryland Campaign, 800.
Meade, Presentation of Sword to General, 636.
Meeting of Negroes in Union Square, 569.
Meeting of the Union and Rebel Pickets in the Rappahannock, 141.
Mexico, the French in, 597.
Millikin's Bend, Battle of, 493.
Missionary Ridge Stormed by General Granger, 808.
Monitor, Destruction of the, 501.
Monitor, Wreck of the, 60.
Montauk, the, Destroying the Nashville, 193.
  In Action, 193.
  Torpedo Exploding under, 193.
Morgan's Raid, 513.
Morris Island, General View of, 536, 552.
  Sketches, 565.
Mosby's Guerrillas, 561.
Murfreesboro, Tennessee, 45.
  Appearance of the deserted Rebel Camps near, 69.
  The Battle of, 108.

NASHVILLE and Chattanooga Railroad, 313.
Nashville, the, Destruction of, 193.
  In the Ogeechee, 164.
Negley, Fort, 23.
Negroes Addressed on the Duties of Freedom, 722.
  Recruits, Teaching the Use of the Rifle, 161.
  Regiment in Battle, 168, 169.
Newbern, Battle at, 237.
New Inlet, Rebel Batteries at, 716.
New Orleans, Arrival of General Banks and Staff at the Levee at, 21.
  A Slave for sale—Before the Auction, 61.
  Custom-house, Rebel Prisoners in, 549.
  Market, Soldiers exchanging Rations for Fruit, etc., 49.
  May Day, 377.
  Requiring Levee at, 181.
  Sale of Blood Horses at, 221.
  Scene on the Levee at, 184, 185.
  Thorpe employing Poor of, 177.
Night Guard in the Southwest, 317.
Northwest, Men of, at Work, 360, 361.

ORCHARD KNOB, Capture of, 812.
Organ at Home, 733.
Oslabia, the Russian Frigate, 657.
Our new Western Gun-boats, 84.

PACK-MULES in the Mountains, 793.
Pay-day in the Army of Potomac, 156, 157.
Philadelphia, Street Scenes in, 460.
Picket Guard, the, 77.
Picket on Duty in Swamp, 289.
Planter's House, Arrival of Column at, 200.
Pontoons building on Rappahannock, 305.
  Bridge, 309.
  Sedgwick's, 309.
Powder Court-martial, 12.
Porter's Dunmory at Vicksburg, 326.
Port Gibson, 341.
Port Hudson, Augur's Assault on, 413.
  Bombardment of, 548, 549, 449, 452.
  Banks's Head-quarters, 437.
  Farragut's Attack on, 429.
  Departure of Banks for, 389.
  General Paine's Assault on, 493.
  Paine's Head-quarters, 457.
  Siege of, 476.
  Surrender of, 499.
  Union Forces taking Possession of, 500.
  View of, 500.
Post of Honor, Bombardment of, 61.
Potomac, Crossing the, 553.
President's Dispatches, 341.
Prices at Richmond, 781.
Prisoners, Attacking Gun-boat, 313.
  Union, 573.
Pushka, Mexican, 597.

Queen of the West (the Ram) Attacking the Vicksburg, 123.
  Destruction of, 340.
  Loss of, 151.

RACCOON FORD, Buford's Attack on, 633.
Rail line Destroyed, 429.
Rappahannock, Capture of Rebel Works on the, 765.
  Effects of Shells on Rifle-pits at, 493.
  Franklin's Grand Division crossing the, 6.
  Railway Bridge burnt, 713.
  Soldiers crossing the, 713.
  Shelling Rifle-pits at, 493.
  View of the, 200, 701.
Raymond, Battle of, 372.
Rebel Attack upon the 42d Massachusetts Volunteers at Galveston, Texas, 73.
  Guerrillas, 740.
  Negro Tickets, 17.
Reception at New Orleans by General Butler, 44.
Registered Enemies, Arrival of, in Dresden, 136.
  Departure of, 156.
  Taking the Oath, 337.
Reveille in Camp, 444.
Richmond, 684.
Riots at New York, 484, 485, 493.
Rowena, the Tug, 317.
Rush Street Bridge, 748.
Russell's Brigade crossing the Rappahannock, 308.
Russian Hall, the, 737, 744.
  Flag-ship, Common Council Committee received on Board the, 657.
  Fleet, 664.
  Procession through Broadway, 660.
  Visit, 708.

SABINE PASS, Attack on, 653.
Santa Claus in Camp, 1.
Savannah, Georgia, and its Approaches, 100.
Scenes Women leaving Washington for Richmond, 61.
Sugar Steamer, 701.
Service and Shoddy, 677.
Sharpshooter, 653.
Shell in the Rebel Trenches, 56.
Sibley's Indian Expedition, 580.
Signal Station at Naples, 313.
Sioux War, the, 693.
Skinner's Neck, on the Rappahannock, 140.
Somerville Ford, 685.
Southern Chivalry, Illustrated, 88, 89.
  Exiles on their way North, 680.
Spies, Execution of two Rebel, 617.
Springfield Landing, View of, 437.
Spy, the Life of a, 676.
Steam-rams, the Anglo-Rebel, 661.
Stevenson, 781.
Stockade on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, 85.
Stone River, Bridges over, 69.
Stonewall Jackson in Camp, 109.
Stragglers, 13.
Switzerland, the Ram, 241.
Suffolk, Virginia, 28.
Sumter and Wagner, Bombardment of, 593.
Sumter, Bombardment of, 585.
Sullivan's Island, Battery Bee on, 701.
Susquehanna, Destruction of the Bridge over the, 468.

Tacony, the Pirate, 641.
Teamster's Duel, the, 33.
Teamsters in the Army, Paying off, 748.
Tinby's Revolving Towers, 252.
Torpedo, 682, 697, 699, 700.
  Explosion of, 548.
  Exploding under the Montauk, 193.
  In the Western Rivers, 85.
Torpedoes in Charleston Harbor, 380.
Trenton Falls, the Diplomatic Corps at, 585.
Turtle Run at Savannah, 164.
Tuscumbia, overflow of the, 105.

UNION ARTAB, the, 776.
  Jim's Prisoners, 180.
United States Ford, Bridges at, 308.
Upperville, Skirmish at, 401.
  Skirmish near, 449.

VALENTINE'S Day, 176, 121.
Vicksburg, Admiral Porter's Fleet at, 492.
  Approaches to, 464.
  Approach of M'Pherson's Sap, 436.
  A Scene in one of the Rebel Forts before, 193, 153.
  Before the War, 469.
  Breach in the Levee near the Canal at, 309.
  Cutting away Cotton-bend at, 260.
  Indianola running the Blockade at, 149.
  In the Trenches before, 461.
  Masked Batteries Shelling, 313.
  Our Works before, 420, 421.
  Porter's Fleet running the Batteries at, 313.
  Rams running the Blockade at, 341.
  Settling Terms of Surrender of, 481.
  Siege of, 405, 501.
  Surrender of, 493.
  The Battle at—Gallant Charge of the 6th Missouri Regiment, 71.
Virginia in 1864, 801.

WALES, Marriage of the Prince of, 332, 333.
War in the West, the, 40, 41.
  The Beginning of, 584.
Warrenton from our Batteries, 212.
  Sulphur Springs, Camp at, 605.
Wedding in the Army of the Potomac, 216.
Wehawken (Iron-clad), 813, the Gain, 92.
Whitehall, the Battle of, 29.
Winter-quarters in Camp—Inside of a Hut, 52.
Wyndham's Cavalry on a Reconnoissance, 100, 101.

YATES searching for Wounded, 341.
Yazoo, Sunset Gun in the, 213.

MAPS AND CHARTS.

Charleston, Approaches to, 196.
Chattanooga and Charleston, Map of Grant's Operations between, 776.
Galveston, Texas, Chart of the Harbor of, 69.
Hooker's recent Fight, Map showing Scene of, 723.
Knoxville, Tennessee, 796.
Lake Providence, etc., 153.
Maryland and part of Pennsylvania, 467.
Mississippi, 45.
  Grierson's Route through, 353.
  River from its Source to Vicksburg, 78.
  From Port Hudson to Bayou Sara, 218.
  Red River, Banks's Route to Grand Gulf, 297.
Murfreesboro, Tennessee, Map of the Battle of, 43.
North Carolina, 7.
Pennsylvania and Maryland, Map showing Seat of War in, 453.
Prairie Grove, Arkansas, 62.
Rosecrans's Operations in Tennessee and Georgia, 631.
Savannah, Environs of, 164.
Slavery Chart, 429.
Tennessee, Rosecrans's Advance in, 557.
Vicksburg, Mississippi, 45.
  And Jackson, 369, 393.
  And Vicinity, 153.
Virginia, 236.
  East, 316.
Yazoo Pass and Vicinity, 199.

PORTRAITS.

Alexandra of Denmark, 197.
Beecher, Rev. Henry Ward, 733.
Beecher, Rev. Lyman, D.D., 77.
Blunt, James G., of Kansas, Brigadier General, 45.
Brady, James T., 117.
Brough, Hon. John, 828.
Browne, J. Ross, 725.
Buford, General, 541.
Butterfield, Major General Dan., 109.
Colfax, Hon. Schuyler, 317.
Couch, Major General Darius, 109.
Curtin, Governor, 365.
Davidson, the Scout, 349.
Dupont, Admiral Samuel F., 257.
Farragut, Rear Admiral David G., 545.
Foote, Rear Admiral, 445.
Foster, J. G., Brigadier General, 21.
Gilmore, General Quincy A., 225, 684.
Gordon, the Negro, 681.
Granger, General Gordon, 730.
Grant, Major General, 283, 377, 378, 465.
Grierson, Colonel, 353.
Guenther, Charles G., 733.
Hammond, Dr. William A., 748.
Hooker and Staff, 295, 297.
Hooker, Joseph, Major General, 93, 729.
Howe, Julia C., Brigadier General, 49.
Howe, General David, 165.
Hunter, General David, 165.
Jackson, General Stonewall, 173, 549.
Jackson, Thomas, 549.
Kilpatrick, Major General, 541.
Lincoln, Abraham, 1, 117.
Logan, Major General, 745.
Longstreet, General, 549.
Lytle, Brigadier General, 733.
Manahan, the Archduke, 621.
M'Clernand, Major General, 81.
M'Clellan, John, Brigadier General, of Missouri, 48.
Meade, Major General George G., 433.
Mitchell, General, 9, 541.
Plesenton, General, 541.
Porter, David D., Rear Admiral, 81.
Reynolds, the late Major General John F., 453.
Rolgers, Captain John, 733.
Rose, General Leonard F., 293.
Salm Salm, Prince, 597.
Semmes (the Pirate Raphael), 653.
Shaw, Colonel Robert Gould, 569.
Sherman, William F., Major General, 40.
Slocomb, Major General, 321, 541.
Stratton, Charles F., of Wisconsin, 113.
Strong, Brigadier General George C., 525.
Thomas, Major General George H., 641.
Tom Thumb and Wife, 113.
Turner, the Rev. H. M., 796.
Union Jim, 196.
Vallandigham, C. L., 365.
Van Buren, John, 117.
Victoria, Queen, and Beatrice, 229.
Wales, Prince and Princess of, 825.
Washburne, Major General C. C., 764.

GENERAL INDEX.

Anony Gentlemen, 226.
Academy Exhibition, 260.
Academy of Design, 574.
Admiral Porter's Dummy, 295.
Agnes Sebastian, 574.
Agricultural Bureau, 722.
Alexandra of Denmark, 188.
Alexandra, the English Pirate, 262.
America and England, 1864.
American Battles, 403.
American Citizens, 743.
American Industry, 706.
Amusing Book, an, 51.
Anglo-phobia, 578.
Anglo-Prussia, 514.
Anglo-Rebel Iron-clads, 569, 601.
Annie Laurie, 397.
Another Mask off, 403.
Anti-Imperial View in France, 809.
Antipathy of Race and Religion, 130.
Antietroplus, 291.
Apathy, 435.
A poor Article of Rebel, 295.
Arkansas, Capture of Post of, 94.
Armies, the, 802.
Army and Navy Items, 515, 551, 547, 563, 579, 595, 614, 627, 659, 675, 691, 707, 725, 739, 771, 818.
Army Beef, 71.
Army of the Cumberland, the, 690, 711, 775, 808.
Army of the Potomac, the, 34, 53, 95, 101, 197, 245, 331, 405, 551, 625, 636, 646, 654, 711, 721, 764, 789.
Arrival of the Coming Man, 707.
Artemus Ward, 518.
Artist-Correspondent (our) at Large, 125.
Atlanta, Capture of the, 443.
At Last, 2.
As you Were, 782.
A very Simple Plan, 322.
A Word to the Soldiers, 329.

Bacon's Quaker, 196.
Bacon, 343.
Ball at the Tuileries, the late, 205.
Balloon, the French, 774.
Banks Expedition, the, 3, 37, 48.
Banks, General, at New Orleans, 18.
Banks's Campaign, 303.
Barbarism and Civilization, 483.
Barnum, 407.
Barnum's, 871.
Battle of Murfreesborough, 209.
Bayou Teche, Battle in, 103.
Bear-hunting, 135.
Beecher, Rev. Lyman, 77.
Rev. H. W., 723.
Belle's Fairy Frame, 518.
Berwick's Bay Expedition, 337.
Beside Crompton, 74.
Better Feeling, a, 194.
Bewitching Widow, the, 165, 167.
Birds of a Feather, 651.
Bishop Beckel, a, 719.
Blarney, 491.
Blind, 436.
Blockade-running Experiences, 794.
Blue Flowers, 566.
Blunt, Brigadier General James G., of Kansas, 45.
Border State Policy, 626.
Boston Organ, the great, 795.
Boys run Wild, 426.
Brady's Gallery, 722.
Britannia and Rams, 642.
British Journalism, 754.
British Meddle, the last, 387.
British Privateers, the, 210, 594, 626.
Broadway, 291.
Brothers in Arms, 30.
Burnside, General, 98, 707, 771.
Burton on Du Chaillu and Gorillas, 95.
Butler on Reconstruction, 466.
Butterfield, General, Life of, 120.

Cadwell Imbroglio, the, 2.
Calhoun, Funeral of Captain, 551.
Cairns, 307.
Calling Names, 322.
Camp Douglas, from, 547.
Camp on the Rappahannock, 315.
Campaign in Louisiana, 299.
Canal Convention, 371.
Capture of a Rebel Garrison, 819.
Of the Fort of Arkansas, 94.
Of the Steamer Chesapeake, 817.
Carlyle, 387, 723.
Case for the Prisoner, 710.
Catching the Dragon, 534.
Catiline's last Cry, 530.
Cauliflower, 511.
Cavalry, 338.
Officers, 541.
Charleston, South Carolina, 79, 98, 242, 258, 295, 375, 519, 541, 551, 621, 629, 659, 676.
Fight off, 177.
Charmer charmed, 479.
Chattanooga, 587, 737, 754, 786, 812.
Chastel, the Story of a, 295.
Chesapeake Privateer, the, 819.
Steamer, Capture of the, 817.
Chicago, Bridge Accident at, 743.
Chivalry, 194.
Christmas Eve, 54.
Cincinnati, the Iron-clad, 585.
Circumstances alter Cases, 163.
Civet wanted, 515.
Clignancourt Mystery, the, 506.
Closet, the "" in the, 196.
Cold and Unfriendly Neutrality, 573.
Colored Soldiers, Treatment of, 514.
Colored Troops, 403.
In Louisiana, 143.
Color-prints, 739.
Coming to Life again, 718.
Common Complaint, a, 371.
Conciliation, 651.
Confederate Loan in Europe, the, 266.
Confiscation of Anglo-Rebel Cotton, 295.
Congress, 3, 19, 35, 51, 67, 83, 99, 120, 131, 147, 163, 179, 195, 243, 259.
Connecticut in Louisiana, 237.
Conservatism and Respectability, 674.
Contrabands Coming in, 78.
Conway and Mason, 450.
Copperheadism, 130.
Copperhead Logic, 563.
Plan, the, 195.
Statesmanship, 467.
Coach, General, Life of, 169.
Courage, 178.
Court of the Water-Lily, 138.
Cotopaxi, 219.
Cruel Case, a, 582.
Culpepper, Cavalry Fight near, 427.
Cumberland, Army of the, 215.
Cumberland Gap, 652.
Curiosities of Cipher, 506.
Curiosities of Sleep, 61.
Curtin, Andrew G., 263.

Dare's Duty, 720.
Dark Night's Work, 58, 70, 86, 110, 122, 134, 154, 170, 190, 202, 219, 230, 247.
Deserters, Execution of, 510.
Despotism, 370.
Diplomatic Exercises, 603.
Dix, General, 563.
Dixie, Two Views of, 291.
Domestic Manufactures, 723.
Doomed to Disappointment, 583.
Dragon, 690.
Draft, the, 466, 546, 573.
Drafted, 307.
Duel or Two, a, 430.
Dumbass in Libraries, 691.
Dunderbeg, the, 127.
Dupont, Admiral, 370.
Duty of Cheerfulness, 34.
Duyckinck, George Long, 563.
Dyspeptic Patriot, a, 739.

Easy Questions, etc., 594.
Editorial Responsibility, 34.
Election, the, 723.
By the People, 35.
Emancipation, 35.
Empress of China's Navy, 291.
Empty, the Account with, 374.
A Voice from, 388.
Our Relations with, 306.
Why she keeps still, 710.
Ericsson's Devil, 371.
Escape from Prison, 838.
Essex, the Fast of the, 299.
Essex, the, and the Alabama, 34.
European Congress, the, 515.
Europe at Home, 802.
Everett, Speech of, 675.
Exchange of Prisoners, 7.
Execution of the Minnesota Indians, 39.
Of Williams and Peters, 417.
Exodus of Rebel Women, 81.
Expedition, the great Southern, 119.

Fable of the Bats, 562.
Fact and Theory, 354.
Fall Campaign, 694.
Fair Play, 66.
Fair Wages for fair Work, 563.
Farmer Hayden's Thanksgiving Day, 774.
Farragut, Rear Admiral, 546.
Fidelio, 295.
Fighting and Waiting, 22.
And Twaddling, 290.
Finance, 530.
Financial Situation, 290.
Fine Chance, a, 547.
Fine Names, &c.
Firmness, 307.
First Time under Fire, 746.
Florida, the Pirate, 187.
Fools, Admiral, 435, 445.
Footing up an Account, 98.
Foreign Observer, to the, 386.
War, 375.
Forey, General, 307.
Fortic et Fidelis, 678.
Fort Negley, Evacuations, 23.
Sumter, 587.
The Bombardment of, 270.
Wagner, the Attack on, 510.
Fortune's Wheel, 614.
Forty Days' Warning, 594.
Foster, J. G., Brigadier General, 21.
Fourth of July, 1863, 450.
France in Mexico, 594.
Fredericksburgh, Battle of, 6, 17.
Freedmen on the Mississippi, 770.
French dead (and gone) Shots, 466.
Emperor Policy in America, 98.
Pamphlet, 658.
Fun, 178.
Friendly Voice, 387.
Friends in England, 706.
From a Diary, 178, 194, 210, 242, 274, 291, 370, 450, 706.
From England, 594.
Richmond, 626.

Galveston, the Loss of, 75.
Gambling, 771.
Gasconade, 258.
George Griswold at Liverpool, the, 295.
Georgia, Battles in, 643.
Georgia's Resistance, 386.
Germaine, 474.
Gettysburg, Battle of, 471, 510.
Incidences of, 534.
The Hills at, 747.
Ghost at Cedar Glen, the, 118.
In the Green Park, 646.
Gift to the Wayside, 619.
Gigmour's Picture, 338.
Gilmore, General Quincy A., 626, 657.
Going to Wilson's Creek, 119.
Golden Hair, 638.
Gold Pania, the, 187.
Good-natured Man with One Eye, 563.
Good News, 450.
Government and Administration, 162.
Granger, General Gordon, 780.
Grant and some Western Heroes, 256.
Major General Ulysses S., 265, 466.
Grant's Campaign, 337, 362.
Letter, 755.
Gratia's Fortune, 658.
Greco-American Citizen, 259.
Grierson, Colonel, 354, 658.
Gun-boats, the new Western, 85.

Habeas Corpus, the, 195.
Hail! King that would be, 450.
Hammond, Dr. William A., 748.
Hands and Hearts, 123.
Happy New-Year, 18.
Have we a General among us? 34.
Haxa Bell, 291.
Hearts and Faces, 642.
Hindman, Attack on Fort, 94, 123.
History vs. Palmerston, 194.
Holy-Time, 18.
Holly Springs, 37.
Home from the Wars, 747.
Homespun, Mrs., upon Players, 66.
Hon. John Brough, Governor-elect of Ohio, 628.
Hon. Schuyler Colfax, the new Speaker, 617.
Hooker, Major General Joseph, 93, 130.
Hooker's Head-quarters, Sketches at, 241.
Hospital Register, 195.
House-keeping, 295.
Hovey, Alvin P., Brigadier General, 62.
How a free People conduct a long War, 150.
How an Officer made Love, etc., 199.
How others See us, 435.
How shall we Vote? 610.
How the First New Jersey Fought at Brandy, 606.
How to do it, 515.
Hughes, Archbishop, on the Conscription, 258.
Humor, a Stroke of, 258.
Humors of the Day, 3, 19, 35, 51, 67, 83, 99, 115, 131, 147, 163, 179, 195, 211, 227, 243, 259, 275, 291, 307, 323, 339, 355, 371, 387, 403, 419, 435, 451, 467, 483, 499, 515, 531, 547, 558, 574, 590, 609, 625, 631, 647, 670, 679, 699, 711, 734, 751, 767, 775, 798, 807, 823.
Hungarian Officer, the, 195.
Hunter, Major General, 163.

Iliad in a Nutshell, 643.
Immigration, why it Increases, 322.
Important Notice, 658.
In Dixie, 179.
Inevitable Question, the, 98.
In Extremis, 595.
In Hospital, 122.
Interrupted Letter, 322.
In the Bayous, 735.
In the Cars, 66.
In the Closet, 106.
In the Hospital, 62.
In the Waters under the Earth, 142.
Invasion of the North, 450.
Irish Bend, Battle of, 315.
Iron-dads, 274.
At Charleston, 259.
Our, in the Speeches, 306.
Irrepressible Conflict again, the, 114.
Isaac Newton, Loss of the, 515.

Jackson, Capture of, 626.
Jackson, General Stonewall, 174.
John Bull in Dixie, 642.
John Morgan's Subsistence, 78.
Justice, 547.

Kemble's Journal, 418, 451, 466.
Kentucky Loyalty, 170.
Kenlock, 258, 307.
Kiernan, Major, 466.
Killed in Action, 291.
Kilpatrick's Raid, 343.
Kinglake, Mr., 306.
Kinglake's Crimean War, 259, 290.
Kingsley, Charles, 418.

Lady Constance's Trap, 250.
Laird, Mr., 530.
Last Word, 107.
Latest News from the Dead, 491.
Lawrence's Volunteers, 23.
Lawrence, Massacre at, 566, 603.
Lay Representation, 338.
League of States, 243.
Leah, 146.
Lee, General R. E., 174.
Letter to a Rebel Friend, 210.
Liberty and Licenses, 66.
And Privilege, 323.
Literary, 259, 339, 371, 419, 467, 626, 645, 691, 739, 771, 787, 803, 818.
Piracy, 258.
Little Purple, 67.
Little Red Slipper, 238.
Lloyds's Weekly Newspaper, 419.
Locomotive and the Cow, 451.
London Charivari, 307.
Scandal, 386.
Lord Lyons's Dispatch, 226.
Loss of the Hecksaben, 819.
Lost Leader, 418, 546.
Louisiana, Campaigning in, 302.
Louis Napoleon's Prayer, 707.
Lounger in the next Box, to the, 50.
Lounger, the, 50, 66, 82, 98, 114, 130, 146, 162, 178, 194, 210, 226, 242, 258, 274, 290, 306, 322, 338, 354, 370, 386, 402, 418, 434, 450, 466, 482, 498, 514, 530, 546, 562, 578, 594, 610, 626, 642, 658, 674, 690, 706, 722, 738, 754, 770, 786, 802.
Loyal Soldiers, 243.
Citizens, 418.
Lyte, General, 737.

Margaret's Cross, 663.
Maryland Campaign, 519.
Maryland Yank, a, 66.
Mast-meeting, 354.
Masters and Lackeys, 659.
Maud, 518.
Mayor Hall, the, 818.
Maximilian, 691.
McClellan, Attack on Fort, 123.
M'Neil, General, 404.
Meade, Major General, 454.
Meave, Schoolmistress, 708.
Melancholy Event, 802.
Mercier vs. the United States, 131.
Merry Christmas, 818.
Mexican Empire, 579.
Mildred's Sacrifice, 395.
Military Statistics, 355.
Tableau, a, 59.
Millie Leslie's Secret, 182, 183.
Minnesota Indians, Execution of the, 39.
Miss Chase's Wedding Jewels, 764.
Mississippi, Opening of the, 601.
Missouri, 754.
Mixie, Prince of Fogee, 363.
Mitchell, Brigadier General Robert B., 221.
Monitor, the Wreck of the, 60.
Monitors at Charleston, 579.
Monroe Doctrine, 771.
Monster Gilbraze, the, 579.
Moor Peace, 338.
Morgan's Raid, 513.
Mr. Bluett's Christmas Dinner, 827.
Murfreesboro, Tennessee, 79.
Appearance of the site of the deserted Rebel Camps at, 69.
Battle of, 103.
My First Duel, 243.
My Independence Day, 594.

National Academy of Design, 722.
National and State Governments, 594.
Nation as a Jury, 418.
Necessity of Success, the, 82.
Negley, Fort, Tennessee, 23.
Negro Emancipation, 18.
Negro Troops, 386.
In the Southwest, 721.
Negroes as Soldiers, 174.
Nelson, Lord, 434.
Nest, 731.
Neutral English Gentleman, the, 577.
Neutrality, the Fruit of British, 307.
Nothing but Bills, 51.
Newborn, Flight at, 258.
New Bureau, a, 338.
New Call for Men, 690.
New Gospel of Peace, 563, 722.
New Jersey Cavalry, 208.
New Orleans, General Banks at, 18, 45.
Affairs in, 157.
A Shower on, at 61.
Excitement in, 186.
Market, the, 98.
Rebel Prison in, 551.
Repairing Levee at, 155.
Sale of Horses at, 223.
Scenes at, 362.
New Outlet to the Gulf, 199.
New Picture, 795.
New Soldiers, 338.
Nicknames, 179.
Nile, the Sources of the, 387.
No Name, 18, 96, 97, 84.
No Peace with Rebels, 355.
North, the United, 178.
No Surrender, 66.
Now for a Victory, 210.

Octoroon Elections, 674.
Official Dignity, 403.
Ogeechee, our Iron-clads in the, 306.
Old Gag, the, 722.
One-sides Men, 67.
One of Three, 393.
One Point gained, 706.
One Women's Will, 186.
On the Accession, 51.
Opening of the Mississippi, the, 50.
Opera, the, 577, 723.
Oppression, 146.
Ordahs, 626.
Our Black Army, 731.
Our Financial Policy, 130.
Our Foreign Relations, 613.
Our Own, 483.
Our Platform, 658.
Our Relations with Great Britain, 253.

Parmentier and Portionship, 115.
Paying the Tweenters, 150.
Peace, a Little Bit of, 370.
Peace-makers, 531.
Peerage Reform, 195.
Pirates off New England, 441.
Pitt, Attempt to raise a Train Question, 516.
Plum for the Disconsolate, a, 51.
Policy and Right, 51.
Policy of the Government, 514.
Political Legislation, 146.
Poor Pilot, 94.
Porter Court-martial, 7.
Port Hudson, 497.
The Fall at, 554.
The Siege of, 411, 446, 463, 478.
Portland Ball, 599.
Precious, 195.
President and the Report, 258.
President's Letter, the 402.
Message, the, 818.
Proclamation, the, 34.
Prentiss, Gen., 23, 94.
Pretty Good Hit, 179.
Prince of Montenegro, 594.
Prince Hassan and the Ogre, 71.
Prince Salm Salm, 291.
Princess of Wales and her Bridesmaids, 247.
Prison at Charleston, 563.
Prisons at the South, 575.
Rebel, 551.
Prisons at Richmond, 687.
Proclamation, effects of the, 119.
Professors, the, 674.
Providence, Canal at Lake, 387.
Public Finances, 610.
Public Opinion, Progress of, 546.
Punkin, 398.
Pure Castilian, 723.

Quarry's Master, 14.
Queen of the West, the, 120.
Loss of the, 187.

Question of Endurance, a, 728.
To be Pondered at Leisure, 795.
Settled, 419.
Question, the, 466.

RAIN from Pennsylvania, 418.
Ralph Hazlitt, 459.
Reaction, 68.
Rebel Batteries, 397.
Dispatches, 83.
Exultation, 466.
Frankness, 696.
Garrison, Capture of a, 818.
Logic, 530.
Message, the, 818.
Negro Pockets, 17.
Policy, 425.
Rams at Liverpool, 593.
Rebels and Copperheads, 370.
Rebellion, Harper's Pictorial History of the, 275.
Recaptured, 103.
Reconstruction, 309.
Red Rover, 299.
Remaining Dangers, 610.
Reply to a Western Friend, 19.
Results, 802.
Retaliation, 354, 434.
Retrospect, 562.
Return from the Threshold, 203.
Review of the Army of the Potomac, 289.
Revolving Tower, 193.
Reynolds, the late General, 453.
Rice Plantations, 427.
Richmond, 654.
Riots, the, 337, 394, 479, 530.
Rights and their Violation, 60.
Rodgers, Captain John, 519.
Rumsh, 99, 305.
Rosecrans, Removal of, 690.
Ross, Brigadier General Leonard F., 222.
Rothschilds and the Union, 258.
Russell's Diary, 83.
Running the Blockade, 607.
Russian Alliance, 658.
Ball, the, 738, 746.
Visitors, 661, 711.
Russians, the, 674.

SABINE Pass, Disaster at, 646.
Sally's Choice, 340.
Sanitary Commission, 387.
Fairs, 735.
Santa Claus among the Soldiers, 6.
Ball, 15.
Sauce for the Goose, etc., 466.
Savannah, 193.
Approaches to, 165.
Scout in Dixie, 343.
Semmes, the Pirate Raphael, 12.
Sensation, 406.
Separation, 243.
Shakspeare's Birthday, 505.
Shaw, Colonel, 576.
Sherman, Major General W. T., 62.
Short Letter to John, a, 99.
Sibley Expedition, 597.
Side-light, a, 83.
Side-lights, 565.
Sinews of War, 354.
Sing Sing Conservatism, 547.
Sir Edward Lytton again, 675.
Situation, the, 306, 514, 754.
Slander, 371.
Slavery Chart, 149.
Slaves in Louisiana, 114.
Smith's Bridge, 168.
Social Condition of the English People, 578.
Soldiers and Saints, 328.
Soldier's Farewell, the, 115.
Something like Campaigning, 663.
Song of Songs, 211.
Sophie's Ribbon, 608.
Southern Chivalry, 87.
Southwest, our Army in the, 215.
Speaker, the new, 321.
Starvation, 779.
State Rights, 563.
Station-master at Langley, 590.
Statue by John Bull, 467.
Stockade on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, 58.
Stonewall Jackson, 146.
Stonewall Jackson's Camp, 103.
Struggle, a, 196.
Strategy, 535.
Straws, 114.
Strong, General G. C., 525.
Strong Heart, the, 466.
Study for a Copperhead Editorial, 659.
Suffolk, 98.
Sumter Meeting, 270.
Suppose and Suppose, 50.
Sword and Gown, 643.
Sylvia's Lovers, 277.
Symptoms of Carping-in, 354.

TENNESSEE, 819.
Army of the, 369.
Terror at the South, 402.
Texas, 819.
Expedition, 754.
Thanksgiving-day, a Story of, 773.
That Mysterious Joe, 506.
The Precise Point, 322.
The way Joe Allen buried Vandegrift, 622.
Thomas, Major General, 643.
Three Christmas Days, 10.
Tim Binney's Courtship, 155.
Tom Thumb and Wife, 114.
Torpedo, 258, 548, 587.
Torpedoes in the Western Rivers, 35.
Transatlantic Cousins, 690.
Trial of the Constitution, 385.
Tried, 679.
Tribe, 46.
Trumpet-blowing, 728.
Truth put to the Wall, 131.
Turner, Rev. H. M., 706.
Twinsheims and Tweedledee, 147.
Twin Crimes, 611.
Two Kinds of Men, 307.
Typical Negro, 429.

UNDER which King, 162.
Union Meeting at Dexter Hall, 171.
Universal Knowledge, 18.
Unmasking, 618.
Upperville, the Fight at, 462.

VAINGLORY, 655.
Vallandigham, 338, 362.
VARY HARD Case, 214, 234, 246, 266, 275, 294, 314, 330, 346, 358, 378, 390, 410, 422, 443, 453, 474, 490, 502, 522, 534, 554, 570, 586, 602, 618, 634, 650, 666, 683, 698, 714, 730, 742, 762, 778, 790, 810, 822.
Very Thin Mask, 179.
Vicksburg, 215, 295, 405, 427, 446, 473, 487, 501.
Battle of, 164.
Running the Blockade, 541.
The Attack of, 77.
Victory of South Carolina, 725.
Victory or Defeat, 130.
Voice of the Charmer, 515.

WAITING for the Tide, 620.
Walk through a Hospital, 178.
Wall Street, 95.
History, 434.
Wanted, a Reserve Force, 418.
War and Trade, 242.
War in Japan, 786.
In the North, 386.
In the Border States, the, 42.
Washburne, Major General, 764.
Wealth of our Country, 194.
Wedding in Camp, a, 219.
Of the Prince of Wales, 229.
Weed's (Mr.) Retirement, 98.
Weitzelen in the Gale, 95.
Loss of the, 819.
Western Boys, 370.
Whately, Dr., and Mrs. Stowe, 114.
What is Loyalty? 543.
What Mr. Lindsey Thinks, 707.
What shall it be? 578.
What's in the Pack? 343.
What to do with Money, 674.
Whether we are Whipped, 386.
Whiff, 634.
Whining, 19.
Whirligig of Fortune, 163.
White Elephants, 107.
Who are our Enemies in England, 146.
Who is Who? 674.
Who Quote the London "Times," 131.
Williams, Jim, 195.
Wigfall, 563.
Wilmington, Blockade at, 711.
Will the South Submit? 626.
Winter Campaign, 706.
Wiser and Better, 591.
Within and Without, 218.
Woman's Choice, 438.
Word, a, about Connecticut, 227.
Word, a, with my Connecticut Voter, 147.
Words and Things, 803.
Work before Congress, 786.
Work done by Congress, 162.
Would-be Martyrs, 370.
Wrath of Mrs. Elizabeth Gwynne, 173.

YANCEY, 626.
Year too Late, 675.

ZENAS CAREY'S Reward, 779.

POETRY.

After the Battle of Anti-tam, 423.
Azor Blockade, 130.
At Fredericksburg, 98.
Bachelor's Soliloquy, 342.
Banks, 483.
Broken Sword, the, 775.
Cavalryman's Story, 370.
Child's Question, 474.
Christmas Carol for 1862, 47.
Christmas, 1863, 818.
Church-yard Lily, 574.
Conscript's Appeal, 746.
Conscript, the, 723.
Copperhead Song for 1870, 450.
Counterparts, 106.
Dreams, 18.
Fading Photograph, 538.
First Waltz, the, 50.
Flag, the, 370.
Fort Donelson, 187.
For us, 562.
Forward—March, 210.
Gallop of Death, 706.
General Butler, 66.
Gettysburg, 459.
Ghostly Fight, the, 626.
Gone, 138.
Grave beneath the Willow, 46.
Graves of Gettysburg, 506.
Gun, the, 490.
Halfway Rock, 259.
Home, 634.
Homopathic Song, 938.
Hour and the Cause, the, 463.
I'd like to aid the Soldier, 774.
If, 6.
In an Album, 11.
In Hospital, 474.
In time of War, 613.
Jonathan to John, 374.
Last Words, 478.
Lay of the modern Konservative, 306.
Left on the Battle-field, 551.
Letter, a, 414.
Life's Answer, 167.
Lines to Jeff Davis, 82.
Lock of Hair, the, 106.
Love Song, 27.
Love's Inconsistencies, 231.
Method, 55.
Mexico, 690.
Monitor, 290.
More Light, 587.
Mother's Letter, the, 194.
My Confession, 698.
My Vision, 823.
New Battle-cry, 730.
Night Attack, 243.
No Change, 711.
Ode to the Peacemakers, 162.
One Day's Command, 338.
One Grave, 171.
One in a Thousand, 598.
Only, 7.
Only one Man killed To-day, 98.
Only Son, 703.
Our Color-sergeant, 226.
Our Country, 731.
Our Country's Dead, 210.
Our History, 94.
Our Jubilee, 270.
Over, 95.
President's Hymn, the, 770.
Rappahannock, 263.
Reminiscence of Fort Hudson, 586.
Rose de Guerre, 514.
Snow at Fredericksburg, 74.
Snowstorm at Belle Plain, 206.
Soldier's Burial, 218.
Soldier's marching Song, 738.
Soldier's Valentine, a, 111.
Something worth having, 143.
Song, 402.
Sowing of the Ages, 813.
Spanish Cloister, Soliloquy of the, 242.
Stolen Stars, 523.
Swamp Angel, 776.
Sympathy, 347.
Tempora Mutantur, 471.
Threads, 714.
To General Hooker, 322.
To Men, 754.
To my Soldier, 10.
Trifles, 343.
'Tis the repentant Saouth, 610.
Two Sons, 618.
Wanderer, 295.
Warning, 290.
Watch-fire, 322.
Wedding Words, 30.
Where are the Copperheads? 562.
Whisper, a, 626.
Wind-music and the Child, 482.
Wreck of the Monitor, 97.
Young Lady's Soliloquy, 554.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 314.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

SANTA CLAUS IN CAMP.—[See Page 6.]

AT LAST.

THE full chords, the flying, sparkling notes, the unwoven harmonies, were all one splendid mutiny; for Esther Travellian, after three weeks of depression and doubt of Raymond Leighton, was roused at last to revolt, and with head erect and sparkling eyes, rung out musical defiance in the name of Liszt, as bold and plain as words could have set it forth. And so Raymond Leighton understood it, as the throbbing notes, escaping through the opened windows, came on him tranquilly sitting on the piazza.

"Good!" he said to himself. "She is ready now to fling her glove in my face. We shall have a scene, and then I think we shall come to terms;" and throwing away his cigar he sauntered into the parlor.

She was alone, and his steps were lost in the thunder of the chromatic storm; but a Cenci hung over the piano, and in the glass of the picture she caught a blurred hint of his coming; saw a brown mustache, a dark outline, something masculine, guessed out the rest by the tingle of her blood, and the fast throbbing of her heart at the time to quell the secret insurrection, and was ready for him, with steady eye and lip, and a cold little hand that lay passive in the grasp into which he took it.

I thought you were yet in town."

"I have only been here an hour or so."

The sharp twang with which she brought how a month back "the hour or so" would have real five minutes, she could not keep from sounding in her voice.

"Well, have you nothing to tell me?"

"Nothing but my indecision, and that you shall end. The Eighth goes next week. Shall I go or stay?"

"I should hardly think there could be a doubt unless the Gideon flood turn again."

"It has flowed redly enough on more than one field," returned the young man, haughtily.

"Like the old Burgundians? "It could fort et bon ?"

"Then you wish me to go?"

"I—I have no wish about it; what is it to me?"

"True, it is nothing to you, of course," answered this maladroit Raymond, who might have seen that she had not withdrawn her hand, that she could not meet his look, that her very coldness was in itself a confession and a fear; and might have—but did not—quietly pulled his mustache wrathfully, and dubbed himself of the order of Fools.

She, disappointed in not being contradicted, flushed scarlet and drew away her hand.

"There is Darwin Ashe," she said, pettishly. "I want to go and ask about my letters." And with that she vanished.

Raymond stood looking after her.

He had thought himself so sure of her, and after all she had not used him. He had been in the afterglow, with a half-defined idea of making his loving more precious to her when he should at last confess it; but she had wholly loved and trusted her, and she— He burst out into a bitter laugh.

"Why, she is only a coquette after all; a little higher in feeling, keen enough to see through the trust and whiteness of soul might be, but like the rest at heart. And to think that I believed she loved me!"

Meanwhile Darwin Ashe, sitting in the cool room or hall, had kept his eyes on his paper, but his senses on the alert. He had heard and interpreted rightly Raymond's coming, the sudden hush of the music, the low talking. When Esther came and sat down by him, with white cheeks and eyes aflame, he said to himself, "One of the two extremes." When Raymond passed them to join a group of girls, with an ostentatious avoidance of their point of the compass, he guessed which extreme it was. And so thinking, he listened to whatever nonsense she was pleased to utter with a quiet look, not in itself a power, but he would give her nothing but a curve of the lips or a half-uttered word for her poorly-forged smiles and counterfeit talk, till, urged almost by his will, she put off at last her false self, gave a little shiver, and on a sudden was pale and silent.

"You are cold, well," said Darwin. "You have shut yourself up all this week, and the consequences are these dark circles about your eyes and that look of languor. You need exercise. Come and get your burnous, or tell me where to find it. I am going to take you out."

A sort of blunt authority that, a week ago, three hours back even, would have been resisted. As it was, she turned toward him with something of the old spirit, but the flash and sparkle died out before the soft, steady look. The main de fer held her will already in its clasp, though felt unconsciously as yet, accounted for by that facile mountebank we call our Reason; thus—

"It was pleasant to be the object of even such authoritative care" (latterly, of course, Darwin being five years her senior). "Why should she not go? There was no one else to care. No one had even seen that she suffered."

And so Raymond, cantering along the beach that afternoon, came on them under the cliffs, Esther seated on a rock cushioned with Darwin's cloak, he stretched lazily near her, the sea only neighboring them, utter solitude all mean things. It was quite natural. It had all happened in a truly unavoidable way. She had not cared to talk, and Darwin was always content to wait for hers; so they had ridden quite in silence till, out from a quiet, shaded lane, they came suddenly on the sea, rolling in on the rock-strewn beach a hundred feet below. Darwin had helped her down the breakneck path, and found a seat for her, but troubled her with no talking, and she, half forgetting that she was not alone, sat there, hushed by the rest and quiet of all about her, till Raymond passed them with a bow and a stern smile. Then she started, flushing scarlet, even called after him in her first hurry and confusion.

"It is too late," said Darwin.

"For what?"

"He will not hear you."

"Will not?"

"I mean, can not; he is gone."

"How strangely you look! I don't comprehend you."

"Nor I you."

Startled, half alarmed, Esther turned and looked into his eyes, but saw there only depths of blackness; he permitted not a gleam of his meaning to shine out to her.

"It is time to go back," she said, half uneasily. "As you like—there is no losing the train."

"You will have an hour or so in which to dress." "I shall not dress."

"Why so idyllic Mrs. Manly gives her reception." "I shall not come down."

"You will."

"I tell you no—I have my reasons."

"Not so closely masked that I can't guess them; yet, believe me, you will come."

"Why do you think so?"

"If for no better reason, because I choose it."

"Now you have given me an additional motive to stay away."

"Still you will come."

"We shall see."

"Promise me the first waltz."

"I have not waltzed since—since—" She hesitated (but Darwin knew well enough how to fill the gap) and then the doing so almost stung him out of his self-control.

"Well," he asked, sharply.

"I'll come if you will stay with you."

"So be it;" and with that they went home.

That night the drawing-rooms were silently expectant, the upper halls were echoed, with the indiscretions of half-opened doors through which came out perfumes and whisperings, glimpses of little slippers, of black lace, of white arms and shoulders, of bright hair brushed over cushions, fans and gloves sown among gilded bottles, and a general visitation of clothes-presses, with dark-eyed maids and across bright-flowered chairs; but by all these passed the fairy to the sullen door that shut in Esther in peignoir and toilet-slippers, making believe to herself that she was reading; and with an Undine-like tapping, these vanished as fairies ought when Esther came to open. Up and down the hall she looked in perplexity, saw at last at her feet a basket, only of moss, but in its centre a broad green leaf, and on it a delicate bunch of a cala lily; a fairy dropped it there, but the flower was guilty of no magic, unless it was that Raymond lived and gathered it, while the roses were drooping wearily in loosened braids over the flushed cheeks of the dancers, came, or rather dawned, Esther Travellian.

It was plain that she had never dressed herself after the brushing, powdering, and hooking-up style of ordinary mortals. Some sweet thought had compelled cloud and mist into her service, and she had floated down, not from the toilet-table, but some cyclic, unknown hall, all its chairs and luxury yet in her eyes, and bringing with her its enchantment, hidden, perhaps, in the lily rising and falling with every breath she drew.

The first eyes that met hers were those of Raymond Leighton, standing a little apart, and scanning her coldly, beating his white cuffs with what she had looked up at him with a look of bitterest anger, merciless scorn. Pale and stunned, she looked wildly about and found—and saw Darwin Ashe.

"You acknowledge yourself conquered," he said, softly; "remember the first waltz is mine."

She knew nothing about it, but probably she had smiled some time in the past, perhaps then she had talked of waltzing; so she went with him passively. The first notes, the solemn sounding of chords was done; the wave of waltz harmony was full upon them, and like foam on its crest, they floated with it, Esther's eyes fixed on those of Raymond; and as the passion of the music grew upon them he clasped her closer, and judging rightly that it was his triumph, and that the long-repressed fire to break through the outer crust of calmness, and made her—weak, helpless, despairing—feel in his look all the power he had over her, and that no saw how he had loved her, and with what quiet confidence he had waited, and with what relentless purpose he was taking vengeance against her, and how he had sent the lily, not Raymond, and explanation was impossible, and— She was fainting, breathless, and the music ceased just as if it had been wings, till they had crossed the hall and were in the dimly lighted smoking-room alone, and she had sunk like mist from his grasp on a sofa; dreading him more in his changed aspect than all else, and with a vague burning in his meaning on her brain; for touch and tone had been with the dumbness of a woman; and he was not asking, but calling her to account for it, as herself neither payer nor courage to contradict him.

There are tidings that are not told but felt, and Esther's method was of this nature. The knowledge of it was common property before half an hour was over; perhaps because Darwin chose thus to bind Esther's fidelity more securely. Soon enough it reached Raymond's ears, and having heard it with such grief and anger as may be guessed, his wild guess sent Darwin to the smoking-room, where Esther had at last persuaded Darwin to leave her for a while alone.

She was sitting with her head bowed in her hands, and either did not hear him or mistook his step for Darwin.

He laid his hand lightly on the hair that he once had ventured to caress.

"Is it so bitter?"

She started, looked up, and eagerly held out her hands, but drew back instantly, turning red, as she had been deadly pale.

"You need not tell me," he said, seeing her pale lips move. "I know it already."

"But not—you do not know—"

"All the excuses that you could devise I have found for you. You see it is hard to condemn utterly what we have loved so well."

Twice as terrible as reproaches was this bitter anger that disdained all help from outward passion in demonstrating itself! Worse than all, this stern harmonizing of love over dead faith and respect!

She shrank away from him, putting out her hands as if in deprecation.

"Raymond, you are killing me! You will never believe me now, but I loved you."

"Then I must think yet more meanly of you; for in that case your treachery is three-fold. You could at least have been true to yourself. You would have been, if your love had been worthy of the name."

"But—"

"Spare yourself. I did not come to reproach. The only blame is mine. If I mistook wax for pearl mine is the fault; and mine alone, I trust, the suffering."

"Hypocritical as well as cruel!" exclaimed Esther, passionately. "You can not, looking in my face, think that you suffer alone, and if you call me false, have you been true? Which came from your heart—he the lover, or he the false last weeks, or those of the first of this wretched summer? Surely if I am found guilty in your thought, you, men, have least right to cast the first stone at me!"

Thus was the farewell that he took with him; and, the first anger over, Esther thinking enough he found it. She, too, was haunted; night and day rang in her ears, "You could at least have been true to yourself; and you would have been, had your love been worthy of the name!" Daily her self-loathing grew more intolerable, Darwin's gifts and caresses more hateful; and at last she spoke out:

"I can not commit this sin! I will not marry him, Darwin Ashe!"

But he, long expecting some such outburst, did not think it worth his while to be discomposed; only drew the cloak from his shoulders quietly.

"I shall not release you. Do you think, when I have never once faltered in all the past, that I am going to release you now?"

"But I do not love you. I am growing to hate you."

"You will love me. Once mine, you will see the folly of further struggling, and I find such a wealth of tenderness for you in my heart that I have no fear. Your indifference, you can not leave."

"I will appeal to my aunt."

"And she will be properly shocked. She is fully alive to the position of affairs, and proud of her grave and somewhat troublesome responsibility. Expect no help from her, or from any other. I have made sure of you."

A sudden light shone in her eyes.

"Have you bribed Heaven?" she asked.

Darwin Ashe paralyzed, iron heartedness kept her under quiet surveillance; breathing in an atmosphere of his waiting and watching, she seemed to have yielded to her fate; and her passive resignation, till suddenly, three days before her marriage, she disappeared, leaving scarce so much trace behind her as the lily had done.

On the New England coast is to be found a Sir Charles Coldstream of a village, that is always running after the newspaper, and reads it as if his life, and the world, and the universe, were in the balance. Expect no help from her, or from any other, have made sure of you."

A sudden light shone in her eyes.

"Have you bribed Heaven?" she asked.

Darwin Ashe paralyzed, iron heartedness kept her under quiet surveillance; breathing in an atmosphere of his waiting and watching, she seemed to have yielded to her fate; and her passive resignation, till suddenly, three days before her marriage, she disappeared, leaving scarce so much trace behind her as the lily had done.

On the New England coast is to be found a Sir Charles Coldstream of a village, that is always running after the newspaper, and reads it as if his life, and the world, and the universe, were in the balance. Even October was at its meridian glory, such fortune in the way of gossip as is not in the memory of the oldest inhabitant.

It happened that Mrs. Stapleton, leader of village tea in the days when its decoy's wife, celebrated mysteries technically known as a sociable, principally in honor of a Captain Leighton, an old friend of ours, who had been wounded at a heroic wound, and visiting her son Bob, an old college classmate.

Now this past year had by no means been a softening one for Captain Leighton; one hard thing thought had been his company keeper night and day. He had undergone the loss of one of his—brave scar across his cheek more honorable than lovely, and altogether was a grimmer and more forbidding specimen of man. Bob, however, by one knew, specially disliking women and their petting, and not a little wrathful against Fate, who had misused him so much, had taken his father's status with a "sociable;" a thing in this case consisting principally in a setting forth of elderly people, with a last victorious effort of the unmarried old of whom, if truth must be told, he bore himself somewhat stiffly, till by the centre table he chanced to spy a stately girl, with head erect, and having a something familiar in the poise and arching of head and neck, and looking a little more earnestly, met a pair of starlit eyes—Esther's.

Captain Leighton sprang forward, crying, "Esther!" and the young person, a schoolmistress, a Miss Travelling, fell fainting in his arms.

This was the next day's gossip, but there the story ended. Miss Travellian preserved a discreet silence on recovering, and was home in safety. Captain Leighton vouchsafed no explanation, perhaps he thought none necessary. I believe, however, that he took Bob into his confidence, and it was that genial man who directed him to the Widow Brigham's after Esther's disappearance, and to negotiate the next morning (fortunately it was Saturday) he was knocking at the little door at the head of the first street, and Esther was sitting at breakfast as it had never done when marching up to a battery.

Esther came herself to answer; possibly she was expecting him, for she neither started nor exclaimed, only gave him her hand with a tri-fling blush and a little nervousness, which was not but this over, they did well pourly. Conversation dragged as heavily as Pharaoh's chariot-wheels, though it is recorded of very sensible and unnervous person that they might have talked of the weather, the war, Raymond's wound, the socialist, the pig-thing instead of pretending to sew, as Esther did, with eyes brimmed and blinded with tears, or looking pitifully about at the meagre little room, and the pale face with its look of sorrowful self-reliance like Raymond, till—"Esther, my poor child, what can have been your life?" he cried suddenly. "Oh, how much sharper must have been my self-reproach, could I have known how my stray lamb was solitary and homeless among strangers!"

"I have been very well here."

"It is well to be utterly desolate?"

"My desolation is of my own making."

"Why that is the very echo of my brutality at our parting. Can you ever forgive me for that? Think, too, not twelve weeks ago, I still thought you wholly wrong, my self altogether injured. It was on the field, among the dead and dying, where I lay a day and night before they found me, that I first saw myself; guilty of falsehood, and cowardice, criminal, when you had been weak; when back all the old sweetness of the thought of you, swore to myself to win you also, for in the light of my new revelation I felt sure that you had not married Darwin; fairly struggled out of the hands of Death, I do believe, because I was to deserve you by faith and service, and so was saved and tasely said. Yet I had almost commenced to despair, my darling! Your aunt had no traces of you, and hinted at suicide. The dressed my property treasure was hidden here: only came because I half hated the world, which perhaps had you so ill-used."

From all this talk, at once so sweet and so hard to answer, Esther shrank at first, and, for the question half whispered at the last, she could not answer than to hide her crimson face on Captain Leighton's shoulder; but presently taking heart of grace, timid fingers began to touch the scar, and a hesitating voice said, softly,

"Are you quite sure that you love me, Raymond, after all?"

Surer than that I hold you to my heart. I have half offered it to Heaven a vision."

"It has been such a weary time!" says Esther, with a little sigh.

"I thought you had been very well here."

"Oh! that signified as well as I deserved."

"Ah!"

"What is that 'ah!' Translate, if you please."

"A sigh for our prodigality with our little patrimony of happiness. Those moments are so sweet that I feel a sort of regret for those we have lost."

"Yes: but then—"

"Well, what?"

"I should never have known how much you—"

"Well?"

"I loved you."

With which reasoning as Raymond was content, so will we be.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1863.

THE CABINET EMBROGLIO.

THE battle of Fredericksburg produced its natural fruit in the shape of a Cabinet imbroglio. On 16th December a Senatorial caucus, headed, apparently, by Senators Sumner and Grimes, adopted a resolution of want of confidence in Secretary Seward, and requested the President to remove him. On the following day the resolution was amended so as merely to recommend "a partial reconstruction" of the Cabinet, without reference by name to Mr. Seward. The fact having been communicated to the Secretary, on Thursday, 18th, he placed his resignation in the President's hands. On the following day a Committee appointed at the caucus was received by the President and Cabinet, and a sharp discussion ensued, which terminated in the resignation of Governor Chase. Some of the members of the Cabinet would appear to have been so careless of dignity as to defend themselves with vehemence before the Committee, and this extraordinary meeting broke up in some confusion. Saturday and Sunday would seem to have been spent in negotiations between the Secretaries, the President, and the anti-Seward Senators; and on Monday, 22d, the President notified Messrs. Chase and Seward that the public interest would not suffer him to accept their resignations. They accordingly resumed their respective bureaus and resumed their labors. Thus ended an imbroglio which on one time threatened to be very serious, and caused a decline of 5 per cent. in Government securities.

Looking at the matter as a whole, we confess that we are astonished at the impudence of the Senate. The Constitution confers upon them no more right to demand the resignation of an obnoxious member of the Cabinet than it does New York city. When they have confirmed an appointment, their function is complete. For the Senate to attempt to dictate to the executive as to the individuals who shall serve him, or the President to assume legislative power. Such an assumption on the part of the chief magistrate would speedily end in revolution. Are not Senators Sumner and Grimes equally culpable? Some one suggests that the action of the caucus was an attempt to engraft upon our political system the method of Parliamentary pressure by which, in Great Britain, obnoxious ministries are overthrown. It is unfortunate for this argument that, according to the report, the pressure is only applied to the case of ministers who lose the confidence of the people, it was in this instance sought to be used by a caucus for the overthrow of a Secretary whose popularity is greater than it ever was, and for the maintenance of a faction which has been overwhelmingly beaten at all the State elections. The verdict of the historian on this transaction will be—not that it was proposed to introduce a new and useful political method into our system—but that by an ingenious blunder it was intended to satisfy the popular outcry for a victim by the sacrifice of the least obnoxious member of the Cabinet. Senator Sumner has not improved his record by his share in the manœuvre; nor will the popularity of Senators Fessenden, Collamer, and the other members of the caucus be increased by the weakness with which they lent their aid to the conspiracy.

General Burnside's noble and generous letter will go far to silence this outcry. Though he does not explain why the pontoon bridges were not at Fredericksburg by 21st November, when General Sumner crossed there,—which, after all, is the joint of the whole controversy—he assumes the entire responsibility of the battle, and sets at rest forever the current reports that he was ordered to cross the river by General Halleck or the President. For so much let us be thankful. Had Mr. Lincoln really ordered that movement, or suffered General Halleck to order it, the people of the North could have had no more confidence in their Government or their cause. It is a matter for profound congratulation that the terrible disaster which so distilled the heart of the loyal North a week ago did not arise from any foolhardy recklessness of the Washington officials, but was an ordinary casualty of war which does not appear to imply any want of generalship or prudence in Burnside, any lack of courage in our troops, any superiority of the rebels, or any thing but an adverse turn of Fortune's wheel.

THE BANKS EXPEDITION.

By the time this paper reaches our readers we may have intelligence of the arrival of the Banks expedition, which, as is now known by every one, was ordered to operate in Texas. It is understood that the vessels are to rendezvous off Ship Island, for operations against Mobile, but whether the first landing will be made in the Bay of Mobile or the Bay of Pensacola is still matter of conjecture. The presumption, among parties who are usually well informed, is that the landing will be made in the Pensacola, from whence a good road leads overland to Mobile, the notion being that while Farragut assailed Fort Morgan, Fort Gaines, and the other naval defenses of the harbor, Banks would lead a column of 20,000 men overland to the attack of the city itself. Were such a combined attack properly made, skill and economy of vigor Mobile would inevitably fall, unless, indeed, the rebel army in garrison there be much larger than has been supposed.

It need hardly be observed, however, that the capture of Mobile is only one of the objects which General Banks proposes to endeavor to accomplish by his march. It has been stated in the papers that he is to replace General Butler at New Orleans; and in this event he would doubtless detach a strong column of troops to attack Fort Hudson and the Red River, while the M'Clernand expedition and the army of the Southwest were assailing Vicksburg. It is reported that he will have altogether under his command an army of 60,000 men—a force which, in the hands of an able General, to accomplish any thing that may be required on the shore of the Gulf.

The rumors that he is to operate in Texas and watch the designs of the French in Mexico we believe to be without foundation. There is not the least chance of supposing that the French entertain any designs upon Texas or Louisiana. They have already on their hands an elephant of the largest dimensions in Mexico, and they are not likely to increase their stock of that beast at present. Nor is it probable that General Banks will waste any of his strength in hunting predatory bands of the vast wild area of Texas, as their capture could not shorten, or their uninterfered career prolong, the war for a single hour. The country which he will attend his north, not south of him.

A good deal of dissatisfaction has been expressed at the East at the dispatch of so large an army as Banks's to the Gulf, on the ground that it might have co-operated efficiently with General Burnside in Virginia. Had General Banks gone up the James River, or struck at Weldon, it is said the defeat of Fredericksburg would have ended differently, and we might be on the highroad to Richmond. There is no little force in these objections; and if it were clearly shown that the capture of Richmond would prove more fatal to the rebellion than the permanent opening of the Mississippi and the liberation of 2,000,000 of people from slavery would be irreversible. As it is, however, it is by no means clear that the defeat of Lee's army and even the fall of Richmond would put an end to the war; whereas the complete reopening of the great river of the West, and the restoration of peace and commerce to the Mississippi Valley, would undoubtedly settle the entire aspect of the contest. The Mississippi and its tributaries once more securely in our possession, cotton would go forth to the foreign demand, and restore the currency to a sound basis, copious supplies of Western food would revive the loyalty of the planters of the Southwest, and the isolation of Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas from the Confederacy would confine the slave empire within limits too contracted for a safe national existence. If a victory in Virginia would lead to results as important as these, then Banks might have been sent to Weldon; otherwise not.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"Bobby, what is steam?" "Boiling water." "That's right, compare it." "Portlive, boil; comparative, boiler; superlative, biler."

A little girl was standing by a window, busily examining a hair which she had just pulled from her head. "What are you doing, my daughter?" asked her mother. "I'm looking for the number, mamma," said the child; "one of the Bible says that the hairs of our head are all numbered, and I want to see what number I've on this one."

A woman has generally so much rigging about her, that, for the most part, she is the least part of herself.

A young lady from the country being invited to a party, was told by her self-conceited brother that she had got a bonnet, in order to catch a beau, "she looked so green in the country attire." The young lady was angry enough, and into the face of her rather fooled relative, and replied, "I better green than withered."

In the days of the old volunteers a respected inhabitant of Greenock commanded a company, which he duly drilled and paraded, though his services were not in any awkward regard. They never would draw up in a straight line, do what he might, so, one day, he gave it up in despair, and made his horse or he looked along the front rank—"oh, what a bow! what a bow! Just come out, lads, and look at it yourselves!"

"I say, Bill, Jim's caged for stealing a horse?" "Serve him right. I say didn't he buy one and not pay for it, like any other gentleman?"

An anxious father had been lecturing his dissolute son, and, with a most pathetic appeal to his feelings, discovering no sign of contrition, concluded thus:

"What, no relenting emotion? not one penitent tear?" "Why, father, replied the hopeful youth, "you may as well leave off 'boring' me; you will obtain no water, I assure you."

"There's two ways of doing it," said Pat to himself, as he stood mowing and waiting for a job. "If I save two shillings about it I must get up a thousand days in a row for twenty years, or I can put away two dollars a year for two hundred years! Now which shall I do?"

MR. NORONY, the party really responsible for the Fredericksburg disaster.

THE DIFFERENCE.—"Can you tell me, Jim, where they get so much corn for the manufacture into whisky?" "Why, no," says he, "but I can tell you well where the corn comes from after the whisky is made."

What do sailors do with the knots the ship makes in the log?

TOBACCO was apt to be smoky, for, as we can't see them, it is impossible to keep a watch on it.

When a provincial alderman named Gill died, his wife ordered the undertaker to inform the Court of Aldermen of the event, when he went to the office: "I am desired to inform the Court of Aldermen, Mr. Alderman Gill died last night by order of Mrs. Gill."

There are two classes of disappointed lovers; those who are disappointed before marrying, and the more unhappy who are disappointed after it."

The most under-hearted man we ever heard of was a shoemaker, who always shut his eyes and whistled when he ran his awl into a sole.

A gentleman was riding with a lady in an open carriage, "all of a summer's day," and accidentally—quite accidentally—put his arm over in the way—dropped on and around her waist. She objected very much to it, and told the arm gruffly relieved the side of the carriage of the pressure caused by it. A sudden pleasant frown is the recognition of the impropriety of the thing, or the sight of another lady coming, never was known to be half started with volcanic energy, and with a flashing eye, exclaimed, "Sir, I desire it may be removed." "Madam," he answered, "I am exceedingly sorry."

The gallant army which is now gathering around Vicksburg is the noblest reply, we believe, that the people of the North could have made to the calumnies of the Democratic Congress. The resolution of inquiry relative to the alleged outrages upon the rights of citizens and the conduct of the War in Prairie into and report to the Senate the facts relative to the arrest of Vallandigham, by Burnside, and particularly as to what officer or officers are responsible for the wrong which was done to that person and his works; and also for the delay which occurred in preparing to meet the enemy at Fredericksburg, before the reinforcements of the cavalry force was passed; also the bill to facilitate the discharge of disabled soldiers from the army and aid in the inspection of convalescent camps and hospitals. The Bankrupt bill and the bill to provide for the sale of the effective speeds in favor of its passage. The Senate then adjourned over to the House of Representatives, and, examining in the aggregate appropriations to the amount of $691,000,000 for the support of the army for the year ending June, 1863, was passed by a vote of 107 to 3. An amendment to the bill was offered by Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, but rejected by the House, to the effect that none of the appropriations should be used for the purpose of running slaves, or for emancipating or colonizing them. The Senate amendments were intended to report at any early day whether letters of marque ought not to be issued for the purpose of arming or destroying the vessels now known as the "No. 290," or the Alabama, and other vessels of like armament, now fitting out in the ports of Great Britain for the purpose of preying upon our commerce, and to report a bill, if necessary, for such further legislation, if any, is necessary for that purpose. A joint resolution was introduced into the House to fill vacancies created by total relations for slaves wrongfully taken or detained, with the restoration of the Union as it did not get. After considerable debate the bill was laid on the table by a vote of 80 yeas to 74 nays. The remainder of the session was occupied with speeches and political topics.

On Friday, 19th, in the Senate, a resolution calling on the Secretary of War for information relative to the Court of Inquiry which was ordered by the Commissioners of General Dix in Kentucky was laid over. The bill to amend the Act to provide for the more prompt settling Congress to authorize the issue of letters of marque and reprisal, and to grant rules concerning captures in water. A bill granting pecuniary aid to the Union Pacific Railroad Company was referred to the Judiciary Committee. The consideration of the resolution providing for a joint select committee on the subject of compensating States for the emancipation of their slaves was postponed. The House bill to amend the Acts of several verbal amendments adopted, and the Senate adjourned over to Monday. In the House the bill to facilitate the discharge of disabled soldiers and the inspection of convalescent camps was passed by a vote of 78 to 50. Speeches of Mr. Flanders, the new member from Louisiana, were delivered in favor of the admission of Mr. Hahn, and of Vallandigham, however, objected, and the papers were referred to the Committee of Elections. The bill making appropriations for invalid and other pensions was passed. The bill to amend the Act relative to the limitation of suits, recently introduced by him, saying it was his own act, was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means or with the Secretary of the Treasury. He was opposed to the appointment of Mr. Chase. A bill relations thanking Lieutenant Commanding Morris, of the Cumberland, for his gallantry in the fight with the Merrimac, the Monitor, for their gallantry in the engagement with the Merrimac was passed. These thanks are a necessary preliminary to the promotion of these officers.

On Monday, 22d, in the Senate, the Vice-President laid before the Senate a communication in response to the resolution of inquiry relative to the chartered vessels of the Government employed in the service of the War, and for which they were engaged. Resolutions were offered and adopted calling upon the Secretary of the Interior for copies and the expediency of attaching the marine corps to the army. Resolutions were offered and adopted by the House the Senate information in regard to captains and commanders in the navy, and to the appointment of Admiral Hunterdon and Penance. The resolution of inquiry relative to the alleged outrages upon the rights of citizens and the conduct of the War in Prairie into, was discussed, but not finally disposed of, and the bill relating to the exchange of State prisoners was taken up, and Senator Lane, of Indiana, addressed the Senate in favor of the bill, and was replied to by other Senators, after which the bill was passed. The Senate then went into executive session, and on the opening of the doors adjourned over to Monday. In the House Mr. Hiss, Representative from the First Congressional district of Louisiana, was qualified and entered. A memorial was presented and referred to the Military Committee inquiring of the Secretary of War whether officers and soldiers are now in service to whom pay is due, and why they have not been paid. A bill to amend the Act to prevent desertion was offered by Mr. Vallandigham, and laid over. A resolution was offered by Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, to protect all the thirty-six members against the bill recently passed, declaring slaves free, and others for sweeping and all irregular proceedings. The resolution was tabled by 75 to 57. Bills were offered and referred to regulate promotion in the Western Territories. The President was requested to inform the House if any contracts had been entered into, whether our Minister to Mexico has been using his influence in the interest of any of the contractors. The Ways and Means Committee were instructed to canvass the expediency of issuing a loan of $150,000,000 in bonds, with a circulation not exceeding twenty-five hundred shall be exempt from taxation. The bill was passed, and referred providing for the emancipation of slaves in the rebel States. The bill was passed, but failed, taking the information of the President in reference to the alleged order of the Secretary of War to General Burnside to have the prisoners against employing ground. A resolution was passed declaring that the Committee of Congress on the claims of soldiers and sailors should take precedence in settlement of all claims. A resolution was offered requiring to give gold medals to the small brave band who rescued the Union prisoners at Fredericksburg to avoid the city of rebel shop-keepers. It was referred to the Military Committee. The House then adjourned over to Tuesday, the first Monday in January. Some other business was transacted, which we have then adjourned.

GENERAL BURNSIDE'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, CAMP BELLE PLAIN, December 16, 1862.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief United States Army, Washington:

GENERAL.—I have the honor to offer the following reasons for having the Army of the Potomac across the Rappahannock river at Fredericksburg, by the President, Secretary of War, or yourself, and for ceasing at a point different from that where I began to go at or in advance of the President's.

During my preparations for crossing at the place I had first selected I discovered that the enemy had thrown a large portion of his forces on the hills immediately in their weakening his defenses in front, and also thought I discovered that a portion of his forces had left the front of the whole force at Fredericksburg; and I hoped, by rapidly throwing the whole command across and that place, to separate, by a vigorous attack, the force of the enemy on the right from that on the left, and, based on the river and in the rear of the town, in which case we could fight him with great advantage to the army.

To do this and to gain a height on the extreme right of the enemy, which height commanded a new road lately made by the enemy for purposes of more rapid communication along his lines, which point gained, his position along the crest would have been entirely tenable, and he could have been driven from them easily by an attack on his front in connection with a movement in the rear of the crest.

How near we came to accomplishing our object future reports will show. But for the fog and any control and mismanagement in building the bridges, which gave the enemy nearly four hours more to concentrate his forces in his strong position, we would almost certainly have succeeded, in which case the battle would have been in my opinion, far more decisive than it we had crossed on the place first selected. As it was, we came very near success.

Failing in accomplishing the main object, we remained in order of battle two days long enough to decide that the enemy would not come out of his strongholds to fight us with his infantry—after which we returned to the side of the river occupied without the loss of men or property.

As the day broke our left was the first of the army to march to the support of different positions as if going on parade. Not the least demoralization or disorganization of any kind was observed, and the whole movement was conducted with the coolness and precision of a review.

The fact that I decided to move from Warrenton on to this line, rather against the opinion of the President, secretary of War, and yourself, is known to you all. The whole movement in my hands, without giving me orders, misses my responsibility.

I will visit you very soon and give you more definite information, and, finally, will send you my detailed report, in which a special acknowledgment will be made of the services of the different officers and troops of my personal and staff departments of the Army of the Potomac, to whom I can not speak too highly for their energy and heavy co-operating.

I will add here that the movement was made entire than you expected; and after the President, Secretary, and yourself requested me to be in front of the line, I felt that we were supplied much sooner by the different staff departments than we could have been by any other.

Our killed amounts to eleven hundred and fifty-two; our wounded, to about nine thousand; our missing, to about seven hundred, which last have been posted and I estimated for about the same number of rebels.

The wounded were all removed to this side of the river, and are being well cared for, and the dead are all buried under a flag of truce.

I am vigorous report a much larger proportion of slight wounds than usual, 1622 only being treated in hospitals.

I am glad to say that the health of the army is now in good condition.

Tuesday the Government for that entire support and confidence which I have always received from them, I remain, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. E. BURNSIDE,
Major-General commanding the Army of the Potomac.

WHY GENERAL BURNSIDE RECROSSED THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, Dec. 16—6 P.M.

Major-General Halleck, Commander-in-Chief:

The Army of the Potomac was withdrawn to this side of the Rappahannock because I deemed it impossible that the position in front could not be carried, and it was the last day I could expect to stay, for reasons which I and I repulse would have been disastrous to us under existing circumstances.

The army was withdrawn at night without the knowledge of the enemy, and without the loss of property or men. AMBROSE E. BURNSIDE,
Major-General commanding.

THE VICTORY AT KINSTON.

The following was received on 20th at the head-quarters of the army in Washington:

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF NORTH CAROLINA, KINSTON, December 15, 1862.

Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington:

GENERAL.—I have the honor to report to you that I left Newbern for this place on the 11th instant, but that, owing to the bad roads and other delays to my trains, etc., I did not reach Southwest creek, the enemy's position, until the afternoon of the 14th instant. The enemy were posted on the bluffs of the heavy timbered creek, and as the heavy infantry attack on either flank, I succeeded in securing a passage, and crossed the creek.

This morning I advanced on this town, and found the enemy in position about a mile in a defile through a heavy wooding on a creek. The position was so well chosen that the enemy had burned the bridge of our advancing. The main attack, therefore, was made by the infantry, sustained by a few pieces of artillery. After a short time, after a few hours' hard fight we succeeded in driving the enemy from his position. We followed him across the bridge to the river. The bridge over the Neuse at this point was guarded by two guns, which we fired in a few shots, when we drove behind them that we seized the bridge.

The following officers were killed: Lieut. Goldsbrough and Pikeville roads. Their force was about six thousand men, with eight guns. Their loss is unknown.

The result is, we have taken Kinston, captured eleven pieces of artillery, a large quantity of ammunition necessary, and found a large amount of quarter-master's and commissary stores. The enemy will probably not attempt to hold Kinston, and we will not. I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

AMBROSE E. BURNSIDE,
Major-General Commanding.

ANOTHER SOUTHWESTERN RAID.

Dispatches from Cairo state that a force of rebel cavalry, variously estimated at from two thousand to eight thousand men, under the command of Generals Forrest, Jackson, Tennessee, on 20th. After firing into a train, they left for Trenton, burning railroad bridges, and burning a long trestle work. The operator at Trenton reports an attack on that place. The force has been considerably reinforced at Columbus in anticipation of a rebel raid to that place.

GENERAL BRAGG RELIEVED INTO NEW ORLEANS.

General Beauregard's wife is now lying dangerously sick in New Orleans, and General Butler has sent to General Bragg, requesting permission to allow Beauregard to visit her. Bragg has consented, and has ordered a steamer to convey her husband to Mobile.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Wednesday, December 17, in the Senate, little to-day but the pay of officers of the army was altered from day to improve the organization of the cavalry forces, and to facilitate the discharge of disabled soldiers, and the inspection of convalescent camps and hospitals, were reported back by the Military Committee. The consideration of the bill providing for the discharge of State prisoners, and allowing judges of United States courts to take bail to secure their trial, was postponed till Monday, and the Senate then adjourned. In the House, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for 1863, which was made the special order for Tuesday. A bill was introduced, providing of Quartermaster-General to which was read pending, or which may hereafter arise, wherein any ship, vessel, or other property may be confiscated, the court rendering judgment shall, before making award, first provide for the payment of any bona fide claim filed by any loyal citizen or friendly foreigner, where proof of the claim shall be established. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee. The resolution referring the topics of the President's Message to the various committees was taken up. Mr. Nesbit, of Missouri, made a strong speech in support of the war policy of the Administration. At the conclusion of Mr. Nesbit's remarks the resolution was adopted, and the House adjourned.

On Thursday, 18th, in the Senate, a resolution was adopted calling upon the Secretary of War for the report of the Court of Inquiry which was ordered by the Commissioners of General Dix in Kentucky was laid over. The bill to amend the Act to provide for the more prompt settling Congress to authorize the issue of letters of marque and reprisal, and to grant rules concerning captures in water. A bill granting pecuniary aid to the Union Pacific Railroad Company was referred to the Judiciary Committee. The consideration of the resolution providing for a joint select committee on the subject of compensating States for the emancipation of their slaves was postponed. The House bill to amend the Acts of several verbal amendments adopted, and the Senate adjourned over to Monday. In the House the bill to facilitate the discharge of disabled soldiers and the inspection of convalescent camps was passed by a vote of 78 to 50. Speeches of Mr. Flanders, the new member from Louisiana, were delivered in favor of the admission of Mr. Hahn, of Vallandigham, however, objected, and the papers were referred to the Committee of Elections. The bill making appropriations for invalid and other pensions was passed. The bill to amend the Act relative to the limitation of suits, recently introduced by him, saying it was his own act, was referred to the Committee on the Committee of Ways and Means or with the Secretary of the Treasury. He was opposed to the appointment of Mr. Chase. A bill relations thanking Lieutenant Commanding Morris, of the Cumberland, for his gallantry in the fight with the Merrimac, the Monitor, for their gallantry in the engagement with the Merrimac was passed. These thanks are a necessary preliminary to the promotion of these officers.

On Monday, 22d, in the Senate, the Vice-President laid before the Senate a communication in response to the resolution of inquiry relative to the chartered vessels of the Government employed in the service of the War, and for which they were engaged. Resolutions were offered and adopted calling upon the Secretary of the Interior for copies and the expediency of attaching the marine corps to the army. Resolutions were offered and adopted by the House the Senate information in regard to captains and commanders in the navy, and to the appointment of Admiral Hunterdon and Penance. The resolution of inquiry relative to the alleged outrages upon the rights of citizens and the conduct of the War in Prairie into, was discussed, but not finally disposed of, and the bill relating to the exchange of State prisoners was taken up, and Senator Lane, of Indiana, addressed the Senate in favor of the bill, and was replied to by other Senators, after which the bill was passed. The Senate then went into executive session, and on the opening of the doors adjourned over to Monday. In the House Mr. Hiss, Representative from the First Congressional district of Louisiana, was qualified and entered. A memorial was presented and referred to the Military Committee inquiring of the Secretary of War whether officers and soldiers are now in service to whom pay is due, and why they have not been paid. A bill to amend the Act to prevent desertion was offered by Mr. Vallandigham, and laid over. A resolution was offered by Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, to protect all the thirty-six members against the bill recently passed, declaring slaves free, and others for sweeping and all irregular proceedings. The resolution was tabled by 75 to 57. Bills were offered and referred to regulate promotion in the Western Territories. The President was requested to inform the House if any contracts had been entered into, whether our Minister to Mexico has been using his influence in the interest of any of the contractors. The Ways and Means Committee were instructed to canvass the expediency of issuing a loan of $150,000,000 in bonds, with a circulation not exceeding twenty-five hundred shall be exempt from taxation. The bill was passed, and referred providing for the emancipation of slaves in the rebel States. The bill was passed, but failed, taking the information of the President in reference to the alleged order of the Secretary of War to General Burnside to have the prisoners against employing ground. A resolution was passed declaring that the Committee of Congress on the claims of soldiers and sailors should take precedence in settlement of all claims. A resolution was offered requiring to give gold medals to the small brave band who rescued the Union prisoners at Fredericksburg to avoid the city of rebel shop-keepers. It was referred to the Military Committee. The House then adjourned over to Tuesday, the first Monday in January. Some other business was transacted, which we have then adjourned.

GENERAL BURNSIDE'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, CAMP BELLE PLAIN, December 16, 1862.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief United States Army, Washington:

GENERAL.—I have the honor to offer the following reasons for having the Army of the Potomac across the Rappahannock river at Fredericksburg, by the President, Secretary of War, or yourself, and for ceasing at a point different from that where I began to go at or in advance of the President's.

During my preparations for crossing at the place I had first selected I discovered that the enemy had thrown a large portion of his forces on the hills immediately in their weakening his defenses in front, and also thought I discovered that a portion of his forces had left the front of the whole force at Fredericksburg; and I hoped, by rapidly throwing the whole command across and that place, to separate, by a vigorous attack, the force of the enemy on the right from that on the left, and, based on the river and in the rear of the town, in which case we could fight him with great advantage to the army.

To do this and to gain a height on the extreme right of the enemy, which height commanded a new road lately made by the enemy for purposes of more rapid communication along his lines, which point gained, his position along the crest would have been entirely tenable, and he could have been driven from them easily by an attack on his front in connection with a movement in the rear of the crest.

How near we came to accomplishing our object future reports will show. But for the fog and any control and mismanagement in building the bridges, which gave the enemy nearly four hours more to concentrate his forces in

THE ATTACK ON THE REBEL WORKS AT FREDERICKSBURG BY THE CENTRE GRAND DIVISION OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, ON DECEMBER 13, 1862.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 6.]

FREDERICKSBURG ON THE NIGHT OF 11th DECEMBER, 1862.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 6.]

OUR SOLDIERS IN THE STREETS OF FREDERICKSBURG.—DRAWN BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 6.]

MAJOR-GENERAL FRANKLIN'S GRAND DIVISION CROSSING THE RAPPAHANNOCK ON 12TH DECEMBER, 1862.—[FROM A SKETCH BY MR. DAVIS.]

IF!

AH, dearest, if our tears were shed
Only for our beloved—dead!
Although our Life's left incomplete,
Tears would not be so bitter, sweet,
As now!—ah, no.

Ah, dearest, if the friends who die
Alone were those who make us sigh;
Although Life's current is so fleet,
Sighs would not be so windy, sweet,
As now!—ah, no.

If oft more pain it did not give
To know that our beloved live,
Than learn their hearts have ceased to beat,
Grief would not be so hopeless, sweet,
As now!—ah, no.

THE BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

We publish on page 4 two pictures from sketches by Mr. A. R. WAUD, representing respectively FREDERICKSBURG ON THE NIGHT OF 11TH, and the ATTACK ON THE REBEL WORKS BY THE CUSTER THE GRAND DIVISION OF DECEMBER 13TH; on page 5 an illustration of OUR TROOPS IN THE STREETS OF FREDERICKSBURG, also from a sketch by Mr. A. R. WAUD; and on this page a picture from a sketch by Mr. DAVIS, representing THE PASSAGE OF THE RIVER by General Franklin's Grand Division.

The following extract from the Herald correspondence will serve to explain the EVE OF THE BATTLE.

All the morning and afternoon the regiments comprising the Ninth army corps were in readiness to receive order to cross the river. The men were prepared for a march, and had every thing with them in case they had to remain on the other side or to push forward. The night was passed with the vast number of men, all armed and in every respect ready for a battle at a moment's notice, encamped. Turn where you would and you encountered troops. Here in a hollow would be hidden a brigade, with their arms stacked, and the men lying on the ground resting themselves, while the officers would be collected together chatting over the events of the day, commanding and the chances of a great and decisive conflict; and on the open plain like square blocks of stacked arms showed that the word need not be given, and in a twinkling thousands of officers and twenty hands would seize them and be ready for the fight. Quite a number of the regiments were encamped very close to the position that it was found unnecessary to take them from their camp, and they were permitted to remain these until about four o'clock in the afternoon, at which time the bridges were just ready and the troops were expecting orders to march. They were then all drawn up in line, and every body was in his place. During the day the heads of the different regiments endeavored to aid by performing national and operatic airs, which afforded a most striking contrast to the burning of the artillery and the sharp hissing of the shells as they rushed through the air on their missions of death.

THE STREETS OF FREDERICKSBURG.

Mr. Waud's picture is well described in the following extract from the Herald correspondence:

No one could better understand what war is than by taking a stroll through the streets of the almost destroyed city of Fredericksburg. Turn where you will and your eye meets some evidence of the terrific fire that was hurled from our guns into the streets and dwellings. Nothing appears to have escaped. Roofs, walls, fences, trees, and chimneys are perforated; and in some instances to such an extent that the side of a house presents the appearance of a huge pepper-box, the holes are so numerous and regular, while immediately beside it are the smoking and ragged ruins of a stately dwelling. Some of remains of what once was a stately dwelling. Some of the houses on the river-front are completely torn to pieces, and as one turned from one street to another the scenes, and as one turned from one street to another the scenes would naturally rise to his mind—How could mortal human beings have lived? And yet, strange to say, any thing remain here to live? I have yet to learn of any casualty to those who did so. Quite a number, after the fashion of the citizens of Harrisburg, took their families into the cellars of their houses, and there remained in safety. In one house I found about a dozen ladies and a few gentlemen. When we entered they emerged from their place of refuge and received us with open arms. The majority of them are good Union people, and are not unknown to a number of our officers, who were here some months ago. I had but little opportunity of speaking to them. In all, I suppose some fifteen or twenty families remained, and can not see what them all from our cannon's declaration. Instead of looking for a house that has been struck, the difficulty is to find one that has not suffered more or less. The streets are piled with bricks from the chimneys, and in fact the city looks as if it wanted to be hauled all over again. The Rebels have wonderfully escaped, having been but partially injured, and the steeples are nearly as good as ever. The Bank of the State of Virginia was burned down, and I am very much surprised that the greater part of the city was not reduced to ashes, as the number of house bonuses, one would suppose, would serve to spread the flames.

The street running along the river gave strong evidence of the intention of the rebels as to stopping our crossing. It was completely lined with rifle-pits, and stone fences were made to answer the same purpose. From behind these the sharp-shooters picked off our men, until compelled to retreat themselves.

The houses were nearly all empty of furniture, with the exception of some old chairs, tables, and the like. In one house was a good piano undisturbed. Whatever remained in the building was soon in the possession of the soldiers, and as there was nothing of value, it was some little time before they were furnished with. Some ludicrous scenes were the consequence, the men arraying themselves in old hats, bonnets, etc., and parading the streets. This interfered with discipline, however, and an order was given that any one found with any article that was taken from a house should be a deserving of great praise for his the Provost Marshal, by whom the order was issued. The men for a time took all they could lay their hands on, and tubs, rakes, buckets, and pots could by their hands on, and tubs, rakes, buckets, and pots could by their hands on, and tubs, rakes, buckets, and pots could be seen in every direction carried away, to be thrown into of all descriptions were carried away, to be thrown into the street at the next crossing. Tobacco appeared to be very plenty, and all the soldiers had their pockets and haversacks filled with it. It was quite a luxury to them, as they had been paying the robbing sutlers from two to three dollars a pound for stretched stuff.

In an bedroom on a corner I perceived the bodies of about a dozen men, who were lying there previous to being buried. They were all our own men, with one exception, and he was an aged man, to all appearance fifty sixty years old. His dress was that of a citizen, and he had been shot while in the act of aiming his pistol, for even in death his arm remained their position, and his face was the mark of hate. Probably the old man, carried away by his passion, volunteered; but dearly he paid for his mistaken zeal. Our own men were properly interred, with their names and regiments placed over their graves.

THE CHARGE.

The following graphic account of the attack is from the Times correspondence:

The time had now come to attempt an advance on the rebel position.

The orders were to move rapidly; charge up the hills and take the batteries at the point of the bayonet. Order, easy to give, but, ah! how brief of execution!

Look at the position to be stormed.

There is a bare plateau of a third of a mile, which the storming party will have to cross. In doing so they will be exposed to the fire, first, of the enemy's sharp-shooters, posted behind a stone wall running along the base of the ridge—of a double row of rifle-pits on the rim of the crest—of the heavy batteries behind strong field-works that stud the top of the hill—of a powerful infantry force now being concealed behind these—of a plunging fire from the batteries on the lower range—of a double enfilading fire from "canon to right of them, cannon to left of them." Schoolgirl was not half so crying.

The line of battle was formed by Condé's Corps (the French), composed of the Divisions of French, Hazzard, and Howard, the left of the line abutting on Sturgis's Division of Wilcox's Corps (the Ninth). The first advanced was French's, composed of the brigades of Kimball, Morris, and Wetherby, supported by Hancock's Division, consisting of the brigades of Caldwell, Zook, and Meagher.

Forming his men under cover of a small knoll in the rear of the town, skirmishers were deployed to the left toward Hazel Toll; Sturgis, supporting at the same time, moved up, and rested on a point, on the railroad.

The moment they exposed themselves on the railroad forth burst the deadly hail. From their rifle-pits came the murderously-aimed missiles; from the batteries, tier above tier, on the terraces, shot planes of fire; from the enfilading cannon, distributed on the air of a circle two miles in extent, came great showers of shot and shell.

Imagine, if you can, for my resources are unequal to the task of telling you, the identical of that gallant but doomed division.

Across the plain for a while they swept under this fatal fire. They were literally mowed down. The bursting shells make great gaps in their ranks; but these are promptly filled by the "closing up" of the line. For fifteen immortal minutes at least they remain under this fiery surge. Onward they press, though their ranks grow fearfully thin. They have passed over a greater part of the interval and have almost reached the base of the hill, when brigade after brigade of rebels rise up on the crest and pour in fresh volleys of musketry at short range. To those who, through the glass, looked on, it was a perfect sight indeed. Flesh and blood could not endure it. They fell back shattered and broken amidst shouts and yells from the enemy.

General French's Division went into the fight six thousand strong; but as night he told me he could count but fifteen hundred!

FRANKLIN CROSSES.

The Herald correspondent thus describes how Franklin's Grand Division crossed the river:

The left Grand Division, commanded by Major-General Franklin, crossed on pontoon bridges above a mile below Fredericksburg. General Devens's brigade had the honor of the advance, and of occupying the ground during Thursday night. The Second Rhode Island regiment—of which General Burnside was once a member—led the brigade at a double quick, in gallant style, followed by the Tenth and Thirty-seventh Massachusetts regiments. The bridge passed quietly, and at daylight the main portion of the left wing command crossed, and encamped until the whole were over. The morning was beautiful and the troops in the spirit, and every thing looked auspicious.

The enemy could be seen occupying a strong position upon a long range of hills about three miles back of Fredericksburg, intrenched as usual.

A more beautiful sight can not be imagined than our army presented as they were formed into line of battle, with the artillery in front, supported on either side by the infantry drawn up in columns of divisions, with General Bayard's splendid cavalry in the centre. General Reynolds's corps occupied the extreme left, with General Smith on his right. The enemy continued to maintain a strict silence, although they were in a position to see all our movements.

It was nearly two o'clock before our army was in readiness to advance when the Eighteenth and Thirty-second New York regiments were sent in front of General Smith's corps as skirmishers, and also portions of the First New Jersey and First Pennsylvania cavalry. They had advanced only about half a mile when they came in contact with the skirmishers of the enemy, who slowly fell back, firing, wounding quite a number of our men. By the time our batteries had reached the position intended to occupy darkness came on, and our troops slept upon their arms till morning without any fighting.

SANTA CLAUS AMONG OUR SOLDIERS.

CHILDREN, you mustn't think that Santa Claus comes to you alone. You see him in the picture on pages 8 and 9 throwing out toxes to the soldiers, and in the one on page 1 you see what they contain. In the fore-ground you see a little drummer-boy, who, on opening his Christmas-box, beholds a jack-in-the-box spring up, much to his astonishment. His companion is so much amused at so interesting a phenomenon that he forgets his own box, and for his in the mean, unopened, beside him. He was just going to take a bite out of that apple in his hand, but the sight of his friend's gift has made him forget all about it. He has his other hand on a Harper's Weekly. Santa Claus has brought lots of those for the soldiers, so that they, too, as well as you little folks, may have a peep at the Christmas number.

One soldier, on the left, finds a stocking in his box stuffed with all sorts of things. Another, right behind him, has got a meerschaum pipe, just what he has been wishing for ever so long.

Santa Claus is entertaining the soldiers by showing them Jeff Davis's future. He is tying a cord pretty tightly round his neck, and Jeff seems to be kicking very much at such a fate.

He hasn't got to the soldiers in the back-ground yet, and they are still amusing themselves at their merry games. One of them is trying to climb a greased pole, and, as he slips down sometimes farther than he goes up, all the others who are looking at him have a great deal of fun at his expense. Others are chasing a greased boar. One fellow thought he just had him; but he is so slippery that he can't hold him, and so he tumbles over on his face, and the next one that comes tumbles over him.

In another place they are playing a game of football, and getting a fine appetite for their Christmas dinner, which is cooking on the fire. See how nicely the soldiers have decorated the encampment with greens in honor of the day! And they are firing a salute to Santa Claus from the fort, and they have erected a triumphal arch to show him how welcome he is to them.

But Santa Claus must hurry up and not stay here too long; for he has to go as far south as New Orleans, and over so far out West; so he says, "Glang!" and away he goes through the arch like lightning, for he must give all our soldiers a Merry Christmas.

OUR MAP OF NORTH CAROLINA.

THE accompanying MAP will enable our readers to understand the recent movements of our armies in North Carolina. General Foster has taken the little town of Kinston, North Carolina, on the Neuse River, and was at latest dates en route for Goldsborough, and perhaps Weldon. On the other side, the army of the Blackwater, which is commanded by General Dix, made a strong reconoissance toward Zuni, evidently aiming at the same point—Weldon. We presume that time will develop this important strategical plan, and that the Generals in charge will be enabled to carry it out successfully.

THE PORTER COURT-MARTIAL.

ON page 12 we illustrate the COURT-MARTIAL OF GENERAL FITZ-JOHN PORTER, which is now being held at Washington. The accused is being tried on various charges, the joint of which is disobedience of the orders of his commanding-officer, Major-General John Pope. General Pope charges that General Porter, by failing to move to his support at the hour mentioned, enabled the rebels to defeat him, and prevented his destroying them, as he would otherwise have done. General Porter claims that he did all that he could, and is in no wise answerable for the disasters of Pope's campaign. Additional interest is imparted to the trial by the circumstance that General Porter is identified more or less with the M'Clellan interest, and General Pope has enjoyed, and may still enjoy, the confidence of General Halleck. The members of the Court are Major-Generals Hunter, King, Hitchcock, and Casey, and Brigadier-Generals Rickett, Garfield, Prentiss, Defeed, Slough, and Lord. Judge Holt is Judge-Advocate. The accused is assisted by his counsel, Reverdy Johnson. General Pope is present watching the proceedings in citizen's dress.

ONLY.

Only another sword
Dripping with human blood;
Only another drop
Swelling the crimson flood.

Only another tear
Wiped from the face of time;
Only a brother dear
Lost in his manhood's prime!

Smoothly the garments fold
Over the silent breast.
Only another soul
Gone to its dreamless rest!

AN EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

"EVERY young man ought to enlist—every one!"

Letty Dallas flashed the blue light of her eyes, half smiling half scornful, upon Mr. St. Mayne as she spoke. A straight, lithe maiden, with black ripples of shining hair, and blue eyes, full of shadow, like late-blossomed violets, it was not in the nature of any male individual to endure her upright-ly badinage unmoved. Yet Marcy St. Mayne only smiled as he stood quietly watching her.

"Are you so very anxious to secure volunteers, Miss Letty?"

"Anxious? of course I am! Come, Mr. St. Mayne, follow your brother's example, and turn soldier!"

St. Mayne smiled with provoking coolness.

"Oh, if I could only inspire you with a spark of my enthusiasm!" said Letty, with glowing cheeks and flashing eyes. "What sacrifice wouldn't I make for the Banner of Stars!"

"Would you really sacrifice much?"

"Any thing—every thing!"

St. Mayne lifted his long dark lashes, and looked her full in the face with an expression she could hardly comprehend!

"Am I beginning to make some impression on that icicle nature of yours?" she laughed. "What bounty shall I offer? A ribbon? a smile? or a bouquet?"

"Letty!" said St. Mayne, calmly and deliberately, "I do require bounty—a bounty beyond money and beyond price!"

"What a solemn preface!" said Letty, lightly. "Well?"

"I will be your soldier, Letty, and fight as man never fought before, until your own lips bid me lay down the sword, if you will promise me, some day, with your own sweet self. That is the bounty I require!"

The deep crimson which had dyed her face turned suddenly to ashy whiteness—she leaned against the carved mantle cupids of the mantle, that he might not see how she trembled.

"No, no! I can not! I can not! Any thing but that!" broke from her quivering lips.

"Pardon me!" said St. Mayne, "I see I have overestimated the amount of the sacrifice you are prepared to make for your country. You are willing that we men should baptize with our blood the steps that lead to Freedom's altar, yet you can not give up one idle dream, one girlish fancy, in its behalf. Do I seem harsh?" he added, as her eyes were raised appealingly to his face. "Nay, I did not mean it. There, Miss Letty, our negotiations shall be forgotten!"

"Stop, Mr. St. Mayne!" she said, folding her little hands so tightly together that the pink-tipped nails turned to rose leaves. "You are right in speaking bitterly of idle fancies. I accept your proposition—go, as my representative, on to the battlefield!"

His face lighted up with sudden brilliance.

MAP OF NORTH CAROLINA, SHOWING THE FIELDS OF OPERATIONS OF GEN. FOSTER AND THE ARMY OF THE BLACKWATER.

"And then?"

"And then—your devoirs shall not be unrewarded!"

He took the cold hand tenderly in his.

"I will lay down my life, if need be, in token of my thanks," he said.

Over—it was all over! She had given up all that a woman holds dearest for her country's sake, yet she hushed the sobs that struggled up from her breaking heart, and tried to think she had done right. And then she took a tiny-folded paper from her bosom—only a playful note about some japonica that Walter St. Mayne had once written her, and burned it, without daring to read its contents over.

"I can not lay down my life for the good cause," she moaned, "but I can yield up my life's happiness. When a soldier falls, shot through the heart, the pain is over; but oh! mine will ache on forever. Yet I should not repine—it is for my country."

White and silent, she sat there, while the sunset flamed through the silken purple folds of the curtains, and touched the dark old paintings with gold. Sweet, faint odors rose from the marble vases of heliotrope and roses in the bay-window—to Letty they seemed like the scent of those pale flowers that grow in cemetery shadows. And the gray, gray twilight came at last.

The night before the battle! St. Mayne never forgot the starry silence of the heavens without—the peculiar aromatic odor of the pine cones crackling on the stone hearth of the rude Virginia cabin —not even the ragged crevices in the log wall. He remembered them all as long as memory and life endured.

There was a light, elastic step on the threshold, a clink of spurs against the floor, and a tall, brown-faced officer stood beside him, laying a careless hand on St. Mayne's shoulder.

"Writing letters, Marcy? Don't lay them aside —there are no secrets between brothers."

"You are right," said St. Mayne; "there should be none. I am writing to my engaged wife."

Walter St. Mayne held out his hand in smiling congratulation.

"Engaged, old fellow! And never told me? But who is the lady?"

"Miss Dallas—our lovely little Letty."

"Dallas! Letty Dallas?"

Walter St. Mayne's head fell on his folded arms, both resting on the rude camp-table, and a low groan broke from his lips.

"Walter, are you ill?"

"No, not ill," stammered the young man, in a stifled voice. "Only I am tired, and these pine cones fires have such a suffocating smell. Don't be uneasy. I shall be better soon. Go on writing to—to Letty Dallas."

St. Mayne looked at his brother's drooping head with a keen, agonized gaze. He asked no questions, but quietly folded away his papers, and sat regarding the fire until Walter St. Mayne looked up again.

"We are to fight to-morrow, they tell me, Walter," he said. "Well, I'm glad of it. But, Walter, if—" He paused a moment, then resumed, "if I fall, you will not forget the brother who loved you far better than his own life. Promise me that!"

And Walter promised, with his forehead resting on Marcy's shoulder, where it had often, often lain when they were both boys.

But Marcy St. Mayne did not fall. By his side, through all the din and tumult of battle, walked his unseen guardian-angel; and when he bore his young brother from the red field, a sabre-wound across his brow, the shout of "Victory!" sounded like a pean in his ears.

The purple curtains were drawn to shut out the storm and darkness—the gilded clock ticked softly on the mantle of the room where Letty Dallas sat all alone, her dimpled cheek resting on her hand, while the unshed tears sparkled on her lashes brighter than any diamonds.

Suddenly the door was opened, and a servant announced "Lieutenant St. Mayne!"

She started up, pale and trembling; then he was come at last to claim her troth.

How changed he was as he stood before her—how the calm, steadfast brightness of his eyes perplexed her!

"Letty," he said, "by all the rules of love and war I am your captive."

She stood spell-bound in the magnetic light of his glance. "But," he added, "I wish to effect a change of prisoners."

"A change of prisoners?"

"Even so, dearest; and here is your other captive!" He stepped back, and Letty's wondering eyes fell on a tall young soldier, who had lingered in the shadow of the door-way—a handsome fellow, whose brown curls hid the fresh scar on his brow—her old lover, who had now declared to tell his love. Ah! he had grown braver now.

Well, true love is not exactly selfish but self-absorbed, and it was not until Walter rose to take leave, at the chimes of midnight, that they remembered that Marcy had slipped away long since.

The next day Letty received a little note, containing only the following words in Marcy St. Mayne's handwriting:

"By the time you receive this, my dear little sister-elect, I shall be en route for camp once more, feeling sure that I may safely leave Walter to your nursing. Let me add that I have fought one battle for you, and I hope to fight many more for my country.

M. ST. M."

And in the sunshine of her great happiness Letty Dallas never knew the everlasting eclipse that had come over Marcy St. Mayne's life!

CHRISTMAS EVE,

1862.—[See Page 14.]

TO MY SOLDIER.

"My God love thee, my beloved; may God love thee!"
MRS. BROWNING.

WATER from my bosom I send you this;
Deep in my heart these thoughts were nursed,
And my lips have lovingly left a kiss
On the words that will meet your dear eyes first.

God and our Country have claimed you from me,
I mourn for your absence, but will not repine;
For, wherever your patient step may be,
I know that your brave, true heart is mine.

Softly I whisper your name as I kneel,
Praying: "God love you! God shield you from harms!
Sickness or wounds may His tender hand heal;
Soon may He lead you back safe to my arms!"

Darling, I love you! By night and by day
Sending my heart through the distance to you,
For I, my Country, her Flag, and My SOLDIER I pray—
I love you, my darling! May God love you too!
LOWELL, MASSACHUSETTS, Dec. 28, 1862.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN M'LENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER IV.—(Continued.)

THE first objects of furniture in the room which attracted her attention were an old bureau of carved oak and a heavy bold table with a cabinet shape. She tried the bureau first; it looked the likeliest receptacle for papers of the two. Three of the keys proved to be of a size to enter the lock; but none of them would turn it. The bureau was unassailable. She left it, and passed for a moment to trim the wick of the candle before she tried the bold cabinet next.

At the moment when she raised her hand to the candle-flame the stillness of the Banqueting Hall shudder with the terror of a sound—a sound faint and momentary, like the distant rushing of the wind.

Had the sliding-door in the drawing-room moved?

Which way had it moved? Had an unknown hand pushed it back in its socket farther than she had pushed it—or pulled it to again and closed it? The hesitation of looking at once might by some undiscoverable agency from the life of the house was stronger in her than the horror of being secretly near the Banqueting Hall. She made desperately for the door of the room. It had fallen to silently after her when she had come in, that it was not closed. She pulled it open—and looked.

The sight that met her eyes rooted her, panic-stricken, to the floor.

Close to the first of the row of windows, counting from the drawing-room, and full in the gleam of it, she saw a solitary figure. It stood motionless, rising out of the farthest strip of moonlight on the floor. In another instant it suddenly disappeared as completely as the sun at night, in the second strip of moonlight—lost it again—saw it in the third strip—lost it once more—and saw it in the fourth. Constantly by moments advanced, now mysteriously lost in the shadow, now suddenly visible again in the light, until it reached the sixth and nearest strip of moonlight. There it paused, and strayed aside to the middle of the Hall. It stopped at the tripod, and stood shivering it gently with its elbow, with its head raised over the dead ashes, in the action of warming them at a fire. It turned back again, moving down the line of the windows—stopped at the fifth window—turned once more—and came on softly through the shadow, straight to the place where Magdalen stood.

Her voice was dumb; her will was helpless. Every sense in her but the seeing-sense was paralyzed. Her heart—her head—her feet in the fetters of its own terror—looked unchangeably straightforward, as it had looked from the first. There was no mistaking the story, full in the path of the figure advancing on her through the shadow, nearer and nearer, step by step.

It came on close. The sense of horror that held her burst asunder when it was within arm's-length. She stared back. The light of the candle on the table fell full on its face, and showed her—Admiral Bartram.

A large pewter drinking-cown was wrapped round with. His head was muffled (observed: his feet were bare. In his left hand he carried his little basket of keys. In the right hand he moved mechanically at intervals; waving to and fro before him in the air. He passed Magdalen slowly: his lips whispered in low expressionless; his open eyes staring with the glassy stare of death. Her eyes started her with a sudden knowledge of the truth. He was walking in his sleep.

The terror of seeing him as she saw him now was not the terror she had felt when her eyes first lighted on him—was separation in the moonlight, a spectre in the ghostly Hall. This time she could struggle against the shock; she could feel the depth of her own fear.

He passed her, and stopped in the middle of the room. Magdalen ventured near enough to him to be within reach of his voice as he muttered to himself. She ventured nearer still, and heard the name of her dead husband full distinctly from the sleep-walker's lips

"Noel!" he said, in the low, monotonous tones of a dreamer talking in his sleep. "My good fellow, Noel, take it back again? It worries me day and night. I don't know where it's safe; I don't know where to put it. Take it back, Noel—take it back!"

As these words escaped him he walked to the bald cabinet. He sat down in the chair placed before it, and searched in the basket among his keys. Magdalen softly followed him and stood behind his chair, waiting with the candle in her hand. He found the key and unlocked the cabinet. Without an instant's hesitation he drew out a drawer, the second of a row. The one thing in the drawer was a folded letter. He removed it, and put it down before him on the table. "Take it back, Noel!" he repeated, mechanically; "take it back."

Magdalen looked over his shoulder and read those lines, traced in the bold handwriting, at the top of the letter: To be kept in your own possession, and to be opened by yourself only on the day of my decease. Noel Vanstone. She saw these words plainly, with the admiral's name and the admiral's address written under them.

The Trust within reach of her hand! The Trust traced to it's hiding-place at last!

She took one step forward to stand round his chair, and to snatch the letter from the table. At the instant when she moved he took it up once more; locked the cabinet again, and turned and faced her. In the impulse of the moment she stretched out her hand toward the hand in which he held the letter. She saw the candle-light fell full on him. The awful deathin-life of his face—the mystery of the sleeping body moving, the sightless eyes open to the dreaming mind—daunted her. Her hand trembled and dropped again at her side.

He dropped the key of the cabinet into the basket, and crossed the room to the bureau, with the basket in one hand and the letter in the other. Magdalen followed him, and saw the table and watched him. As he had opened the cabinet so he now opened the bureau. Once more Magdalen stretched out her hand; and once more she recoiled before the mystery and the terror of his sleep. He put the letter in a drawer at the back of the bureau and closed it heavy oaken lid again. "There," he said, "Sal—there, as you say, Noel—safer there." So he spoke. So, time after time, the letter that he strayed him revealed the dead man living and speaking again in the dream.

Had he locked the drawer? Magdalen had not heard the lock turn. As he slowly moved away, walking back once more toward the middle of the room, she looked at the bureau—looked at the key. That discovery made, she turned and looked to see what he was doing next. He was leaving the room again with the basket of keys in his hand. When her first glance overtook him he was crossing the threshold of the door.

Some inscrutable influence possessed her—a some mysterious attraction drew her after him in spite of herself. She took up the candle and followed him mechanically as he went on and walking in her sleep. One behind the other, in slow and noiseless progress, they crossed the Banqueting Hall. One behind the other they passed through the drawing-room, and along the corridor, and up the stairs. She followed him to his door. He went in and left it behind him softly. She stopped and looked toward the trucklebed. It was pushed aside at the foot against the wall, and was empty. The bedroom door. Who had moved it? She held the candle close and looked toward the pillow with a sudden consciousness of sudden doubt.

The truckle-bed was empty.

The discovery startled her for the moment, and for the moment only. Before the other faculties were to be drawn from it, she never drew them. Her mind, slowly recovering the exercise of its faculties, was conscious of the influences of the earlier and the deeper impressions produced on it. Her mind followed the admiral into his room, as her body had followed him across the Banqueting Hall.

Had he laid down again in his bed? No; he still stood. She listened at the door. Not a sound was audible in the room. She tried the door, and, finding it not locked, softly opened it a few inches, and listened again. The rise and fall of his low, regular breathing instantly assured her that he was still asleep.

She went into the room, shading the candle-light with her hand, approached the bedside to look at him. The dream was past; the old man's sleep was deep and peaceful; his lips were still; his quiet hand was laid over the coverlet in undisturbed repose. He lay with his face turned toward the light-hand side of his bed. A little table stood there within reach of his hand. Four objects were placed on it—a candle, his matches, his customary night-drink of lemonade, and his basket of keys.

The sight of the basket reminded her of his keys that night (if an opportunity offered when the basket was not in his hand) had first crossed her mind as what she now had got to do. Since then she had lost it again, for the moment, in the surprise of discovering the empty truckle-bed. She now recovered it in the moment that followed her first attention. It was useless to waste time in trying to choose the one key wanted from the rest on the one day when the admiral might forget in her to be readily identified. She took all the keys from the table, in the basket as they lay, and noiselessly closed the door behind her on leaving the room.

The truckle-bed, as she passed it, forced itself again on her attention. After a moment's thought she moved the foot of the bed back to its customary position across the door. Whether he was in the house or out of the house, nothing might return to his deserted post at any moment. If he saw the bed moved from its usual place he might suspect something wrong—he might move his master—and the loss of the keys might be discovered. As she descended the stairs the fear of a sudden meeting with old Mazey was so vividly present to her that she carried the little basket close at her side, half hidden in the folds of her dress.

Nothing happened on the stairs; nothing happened in the corridor—the house was as silent and as solitary as ever. She crossed the Banqueting Hall this time without hesitation; the events of the night had hardened her mind against all imaginary terrors. "Now I have got it!" she whispered to herself, in an irrepressible outburst of exultation as she entered the first of the east rooms, and put her candle on the top of the old bureau.

Even yet there was a trial in store for her patience. Some minutes elapsed, minutes that seemed hours, while she found the right key and raised the lid of the bureau. At last she drew out the inner drawer! At last she had the letter in her hand!

It had been sealed, but the seal was broken. She opened it on the spot to make sure that she had actually possessed herself of the Trust before leaving the room. The end of the letter was the first part of it she turned to. It came to its conclusion high on the third page, and it was signed by Noel Vanstone. Below the name these lines were added in the admiral's handwriting:

"This letter was written by me, at the same time with the will of my friend, Noel Vanstone. In the event of my death, without leaving any other document behind me, I beg my nephew and my executors to understand that I consider the requests made in this document as absolutely binding on my honor. SOLOMON BARTRAM."

She left these lines unread. She just noticed that they were not in Noel Vanstone's handwriting. Another instance of the inventive as immaterial to the object in view, turned the leaves of the letter, and transferred her attention to the opening sentences on the first page.

She read these words:

"DEAR ADMIRAL BARTRAM,—When you open my Will (in which you are appointed my executor), you will find that I have bequeathed the whole residue of my estate—after payment of one legacy of £100—absolutely to yourself. It is the purpose of my letter to tell you privately what the object is for which I have left you this handsome token of remembrance in your hands.

"I beg you to consider this large legacy as intended—"

She had proceeded thus far, with breathless curiosity and interest, when her attention suddenly failed her. Something—she was too completely absorbed to know what—had got between her and the letter. Was it a noise? She looked round involuntarily at the door behind her, and listened. Nothing was to be heard: nothing was to be seen. She returned to the letter.

The writing was cramped and close. In her impatient curiosity to read more she failed to find the lost place again. Her eyes, mechanically, attempted to help her, lighted on a sentence lower in the page than the sentence at which she had left off. The first three words she saw riveted her attention—they were the first words she had met with in the letter which directly referred to George Bartram. In the sudden excitement of that discovery she read the rest of the sentence eagerly before she made any second attempt to return to the lost place:

"If you, my executor, do comply with these conditions—that is to say, if being either a bachelor or a widower at the time of my decease, he fails to marry Miss Garth—then I have long constructed him to marry, within Six calendar months from that time—it is my desire that he shall not receive—"

She had read to that point, to that last word, and no further, when the blinding consciousness from behind her, between the letter and her eye, and gripped her fast by the wrist in an instant. She turned—and the cry of terror, and found herself face to face with old Mazey.

The old sailor's eyes were bloodshot; his hand was heavy; his face was drawn and twisted cruelly on his feet; and his body swayed to and fro on his widely-parted legs. If he had tested his condition himself, by the unfailing criterion of the model ship, he must have inevitably pronounced sentence on himself in the usual form:

"Drunk aboard—and ought to take to night-cap."

"You young Jezabel!" said the veteran, with a leer on one side of his face, and a frown on the other. "I've got you now you take to night-walking in the neighborhood of Freeze-your-Bones use those sharp eyes of yours first, and make sure there's no one else night-walking in the garden outside. Drop it, Jezabel! drop it!"

Keeping fast hold of Magdalen's arm with one hand he took the letter from her with the other, put it back into the open drawer, and locked the bureau. She never struggled with him, she never spoke. Her presence of mind—her powers of resistance were crushed. The terrors of that horrible night, following one close on the other in reiterated shocks, had struck her down at last. She yielded as submissively, she trembled as helplessly, as the weakest woman living.

Old Mazey dropped her arm and pointed with drunken solemnity to a chair in an inner corner of the room. She sank into it without uttering a word. The veteran (breathing very hard over it) steadied himself on both elbows against the shutting top of the bureau, and from that commanding position addressed Magdalen once more.

"Come and be locked up!" said old Mazey, wagging his venerable head with judicial severity. "There'll be a court of inquiry to-morrow morning; and there's two witnesses lost—two witness. You young jade, you've committed burglary—that's what you've done. His honor the admiral's keys stolen; his honor the admiral's desk ransacked; and his honor the admiral's private letters broke open. Burglary! Burglary! Come and be locked up!" He slowly recovered an upright position with the assistance of his hands, locked by the solid resisting power of the bureau, and lapsed into lachrymose gossip. "Who'd have thought it?" said old Mazey, pumping and wiping at the eyes. "Take the outside of her, and she's as straight as a poplar: take the inside of her, and she's as crooked as Sin. A fine-grown girl, too. What a pity! what a pity!"

"Don't hurt me!" repeated the veteran, as old Mazey suggested the first matter and took her by the wrist again. "I'm frightened, Mazey—I'm dreadfully frightened."

"Hurt you?" repeated the veteran. "I'm a dead too fond of you—and more shame for me at my age!—to hurt you. If I let go of your wrist I'm certain you'll make off before me where I can see you all the way? Will you be a good girl, and walk straight up to your own door?"

Magdalen gave the promise required of her—gave it with an eager longing to reach the refuge of her room. She rose and tried to take the candle from the bureau, but old Mazey's cunning hand was too quick for her. "Let the candle be," said the veteran, winking in momentary forgetfulness of his responsible position. "You're a trifle quicker on your legs than I am, my dear, and you might leave me in the lurch if I don't carry the light."

They returned to the inhabited side of the house. Staggering after Magdalen, with the basket of keys in one hand and the candle in the other, old Mazey sorrowfully compared her figure with the straightness of the poplar, and her disposition with the crookedness of Sin, all the way across "Freeze-your-Bones," and all the way up stairs to her own door. Arrived at their destination, he peremptorily refused to give her the candle until he had first seen her safely inside the room. The conditions being complied with he exchanged the light with one hand and made a dash with the other at the key—drew it from the inside of the lock, and instantly he closed the door. Magdalen heard him outside chuckling over his own dexterity, and fitting the key into the lock again with infinite difficulty. At last he secured the door safely—a deep grunt of relief. "There she is, safe!" Magdalen heard him say, in regretful soliloquy. "As fine a girl as ever I set my eyes on. What a pity! what a pity!"

The last sounds of his voice died out in the distance, and she was left alone in her room.

Holding fast by the baluster on the Mazey made his way down to the corridor on the second floor, in which a night-light was always burning. He advanced to the truckle-bed, and, stretching himself against it, surveyed the whole length of it attentively. Prolonged contemplation of his own resting-place for the night apparently failed to satisfy him. He shook his head dubiously, and taking from the side-pocket of his great-coat a pair of old patched slippers, surveyed them with an air of illimitable doubt. "I'm all abroad to-night," he mumbled to himself. "Troubled in my mind—that's what it is—troubled in my mind."

The old patched slippers and the veteran's exciting perplexities happened to be intimately associated, with the other, in the mind's eye of one and effect. The slippers belonged to the old cobbler who had formerly come to their assistance in the particular way, and had presided in wearing them long after they were unfit for the purpose. He had now remembered old Mazey had taken the slippers to the village cobbler to get them repaired on the spot before his master could have them the next morning. He set superintending the progress and completion of the work until evening came, when he and the cobbler had withdrawn to the inn to sing and to drink each other's healths at parting. They had prolonged this social ceremony till far into the night; and they had carried, as a necessary consequence, in a finished and perfect state of intoxication on either side.

If the following hour had led to no other result than those night wanderings in the grounds of St. Crux, which had shown old Mazey the light of the east window, the discovery would unquestionably have presented it to him the next morning in the light of one of the praiseworthy achievements of his long life. He had unconsciously prevented a breach of discipline, and a breach of trust. In plainer words, he had deserted his post.

The one offence against the admiral Bartram's constitutional tendency to somnambulism was the watch and ward which his faithful old servant had kept outside the door. The veteran had ever prevailed on him to submit to the usual precaution taken in such cases. He peremptorily declined to be put into his room at night, and ignored his own liability, whenever a dream disturbed him, to walk in his sleep. Over and over again old Mazey had been roused by his master's attempts to push past the truckle-bed, or to step over it, in his sleep; and over and over again, when he had discovered the fact the next morning, the admiral had declined to believe him. As the sailor once stood, staring in sweet inquiry at his master's door, these incidents of the past rose confusedly on his memory, and forced on him the serious question whether the admiral had left his room during the earlier hours of the night? If by any mischance the sleep-walking fit had seized him, the slippers in old Mazey's hand pointed straight to the startling conclusion that followed—his master must have passed barefoot in the cold night, over the stone stairs and passages of St. Crux. "Lord send he's been quiet," muttered old Mazey, daunted, bold as he was and drunk as he was, by the bare contemplation of that prospect. "If his honor's been walking to-night it will be the death of him!"

He roused himself for the moment by main force—strong in his dog-like fidelity to the admiral, though strong in nothing else—and fought off the stupor of the drink. He looked at the bed with steadier eyes and a clearer mind. Magdalen's precaution in returning it to its customary position presented it to him necessarily in the aspect of a bed which had never been moved from its place. He next examined the counterpane carefully. Not the faintest vestige appeared of the indentation which must have been left by footsteps passing over it. There was the plain evidence before him—the evidence recognizable at last by his own bewildered eyes—that the admiral had never moved from his room. "I'll take the Pledge to-morrow!" mumbled old Mazey, in an outburst of grateful relief. The next moment the fumes of the liquor flowed back insidiously over his brain, and the veteran, returning to his customary remedy, paced the passage in zigzag as usual, and kept watch on the deck of an imaginary ship.

Soon after sunrise Magdalen suddenly heard the grating of the key from the outside in the lock of the door. The door opened, and old Mazey reappeared on the threshold. The first fever of his intoxication had cooled, with time, into a mild penitential glow. He breathed harder than ever, in a succession of low growls, and wagged his venerable head at his own delinquencies without intermission.

"How are you now, you young land-shark in petticoats?" inquired the veteran. "Has your conscience been quiet enough to let you go to sleep?"

"I have not slept," said Magdalen, drawing back from him in doubt of what he might do next. "I have no remembrance of what happened after you locked the door; I think I must have fainted. Don't frighten me again, Mr. Mazey! I feel miserably weak and ill. What do you want?"

"I want to say something serious," replied old Mazey, with impenetrable solemnity. "It's been on my mind to come here and make a clean breast of it for the last hour or more. Mark my words, young woman. I'm going to disgrace myself."

Magdalen drew further and further back, and looked at him in rising alarm.

"I know my duty to his honor the admiral," proceeded old Mazey, waving his hand drearily in the direction of his master's door. "But try as hard as I may, I can't find it in my heart, you young jade, to be witness against you. I liked the make of you (specially about the waist) when you first came into the house, and I can't help liking the make of you still, though you have committed burglary, and though you are as crooked as Sin. I've cast the eyes of indulgence on fine-grown girls all my life, and it's too late in the day to cast the eyes of severity on 'em now. I'm seventy-seven or seventy-eight, I don't rightly know which. I'm a battered old hulk, with my seams opening, and my pumps choked, and the waters of Death powering in on me as fast as they can. I'm as miserable a sinner as you'll meet with any where in these parts—Thomas Nagle, the cobbler, only excepted; and he's worse than I am, for he's the youngest of the two, and he ought to know better. But the long and the short of it is, I shall go down to my grave with an eye of indulgence for a fine-grown girl. More shame for me, you young Jezabel—more shame for me!"

The veteran's unmanageable eyes began to leer again in spite of him, as he concluded his harangue in these terms: the last reserves of austerity left in his face intrenched themselves dismally round the corners of his mouth. Magdalen approached him again, and tried to speak. He solemnly motioned her back again with another dreary wave of his hand.

"No carneying!" said old Mazey; "I'm bad enough already without that. It's my duty to make my report to his honor the admiral, and I will make it. But if you like to give the house the slip before the burglary's reported and the court of inquiry begins—I'll disgrace myself by letting you go. It's market morning at Ossory, and Dawkes will be driving the light cart over in a quarter of an hour's time. Dawkes will take you if I ask him. I know my duty—my duty is to turn the key on you, and see Dawkes damned first. But I can't find it in my heart to be hard on a fine girl like you. It's bred in the bone, and it wunt come out of the flesh. More shame for me, I tell you again—more shame for me!"

The proposal thus strangely and suddenly presented to her took Magdalen completely by surprise. She had been far too seriously shaken by the events of the night to be capable of deciding on any subject at a moment's notice. "You are very good to me, Mr. Mazey," she said. "May I have a minute by myself to think?"

"Yes, you may," replied the veteran, facing about forthwith and leaving the room. "They're all alike," proceeded old Mazey, with his head still running on the sex. "Whatever you offer 'em they always want something more. Tall and short, native and foreign, sweet-hearts and wives—they're all alike!"

Left by herself, Magdalen reached her decision with far less difficulty than she had anticipated.

If she remained in the house there were only two courses before her—to charge old Mazey with speaking under the influence of a drunken delusion, or to submit to circumstances. Though she owed to the old sailor her defeat in the very hour of success, his consideration for her at that moment forbade the idea of defending herself at his expense—even supposing, what was in the last degree improbable, that the defense would be credited. In the second of the two cases (the case of submission to circumstances), but one result could be expected—instant dismissal; and, perhaps, discovery as well. What object was to be gained by braving that degradation—by leaving the house publicly disgraced in the eyes of the servants who had hated and distrusted her from the first? The accident which had literally snatched the Trust from her possession when she had it in her hand was irreparable. The one apparent compensation under the disaster—in other words, the discovery that the Trust actually existed, and that George Bartram's marriage within a given time was one of the objects contained in it—was a compensation which could only be estimated at its true value by placing it under the light of Mr. Loscombe's experience. Every motive of which she was conscious was a motive which urged her to leave the house secretly, while the chance was at her disposal. She looked out into the passage and called softly to old Mazey to come back.

"I accept your offer thankfully, Mr. Mazey," she said. "You don't know what hard measure you dealt out to me when you took that letter from my hand. But you did your duty; and I can be grateful to you for sparing me this morning, hard as you were on me last night. I am not such a bad girl as you think me—I am not, indeed."

Old Mazey dismissed the subject with another dreary wave of his hand.

"Let it be," said the veteran; "let it be! It makes no difference, my girl, to such an old rascal as I am. If you were fifty times worse than you are I should let you go all the same. Put on your bonnet and shawl and come along. I'm a disgrace to myself and a warning to others—that's what I am. No luggage, mind! Leave all your rattletraps behind you, to be overhauled, if necessary, at his honor the admiral's discretion. I can be hard enough on your boxes, you young Jezebel, if I can't be hard on you."

With those words old Mazey led the way out of the room. "The less I see of her the better—especially about the waist," he said to himself, as he hobbled down stairs with the help of the balusters.

The cart was standing in the back-yard when they reached the lower regions of the house, and Dawkes (otherwise the farm-bailiff's man) was fastening the last buckle of the horse's harness. The hoar-frost of the morning was still white in the shade. The sparkling points of it glistened brightly on the shaggy coats of Brutus and Cassius as they idled about the yard, waiting, with steaming mouths and slowly-wagging tails, to see the cart drive off. Old Mazey went out alone and used his influence with Dawkes, who, staring in stolid amazement, put a leather cushion for his fellow-traveler on the cart-seat. Shivering in the sharp morning air, Magdalen waited while the preliminaries of departure were in progress, conscious of nothing but a giddy bewilderment of thought and a hopeless suspension of feeling. The events of the night confused themselves hideously with the trivial circumstances passing before her eyes in the court-yard. She started with the sudden terror of the night when old Mazey reappeared to summon her out to the cart. She trembled with the helpless confusion of the night when the veteran cast the eyes of indulgence on her for the last time, and gave her a kiss on the cheek at parting. The next minute she felt him help her into the cart and pat her on the back. The next she heard him tell her, in a confidential whisper, that, sitting or standing, she was as straight as a poplar, either way. Then there was a pause, in which nothing was said and nothing done; and then the driver took the reins in hand and mounted to his place.

She roused herself at the parting moment and looked back. The last sight she saw at St. Crux was old Mazey wagging his head in the court-yard, with his fellow-profligates, the dogs, keeping time to him with their tails. The last words she heard were the words in which the veteran paid his farewell tribute to her charms:

"Burglary or no burglary," said old Mazey, "she's a fine-grown girl, if ever there was a fine one yet! What a pity! what a pity!"

THE END OF THE SEVENTH SCENE.

ON THE ANTIETAM.

I'll make you sorry for that! The fighting's fair enough; but I'm no more a dog than you are, and you shall pay for it if it takes years to do it—see if you don't!"

It was Jack Middleton who yelled out this, as, bruised and bleeding, he reeled away from Drake Porter, who had let him up with some contemptuous remark about "soiling his hands," seconded by our insulting laughter, for boyish sense of justice is not keen, and I doubt if it ever occurred to any of us that any thing from the "back street" had feelings and passions like unto ourselves. Feud had long existed between what was known in boys' parlance as the "back-streeters" and "ours;" the "back-streeters" pouring forth from two or three wretched tenement buildings in our rear, and "ours" being represented by the children of the well-to-do row of houses between —d and —th Avenues in ——th Street.

Extremes met here indeed, but only with blows; the "back-streeters" evidently regarding overcoats and whole pairs of shoes as so many direct injuries, while we considered their very unkempt existence as an impertinence, and with sticks and fists and stones, at every corner, and in every alley, whenever and wherever we were unlucky enough to meet, fought out Society's old quarrel. At such times Drake acted as our leader, fighting with an earnest fury that made all fly before him, unless I except Jack Middleton, the back-street leader, and the opposite type of Porter; olive-skinned, black-eyed, squarely built, opposing steady, dogged resistance to Drake's élan, and undismayed by the fact of being whipped seven times out of nine, coming up to every battle with a cold perseverance that I never saw warmed to fury but on the occasion above quoted.

The threat, however, was but little regarded—hardly remembered, except as a jest; and soon after, being sent off to school, the back street and its brawls were fast being forgotten, when, oddly enough, Middleton turned up in our very midst—no longer as a New York Bedouin, but as the nephew of a wealthy South Carolinian, who had traced, found him out, and adopted him. Rid of his rags and his hang-dog manner, I have really never seen a finer-looking boy; and gradually sprung up between him and Drake a curious rivalry (the result, doubtless, of a nearly equal balance of faculties), developing itself in the lecture-room, the gymnasium, with the girls of the neighboring seminary, wherever they came in contact; and daily growing in bitterness till we were again separated, he going to a Southern university, and we living very much after the ordinary New York fashion, till the war broke out.

Nearly all the ——th Street boys were in our regiment—Spaulding, Elliott, Davis, and, best of all, Drake Porter, Captain of our Company, and on the high-road to a well-deserved promotion. It was the 17th of September, the day of the battle of Sharpsburg. Already Monday and a part of Tuesday we had spent facing the enemy, talking to them occasionally with our guns, and answered emphatically by their batteries. As usual, they had the chronic advantage of position, being stationed behind the crest of a hill, and separated from us by the Antietam, sweeping along at their base, and too deep to be forded except in one or two places. The country between was broken, mostly plowed land, sometimes covered with high, growing corn, and terribly cut up with ravines and passes; and, with their usual touching faith in "the strongest battalions," the rebels were assembled in force, having brought troops from Hagarstown and Harper's Ferry. We had crossed the creek about four o'clock, and after some tolerably sharp skirmishing had fairly carried and taken possession of the woods from whence they had first fired at us. So we were all in famous spirits, with the exception of Drake, who was curiously grave and silent. Before lying down for the night he gave me a little packet.

"There are letters for Belle and mother, a ring, and some other trifles. If any thing happens to me you will see to them."

To which I assented briefly enough, I fancy, being much too careful of my sleeping-time to waste any of it in talking. It was midnight already, and every few minutes there was an alarm of some sort: one time it was the rebels shooting each other—by way of practice, I suppose; at another it was picket-fighting; again they were bringing in half a dozen sulky Confederates; altogether it hardly seemed that we had slept half an hour when the battle began.

As the rebel fire slackened the first line went on to the woods with a cheer and a rush, only to be beaten back by the heaviest volleys with which they had favored us yet; and then out poured the rebels, swarming like bees, in masses, not in columns, flowing out over the field, and forcing back the second brigade by sheer superiority of numbers. We could see it all plainly enough; and let me tell you, reading lists of names and seeing the men with whom you have lived familiarly shot down before your eyes stirs the blood in a widely different way.

And it was with a "Thank God!" that we heard the signal to advance. Down the hill we went on a run, making straight for the corn-field. Half way there Spaulding fell; a little further on Elliott and Manvers. Manvers was Drake's cousin; Elliott was to have married my sister Jessie—but there was no time for mourning then. We were close upon the rebels, fighting hand to hand; and they fought us like tigers, and held to every inch of ground with a stubbornness unequaled. When we took our stand on the ridge they came at us again and again, with such a dash as seemed as if it must carry all before them. Our guns thundered away nobly on our right; but they had a battery that the archfiend himself couldn't have planted so as to rake us more effectually, while their sharp-shooters picked us off from the woods beyond very much at their ease. We saw nothing of the promised assistance, and our ammunition was giving out, and, tired of waiting, we began to go down into the corn; and just then Doubleday had stopped that confounded battery, and the rebels giving back as we pressed on after them into the woods, and with Crawford and Gordon coming close behind us, things looked like success.

All this time Drake fought steadily, and, as usual, in the hottest of the fire, but escaping, as by a miracle, unharmed. In our downward rush we had carried all before us, but we found the woods a perfect hornets' nest. The —th, that had never faltered once, broke and fell back now; and Drake, fighting hand to hand, was separated and carried far on in advance of the rest, but being a good swordsman, managed before long to give his quietus to his opponent, who was in a little too much of a hurry. In the struggle they had insensibly gotten out of the thickest of the fight into comparative quiet and seclusion; and Drake, thankful for even a moment's breathing-time, was trying to wipe away some of the blood and grime from his face, when his quick ear caught an ominous click. He looked about, behind him, finally overhead, and there, showing among the leaves, a rifle-barrel glinted in the sun, and a pair of fiery eyes glowed above it. To start or run was simply almost inevitable death, and Drake, unwilling even to die in a hurry, folded his arms, saying, coolly,

"My friend, if you are so long in sighting you will be behindhand in your count."

"I have been longer in sighting than you think, perhaps, Captain Porter," was the reply, in a not unfamiliar voice, while a series of cautious movements showed from among the leaves a face at which Drake stared in utter perplexity and amazement. Suddenly light broke in upon him.

"Why, it is Jack Middleton!"

"Precisely! though your memory is not so good as mine. I recognized you on the instant, perhaps because I was so anxious to meet you."

"I have been fighting since daybreak, and don't feel too clear-headed. Do you think you could explain?"

"With pleasure. I could have killed you twice over, only that I was anxious to make this very explanation. I remember that at school you were always sharp-set after the reason of every thing. It would be a pity that you should die without knowing why."

Middleton dropped out these cruel words slowly, watching his victim's face the while for their effect, but no matter what thoughts of Belle and mother were trying at his heart-strings, he only answered,

"You are so tedious that I begin to think you have only a woman's reason, 'Because.'"

"You shall see. You remember that some years ago you called me a dog; that was the beginning of the debt I owe you. When we were at school you put it out at interest. You no longer called me a dog, but you treated me as one. You thought I would have been glad to crawl to your feet, and lick your hand, in return for your condescension. You would never let me alone. You would not be repulsed. I was not worth your disliking. At every step you crossed my path. You took my honors, you stole the hearts that would have been mine. I kept account of all these items; and, do you remember Virginia Brush?"

"A little girl with yellow curls—splendid ones? Yes, I think I do."

Middleton made a hasty movement, as if to fire, but checked himself.

"Drake Porter, I loved that girl, and would have won her but for you. You crossed me there in sheer wantonness. You cared nothing for her; I would have given my soul for her. From that time I swore to have your life. I was sure at last of—"

His hand was on the trigger, waiting the completion of the sentence, his body bent in the very act of firing, and Porter was calculating the chances of a jump at the last moment, when whir! went something over his head, and Middleton fell crashing through the limbs to the ground dead, shot through the heart by a chance bullet, if it is not profane here to speak of chance.

Drake told me the story after, and—

"I tell you what, old fellow," he concluded, "it was about as peculiar a predicament as I ever caught myself in. There wasn't an atom of feeling in my body, except in the spot that that devil's rifle covered; and when that blessed bullet sent him heels over head, I think if there hadn't been a party of our boys close at hand I should have knelt down and made a baby of myself. On the whole, I am not anxious to try it [illegible]."

To which I answered, as in duty bound,

"I should think not."

IN AN ALBUM.

BY T. HOOD.

A pretty task, Miss S——, to [illegible]
A Benedictine pen,
That can not quite at freedom [illegible]
Like those of other men.
No lover's plaint my Muse must [illegible]
To fill this page's span;
But be correct, and recollect
I'm not a single man.

Pray, only think, for pen and ink,
How hard to get along,
That may not turn on words that b[illegible],
Or Love, the life of song!
Nine Muses, if I chooses, I
May woo all in a clan,
But one Miss S—— I daren't address—
I'm not a single man.

Scribblers unwed, with little head,
May eke it out with heart;
And in their lays it often plays
A rare first-fiddle part.
They make a kiss to rhyme with bliss,
But if I so began
I have my fears about my ears—
I'm not a single man.

Upon your cheek I may not speak,
Nor on your lip be warm;
I must be wise about your eyes,
And formal with your form;
Of all that sort of thing, in short,
On T. H. Bayly's plan,
I must not twine a single line—
I'm not a single man.

A watchman's part compels my heart
To keep you off its beat;
And I might dare as soon to swear
At you as at your feet.
I can't expire in passion's fire,
As other poet's can;
My life (she's by) won't let me die—
I'm not a single man.

Shut out from love, denied a dove,
Forbidden bow and dart,
Without a groan to call my own,
With neither hand nor heart;
To Hymen vowed, and not allowed
To flirt e'en with your fan;
Here end, as just a friend, I must—
I'm not a single man.

COURT-MARTIAL ON MAJOR-GENERAL FITZ-JOHN PORTER, HELD DECEMBER, 1862, AT WASHINGTON, D. C.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. E. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 7.]

THE PIRATE RAPHAEL SEMMES.—[FROM AN ENGLISH PHOTOGRAPH.]

THE PIRATE SEMMES.

We publish herewith a portrait of the famous pirate RAPHAEL SEMMES, now in command of the British pirate-ship Alabama. This man was once in our navy, and acquired an unenviable reputation for bad conduct, which prevented his rising in the service. At the outbreak of the rebellion he cast his lot with the insurgents, and was appointed to command the Sumter. In that famous craft he successfully ran the blockade of the Mississippi, and escaped to sea. For some months he made the civilized world ring with the fame of his exploits over unarmed merchantmen, which he robbed and burned. He always refused to fight a ship-of-war, and had hard work, at one time, in escaping the United States gun-boat Iroquois at Martinique. We published in a recent number an account of his cruise, written by one of his officers. The Sumter was fairly nailed at last in the British port of Gibraltar; there her crew left her, and there she lies still, under the friendly protection of British guns.

Semmes forthwith proceeded to England, where he took the command of the British pirate Alabama, and went to sea on 29th June last. His subsequent exploits are fresh in the memory of our readers. He burned ten whalers off the Azores; half a dozen merchantmen between New York and Liverpool; and some small trading craft in the West Indies. At latest dates he was coaling at Martinique, and the Sea Jacinto and other vessels of Commodore Wilkes's squadron were watching him. It is to be hoped they will catch him.

Semmes's family are residing in Philadelphia; one or two of his daughters are at school there.

SANTA CLAUS'S BALL; OR, A PLEA FOR THE CHILDREN.

SANTA CLAUS had appointed this November night as a dress-rehearsal for Christmas. It was an occasion when not the Dolls only, but very many others, denizens of Toyland, were expected. All, in fact, who could make it convenient to attend felt it to be a duty to do so. In fact, the invitation was almost peremptory. Santa Claus expected to hear from his spies, the Old Dolls, full accounts of the conduct and behavior of his little friends the Children, in order that he might know who deserved his rich prizes, and who might merit the traditional "rod in the stocking" as the penalty of their misbehavior. He also expected to hear from the same reliable sources what all the mothers, sisters, aunts, and cousins were doing with reference to assisting him; and for this information he was accustomed to rely entirely upon the Dolls. They are a very intelligent race of little beings, if one did but know it, and they always keep with at least one eye open. Consequently, when the Children have gone to bed, and the Dolls set in order in the nursery, and the bidden work is taken out, and the mysterious plans of the family talked over, the Dolls have the best possible chance to see and hear it all, and of course their sympathies are all interested in the Children, and all that concerns them.

Santa Claus was accustomed to hold this annual festival preparatory to Christmas, in order to know exactly what to do, and what to depend upon.

The gala was held in Santa Claus's favorite winter palace, an immense snow-cave in the side of Mount Hecla. Santa Claus found the climate to agree better with his health than a more southern situation, and likewise he found here, in this sequestered spot, the quiet and seclusion so necessary to the mystery in which he is accustomed to invest his good deeds.

The palace was all of a glow with warmth and light from numerous fires in huge fire-places, whose vent was none less than the great crater of Hecla himself. The cheerful blaze illumined the glittering ceiling and sparkling walls, and mellowed the atmosphere to almost tropical geniality; while, to restrain the melting of snow and ice, which naturally would have ensued, and which would have greatly incommoded the guests, the palace was placed under a perpetual spell or charm by a certain witch. This witch when young had been a famous beauty, and a great favorite of the good saint, who was a gay bachelor in those days.

Of course she could not preside publicly at his entertainments; but it was more than surmised in Northern circles that his domestic ménage owed much to her occasional care. It was positively asserted that if she chose she could tell what had become of a certain Geyser, which had mysteriously disappeared of late, and there were not wanting dark hints that it had been placed in his kitchen by her agency, in order that he might enjoy a perpetual supply of hot water for his punch, of which it was feared he was becoming very fond.

It is certain that he has been known to lay his finger aside his jolly red nose, wink oracularly, and indulge in a silent inward laugh and chuckle when the subject has been broached to him. But it is not my business to pry into the domestic concerns of these excellent people, but to give an account of Santa Claus's ball.

The dancing-hall was brilliantly illuminated by certain Northern Lights, which had generously volunteered their services for the occasion, and a great number of Shooting-stars were engaged to act as drivers and torch-bearers to convey the guests to and from the scene of the festivities. It was expected that this evening would witness the début of many of the belles and beaux of Toyland, and no pains or expense was spared to make the ball "the affair of the season."

Santa Claus had dispatched his numerous reindeer teams over the American continent to collect his guests; and, lest these accommodations should fail, several Lapland witches had benevolently loaned their broomsticks for the use of such of the company who might prefer them. Jack Frost had done himself more than justice in the upholstery and finishing of the palace, which he could well afford to do, having had the contract from time immemorial. The tables were abundantly spread with viands suited to the tastes and appetites of the guests; while Boreas was engaged to furnish music, assisted by a large deputation of Tin Trumpets and Painted Drums, who were expected to arrive somewhat later in the evening.

Santa Claus had to hear what communications his emissaries might have for him, and this must be attended to before dancing, of course.

The apartments were decorated with hemlock boughs and garlands, brought thither with infinite pains. Ash-berries and holly, with the ancient mistletoe, were tastefully arranged over the walls, and huge sparkling icicles glittered among them in pure and beautiful contrast to the rich dark green of the evergreens.

The reception-room was thickly carpeted with Iceland moss for the benefit of rheumatic old Dolls, and to enable imprudent young lady Dolls who might have overheated themselves with dancing to resort thither and save themselves a pulmonary attack by inhaling its health-restoring fragrance.

And now, as every thing had been properly attended to, and the arrangements were to his entire satisfaction, the old gentleman, in his best suit of furs, with his pipe laid aside for once, in compliment to the ladies, stood before the great fire-place in the reception-room, with his back to the fire and his coat-tails judiciously drawn on each side, awaiting the arrival of his visitors. He did not have to wait long; for the tinkle of his reindeer' bells were now heard, and the first installment of Dolls soon entered the apartment.

As he expected, they were the invalid guard of the hall, the battered and disabled ones, who had stood one year, at least, of the Nursery campaign, and their battered noses, cracked crowns, and shattered or missing limbs bore evidence to the hard service they had seen.

Polly, the oldest Doll, opened the conversation with grumbling and complaints. She was a very old Doll. Lame and dilapidated, with one arm and a foot gone, and her frock torn half off her shoulders, and her garments soiled and tattered generally, she presented but a sorry appearance.

After extending a courteous welcome to the lame, halt, and blinded party, he lent a listening ear to her grievances.

"If your highness could only know of the goings on in our nursery. Now I don't come here to complain of neglect or ill-usage like some, though I was once a very handsome china Doll, and was dressed and petted as much as the best. Nor do I complain of my broken arm;" and she sadly held up the stump of her once plump and snow-white arm. "But it is not myself," she went on, wiping her remaining eye with a soiled rag of a handkerchief, "it is the Children I'm so sorry for. Why, their mother never comes into the nursery more than once a day, and often not that. Sometimes she sweeps in in splendid carriage-dress just ready for a drive, and just touches the children, with 'There, there! don't touch my dress;' and off she goes, while the Children stand at the window and cry themselves sick to see the carriage go off, in which they very seldom have a ride, and never with mamma, unless she goes to fit them with clothes and hats.

"And when little Mary had the scarlet-fever, she left some tiny pills with Katy, the Irish nurse, and told her to give them so often, and the child would be well enough in the morning. But Mary turned and fretted for mamma, was was away at a grand party, and Katy was sleepy and tired, and she muttered to herself—I heard her—'What's the use o' bothering wi' the like of this thrash? I'll just be giving the poor thing a dhrop o' suthin' to bring the slape to her eyes.' And she did give her something out of a bottle, and Mary never woke up out of that sleep. And they carried her away, and I never saw her again. Mary had no in her little bed all the time, and I know all about it."

"How many children are there left?" asked Santa Claus, blowing his nose very hard.

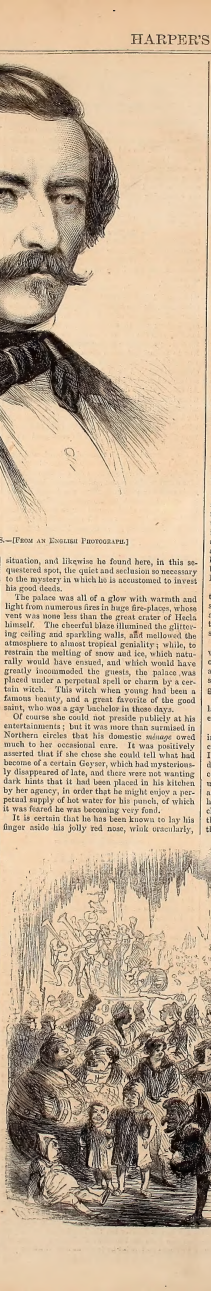
"Two," answered Polly; "another girl and a teething baby. I know just how many teeth he has, for he tries 'em all on me, and I know the minute one is through."

"Poor little things!" sighed the good saint; "I really do not see how I can help them. Is there no aunt or cousin in the house?"

"Yes. Aunt Sophia and Cousin Bell; but they are entirely taken up with Aid Societies, and Lint Circles, and Hospital visiting, and they have no time for the poor children. Mrs. Harvey, the mamma, is wiser. She gave ten dollars to escape the trouble."

"Not so bad! not so bad!" exclaimed the host. "I guess that my friends the soldiers can do for us so well. May the shirts be warm and the turkeys fat that I bring, that is all! I don't suppose there is much chance that my juvenile friends are being calculated upon at all, is there?"

"Not much. I fancy the Soldiers' Christmas box engrosses all their time and attention, and the children always come off second to the public in that house."



"The poor children! the poor children!" put in another doll. "Now where I live there are four little children, and not a rag of new clothes have those poor young ones had this fall or winter, and no prospect of them. And not for lack of money either. Mamma is away to the Hospital, or the Aid Society, or the Lint Company, or what not, as soon as she gets her breakfast, and Tommy's face isn't washed, nor Lizzie's hair curled until the middle of the afternoon, when Betty is all done her work. The cook hasn't made a seed-cake this fall, and every thing nice of jellies or fruit, or whatever there is, goes to the soldiers. The children don't know what a kiss or a story is hardly, it's so long since they heard one; and Charlie's shoes have gaped for patches this month, and Molly's dress is a sight to behold."

"Well, but," interposed the saint, "the soldiers are proper subjects for care and kindness. They need jellies and the children don't; and, poor fellows! they have no mothers to wait upon them."

"Small loss if they are like some mothers I know; but if those mothers don't train and love their own little soldiers at home, there will be another great rebellion one of these days."

"Just my notion," mumbled an old nut-cracker. "If the Southern mothers had only cared for their children when they were little instead of always threatening to send them to convents or boarding-schools—and finally doing it to get rid of the trouble they ought themselves to take—South Carolina never would have seceded, and Master Peyton wouldn't have screwed my neck off with rage when he heard of the victory of Fort Donelson."

There was another loud jingle of bells, and a merry load of the aristocrats of Toyland were joyfully ushered in. They were accompanied by a

SANTA CLAUS'S BALL.

Zouave, whose pretty china head and brilliant red white and blue had evidently dazzled the eyes of all the female portion of the company—all but Miss Josephine. She, the waxen beauty in her silk and blond, her tarletan and spangles, her embroidery and lace, felt herself entitled to the belleship of the ball-room without a question, and was especially irritated at the company of certain nondescript Dolls, who were exceedingly presumptuous, as she deemed it, in riding in the same sleigh as herself. She was especially conceited on the subject of her birth; for, as she boasted, she was a genuine Parisian, body, complexion, curls, dress, and all; and, moreover, a true Santa Clausian, who had come down standing in Santa Claus's own hands, and was none of your fair-bought, home-made, home-dressed, got-up-any-how affairs. She had been promenaded on the Boulevards, and aired in the Bois de Boulogne, and was bursting with spite that the Zouave, who was, as she alleged, "only bought at a Soldiers' Fair," should not notice her more than he did.

She flirted her tarletans contemptuously past him, and courtesied to the ground before the host. He greeted her kindly, and courteously inquired the occasion of her clouded brow.

"I can not bear mixed companies," she answered, with ill-concealed disdain.

"But my invitation was peremptory."

"True, and therefore am I here."

"Yet, my pretty Doll, your countenance indicates that you come reluctantly."

The petted beauty burst into tears.

"May I never become human!" she exclaimed. "If my heart is not almost broken with neglect!"

(This is the hoped-for future of Dolls, and with good reason, for the metamorphosis is well authenticated in many cases.)

"Neglect! I supposed the fair Josephine was far above the danger of neglect!" murmured the Zouave.

"It is very well for you, Colonel Ellsworth, to speak in that way," she pettishly replied. "You know that I have lain in the drawer without a breath of air or glimpse of daylight but what comes through the broken lock of my drawer, while you sit in the Doll-chair, the pet and darling of the nursery, and feel yourself Lord Paramount every where. My worst trouble, and the cause of all my troubles, is the ambition of my little mistress's parents. Unfortunately she let it out that she was a bright child, and they have shown her no mercy ever since. She goes to school at half past eight every morning. She remains until half past two, then she comes home, eats a lunch, and practices music until four. Then she sews an hour for the Aid Societies, then her evening meal and lessons from seven till nine, when my poor ten-year-old mistress goes to bed. Every day of the week this is the rule except Saturday, when sewing for the soldiers takes the place of lessons at school, and maybe she gets a short walk in the afternoon.

"Dear Santa Claus, can not you help us? She will die if this goes on. I see and hear this, and it is every word of it true;" and the tears stood again—tender, loving tears—in her waxen blue eyes.

The saint's eyes glowed like sparks under his shaggy eyebrows.

"My Master greatly loved these little ones when he dwelt on the earth, and if their human parents do not more carefully watch and tend them he will gather the lambs to his bosom again," he murmured softly to himself, as he slowly paced the floor, with his hands contemplatively clasped under his coat-tails.

A brisk-looking jointed Chinese Doll now hopped up to their host, and began to retail both information and grievance in his attentive ear.

She said that she and her friends Hoop and Hoop-stick, Ball and Bat, Battle-door and Shuttle-cock, were under a ban, and were heart-broken at the aspect of things in their residence, which was in Boston. She really did not see how she was going to bear it any longer. Evening study was now the rule, and the poor children went to bed so tired that when they rose in the morning they had no spirits for play at all, neither had they the time. She couldn't remember when they had had time.

Katy was as pale as a ghost trying for the prize for French, and Milly was equally desperate for the Mathematical medal. She stated that her memory couldn't recall when she had been properly undressed and put to bed, and she had quite lost her voice, it was so long since she had been squeezed.

The circle smiled at this, and the Zouave mischievously encircled her waist with his padded arm, to which pressure she responded with an extremely natural "squawk," which proved her bellows in excellent order, and made the Dolls look scandalized behind their fans, and Miss Josephine walked away as haughty as a crowned queen.

"It seems that the Aid Societies do not trouble your house very much," whispered the Zouave, offering his arm for a promenade; "at least you do not oppose them as violently as many do."

"Ah!" sighed the almond-eyed Squaw Lin, accepting the proffered arm with a mollified air, "if all soldiers were like Colonel Ellsworth! But really, if you could only see the wooden German Grenadiers at our house which came home from the last fancy fair—" The rest of the sentence was lost as they sauntered off to try the flavor of an ice à la Hecla.

Santa Claus looked after them with a peculiar smile.

"We have all been young once," he sighed. "I had a touch of the complaint many years ago myself."

There were many complaints and much important information brought to Santa Claus that night, to all of which he attentively listened, and promised to use his influence on the side of right, reserving to himself the privilege of judging the merits of the case.

There were almost universal complaint from the city Dolls that their little mistresses were over-studied, in school and out of school; and although the complaint came selfishly from the Dolls, Santa Claus knew too well the consequences to pass the information in silence. Dull children were in little danger. It was the bright, talented ones, who needed no urging to study at all, to whom the harm happened. Boys could and would get air and exercise somehow; but little girls, bright, studious, lady-like little girls, had no redress if parents did not take up their cause.

Santa Claus had a theory that, if a little girl of ten years old made the clothes for her Doll family, it was about as much sewing as she ought to be expected to do; and if she was studious in school she ought not to be expected to study out of school and give up her play hours. He espoused the cause of the Hoops and Balls, the Battle-doors and Shuttle-cocks, feeling that they had a good work to do, in which the parents ought rather to aid than restrain them.

His "little ones" were especially dear to the saint's heart, and he believed that his little Peter Parlegians had turned out full as well as those whose studies were more pretentious. He sadly remembered certain bright little faces that, one Christmas, would peer so curiously and sweetly into the stockings it had been his care to fill for them, who, before another Christmas, had laid their throbbing heads and quivering nerves to rest where school-books should never annoy them more. And he shrewdly opined that if half the amount of study at present exacted was performed in school under the teacher's eye, and with his assistance, the good results mentally would be doubled; and if the time thus saved from study be devoted to vigorous romping in doors or out, the value to the little students would be wonderful, and the bright eyes and curls might look into well-filled stockings until years insensibly stole away the child's privilege. But Santa Claus sighed deeply when he thought how hopeless was the task of convincing parents of this.

His heart grew still heavier when he thought of the many nurseries unblessed by the constant presence of a mother. Society—gay, bewitching, fascinating society—claimed so many, especially young mothers. "And yet," he reflected, as he promenaded the now nearly deserted reception-room, and the gusty sounds of distant music reached his ears from the dancing-halls, where the Tin Trumpet Band, Boreas conductor, discoursed melody for the multitude of twinkling feet—"and yet this class are not so hopeless after all; for sooner or later sorrow, steadiness, or wisdom come to all, and these gay young creatures turn out pretty well after all; for most generally it is only an excess of animal spirits which passes off in time. It's only a few comparatively—alas that there should be any!—who are incorrigible." But even Santa Claus shook his head as he reflected that so many really excellent, high-principled, kind-hearted mothers find their duties and tastes leading them away from home and the dear faces there, even to the neglect of his darling pets, who so sadly missed the smile, the kiss, the story or romp, the walk or ride with mamma, the sunshine of her presence. And very sad remembrances occurred to him of those who, having no tender drawing out of love of home, found bright fires and lights (such unhallowed ones!), elsewhere, and sweet smiles and brilliant glances, glowing with no holy mother-love, and accepted the wretched substitutes. He loved the poor soldiers; they were his especial care. Many a box of comforts and delicacies had he conveyed to them, and so joyfully, when mothers, sisters, and daughters filled them; but his heart ached for the dear Children whose mothers, in restlessness or ignorance, had neglected them to minister to strangers. He saw in this very neglect, whether from misguided ambition or simply indolence, the one great cause of the Great Rebellion; for, of a certainty, if the Children can obey well, the men will command well, and deserve well of the opinion of the world.

The Children of Santa Claus must neither be left to the exclusive care of either Biddy or Dinah. Neither devoted to death upon the school desk, nor impaled by the needles of infanticidal Sewing Societies. The races and romps, the balls and hoops, must resume their rule. Their precious Doll cares and baby housekeeping, the song or story from mamma, the evening frolic with papa, must be reinstated. Bo-Peep and Cock Robin must not be supplanted by Manesca and Davies; nor Jack the Giant Killer by Dumas or De Staël, nor Mother Goose by Watts on the Mind. Not a bit of it. And St. Nicholas swore by his eight favorite reindeer to claim back his own, and bid the children be Children once more.

He resolved that the children of soldiers, either absent or killed, should fare especially well, and their stockings well filled by hook or crook, and re-resolved that within the circle of his influence all faces should be bright and happy—Aid Society or Gay Society to the contrary, notwithstanding.

So he walked along with his hands in his pockets to watch the dancers. They were holding high revel there. Over the glittering floor they flew, waxen beauties, clasped by stalwart Highlander or courtly Louis Quatorze, who had escaped from the drawing-room mantles. Bronze knights in armor clinked their mailed heels in time with plump china Dolls. Rag Dolls waddled round in the embrace of India-rubber Zouaves. Wooden Dolls stumped round in the Mazurka with the German Grenadiers. Hideous Gutta Perchas and half naked Arabs hob-a-nobbed with Walnut witches over their boiling punch; while Jumping Jacks executed frantic polkas with beautiful dancing Dolls; and Chinese Dolls and Crying Babies squalled vigorously, as energetic Harlequins bounced them around in time to the wild music of the Band. The Northern Lights glimmered and flashed, the huge fire-places glowed with fervent heat. The icicles trembled on the garlands, and the weird music played faster and faster, and round and round they flew under its enchantment. The Sister of Charity, her skirts smeared with the ink she had wiped from numerous pens, simpered slily under her big white bonnet, as she touched glasses with a burly Punch, astride a beer cask. She looked abominably knowing as she winked to him that she could, if she chose, reveal what a soldier in camp had written under her supervision. "That is, I sat on the inkstand, and wiped his pen—so I read his letter," and she smiled as a gay young tiger replenished her glass with the hottest of punch.

I should talk forever to describe every thing said and done that night. I shall only hint how certain Dolls, too old to dance and too young to stay at home, formed in a snug whist party, and en masse got gloriously fuddled, insomuch that some ventured too close to the fire and were instantly reduced to glowing charcoal; while others, not discerning the difference between a witch's broomstick and a comfortable sleigh, imprudently chose the former, and while in the act of sailing home, singing incontinently tumbled off and were lost in the Arctic ocean, and never heard from more. The younger portion of the company, who drank only ice-water, all got home in perfect safety before cock-crow.

"On the bat's back do I fly!"

Santa Claus made a speech to the Dolls, in which "he assured the Dolls that he would attend to their grievances, and see to it that they had more of the time and attention of their little mistresses than ever before; also that a flea should be judiciously inserted into the ears of the mothers, to the intent that their assistance and co-operation should be lent to further his plans for a merry Christmas. He added that the soldiers were the fathers of his children, and had been his children themselves, and should receive his especial care and attention. All that could be done for them was right, except when it robbed little ones of their mothers. Likewise, the children and orphans of soldiers were under his especial care, and he promised to co-operate with all Dolls from Fancy Fairs, to see that they were placed where they would do most good to the children."

He squeezed Polly's remaining hand, and exhorted her to mind the slippery steps, and pinched Josephine's glowing cheek, as she courtesied before him down to the ground and showered her flaxen curls over her waxen beauty; she leaned on the arm of the Ellsworth Zouave, who tenderly wrapped her white opera cloak around her, as he placed her inside the sleigh and took his own seat on the box beside the strolling Star who acted as driver for the nonce.

He comforted Squaw Lin, who looked venomously after them as they departed, with a promise of a splendid gutta percha Uncle Tom, and laughed himself sore to see her look of disgust.

He felt an inward disquiet, though he could not keep his face straight either, as he saw that the Walnuts and Gutta Perchas had had more than was good for them, and more than doubted if all of them would arrive safe home.

He detained the demure Sister of Charity a moment with a whispered hint of caution under her bonnet, and gave her arm a sly pinch as she nodded so violently that she nearly lost her head-gear. There was a secret understanding between them, only to be divulged to you, dear reader.

He watched each guest depart, and the long train of matrons, each escorting a load of merry, sleepy, tired Dolls home to their nursery, streamed across the ebon sky like a procession of sparks from a great conflagration.

They were the happiest Dolls that ever started off to a midnight frolic, and the tipsy ones made their exit singing,

"Wewongohomt'llmo'n'g,
'T'lldayltdoespear!"

Then he went in, lighted his pipe, and sat down to cogitate before his fire till morning. Then he concluded that an account of his ball had better be sent to Harper's Weekly, and see if a plea for the Children could not be made through its pages; and I did it for him, and here is the story.

CHRISTMAS EVE.

THE dearly cherished anniversary of so many hundred years comes back to us again in all its sacred beauty and antiquity, kept by some with the time-honored custom of gathering together all the members of the family, near and distant, and distributing among them welcome tokens of affection, of which kind old Santa Claus is supposed to be the donor. The happy few may, perhaps, again this year celebrate their annual festivities; but oh! to how many will it be a season of sad, sad memories! On the left hand of our picture, on pages 8 and 9, we see the fond wife with the likeness of her brave soldier clasped to her heart, looking up to the moon and thinking that it is also shining on him, if indeed he still be above the sod, of which she, poor soul, has never-ceasing and bitter misgivings. The gentle moon shines just as brightly as it did last Christmas when he sat lovingly by her side, and they talked with delighted anticipation of the children's joy, when, on waking in the morning, they would find that Santa Claus had more than realized their fondest hopes in the gifts he had prepared for them. Notwithstanding the anxiety so painfully weighing on the mother's heart, it shall still be "Merry Christmas" with the little ones; and as they lie nestling so sweetly in their little crib, she carefully fills the little stockings, which have been expectantly hung in the chimney, with all they have so eagerly desired. Then she decks the room tastefully with greens, and hangs a wreath below the dear absent father's portrait, which greets the little ones with loving eyes as they awake. Meanwhile the vision of Santa Claus showering his gifts down the chimney comes to them in their merry, happy little dreams, while his sleigh, laden with gifts, is impatiently waiting to jingle off to the next of his favorites.

On the right of the picture sits the subject of these tender recollections. By the light of his camp-fire he can plainly see the loved faces looking up at him from the likeness he holds in his hand. As he gazes he fancies he is again with the dear ones at home; it seems as if the children's merry tones would momentarily ring out with gay laughter. He thinks he feels the clasp of his wife's hand, the slender fingers twined so caressingly round his own; but he raises his eyes, and his own dreary Christmas comes back to him in all its loneliness. The moon is shining down on the beautiful river, and plainly reveals the forms of two of his comrades on sentry duty. Quite near him is another, who, basking in the warmth of the fire, has fallen quietly asleep, the snow lying on the ground sparkles in the moonlight, and all is very still. But there is somebody who remembers the soldier's Christmas. Behold Santa Claus driving along with merry speed, and as he goes he rapidly throws out boxes filled with good things by the thoughtful hands at home, wherein the soldiers shall find enough to make them a jolly Christmas feast, and to drink the health of those they love so dearly.

On the lower right-hand corner we see one of many of our noble ships struggling with the storm; their duty this Christmas time is to be as active as ever on the watch for privateers, while others blockade the rebel ports. There is no merry-making for them this holiday season; only to be tossed about on the wild deep, while the great waves seem to toy with their strong vessel.

On the lower left-hand corner our troops are marching along despite the snow which lies deep on the ground, and is still falling. "Onward to Victory!" is the word, and they continue to press forward. Rains can not damp their martial ardor, snows can not chill those true spirits, cold can not freeze the warmth of their love for freedom, peace, and Union.

At the top is the Northern Light glowing behind Washington's tomb; and as Duganne says, in one of his Ballads of the War—

"When Sumter's cannon in thunder spoke,
And Sumter's lightning blazed—
When out of the gloom of Vernon's tomb
The soul of the Past was raised;
When Union's stars, on the shield of Mars,
Were lifted by Freedom's hand,
Then the light of the North went grandly forth
Through all our loyal land!"

Below this are the peaceful graves of those who have numbered all the Christmases they will ever spend on earth. There they lie, side by side, buried on the field where they fought their last battle. The sad hearts of their mourning mothers, sisters, wives, and children can only find comfort in knowing that they nobly responded to their country's call, and that they yielded up their lives to its glory in as true a cause as ever made hearts beat with patriotic emotion. And so let them not mourn, but HONOR THE BRAVE!

QUASHY'S MASTER.

YOU remember Quashy Quando, don't you? He made your acquaintance through the columns of Harper's Weekly, and perhaps you will remember that he was, in old, old times, before the Revolution, the slave of a physician in the province of Massachusetts Bay.

This physician (besides being a gentleman and my ancestor) was, after his style, as great an original as old Quashy himself, and met with some queer adventures.

Will you hear an anecdote or two of him? He was summoned once in direful haste, to attend a daughter of Eve in her extremity. It was a lonely, old-fashioned farm-house, and the family comprised the man, his wife, and three old maids, sisters of the farmer, by name Hetty, Nabby, and Polly.

It was a cold winter's day, and the Doctor, on arrival, was invited to seat himself in the kitchen (the only sitting room indeed) beside an immense wood fire.

In those days there was at either end of the kitchen a wide door opening directly out, and when the goodman had hewed off a log, something smaller than a hogshead, he used to hitch his oxen or his horse to it by a chain, and drag it in at one door, leave it to be "crowed" on to the fire, and then drive the beasts out at the opposite door. Now that's true.

Well, the Doctor seated himself in such a kitchen before such a fire, rubbed his hands, warmed his knees, and looked about him. In the chimney hung hams of pork and mutton, with a mighty round of beef, smoking. The Doctor pulled his pipe from the pocket of his flapped waistcoat and smoked in opposition.

Upon a bench snugly accommodated in the corner of the wide fire-place slept a great pussy cat, and the Doctor watching her began to nod and blink in sympathy, but just then the door opened and in bustled Nabby bringing "the kettle" (they had but one, and she called it the dinner-pot) half full of water, which she proceeded to adjust by pot-hook and trammel to a great chain hanging lengthwise down chimney (chimney cranes are a modern innovation). Then, with many apologies for disturbing the Doctor, and voluble lamentations over "poor Nancy's" sufferings, she brought from the "butt'ry" a bucket of Indian meal, and began to stir it slowly into the water, seasoning the compound with a handful of salt taken from a great wooden salt-box hung beside the chimney.

The pudding began to boil, and Nabby giving it a parting stir, bustled out of the room and up stairs again to see after "poor Nancy."

A few minutes elapsed, and the door opening in glided Hetty, who shook hands with the Doctor, spoke hopefully of her sister-in-law's illness, and then vehemently stirred the pudding, adding as she did so a large handful of salt.

She had just finished when in minced Dolly, a beauty of thirty years before, and informed Hetty that she was wanted up stairs. Hetty went, and Dolly remained. Innocent young thing, she didn't know or say any thing about Nancy's illness, but whisked about the room setting all in primest order and talking of this "uncommon spell o' weather."

Finally, approaching the fire, she spied the kettle of pudding, and tucking away her striped linsey-woolsey skirt to show her pretty feet, began to stir the mush, ending by adding a double handful of salt.

"Dolly," called Nabby's shrill voice, and the fair child skipped away.

As the door closed behind her the Doctor solemnly arose from his chair, and with a severe aspect seized the stick, stirred the pudding till he could stir no longer, and then diving into the salt-box brought up as much of its contents as his capacious hand would hold, and gravely added it to the boiling mass.

Then he sat down again with one queer little twitch at the corner of his mouth.

Half an hour later, and Nabby reappeared. "Poor Nancy" wasn't ready to see the Doctor yet, and she guessed they'd better have supper right away.

So the great immovable oaken table was cleared, a number of bowls with pewter spoons were put upon it, with a loaf of brown bread, some butter, a pitcher of milk, and a great can of cider. Then Nabby, seizing the pot, drew it forward, but pausing, said, meditatively,

"Seems to me jest as if I'd forgot to salt this firmaty."

She half glanced at the Doctor, but he was deep in dignified reverie, and Nabby did not venture to disturb him.

"No, I'm sartin I didn't," said she, to herself, and dipping into the box brought out a generous handful and stirred it in.

"Seems to me the salt's got dreadful low in that 'ere box," muttered she, sturdily swinging the kettle off the chain.

The Doctor rousing himself, gallantly offered his assistance, and the firmest, poured into a mighty wooden bowl, soon smoked in the middle of the table.

The family were assembled, and the pudding was ladled into a little bowls.

"I s'pose you like much and milk, Doctor? It's farmers' fare," remarked Hiram, handing the widow his portion.

"Very much when it is good," returned the Doctor, commencing to eating the substance to begin tasting.

"Well, sir, I guess it is good,—why, I use—my—mother, what upon earth ails the stuff?" exclaimed Hiram, putting a spoonful into her mouth, and swallowing it with a gulp.

"Why, sure enough, it's just as salt as brind leef!" ejaculated Nobby.

"Oh, my! I do declare! I never did!" cried into Dolly, pocketing a mouth which had been pretty nigh the measure of sinning.

"Then," recommenced Nobby, with a self-condemnatory nod of his head, "you 'was I up in it. I salted it when I put it over, and then I was so took up with your book in it!"

"Well, sister," began Hiram, sheepishly, "I didn't know we 'took salted it, and so I up and added it."

"Ho, he, he! Oh my! Oh dear my! I never did in all my days!" giggled Dolly. "Why, Jabez, I put in a double handful of salt!"

"And, ladies," began the Doctor—who had turned his eyes with evident gravity from one speaker to the other, all around the board—"I stirred and I tasted the pudding, before, perceiving that you all did it. I thought it was a household custom at such times to stir, partake and pray for the goddess Lucina. In some I was mistaken."

But the bowl laid, and the pudding, and the milk were good, and Nancy was well before morning.

Another time the Doctor was summoned to one of these outlying farms, to visit a young wife dying of some acute and painful disease. He soon saw that the case was hopeless. Five the night, and summoning the husband into another room, he broke the sad news to him, adding that he would stay awhile her to the last.

The husband left the room, and seated himself beside the kitchen fire, while the Doctor returned into the sufferers bedroom.

It was just at midnight, but through the little square window the Doctor could see the dawn in the east all the grey seem had come at last, with mingled misery and pain, hurled across like the first message by such overwhelming grief. wind as they have upon the sea-board, and northern clim.

The dawn should have crossed and trembled, the great trees waved in terror, flowed in submission, but were vast limb fixed like the gravity of the land, hugging the earth.

It was an awful night.

The Doctor sat still, returning from the window, which the bedroom door softly opened, and the young husband's hand appeared within.

"Is she a-goin', Doctor?" asked he, in a loud whisper.

"Yes, my friend," said the Doctor, and the door was closed quietly.

Some fifteen minutes passed, and the door again opened.

"Is she a-goin' yet, Doctor?"

"Yes, my friend," said the unconscious. She does not suffer now. Won't you come in?"

The man entered and closed the door.

"Poor fellow! He feels what he is losing very keenly," thought the Doctor, softly, looking again at the window.

Another fifteen minutes passed, and again the door opened. This time the husband crept cautiously in, approaching the bed, looked at his wife. The Doctor regarded him with considerable interest. A pair of bloodshot eyes were set over his pantaloons; his head was borne upon his arm, and his grotesque body and limbs covered with a hot woody and grotesque body and limbs covered with a hot woody and grotesque body and limbs covered with a loose coat or frock, and his shoulders were a loose coat or wrapper, bolted about the waist with a short cord.

"Are you a-goin' yet?" asked the Doctor, bluntly.

"She ain't gone yit," whispered the husband, not describing the dying woman. "But I reckon, Doctor, you to let me know the very minute the breath's out'n her body, 'cause I mean to be right by it."

"Were too late!"

"Yes," responded the man, compassionately, mistaking the Doctor's malignant astonishment for sheer ignorance. "Perhaps you'd better stay in that when see me die. I'm in a house then, 'those the hers are warned on it fast thing they'll do, and I reckon I'll be the last you'll see on it. You reckon she's gone' (gazing his thumb toward the bed) 'I want to know, 'cause I don't see that right out."

And five minutes after he went.

The Doctor, like most medical men, was a great skeptic as to supernatural matters, and often said he'd only ask to meet a ghost to have a good bout before parting.

So one dark night, coming home on foot from the border of a big swamp, where he had been called to visit a case of fever and gratify his own pride by crossing "Doctoman's Path-e," where old Jeff Davis had been found hanging by the neck many years before, when he had been buried, and where, he was quite sure, he might still "walked," Doctor Bolus, on darkness might like this.

The Doctor stopped, vividly along, smiling gravely to himself at the mental weakness of his fellow-townsfolk, which was entirely natural, and then stood still as if to wait for him, standing apparently half in and half out the earth, and of a dingy white form, with outstretched arms. The Doctor walked but an instant before he boldly advanced upon the fact. In not in two steps from the spot a hog, whose he hastily retreated, and regaining the road coolly walked on, congratulating that it was not a ghost and not the ghost that had vanquished him, and that he was not ashamed of the horrid thing he had mistaken for "it."

Just then, however, the Doctor became aware that some one or something was pursuing him at a short distance behind, the sound being such as by a thick hedge by the bushes growing along the edge of the road. Dull footsteps, however, on the occasional clink of a chain, plainly to be distinguished, and were evidently following in his track or course.

This was uncomfortable; but with a dogged shake of his head the Doctor walked on and walked steadily, and in the centre of the road, toward home, only wishing he had taken to ride that day.

Suddenly standing his eyes to discern the path, the poor Doctor saw a dim figure before him, a tall white form, obstructed some, stood in his path, but now there lay no log between, and which a quick fire was seen to have been viewed upon.

Nobody was so accustomed. He saw the weary white dress, the flowing dark hair, the pallid face and hollow eyes. Still he approached near and nearer, until, as he drawn within the length of a couple of yards of the form, a loud laugh, and dared away to the thick forest.

The Doctor stood still and wiped his brow. Although the night was freer and the wind a shrewd one. Just then the Doctor heard the tramble of a cradle in Jack Bolus's little farm-house; and actuated by a sudden impulse, he made up his mind to stop there for the night and not proceed, as he was following his wife to bed.

"Please, sirs, all of course receives in your wood-lot, Bolsbus," began he. "Take your gun and a lantern and come with me. Quick. Perhaps the shell out had not fired."

The lantern woman obeyed, and it was not till they were on the road that the astonished farmer gasped out:

For reply, the Doctor succinctly narrated his night's adventure.

Jack Bolsbus listened to the whole account with brooding gravity of countenance, and by the noise of the report of Daudmain's Pistol; and being encored in the affirmative, replied, that, the breech of his gun barrel he'd known his feat, looked up and down, east and west, and listened a short, silent, contentious pace of ground.

"Tellee what, Doctor! you not the old white cellar in the house, and the hen-house. The hen's cackling like old, and there's just two limbs left, that do stick out the arms, and there's a fowl. Then my old 'Sy-ree black horse, you know—he's fattened and turned into that very pasture to grow. I guess he wanted you should hereon him. Then as for the critter that screamed, I shouldn't wonder if it was that 'ere crazy woman the men was here from Stapleton arter this very mornin'—"

"Why didn't you say that first, you foolish fellow?" inquired the Doctor, with somewhat unwarrantable heat. "Of course it's she, and we must take the team and come and get her. She'll freeze before morning. And, mind you, Bolsbus, not a word to any one. Here's a dollar for you, and as you don't say a word about my little mistake to man, woman, child, nor child. I'll give you a look out for an extra dose of wine pill next time you come under my hands!"

Stebbins promised, and kept his promise for a good many years at least. Only once in a while, when any one spoke of Deadman's Pasture, he would unaccountably break into one of his peculiar laughs, and go away shaking his head in silent satisfaction.

But then—that's enough for once of the old Doctor.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A SPECULATION.

$25 per day made sure, and more if you persevere selling our new and popular Chromo Fluid Pictures for Parlor, age. Something NOVEL and UNEQUALED. Just out to all old agents, and containing the NOW ARTICLE of good quality. Writing Materials and Fancy Articles sell well for our customers. Age the New Style Agents did Holiday Gift. They are standard goods, and everybody wants them. Call and see them, and sales quick. We give it a free present to each person who orders our Package. A SPLENDID GIFT. Circulars sent free. Address, Draper, Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted in every County and State. Now is a chance for soldiers in camp or discharged. Send for circulars. Address, Draper, Packages in endless variety and at all prices.

S. C. HUKRIDGE & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York. Largest and oldest Picture Publishing House in the World.

AGENTS WANTED, in every County and Town to sell our New Mammoth Brooks Prize Packages. We give free a BEAUTIFUL WATCH to each Agent. $15 to $30 can be made every day. Send for our new Circulars.

W. U. CATELL & CO., 49 and 51 Nassau Street, New York.

Attention Masons and Soldiers.

I will send (as sample), on the receipt of $1, a handsome Gold Plated Ring, with Square and Compass, Letter G and Gold Pin and Pencil, or Engraved Locket, or Bracelet, or Sleeve Buttons, or Studs, or Charm, or Thimble, or Ring with my wholesale Circular. B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 209 Broadway, New York.

$16 WATCHES. $16 "Holiday Presents."

Lodi s' Watches.—A fine Gold Plated Hunting Case full jeweled Lever, equal to Gold 18 k. Gold in finish and guaranteed to keep correct time for three years. Price $16. Sent to any express. Address, Draper, Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted in every County and State. Now is a chance for soldiers in camp or discharged. Send for circulars. Address, Draper, Packages in endless variety and at all prices.

S. C. HUKRIDGE & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York. Largest and oldest Picture Publishing House in the World.

AGENTS WANTED, in every County and Town to sell our New Mammoth Brooks Prize Packages. We give free a BEAUTIFUL WATCH to each Agent. $15 to $30 can be made every day. Send for our new Circulars.

W. U. CATELL & CO., 49 and 51 Nassau Street, New York.

Attention Masons and Soldiers.

I will send (as sample), on the receipt of $1, a handsome Gold Plated Ring, with Square and Compass, Letter G and Gold Pin and Pencil, or Engraved Locket, or Bracelet, or Sleeve Buttons, or Studs, or Charm, or Thimble, or Ring with my wholesale Circular. B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 209 Broadway, New York.

MAGIC TIME OBSERVERS

The Perfection of Mechanism.

BEING ADAPTED TO RAILROAD USE, THE LLOYD'S OR GENTLEMEN'S WATCH COMBINES.

One of the most simple, accurate, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepieces for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it the movement which the machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. In the case of this Watch are combined of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved vulcanite lever escapement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Price, superbly engraved, and case of a solid piece, $20.00. Sample Watches, in best movement bores, for those proposing to buy at wholesale, $25, sent by express, C.O.D. payable on delivery. Soldiers must remit payment in advance, as we can not collect from them. Address, Agency, HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,

Cor. John and Nassau Streets, New York.

FISH'S

KEROSENE LAMP, HEATING ATTACHMENTS.

Also arranged for GAS, viz.:

Nursery, or Sitting Lamps;

TEA AND COFFEE BOILERS;

HOOPSKIRT LAMPS;

Light and Heat Combined.

Send for a Circular.

A great saving.

W. L. FISH & CO.,

No. 2 Platt Street, N. Y.

"THE HUMAN FACE DIVINE"—Eyes, Ears, Lips, Mouth, Head, Hair, Neck, Hands, Feet, Skin, Nose, Beard, Complexion, Expression, Health, Grace, given in the

Phrenological Journal

AND LIFE ILLUSTRATED FOR 1863, devoted to PHRENOLOGY, PHYSIOLOGY, PHYSIOGNOMY, PSYCHOLOGY, and all that pertains to the Moral, Intellectual, Social, Mental, and spiritual Nature of Man. Amply illustrated, and all for the cheapest of publications. Only 30 cents. Subscribe now. Only $1 00 a year. Samples, 10 cents. Address, FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

Artificial Legs.

Artificial Legs are furnished to soldiers by Government without charge, by applying to Dr. DY. A pamphlet describing the reception, may be obtained free of charge by addressing DANIEL BYE, M.D., Author of No 626 Broadway, New York, or Rochester, N. Y., or Cincinnati, Ohio.

PENSIONS, BOUNTY, PAY, PRIZE-MONEY, and Navy Claims, procured by SOMES & BROWN, No. 2 Park Place, New York. Send for circular. Agents wanted.

Rheumatism—Who has it?

It has been confessedly acknowledged by thousands who have used them, that the Galvanic Electric Metallic Insoles are the most wonderful remedy ever known for all kinds of Rheumatism, Nervousness, Neuralgia, Sick Headache, and Debility. Send for a circular. MICTIAM & CO., 629 Broadway.

SOMETHING NEW.

NATIONAL AMERICAN AMUSEMENT CARDS.

Consist of Historical Portraits of Distinguished Characters, for Jack. Fifty-three card to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags, and other National Devices, on the reverse cards. Your packs mailed free on receipt of One Dollar in a small envelope. Address, J. H. MANSFIELD, Agent. Address AMERICAN PUBLISHING AGENCY,

No. 21 Ann Street, Up Stairs, New York.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Cocoanut will force them to grow beautifully in six weeks upon the smoothest face, or upon a bald head. Sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of 25 cts. Address, Box 5,000, Boston Street Post, N. Y.

CATARRH!—Dr. Goodale's CATARRH REMEDY penetrates to the very seat of this terrible disease, and exterminates it, root and branch. Price $1 00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. Depot 612 Broadway.

WEDDING CARDS.

The Latest Fashionable Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Old Establishment, 23 Broadway, cor. Trinity Pl., N. Y. 12th Established 1845. 12th For Specimen by Mail, send two stamps.

Splendid Holiday Presents.

100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

WHOLESALE BOOKS.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be found for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

160 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $100 00 each.
250 Gold Lever Watches..... 75 00 each.
100 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 60 00 each.
50 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches..... 25 00 each.
3000 Vest and Neck Chains..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
500 Lockets..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
5000 Cameo Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Coral Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Lava, and Opal Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Jet, and Opal Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Gent's Breast Pins..... 2 50 to 5 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys..... 2 50 to 5 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides..... 2 00 to 5 00 each.
5000 Sets of Studs..... 2 00 to 5 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Pair Cuff Buttons..... 2 50 to 5 00 each.
5000 Stone Set Rings..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Gold Pens..... 2 50 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Mounted Holders..... 4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.

All Gold Pens are Warranted.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Persons can have the Goods by various articles, and each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed. They are ordered, are taken without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will be told what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and have the article sent to you.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every certificate sold by them, provided their remittances amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for each package delivered, 10 cents to be returned in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our readers to be sure in giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

No. 5 Broadway, New York.

Wanted by a Bookseller.

A thoroughly competent Retail Salesman. One of experience, with satisfactory references, can make an engagement at once, at a fair salary, by addressing Lock Box 456, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Just Tribute to Merit.

AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON,
July 11th, 1862,
Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners. Manufactured by the sole patentees and manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this make. Beware of worthless imitations.

Maizena

The food and luxury of the age, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without isinglass, milk, eggs, or spice. Is the most astonishing thing and economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. In fact for every purpose you can use flour for. A little boiled in milk will produce rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, &c. For sale by all Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Manufactured at Glen Cove Mills,

Long Island.

Wholesale Depot, 166 Fulton Street.

WM. DURYEA, General Agent.

J. W. MERSEREAU,

Men's Furnishing Goods

—AND—

GOLDEN HILL SHIRTS

No. 2 Warren Street,

SECOND DOOR FROM BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Represented by N. R. MERSEREAU, L. N. WYANT.

India-Rubber Gloves cure Chapped Hands, Salt Rheum, &c., and render them soft, smooth, and every white; are imperious to water either hot or cold, and are a certain protection to the hands of housework. For sale by the trade generally. Sent by mail on receipt of price and a little over for postage. Ladies' sizes 75 c. a pair; Gents sizes, $1 00.

GOODYEAR'S RUBBER GLOVE MFG CO.,

205 Broadway, N.Y.

Dealers in every description of Rubber Goods, Wholesale and Retail.

MILITARY GOODS.

Swords for Presentation, Sashes, Belts, and Epaulettes, Guns, Pistols, and Revolvers.

Every article in the Military Line Wholesale and Retail.

W. J. Syms & Bro.,

99 Broadway, New York.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles sent to Soldiers at Fredericksburgh, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union Troops, can be sent free of charge, by HALLETT'S EXPRESS. No. 74 Broadway. Soldiers charged low rates.

FRENCH WINES AND BRANDIES.

From Jules Lefranc, 14 Cours la Reine, Bordeaux, France. Warranted strictly pure. For sale by

J. MARC MARTIN, Importer,

No. 203 Pearl Street, New York.

BEAUTY.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses, a charming and perfectly natural color for the cheeks or lips. With no wash off, but remains durable for years. Can only be removed with vinegar, and warranted not to injure the skin. Used by the Empress Eugenie of France. Extensively applied. Mailed free from observation for one dollar.

HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 422 & 424 Sixth St., Philad.

THE BEST GIFT

For Soldiers in the Field

Is one of Evans' Portable Tent Heaters.

Can be put up in five minutes. Will heat any tent in the service, is packed with seven feet of pipe, has but one hole or square and eight inches deep. Price complete $5. Send for Circular.

J. W. EVANS, 21 John Street, N. Y.

East India Pale and

BURTON ALES.

Also, TONIC BITTER ALE, brewed from the choicest

Barley, Hops and Malt,

In Wine, Malt, and Quarter Casks, for Home Consumption and Exportation. J. MATTHESON SMITH, General Agent.

N.B.—As many ask for Smith & Bro.'s ale, Brewery, and not a SUBSTITUTE is offered, consumers will do well to see that they obtain the GENUINE.

PRINCES IMPROVED FOUNTAIN PEN.—One silling by return 18 to 18 hours. Send 3 cent stamp for circular. GEO. F. HAWKES, No. 94 Nassau St., N. Y.

The Prince of Holiday Gifts or Presents.

"THE CELIC MICROSCOPE"

Magnifies small objects 10,000 times. So simple that a child may use it. A most suitable present for any person. Price by mail $2 25; with six mounted objects, $3. Address HENRY CRAIG, 182 Centre Street, New York.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For January, 1863.

CONTENTS:

A CALIFORNIAN IN HOLLAND. First Paper.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Great Geyser.—Hans Christian Andersen.—Andersen's Old Home.—Andersen Cutting Twigs.—Thorlsven.—View in the Faroe Islands.—Faroese Children.—Faroese Cattle.—Coast Land, 1811.—Shore of Glide, 1811.—Krone of Hearts, 1618.

A LIFE'S WORK: THE RESURRECTION.

PAST AND PRESENT.

HOLIDAY SONG.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Hole-in-the-Day.

TURKISTAN.

THE LEAGUE OF STATES.

ROMOLA. Book II.—Chapter I. "ADAM BEDE."

CHAPTER XXI. Florence expects a Guest.

CHAPTER XXII. Fra Girolamo.

CHAPTER XXIII. After-Thoughts.

CHAPTER XXIV. Tessa at the Loom.

CHAPTER XXV. Outside the Duomo.

CHAPTER XXVI. The Convent of Fear.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—In the Via Largo.—The Escapid Prisoner.—Novice of Work.

CARLYLE'S TABLE-TALK.

MISTLETOE AND BAUD. A HOUSEHOLD STORY. By Miss MULOCK. (Concluded.)

THE HABITS AND HAUNTS OF THE SWALLOWS.

THE REVOLVING TOWER AND ITS INVENTOR.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Front Model of the Revolving Tower, 1841.—Theodore E. Tinby.—Vertical Section of Revolving Tower.—Plan of Revolving Tower.—Section of Ship.—Section of Hull and Naval Tower.

THE SMALL VOICE. By C. ALLINGTON.

CHAPTER IX. Mrs. Dale's Little Party.

CHAPTER X. Mr. Jones and Amelia Roper.

CHAPTER XI. Mr. Jones Retires.

CHAPTER XII. Lilian Dale becomes a Butterfly.

LITERARY NOTICES.—Bard, Gardner, Halsted.—Jenny Eames's Letters.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

EDITOR'S PORTFOLIO.—Publication Agency.—The Currency Question.

METHODS FOR JANUARY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Bill Dress.—Children's Costumes.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY together, one year, $5 00.

☞ The Publishers employ no TRAVELING AGENTS. Parties who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly had better remit direct to the Publishers, or pay their subscription to some Postmaster or Canvasser. Unless this precaution be observed, no responsibility can be assumed.

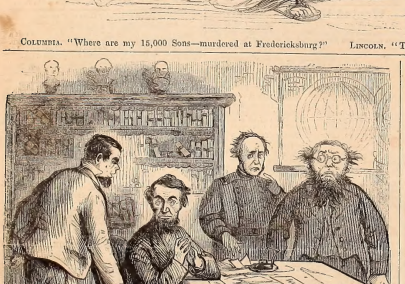
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.



HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY together, one year, $5 00.

☞ The Publishers employ no TRAVELING AGENTS. Parties who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly had better remit direct to the Publishers, or pay their subscription to some Postmaster or Canvasser. Unless this precaution be observed, no responsibility can be assumed.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

COLUMBIA. "Where are my 15,000 Sons—murdered at Fredericksburg?" LINCOLN. "This reminds me of a little Joke—" COLUMBIA. "Go tell your Joke at SPRINGFIELD!!"

THOSE GUILLOTINES—A LITTLE INCIDENT AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

SERVANT. "If ye plase, Sir, them Gillitteens has arove."
MR. LINCOLN. "All right, MICHAEL.—Now, Gentlemen, will you be kind enough to step out in the Back Yard?"

Robes, Scarfs, Ties,
Hosiery, and Gloves.
New Goods at Old Prices.

UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway, New York City.

Sleeve & Bosom Studs,
Made from fine ivory, colors white, black, red, purple, and blue, marked any initial in Old English, and mailed free to any address upon receipt of the price, $1 50 full set. Monograms made to order.

UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway, New York.

CHINA AND GLASS!
We have now in store a very large stock, and invite an inspection. Prices are low, most of the stock having been imported before the new duty. We have not removed, and have NO BRANCH STORE, but continue our business at 439 Broadway, between Broome and Grand Sts.
DAVIS COLLAMORE & Co.

Holiday Presents.
Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machines.
Highest Premium
International Exhibition, London, 1862.
Office 505 Broadway, New York.

Buy your Skate Straps with
Fogg's Lever Buckle,
Manufactured by F. STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK,
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

GOLD PENS.
Retailed at wholesale prices. Goods warranted. Send for a circular, giving list of prices and engravings of Pens. Pens repaired on the receipt of 50 cents or P. O. Stamps.
E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office 15 Maiden Lane, New York City.

A New Story by Arthur!
A New Serial, by T. S. ARTHUR, entitled, "OUT IN THE WORLD," is commenced in the January Number of ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE. For sale by News Dealers. Yearly terms $2. Four copies $5. Published by T. S. ARTHUR & CO., 323 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.

HOLIDAY GOODS.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane AND 22 John Street,
15 Rue d'Enghein, Paris.
47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.
Are now receiving by every Steamer
New and desirable styles of
FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS,
Suitable for the Holiday trade,
Consisting in part of
BRONZES, MANTEL ORNAMENTS, MARBLE CLOCKS, CARD RECEIVERS, PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS, PORTEMONNAIES, OPERA GLASSES, FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES, WORK BOXES, DRESSING CASES, PARTY & BRIDAL FANS, LEATHER BAGS.
Also, a great variety of
FINE JET AND CORAL GOODS,
To which they invite the attention of all parties purchasing in this line. A full Stock of MILITARY GOODS, GUNS, PISTOLS, CUTLERY, PLATED WARE, WATCHES, DIAMONDS, ETC.
Also FINE ENGLISH SKATES.
Entrance 19 Maiden Lane or 22 John Street.

"THE"
CENTRAL PARK SKATE EMPORIUM
An assortment of skates and skate fixings will be found at the Skates 25 cents to 25 dollars. Everything in the skating line except pendit to suit all ages, sexes, tastes and purses.
CONOVER & WALKER, 474 Broadway, N. Y.

Tomes, Son & Melvain,
6 Maiden Lane, New York.

Dealers in Arms and Military Goods of every description.
RICH PRESENTATION SWORDS.
Smith & Wesson's Breech-loading Rifles and Pistols.
Boker's Manufacturing Co. Revolving Pistols.

IMPORTANT TO AGENTS!!—We have reduced the wholesale price of our GREAT STATIONERY PORTFOLIO EMBLEM. We also give better Watches to our Agents than any other firm. Send stamp for new circular. WEIR & CO., 34 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

Lyon's Kathairon.
This delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is again put up by the original proprietor, and is now made with the same care, skill, and attention which for 25 years has obtained such unprecedented sale. Every one admires lustre and beauty! It will cost only 25 cents in large bottles. Two million bottles can easily be sold in a year when it is again known that the Kathairon is not only the most delightful hair dressing in the world, but that it cleanses the scalp of dandruff, gives the hair a lively, luxuriant growth, and prevents it from turning gray. There are considerations worth knowing. The Kathairon has been prized for over twelve years, and is warranted as described. Any lady who values a beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon. It is finely perfumed, cheap and valuable. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.
D. S. BARNES & CO.,
New York.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending D. Adee, 37 Pearl St., N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON WORK, Wrought, Cast, and Wire. 259
IRON RAILINGS, VERANDAHS, BALCONIES, GUARDS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description. Illustrated Catalogue mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM, 259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

Union Prize Packages.
Dunn & Co.'s Head-Quarters, 118 Nassau St., N.Y., and Chicago, Ills. Send for circulars (largest house in the U. S.).

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.
Made to Measure at $18, $24 and $27 PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.
FRENCH FLANNEL ARMY SHIRTS, $24, $27, $30 and $33 per dozen.
S. W. H. WARD, from London, No. 387 Broadway.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE!
MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 28c., COIN PREPAID. Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free.
Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 239, Boston, Mass.

The American Parlor Or Floor Skate, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles.
Oil-tree, each Skate is labeled with the trade mark. Also, 50,000 pair of Ladies' and Gents' Ice Skates, comprising all the new and most improved patterns, made from welded steel and iron instead; Skate Straps and Leather Goods of every description; Fogg's improved Lever Skate Buckle. Sole Agent for Williams, Morse & Co.'s celebrated Skates.
FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK.
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

GOLDEN HILL SHIRTS.
RETAILING
At Wholesale Prices.
Depot 2 Warren Street. J. W. MERSEREAU.

HOW TO BE BEAUTIFUL.
Read PHYSIOGNOMY in the Phrenological Journal. $1 a year. January No. ready. 10 cents.
FOWLER & WELLS, N.Y.

NOW IS THE TIME FOR AGENTS TO MAKE MONEY.—Agents are meeting with extraordinary success with Mrs. STEPHENS'S great work, the PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR FOR THE UNION. It is embellished with over two hundred illustrations. Two volumes, royal octavo, 400 pages each; $3 50 per volume. Sold only by regularly appointed agents, to whom exclusive territory will be given. FIRST VOLUME NOW READY. For terms of agency, &c., address J. G. WELLS, No. 166 Willam Street, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 315.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

REBEL NEGRO PICKETS.

So much has been said about the wickedness of using the negroes on our side in the present war, that we have thought it worth while to reproduce on this page a sketch sent us from Fredericksburg by our artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis, which is a faithful representation of what was seen by one of our officers through his field-glass, while on outpost duty at that place. As the picture shows, it represents two full-blooded negroes, fully armed, and serving as pickets in the rebel army. It has long been known to military men that the insurgents affect no scruples about the employment of their slaves in any capacity in which they may be found useful. Yet there are people here at the North who affect to be horrified at the enrollment of negroes into regiments. Let us hope that the President will not be deterred by any squeamish scruples of the kind from garrisoning the Southern forts with fighting men of any color that can be obtained.

THE BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

On pages 24 and 25 we publish an illustration of GENERAL HUMPHREYS'S MAGNIFICENT CHARGE AT THE BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG, from a sketch by A. R. Ward. We have heretofore published accounts of the battle, and will only subjoin here Mr. Ward's account of the charge:

"The ground of the rebel position at Fredericksburg has been described a number of times; it was, indeed, a natural fortress of the most formidable character. Their guns were mounted along the crest of a steep hill, which formed a glacis sloping to the plain below, across which our troops had to charge. Along this glacis or slope runs a road inclosed by stone walls. Against the inside of these walls earth had been shoveled, and then covered with boards for the riflemen to lean on. Here, four ranks deep, they securely leveled their deadly weapons on our columns. In addition to this fortified road rifle-pits covered the hillside in all directions.

"Against this magnificent defensible position, strong as Sebastopol, and more dangerous for an attacking force on account of the river in its rear, our troops were hurled all day. To what purpose all knew now. The place was impregnable! French and Sturgis led their divisions with patriotic determination to the enemy's rifle-pits. Sturgis, suffering severely, held his ground, as it were, under the muzzles of the heavy batteries. French's column, shattered, broken, falling by hundreds, advancing still with heroism unparalleled, delivered its fire till the last cartridge was spent and nearly half its men killed and wounded. It retired as it came—over the open fields. After it came first Hancock's and then Howard's divisions, each charging more savagely than its predecessors, and holding the ground in front of the rebel works while its ammunition lasted. By this time the sun had set behind the rebel fortifications. The crimson-edged clouds gleamed luridly through masses of smoke, which almost obscured at times the bleak sky, so peaceful in its quiet evening tints, and suggestive of the cessation of the day's labor. Not for the army, however, did it indicate repose. The, relief fire broke out with more ferocity than ever. For sweeping across the fields came the divisions of Generals Humphreys and Griffin. Onward, a forlorn hope, they advance—the ground encumbered by the countless bodies of the fallen; knapsacks, blankets, guns, haversacks, canteens, cartridge-boxes, etc., strewed all over the plain. Shot, shell, canister, shrapnel, and grape is hurled as they approach. By column of regiments, led by their generals, and without firing a shot, that noble band continues on. General Humphreys, dashing ahead to a small rise in the ground, takes off his hat to cheer on his men. With reckless ardor his men, rapidly closing on the double-quick, answer cheers with cheers. Every member of the General's staff has been dismounted. The brave Humphreys himself has two horses shot under him. Here a strange thing occurs. Howard's division, lying on the ground and holding their position with the bayonet since their ammunition was expended, opposes the advance of the division of Humphreys. With pistol and sword the officers threaten and prevent the passage of another division over their prostrate lines, thereby throwing the advancing column into confusion —a confusion which may have prevented this, the last effort of the army, from being successful, for though the smoke the rebels are seen running from the wall.

"Humphreys's division has never been under fire till this battle. But before the awful hurricane of bullets no heroism can avail. The hillside appears to vomit forth fire, its leven glare flashing through the fast-thickening obscurity seems to pour with redoubled power upon our storming columns, till, being unable to stand up against it longer—although within eighty yards of the wall—the brave remnant, singing at the abandon of its courage, marches steadily back to the place where it formed for the charge, leaving its comrades in swathes upon the bloody ground, where, 'stormed at by shot and shell,' they had been cut down, whole ranks at a time, by that terrible fire.

"Thus closed the battle, except for now and then the boom of a heavy gun from the heights and the constant sharp report of the rifles of the sharp-shooters. But the horrors of that night—the scenes of despair and gradual death upon that bloody ground in the bitter cold and darkness—can not be described. Imagination recoils from the cruelty of the scene. No help for the dying patriots on that awful night. To attempt to reach them was to share their fate. The murderous traitors, without remorse, shot down all who approached. Men with children dependent on them —men whose wives trembled for them—men who had been little children, and whose mothers would have feared to have a cold wind blow on them they lay. Of no avail affection; not for them the soothing touch, the warm chamber, and the thousand nameless attentions of kinfolk. Drearily and with faint hope for the morrow, tired, bleeding, dying, they must stay, their noble efforts idly wasted in a fruitless struggle."

On pages 28 we publish several pictures of the Fredericksburg affair, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis. One of these represents GENERAL FRANKLIN'S GRAND DIVISION RECROSSING THE RIVER AFTER THE BATTLE; another shows us the SKIRMISHERS DEPLOYED TO COVER THE RETREAT—some of them lying, others crouching behind every little hillock, or log, or stone which could serve as a protection against shot or shell, others exposing themselves more fully; another, OUR ARTILLERY FIRING UPON THE ADVANCING COLUMNS OF THE ENEMY to keep them at a respectable distance; and another, showing us THE HOUSE OF A. H. BERNARD, which was used by General Franklin as his head-quarters during the fight." It was in the grounds adjacent to this house, and within fifty yards of the door, that the gallant General Bayard was killed.

The following excellent account of the charge of Humphreys is from the World correspondence:

"Humphreys's division of Butterfield's corps was resting on its arms in the streets of Fredericksburg. Butterfield sent an order to move it to the front; simultaneously Hooker ordered Hazard and Perry to take their batteries to the crest which our infantry had made their fighting line all the day long; to open rapidly, and concentrate their fire upon a certain point in the stone wall. This was a perilous undertaking, but it was executed in the most gallant manner. Hazard was at once in position, though losing sixteen men and eighteen horses before he fairly began. Frank followed, took up a position farther to the left on the same line, and then Hazard reopened with shell and solid shot at a range of only two hundred and seventy-five yards.

While their cannonade was going on Humphreys, at the head of Alabama's second brigade, formed in close alliance, and was forming his men behind the crest ready for the charge, and Tyler's first brigade was moving into position, ready to support. The line was formed, the column moved gallantly forward, reached the line of fire, passed fifty yards beyond, when a deadly fire from behind the stone wall entered it to receive it. Shell, and shot, and canister, forming under the crest from which it started. Humphreys and staff, and many other field-officers, were dismounted in this charge, their horses being killed, while the brigade lost five hundred men in the engagement.

Now there was but one more chance. Tyler's brigade had come up, and notwithstanding the turmoil, General Humphreys had succeeded in forming it in gallant style. The only hope now was with the bayonet. The men were ordered not to fire —to rely solely upon their trusty steel. Then, with great exertion, the batteries and the lines of fire on the crest were persuaded to cease firing while the charge was being made; then General Hooker exhorted his men not to quail, not to look back, to disregard the men in front who were lying down, covered by every projection; to ride over them.

The officers were ordered to the front; then the bri-gade, led in person by General Tyler and General Humphreys, moved forward with a glorious cheer. They reached the little rise in the ground, within eighty yards of the stone wall, where line after line of our men lay flat upon the ground: they began to move over the living mass, when suddenly the prostrate men cried out, "Don't go there, 'tis certain death!" and, rising, began to impede the progress of the column, and by protesting of every man they ordered the men not to go forward. Then the crisis came. The division was fighting its maiden battle; other troops than they quailed before the murderous volleys now making great gaps through their ranks; the head of the charging column was enveloped in a sheet of living flame; the hideous shells were bursting all around and in their midst. Was it any wonder that they faltered? The men began to look and fire; the momentum of the charge was gone; the column began to retire slowly, falling back to its place of formation. "Oh, I can't see," said Humphreys, "if you had only gone forward as well as you came back!" And then, again dismounted, his second horse having been killed, he reported the result to General Butterfield, who ordered him to withdraw his troops to a point of shelter.

And this was the forlorn hope of the day, and this is what it did. It demonstrated the impregnability of the enemy's positions—demonstrated to the bravest troops in the world could not storm the breast of fire which poured and plowed and converged for a final fetal space; and it deadened a quiet, fearless, and accomplished man of science, with whom books, and charts, and surveys have been his studies, left a splendid development of the most vigorous mind and distinguished bravery.

REBEL NEGRO PICKETS AS SEEN THROUGH A FIELD-GLASS.

DREAMS.

Wild wandering dreams! in dusky midnight stealing,
Why wake ye thus the memories of the dead?
Departed object to our gaze revealing;
Forms that we loved ere life's warm breath had fled.
Ye can not bring them back, false dreams! then why
Come ye slowly angels from their guardian watch?
Like doves fast fluttering from the hawk away,
With quick despatch.
Wherefore this mockery?
Wild wandering dreams!

Wizards of night! ye woo false phantom shade
A form with life-blood mantling as of yore,
A face where love, all trembling, had betrayed
The secret that the eyes had told before:
Were the dear songs remembered yesterday
(Summoned in mockery) by my side to-day,
With lovely radiance as the stars of night,
Or shimmering lights that on blue ocean play—
Present in music as in song ago,
I'd curse the spell that brought her to me so,
Empty sphere!
To roam with weary step this vale of tears
Suffering life's direst woe never through long years,
Then withering go,
Dying again!

Wild midnight revelers! if ye needs must come
On stars quick tripping—flash the soul away
Where dwell the blest around the Eternal throne:
Show us Heaven's rapture; palest Eternity!
But heavenly earthward wake no memories here
Of loved ones blest!
Let angels tell us how old Time speeds on;
Woo soon the scytheman comes, and we are gone
To meet them here
And take our rest
Forever!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1863.

NEGRO EMANCIPATION.

BEFORE this paper is published the President will probably have issued his Proclamation offering freedom to all negro slaves resident in localities which have not elected representatives to Congress by a majority of legally constituted voters. It is hoped by the Northern partisans of slavery that the Proclamation will be postponed or withheld altogether. But we fail to discover any ground for the hope. Whatever reasons led the President to issue the preliminary Proclamation in September last apply with equal force to the case as it stands at present, and can not reverse or even supply additional motives for securing the active aid of 4,000,000 slaves, if it can be done.

The loyal parts of States which will be excepted from the operations of the Proclamation will be the States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri; the city of New Orleans, Louisiana; probably the city of Memphis and Nashville, Tennessee; the city of Norfolk, and the vicinity of Fortress Monroe, Virginia; and a strip on the sea-board of North Carolina. Emancipation will doubtless be as to the strict right of such cities as New Orleans—whose legally constituted voters are generally in the rebel army—a mere mockery of the benefits of the exceptional proviso in the Proclamation. But the chances are that that act, if enforced at all, will be construed liberally.

The question suggests itself whether to every one's mind in connection with this Proclamation, First, will it induce the negroes to run away? and, secondly, what shall we do with them if they do?

Opinions differ upon both these points; but we imagine that most well-informed persons will, with the President, doubt whether the issue of the Proclamation will be followed by any general exodus of the slaves. For a year or more our armies have refused to return fugitive slaves. Wherever our generals have invaded the rebel States, they have been compelled by military necessity to welcome the contrabands to their protection. Notwithstanding the famous order No. 3, both Grant's and Sherman's armies practically gave freedom to the slaves whom they found in Western Tennessee. General M'Clellan has published a letter in which he declares that the slaves were returned by officers of the Army of the Potomac after the enactment of the new "Article of War," but that, on the contrary, all contrabands coming to that army were received, fed, and set to work. At Hilton Head, the slaves of South Carolina have had a safe refuge for almost a year. General Hunter, General Butler has received and employed every slave who fled thither. At Memphis General Sherman issued a general order, early last fall, directing all officers of his command to welcome fugitive slaves, and deal with them as freemen, at all events for the time being. It is hardly possible that the negroes of the South can have been generally ignorant of a policy so uniformly pursued on the entire rebel frontier; and the presumption therefore is, that all the slaves who wanted to run away, and were able to escape, either have already reached our lines, or are now endeavoring to do so. The Proclamation can hardly add any thing to their knowledge of our purposes, or to their ability to elude the vigilance of their masters. In this respect, therefore, it will effect no change in the situation. It merely affirms and consolidates the policy which has hitherto been pursued by individual commanders from military considerations. Slaves will continue to escape as heretofore; the number of runaways will increase as our armies advance and the blockade is tightened. Possibly the knowledge that under the Proclamation the faith of the United States is pledged to protect them in their rights as freemen may impart courage to some who are now hesitating, and so swell the tide of the fugitives.

The problem how to employ the contrabands will necessarily be solved by the war. Necessity will compel us to use them as soldiers. We shall require, to garrison the strategic points in the enormous country which we have undertaken to overrun, more troops than even the populous North can provide. It is clear that even a million of men will be found too few to attack and defeat the rebel armies, storm the rebel forts, and at the same time hold and occupy each point we take. A quarter of a million troops, in detached forts, may not prove too many to hold the line of the Mississippi River, after it has been cleared of the rebel and other batteries. For this service the negroes are well adapted, and whatever scruples may be entertained by individual generals, the logic of events compels us to assign them to this general post. The work has already been successfully begun. We have a negro regiment at Hilton Head, and a negro brigade at New Orleans. All is still pending before Congress for the equipment of 200 negro regiments of 1000 men each, and the feeling among loyal men is in favor of its passage. We shall have to feed, clothe, and pay these liberated negroes, and there is no present way of making them earn their living except by making them garrison our forts. But when they are cut on the preceding page shows plainly, have no scruples against arming them. We can safely follow their example.

GENERAL BANKS AT NEW ORLEANS.

THE country has learned with considerable regret that Major-General BENJAMIN F. BUTLER has been removed from the command of the Department of the Gulf. His energy, courage, and hearty hostility to treason in every shape, have won for him the admiration and respect of all loyal men; and the confidence in which he is held by our enemies at the South and in Europe proves how thoroughly he has done the work which was set him to do. Whether he was as careful in the exercise of his authority, and as tender of the feelings of foreign consuls as he should have been, are questions which the Administration can decide better than the public. His removal is said to be other than they were decided in the negative. Mr. Lincoln doubtless had good reasons for his course; though, as we said, the removal was a surprise to all loyal men who are in earnest in this war.

But if any possible appointment could console the country for the removal of BUTLER, it would be that of NATHANIEL P. BANKS. For no man in the United States possesses a stronger hold of the public confidence than the ex-operative of Waltham. Not that General Banks has ever electrified the country with brilliant flashes of genius, by extraordinary exploits, or unusual triumphs; but that, in whatever station he has been called to fill, from the beginning of his career a member of the Massachusetts Assembly to the present moment, he has always proved himself equal to his task. Every thing which he has undertaken he has accomplished, not with unusually clear perceptions, a calm, judicial mind, and dauntless courage, not devoid of passion, as was shown in his magnificent speech at the Cooper Institute, but never left New York; but so fair and free from prejudice that Mr. Aiken, of South Carolina, pronounced that he had stood up straight in the Democratic party as most to have leaned to the other side; gifted with such wonderful prescience that as far back as 1858, when the whole country was slumbering in the belief that the Union was indissoluble, he saw for this war; so keenly alive to the truths of the day, and accurately discerning the nature of the contest, that he alone of the leading Republicans wanted to have 600,000 men called out in April, 1861, and scorned the popular notion that we could starve out the South; a statesman of no mean ability, as one may see who reads the proclamation we forced to confess; a soldier in whom M'Clellan could find no fault. Such is the man who now comes to power with the people in this country second only to that of Abraham Lincoln.

For it can not be too often repeated that this war must be decided on the banks of the Potomac, but on the banks of the Mississippi. So long as the rebels hold any portion of the great river it will avail to them what defeats in Virginia. As they, defeated before Richmond, falls back toward Raleigh, and our triumph is barren. He may even fight us, as Davis has boasted, for twenty years on the soil of Virginia, without decisive result, so long as the present boundaries of the Confederacy remain undisturbed. But once let our armies and navy command and retain the whole course of Mississippi, and the hopes of a national existence for the Confederacy is gone. The South went to war with us because the North insisted on girdling slavery, leaving to the slave power Texas, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Missouri. If we can take and hold the Mississippi we shall girdle slavery without those large States—shall confine the institution within the limits of old States where there is little or no new land, and no room for the migratory system of agriculture on which slavery fattens. The South could not afford to accept national existence on these terms. They would realize, as Toombs prophesied, that their country was too small for them and their negroes together, and before five years elapsed, if we recognized their independence, would come on bended knees to Washington, begging to be let out of the trap in which they had got caught.

The possession of the Mississippi River is the key to victory in the war. It now devolves upon General Banks to possess it.

THE LOUNGER.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR!

SEE volumes of our Weekly are now completed, and the seventh is begun. A great multitude of friends that we can not be guilty of letting the New Year pass without a word of acknowledgment. Not that any very sentimental relation exists between you, my good unknown friend, who buy this paper in the extreme West or East or North or South, and the proprietors or the writers; but because, despite all of us, a periodical paper has an individual existence, and its readers are inevitably a body, a dicease, toward which the paper feels abstractly indeed, but especially attached.

As becomes a well-conducted paper which aims to entertain the public without offending its prejudices, public questions were not discussed in these columns until we were assured at the very heart of the nation left but one commanding interest in the public mind. Then to have tattled similarly about matters for which the world cared would have been merely idiotic. For if any man said that patriotism was politics he was at heart a traitor. And if any said that he was indifferent, while his country staggered under the assassins' blows, he was a knave or a fool. And Harper's Weekly does not publish the favor of knaves, fools, or knaves.

While our brave boys by thousands and thousands were marching, and camping, and fighting for us in the field, this paper has been content to witness of their services and their heroism, by a copious and constant picturing of the more striking and interesting scenes, events, and groupings of the war, all along the line from Maine to Missouri. And that the world might know, as it saw them pictured, what they were fighting for, and that they might see that neither they nor the cause were forgotten by us who stay behind, we have constantly set forth great principles of this war, and so far as we may, in obedience to the first duty of every public teacher in the land, we have sought to elevate and purify the public opinion, which is the true government of the country. To that end we have often spoken strongly and sternly. And when good men and true lives were for us all shall we be mealy-mouthed? Let us at least impress upon our soldiers the fact that they are standing shot for shell, and will not their wives, or their country, or their souls their own? We have not believed in making war with olive branches or any other wooden weapon, but when a deadly assault was made upon the Government, and humanity, and civilization, we have believed, and do still believe, that all means are lawful which the true way to treat it was to make the enemy feel the overwhelming power of that Government and civilization, whether honorable and humane grasp could seize him, and be shaken until he were subdued even if it were until death. And if any subscriber thinks that in what he would be hard to do, we believe in trying, and not in submitting to an infamous foe until we have strained every nerve. To be trial may indeed not save life, but it will save honor.

To have been called "Abolitionist" is not a very overpowering fact. The time for a reactionary position of abstract hostility to slavery and practical support of it has utterly gone. Practically to favor slavery in this country at this time is to aid the destruction of the Government and invite anarchy. The question whether the friends or the foes of slavery caused the war, is idle now. Every man may think of it as he will. But we all know that except for slavery there would have been no war. And we can have no peace with it. Therefore it must conquer as the dominant interest of the Government, or be absolutely conquered.

It is certainly profoundly gratifying to us, as it is a most honorable and significant fact for the country, that the publication of Harper's Weekly during this melancholy time has been steadily increasing. It has not been partisan, and never will be. It has sought to be national in fact, and, by God's grace, will never be otherwise. The Lounger believes that the New Year will be happy, and he salutes all his friends with the best wishes.

HOLY-TIME.

THE holiday season probably never dawned upon so many mourning households. But the grief upon which it shines is not dead and hopeless, for the cause of the sorrow and the association of the holytime blend in a light that transfigures the memory of the departed. The dead only seem to be hardly less than to have lived well. For indeed they can hardly be said to do the one who have not done the most. And the sacrifice of young and brave and beautiful whose voices shall mingle no longer in our solemn Christmas hymns and happy New Year greetings, have given a more serious sweetness to each festival by the memory of their heroic sacrifice.

A generous nation will not stand by the graves which are covered with a year's grass, or are just closed, or just opening, and betray those who are laid in them. Those young lives were not poured out that anarchy may prevail. Every one of them has pledged us all more closely to the great object to which they were devoted. From the first slain in Baltimore, from Ellsworth and Winthrop and Greble, on to the last noble heart stilled in battle, each is a link in the chain that holds us all fast to our country. Our dimmed eyes are washed with their blood, so that we who were blind now see. Slowly, and, in how many cases, reluctantly, our minds have come to know that we must conquer or be conquered, and that there is and can be no peace but the annihilation of the cause of war.

And which of these brave youth of ours, seeing as they now do with perfect vision the work they have wrought, would regret the early ending of their martial lives, or even the sharp, sudden pang that sent to the father, or brother, or wife, or maid who loved them, or the mother's heart who bore them? For those who remain is the gain or the loss greater? Was the mother of WASHINGTON, of Nathan Hale, pitied by any man? The mother of Colonel Baker died lately in Illinois. How well she knew that her son ascended in a chariot of fire, from the floor of the Senate to the field at Ball's Bluff!

But these are the thoughts that raise our human hearts into heavenly serenity after the bitter blow has a little passed. In this friendly and sacred season the old habit of the loving circle and the beloved face and form returns and claims its own. The season is domestic. The home asks for its unbroken circle, and its wistful eye seeks those whose smile should have outlasted ours. How far the shadow this year falls! Yet, if looking nearly, O tearful eyes! for you the poet sings:

> "With trembling fingers did we weave
> The holly round the Christmas hearth;
> A rosy cloud possessed the earth,
> And sadly fell our Christmas-eve.
>
> "At our old pastimes in the hall
> We gambolled, making vain pretense
> Of gladness, with an awful sense
> Of one mute shadow watching all.
>
> "We ceased: a gentler feeling crept
> Upon us: surely rest is meet.
> 'They rest,' we said, 'they sleep well, their sleep is sweet,'
> And silence followed and we wept.
>
> "Our voices took a higher range:
> Once more we sang, 'They are not dead,
> Nor lose their mortal sympathy,
> Nor change to us, although they change.
>
> "'Rapt from the fickle and the frail,
> With gathered power, yet the same,
> Pierces the keen seraphic flame
> From orb to orb, from veil to veil.'
>
> "Rise, happy morn! rise, holy morn!
> Draw forth the cheerful day from night:
> O Father, touch the east, and light
> The light that shone when Hope was born."

UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE.

IT is astonishing to observe how much Everybody knows. If only Everybody's advice had been followed the war would have been over long ago. If you are speaking of it on a little journey, you can not but hear the conversation before you and behind you, and Everybody knows every thing to the minutest detail. The refreshing unconsciousness why we have not long ago done all that we long ago undertook to do. The movements of the army especially, and the plans of the Government, are revealed in detail to Everybody—while poor Nobody evidently knows nothing about them.

It makes no difference that the knowledge of various people is entirely at variance—that both can not be any possibility be true. They ignite from the same sentiment with refreshing magnanimity, entirely disregarding the counter assertion. "I know!" says Paul; and "I know!" retorts Peter; and equally sure of his facts is the good reason as the other. One man goes to Washington and sees the documents, and returns and tells you just how it was. His neighbor goes to Washington and talks with members of the Government, and he tells you upon his return that it was all precisely the other way.

Then the entirely authentic private intelligence! Some gentleman it was said that Mary had gone up on the Virginia side to cut off Lee. "No, no!" said the next man; "impossible. Sigel has not been reinforced." "But I assure you," replied the first, "my correspondent in Washington writes me so, explicitly." The news of the cutting-off was varied for a few days only, but still retained.

After the disastrous days of July upon the Peninsula one friend met another, "So Buell is in Baltimore with fifty thousand men to defend Fort Monroe!" "Impossible." "Oh, but I assure you my correspondent in Baltimore, whose business is to get the news, wrote it to me yesterday." "Indeed."—But Buell has not yet arrived.

Statements of every kind can be taken only at the most unlimited discount. Even the most the most prodigious fabrications, but at the close of the second year of them our appetites are unated. During the Peninsula days many and the detailed news of Banks ascending the Chowan and forming divisions of his force, etc., etc. It was all gravely published and devoured. But the reaction came and memory could have had a chance, we should have reflected that, as General Banks sailed in ocean steamers, and as the Chowan is a shallow puddle or brook, the chances were terribly against the truth of the story, and swiftly in favor of its being a desperate lie to frighten the enemy.

The only permanent fact in the matter is that we all organize furiously upon pure falsehood or the most inadequate reports. Any man who wishes to know will neither believe his neighbor's correspondents nor the newspaper telegrams, but wait patiently until enough time has elapsed to verify all statements. The main fact of a battle may be correct, but whether it were a victory or defeat we can not know, however lustily it may be asserted.

And you, good friend, whose dogged insistence the other morning upon the melancholy and alarming fact that peremptory orders had been issued to all our Generals to burn up all rivers in their way has served the Lounger for a text, do you know that he has discovered your name? It is Legion, and he publishes it to warn his countrymen.

WHINING.

THAT we should be indignant with other people for doing well and being well paid for doing what we can not do at all is not surprising, however humiliating it may be. But that we should add a querulous complaint that such people do not always agree with us in opinion, and even dare to say so, is simply silly. It is surely nobody's fault that he can not deliver a lecture, for instance, with such success as to be often solicited to speak; but to whine that other people can, and that they are actually paid for it, is still further, but not at all what they think, is the most amusing swivel that the press affords.

There is a sour discomposure, upon the part of those who do not believe the principles of the Declaration of Independence, that most of the popular Lyceum lecturers in the country do. At an hour less how to attack them for such temerity, the most convenient thrum has hitherto been that they were "itinerant." But to this enormity is now added that they are "strollers," "radicals," "nomadic," "reformers," etc., etc.; and if you go to hear them you may be outraged by hearing something with which you do not agree.

When this sort of remark is made by a newspaper it may be likened unto a gun which kicks the marksman over. For what is a newspaper but a daily lecture upon the political view of the editor? If a man goes to hear a lecture from Mr. Beecher he knows exactly to what he exposes himself, as when he buys a copy of the Journal of Commerce or National Economist. To complain that he heard certain opinions from Mr. Beecher, or that he found in the Journal of Commerce sentiments precisely the reverse of those of the lecture, would be sure to elicit only the amused answer, "Why, of course; what did you expect?" And to hear an editor who writes a lecture which is sold in many copies for several cents each, and read by the audience, abusing an orator who is paid by the night, and he sells in the lump for a certain sum to an audience which hears it read or spoken by the author, is a striking case of pot and kettle. If the lecturer ever insults any one of his audience because he says what that one does not like, then a loyal editor insults a rebel because he prints what the unsavoury to the rebellious palate. In like manner when we buy certain papers among ourselves we know what to expect, and we are asses if we whimper that they talk treason.

It seems not to be understood by those who complain of Lyceum lecturers as "radicals," that the people who buy tickets to a course of Lyceum lectures are aware of the names and views of the speakers and of the topics they will discuss. The lecture are bought with the full knowledge that the tendency of most all of the speakers is toward the conservation of Washington, Franklin, Hamilton, and Adams, and directly away from that of Vallandigham and Jeff Davis. If any conservative of the Vallandigham school chooses to go to the lecture, why should he squirm? Would he complain if he bought the Evening Post? Is there any deception? Is it not a fair bargain? Would he pay twenty-five cents to hear Wendell Phillips chant the praises of the patriarchal institution, or Bishop Clark eulogize Strauss, or Mr. Bellows extol the Yankees? Or has he made up his mind that he is insulted wherever he hears a forcible dissent from his own political, or social, or religious hobby-horse? If he has, he is a subject for Mr. Barnum, and should be contemplated in a glass case.

Of course the reader is ignorant that the point of the objection lies beneath all this petulance. It is simply the knowledge that the Lyceum is both an educational and a social force; and that what the speakers most sought from one end of the country to another were to loathe the anarchical spirit which now calls itself "Conservatism," that is to say that the people are so true at heart as to make political charlatans and demagogues despair.

A REPLY TO A WESTERN FRIEND.

A CORRESPONDENT in Wisconsin writes to the Lounger: "You make a list of Conservatives, Dickinson, M'Cauley, Randall, Everett, Holt, Johnson, Brownlow, and Hamilton, and set them against Wood, Vallandigham, Rynders, Davis, Brooks, Toombs, Wise, Bayne, Wright, Spratt, Keitt, and Rhett. You make a case, and decide it. Perhaps many of your friends will agree with you. But do you think the question stated with common honesty? Now let me make a case, and ask you to decide it. I choose to name the representatives of the Conservative element of the country Seymour, Bronson, O'Conor, Washington Hunt, Irs Harris, Thurlow Weed, Robert C. Winthrop, Senators Browning, Cowan, Collamer, General M'Clellan, and that sort of folks; and, as their opposites, Ben Wade, Senator Chandler, Sumner, and Hale. Lovejoy, Becher, Greeley, & Co.; and I sincerely but earnestly ask you to state frankly, as between them, where you stand."

The question is as simple as the answer shall be. That sort of folks would be doubtless surprised to find themselves classed together. Judge Collamer and Judge Harris, for instance, have no more sympathy with Mr. O'Conor's views of our general politics, and of this rebellion, than they have with Yancey's. And inasmuch as Messrs. Wood, Vallandigham, Rynders, Brooks, and Van Buren were the most ardent and conspicuous of Governor Seymour's advocates in the late election, speaking with him and for him, it is perfectly clear that their Conservatism can not radically differ from his, unless they misunderstand each other; and as the Lounger has already often enough repudiated the least sympathy with Messrs. Wood, Rynders, and Van Buren, why should his correspondent be in any doubt as to his equal want of sympathy with the men with whom they act, and of whom they are political befellows?

The Lounger still, and "honestly," prefers the conservatism of Mr. Everett to that of Governor Seymour—of Mr. Dickinson to that of Fernando Wood—of Andrew Johnson to that of John Van Buren. And as he believes that the views of Messrs. Everett, Johnson, Brownlow, Holt, and Dickinson, in regard to the scope of this war and the true policy of its conduct, do not differ substantially, however they may differ in detail, from those of Wade, Becher, and the others, he is glad to call himself a Conservative of that school and not of the other.

—And might he not put it to his "good-natured" friend whether the case he makes is stated with any more "honesty" than the Lounger's of? Of course extreme men must always be named to indicate tendencies. Senator Harris certainly does not agree in all points with Senator Wade, for instance. But does he "good-naturedly" man at the West ("honestly" believe that, upon the whole, Judge Harris does not agree with Senator Wade more than with Governor Seymour and his friends? The Conservative in this country is the man who would preserve the spirit as well as the form of the Government. And it is because the party at this moment which especially claims to be conservative seems to the Lounger to be entirely careless of that spirit that he denies its right to the name.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A GENTLEMAN recently visited the Campana Museum, for which the French Government gave $1,000,000. Every object he saw made him cry, "Admirable! fantastic!" One of the keepers saw him, and was so pleased to see at last somebody delighted with the museum, that he went up to him and said, "You are familiar with archeology, I see, Sir; doubtless an antiquary from Heidelberg, or Vienna, or Metz?" "No, Sir; but my wife, who's dead and gone, used to roll butter in just such pots as these. There." The keeper vanished, and now speaks to nobody, until after a regular introduction.

A Bangor paper says that a pig lately walked into a tailor's shop there, and before he was noticed by the proprietor made his way toward the cutting board—attracted, doubtless, by the smell of cabbage in that locality.

A gentleman, one evening, was seated near a lovely woman, when the company around him were proposing curiosities to each other. Turning to his companion, he said, "Why is a lady unlike a mirror?" She "gave it up." "Because," said he, "the one flatters, a mirror reflects without speaking, a lady speaks without reflecting." "And why are you unlike a mirror?" asked the lady. He could not tell. "Because a mirror is smooth and polished, and you are rough and unpolished." The gentleman owned there was one lady who did not speak without reflecting and eating reflections.

"The boy at the head of the class will state what were the Dark Ages of the world." Boy hesitates. "Next. Master Biggy, can you tell me what the Dark Ages were?" "I guess they," said the boy, before spectacles were invented." "Go to your seats."

"So you wouldn't take me to be twenty?" said a rich heiress to an Irish gentleman, while dancing the polka. "What would you take me for, then?" "For better or worse," replied the son of the Emerald Isle.

"You've destroyed my peace of mind, Betsy," said a despairing lover to a truant lass. "It can't do you much harm, John, for 'twas an amazing small piece you had, say way," was the quick reply.

"Sir, I will make you feel the arrows of my resentment." "Ah, Miss, why should I fear your arrows when you never had a beau?"

There are two kinds of cats—one with nine lives, the other with nine tails; the former always fall upon their own feet, the latter upon other's backs.

A FLATTERING ACCEPTANCE.

LITTLE BOTTLES—"Ah! Miss Laura, you will favaw me with your delightful company in a sleigh-ride—sh! I—suppose—of course—you know!"

MISS LAURA—"Bottles, certainly! Right off—now—as soon as you please. Take a sleigh-ride with you or any other man!"

At a wedding recently, when the officiating priest put to the lady the question, "Will thou have this man to be thy wedded husband?" she dropped the prettiest courtesy, and with a modesty which lent her beauty an additional grace, replied, "If you please."

"I am an unlucky man, gentlemen, exclaimed a poor fellow. "If I were to seize Time by the forelock I do believe it would come right out, and leave him as bare as a bachelor's block."

"It is all very pretty talk," said a recently married old bachelor, who had just finished reading an essay on the "Culture of Women," just as a heavy millinery bill was presented to him—"it is all very pretty this cultivation of women; but such a harpy as this for bonnets is rather a heavy top-dressing—in my judgment."

There are ties which should never be severed, as the illused wife said when she found her brute of a husband hanging in his cravat.

A celebrated Parisian dandy was ordered by his physicians to follow a course of sea-bathing at Dieppe. Arrived at that delightful town, he ordered a machine and attendant, and went boldly into the water. He plunged in bravely, but in an instant after came up puffing and blowing. "Francis," said he, "the sea smells detestably; it will poison me. There is a little eau de Cologne into the water, or I shall be suffocated."

"Say, Cassar Augustus, why am your legs like an organ-grinder?" "Don't know, Mr. Sugarloaf; why is they?" "Coz they carry a monkey about the streets."

They tell the story of a young lady of temperate habits who was advised by her physician to take ale to fatten her up. She bought a quart bottle of the article, and drank a tea-spoonful twice a day in a tumbler of water; but finding that she was becoming more ungainly, reduced the dose one half, and thus kept within bounds.

A gentleman having engaged a bricklayer to make some repairs in his cellar, ordered the job to be removed before the bricklayer commenced his work. "Oh, I am not afraid of a barrel of ale, Sir," said the man. "I presume so," said the gentleman; "but I think a barrel of ale would run a you aground."

"Josh, does the sun ever rise in the West?" "Never!" "Never?" "Never!" "You don't say so! Well, you won't get me to emigrate to the West, if it's always night there. It's a mighty poor sort of a country to live in, that is, but it must be all moonshine."

Mrs. Partington is of opinion that Mount Vesuvius should take sarsaparilla to cure itself of eruptions. The old lady thinks it has been vomiting so long nothing else would stay on its stomach.

It is but an ill-filled mind that is filled with other people's thoughts.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, December 23, in the Senate, the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior was received, also the report of Hon. Reverdy Johnson on General Butler's administration of affairs at New Orleans. The Legislature of Kansas, gave notice of a bill to authorize the raising of a force of two hundred regiments of negro soldiers. Senator Saulsbury's resolution in reference to the alleged sending of Maryland troops into Delaware at the last election was discussed for some time, but no final disposition was made of it. The Committee on the Conduct of the War presented a lengthy report on the recent battle at Fredericksburg. The Bankrupt bill was then taken up, and its consideration occupied the remainder of the open session. An executive session was held, after which the Senate, in accordance with the resolution adopted by the House on Monday, adjourned to meet on the 5th of January, 1863.

In the House, Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, moved to have placed on the Journal the entire protest of the thirty-six members against the President's suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, but the House negatived the motion by 74 against 59. The Ways and Means Committee's bill providing for the executive and judicial expenses for the year ending with June, 1864, was reported and made the special order for the 5th of January, 1863. The Postal Committee also reported a bill, which was passed, authorizing the Postmaster-General to establish a postal money order system. The bill relative to the Sioux and Dacotah Indians was taken up in Committee on the Whole; but when the time for taking a vote arrived there was not a quorum present, and the subject was laid over. The negro question was then discussed for some time, after which the House adjourned, to meet on the 5th of January, 1863.

REPORT ON THE BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

The Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War reported, on 23d, in answer to a Senate resolution of the 15th inst. calling on the Committee to inquire into the facts relating to the recent battle at Fredericksburg, Virginia, and, particularly as to what officers were in any way responsible for the assault, that they had proceeded to the head-quarters of the Army of the Potomac and examined the depositions of Major-Generals Burnside, Sumner, Franklin, and Hooker, and Brigadier-Generals Woodbury and Houpt, and, on their return to Washington, those of Major-General Sedgwick and Brigadier-General Howe. All the facts relating to the movements of the army under General Burnside, from the forwarding of pontoons and supplies, the recent battle at Fredericksburg, down to fully and clearly stated in the depositions submitted to the committee report the testimony without comment. The committee ask that General Burnside's report made the attack on his own responsibility, but that the blame for the unsatisfactory results for this non-carrying out the orders at Falmouth till it was too late to cross safely.

A LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following letter was published in the WASHINGTON, Dec. 29, 1862.

"To the Army of the Potomac:

"I have just read your Commanding General's preliminary report of the battle of Fredericksburg. Although you were not successful, the attempt was not an error, nor to its failure was there an army to blame. The failure was which you, in an open field, maintained the contest against an intrenched foe, and that night recrossed the river without loss which you crossed and recrossed the river in the face of the enemy, about four days before, and the attempt of a great army which will yet give victory to the cause of the country and of free government. Condolence seems to be a mourners for the dead and sympathizing with the severely wounded. A consolation you had in common with each is comparatively so small. I tender to you, officers and soldiers, the thanks of the nation.

"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

ANOTHER BEE RAID.

On Saturday, 27th ult., the rebels made a dashing attack with cavalry and artillery in front of Dumfries. The pieces were held by the Eighth, Seventh, and Sixty-sixth Ohio Volunteers, with a section of a battery. Being wearied at one point, after a brief contest, the rebels moved to the Occoquan, where they met Colonel Candy's command, and attacked him with both flanks. Colonel Candy's men met on both sides, and the enemy again made for Annadale, by way of Bull Run and Wolf Run, and Centreville and Vienna, which place they passed through at midnight. Executive General Geary learned to intercept them, and came up with them between Dumfries and Bull Run, charging them without a halt, and drove the rebel forces into Burke's Station and burned the bridge at Accotink. The enemy do not appear to have gained any booty by the solid raid except a few mutter's wagons and some ambulances which they picked up on the way. They destroyed one gun at Dumfries, but were compelled to abandon it. They were reported to be 4000 strong, but this is probably an overestimate.

WINCHESTER RECOUPED.

The news from the Shenandoah Valley represents that the rebels have evacuated Winchester and have gone to Mount Hinkson, on the railroad to Front Royal and Culpeper. The destitution at Winchester is reported as fearful. Generous contributions of provisions, had occupied the time past; but the Union troops, under Colonel Keyes, advanced from Harper's Ferry on Christmas morning and took possession of the town.

A CALIFORNIA STEAMER CAUGHT BY THE ALABAMA.

On the 7th December the pirate Alabama came across the Ariel, bound from New York to Aspinwall, off the coast of Cuba, and captured her. The pirate put a prize crew through her foremast. Captain Semmes then took off her captain, and the Ariel made a gracious bow to the approaching his determination at the same time to land the passengers either at some port on the north coast of Cuba or St. Domingo, and then to destroy the vessel. At the earnest remonstrance of Captain Jones, in behalf of the women and children on board, however, he consented to let her proceed. The Alabama steered in pursuit of the Ocean Queen, then on her return voyage to New York, but failed to find her. Captain Jones caused the Ariel to make into Aspinwall, and arrived at this port on 28th, but brought no gold. With the fear of the Alabama before her eyes, he nicely left the treasure at Aspinwall.

ANOTHER PRIVATEER AFLOAT.

By advices from Havana, it appears that the steamer Florida, otherwise and better known as the Oreto, has succeeded in getting from Sisibon with a crew of one hundred men, having run the gauntlet of the blockade in the darkness of the night.

A ROAR FROM JEFF DAVIS.

Jefferson Davis has issued a violent retaliatory proclamation to the emancipation proclamation of Mr. Lincoln, denouncing the course of General Butler in New Orleans in vehement terms, and deeming his and all his acts proper in his command to death by tee hatter, when they are caught. Jeff Davis, when he issued his proclamation, that Butler had been removed.

A NEW WAY TO COLLECT OLD DEBTS.

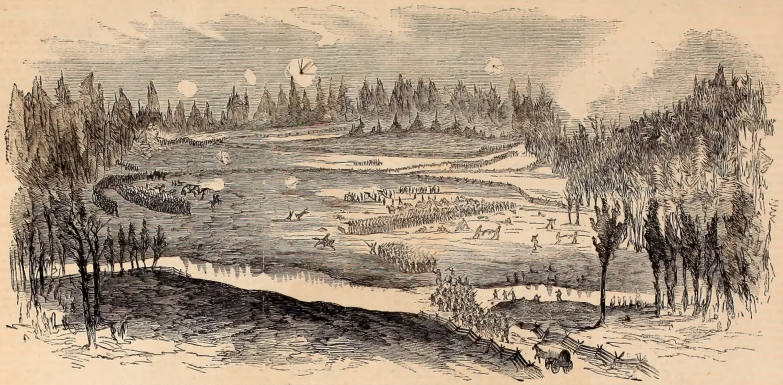
The firm of JOHN S. COCKE & CO., of Richmond, Virginia, having refused to pay their debts to Northern citizens, on the ground that a law of the Confederate States her released and discharged them from all obligations to Northern creditors, General Dix and Vicks has issued a notice, informing said firm that their excuse for refusal to pay is a treasonable one, and that if they do not pay up in a sufficient amount of their property will be seized and sold to discharge the debt.

DESTRUCTION OF THE "CAIRO."

The Union gun-boat Cairo has been destroyed in the Yazoo River by the explosion of a rebel torpedo. A large rent was made in her bottom, and she began to fill rapidly. The crew, however, got all safe ashore before she went down, although with some difficulty. Other torpedoes, in the shape of ordinary demijohns filled with gunpowder, were discovered by our fleet, and taken up without doing any mischief.

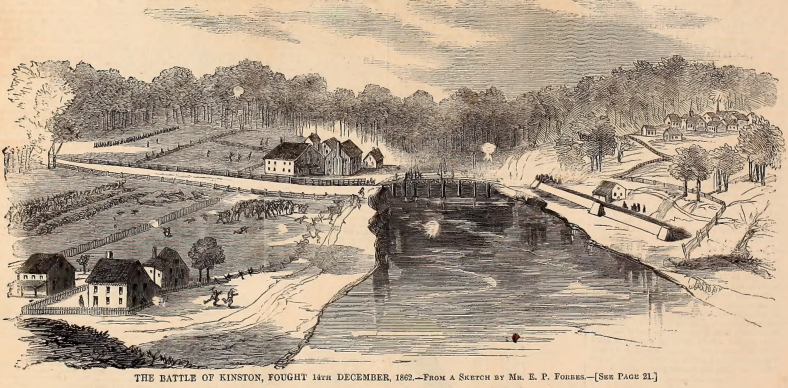
FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.



THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH AGAIN.

The Atlantic Telegraph Company has held a very enthusiastic meeting in London, at which they gave in adding £600,000 sterling for the purpose of laying a new cable was subscribed to the amount of £35,000 sterling had been subscribed. The new capital stock will be issued in shares of the value of £20 sterling each.



GREECE.

A PORTUGUESE KING.

The British Government has agreed with the other protecting Powers to respect the proceed by which Prince Alfred is prevented from accepting the throne of Greece; this appears to have given satisfaction to the French Government, the Cabinet of Russia. The three Powers named and recommend to the Greeks as their ruler Don Luis, king consort of Portugal, father of the present king of that country. Portugal and the Papal of Portugal during the minority of his son. He is a duke of the royal house of Saxony, forty-six years of age, and very popular.

THE BATTLE OF GOLDSBOROUGH, FOUGHT 17TH DECEMBER, 1862.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. E. P. FORBES.—[SEE PAGE 21.]

THE BATTLE OF KINSTON, FOUGHT 14TH DECEMBER, 1862.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. E. P. FORBES.—[SEE PAGE 21.]

THE BATTLE OF WHITEHALL, FOUGHT 16TH DECEMBER, 1862.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. E. P. FORBES.—[SEE PAGE 21.]

BRIGADIER-GENERAL FOSTER, U.S.A.

On this page we publish a portrait of BRIGADIER-GENERAL J. G. FOSTER, U.S.A., the commander of the recent successful expedition to Goldsborough, North Carolina.

The family of John G. Foster has ever been distinguished for its patriotism and valor. His grandfather, in company with the gallant Benjamin Pierce (father of ex-President Pierce), then quite young, was among the first to join the Massachusetts line in the war of the Revolution, and was often commended for his noble conduct on the field of battle. His father, Major Putney Foster, was in active service during the war of 1812, and was in the battle of Plattsburg, on Lake Champlain. The subject of our sketch was born in Whitefield, New Hampshire, May 27, 1823, from which place his family moved to Nashua when he was eight years of age. He early evinced a passionate love for the profession of arms, and formed and commanded a "juvenile artillery company." In 1842 he entered West Point, where he graduated with distinguished honors in his class, in 1846, as Brevet Second Lieutenant in the corps of Engineers. In January, 1847, he was ordered to Mexico with General Scott, as a Lieutenant in a company of sappers and miners, and was in all the engagements from "Vera Cruz" to "Molino del Rey." At the latter place he was severely wounded while leading a division of the storming party in the deadly assault on "Casa Mata," where two-thirds of the entire command were cut down, and where he narrowly escaped death from the Mexican bayonet by the miserable charge of the gallant Cadwalader. For his gallant conduct in Mexico he received three brevets—the first at Contreras, the second at Churubusco, and the last at Molino del Rey, where he was brevetted as Captain.

The severity of his wound was such that amputation was thought to be necessary, as a large escopet ball had struck him below the knee in front, fracturing the bone, and lodging beneath the skin on the opposite side; but he stoutly persisted in retaining his limb, which, though greatly injured, is still sufficient to enable him to do active service. After recovering somewhat from his injuries, he was ordered to Fort Carroll (Baltimore); from thence to Washington City, in Coast Survey Office.

From this position he was sent to West Point as Assistant-Professor in Engineering, and subsequently to the Government works on Sandy Hook. In 1859 he was ordered to Charleston, South Carolina, as Engineer in charge of the forts in Charleston harbor and vicinity, to repair and complete the same.

After the evacuation of Fort Moultrie by Major Anderson, Captain Foster spiked the guns, burned the carriages, and blew up the flagstaff. When the fort was taken possession of by the South Carolina troops he was allowed to make a peaceable departure for Fort Sumter, in a boat, with the laborers under his direction.

After the surrender of Fort Sumter Captain Foster tendered his services to Government. He was employed for a time in superintending the construction of the great fort on Sandy Hook, but was soon ordered into active service in the army of the Potomac, with the rank of Brigadier-General of Volunteers. Burnside secured him for his expedition; and at the fight on Roanoke Island Foster led our troops, and really won the day. He subsequently distinguished himself at Newbern and at the bombardment of Fort Macon. When Burnside was ordered to the support of M'Clellan, Foster was left in command in North Carolina. He has just returned from a highly successful expedition to Goldsborough, North Carolina, where he burned bridges, and destroyed the main railroad track to the South.

Of this expedition we are enabled, through the politeness of an amateur correspondent, to publish on the preceding page three pictures, representing respectively the BATTLES OF KINSTON, WHITEHALL, and GOLDSBOROUGH. We condense the following accounts of these engagements from the Herald correspondence:

BATTLE OF KINSTON.

This battle was fought December 14. Early in the morning, when our troops commenced the advance, the enemy was met near Kinston.

The Ninth New Jersey advanced slowly down the road, and then into the woods on either side. These skirmishers stood their ground until their entire stock of ammunition was exhausted, when the Eighty-fifth Pennsylvania was ordered up to support the Ninth. They did their duty well. This was about ten o'clock. The enemy having brought his artillery into action, we returned a similar and much more effective fire from Captain Morrison's battery, of the Third New York artillery, the latter being posted in a small field, on a rise of ground, within 800 yards of the enemy. Soon after Captain Schanck's and Jasey's batteries were brought into play, from different and the best available positions on either side of the road. The engagement having become more general, Brigadier-General Wessells's brigade was ordered up. It comprised the 50th, 101st, and 103d Pennsylvania, and the 16th, 90th, and 96th New York. After the 46th, 11th, and 23d Massachusetts regiments had been ordered up from the rear, which was on the 30th, without the execution of a flank movement on the enemy's battery. So it was ordered, with a small portion of his forces retreated to the left, the remainder moved through a wood to the right, and formed in a crescent, and got in position on to the right, under the fire of which and a concentrating fire from the front, the enemy, after sustaining a terrific fire from The Second Jersey, after sustaining a terrific fire from the enemy, obliterated by the 17th Massachusetts; and handsomely supported by a corresponding one on the left, then it was that the enemy's position was taken from the rear of the battery, with a long fortification on the opposite side. This completed the capture, 15th ult. I was commanded at the approaches of the artillery, for suppressing it were three companies of 42d artillery, two North Carolina regiments, the 35, 17th, 18th, and 33d North Carolina cavalry, garrison, a portion of the 8th Louisiana, and the Raleigh battery of Major Nethercote's battalion, and the Raleigh battery of Captain Graham's battalion of Colonel Hoke's, who was wounded in the leg—in all about 6400 strong.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL J. G. FOSTER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

ARRIVAL OF THE TRANSPORT "NORTH STAR," WITH MAJOR-GENERAL BANKS AND STAFF, AT THE LEVEE AT NEW ORLEANS.—[SEE PAGE 27.]

After a sharp engagement for over three hours we drove the enemy from his intrenchments and got possession of the field. The latter tree fired in the early part, but the Ninth New Jersey, a few of the Third New York artillery, and the Second Delaware, which I ordered, advanced in haste and put out the flames before the fire had done any material injury. Immediately after the advance regiments crossed, when the Tenth Connecticut advanced upon the enemy and drove them over the fields, forcing him to retreat to the further end of the town.

BATTLE OF WHITEHALL.

This was fought on 16th. As our troops approached the town an open space revealed our approach to the enemy, the latter being posted in a thick wood on the opposite side of the river. Harvey skirmishing immediately ensued between the Second New Jersey and the regiments of rebels. Major Garrard, who was in advance of the column, with a battery of artillery and a regiment of cavalry, passed over a high hill behind the skirmishers, in full sight of the enemy, and got to the rear of them in action, and then opened with his artillery. In a few minutes other guns were heard on the left of the infantry fight. Although his cavalry force was in a position of great exposure, under a heavy fire for quite a while, still he was quite trifling. The battle lasted for over three hours, the infantry engaging with a force of from about five or six thousand infantry and three batteries of artillery.

The Ninth New Jersey, Colonel Simpson, Second Delaware, and a couple of Massachusetts regiments, were engaged in the fight. A few other regiments were brought up later.

BATTLE OF GOLDSBOROUGH.

This General Foster made his way to his destination, which was Goldsborough. On December 17 he found the enemy there, and engaged him with skill. For a very short space of time the rebels stood their ground; but so accurately was the fire range of their guns, rapidly throwing in the shells, that the enemy broke from and line, and commenced a disorganized retreat across the river on the railroad bridge. We kept up our firing with considerable spirit, but by the time some of the last reserves of two rebel regiments, who fell back into thick woods on the other side of the river.

Colonel Lesley then moved a battery to within less than half a mile of the enemy's position. The Ninth New Jersey was sent to support the battery arrom an open field and afterward to the left, and the regiment got close to the right of the railroad bridge, and a short distance from the enemy's line of fire. While these operations were being carried out, the Seventeenth Massachusetts, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Folsom, were sent to the left into the woods, waded through a mill stream, and came out on the railroad directly in front of the enemy's position.

By this time, and while the Seventeenth was slowly advancing, the enemy commenced a rapid fire of shot and shell from a battery concealed in the woods across the river, and the left of the bridge, losing their range rapidly, then as also from their iron-clad railroad car, occupying a position on the other side of the river, close to the bridge, and to the bridge. At this point they also had sharp-shooters, who tried hard, but did not well succeed in picking off our men.

The object of General Foster's spearheading so far inland was to destroy the railroad bridge, but our guns refused to have it burned. Colonel Hickman, who got the order, called the regiments back, and they into effect General's desire. Many volunteered from the Seventeenth Massachusetts and Ninth New Jersey regiments, to the bridge, protected some from each regiment to go and do the work. Several attempts were made to fire it, but each were driven back.

Finally, Lieutenant Graham, of the rocket battery, and now acting adt to Colonel Hickman, and William C. Seaman, a private in the Ninth New Jersey, volunteered under the enemy's heavy firing, when Lieutenant Graham got near enough to and did fire the bridge.

As soon as we saw the bridge in flames the General gave orders to have the troops withdraw from their positions. Massachusetts regiments, who had been lying in reserve, stacked arms and went to work at the track with a will, and quickly and did the work of destruction at short notice. The rails and ties were piled up and fired by the help of pine and the effect of fire.

General Foster having successfully accomplished all his plans and more, to-day determined to withdraw his forces from the field, and the full back to the first convenient encamping place for the night.

FIGHTING AND WAITING.

"Or, and did you know Luther is going?"

She grew just a shade paler, the pretty little creature who listened, but she answered calmly.

"Indeed! I think he has managed to get up considerable element in his composition to make a good soldier."

Ella Mason was dispassioned. She had expected a scene. She had fired no random shot. It was one aimed straight at her listener's heart, sure to find its mark. Accordingly. She had not been quick enough to note that sudden pallor, and Mrs. Letch-worth's feelings were becoming a moment after. We have all read of the general's who never rode into the saddle till the fierce charge was over, though the first shot tore its way to his heart with a mortal wound. If men would take lessons from women they would do such things oftener.

"Yes, he is a gentleman in the Thirteenth. I heard that he persuaded his brother, who thought of going, out of the notion, and went in his stead. He said that men with happy fireside ought to stay at home until all those who had nothing to leave, and no one to mourn for them, had been used up."

"Used up!" Mrs. Letchworth winced again at those words, but Miss Mason was not sharp-sighted enough to perceive it, or skillful enough to hold her ground when her hostess adroitly turned the conversation. Presently she took her leave, and marched off with an uncomfortable sense of defeat. It was well that she did not bethink herself to look back through the window. She would have seen pretty Ada Letchworth frozen into a pulseless calm, like some pale statue of despair. She sat there, no one ever knew how long, with clasped hands and tearless eyes, and prayed that longed to weep but could not. She did not realize what had paralyzed her. She had not fainted; but, for the time, thought and sense were blotted out utterly.

At length her limbs shook with a sudden shudder. Her eyes overflowed with tears, and she sat there with thought only too active, a helpless, sorrow-stricken girl.

He only one gentleman, five years before, when Luther Letchworth married her. She was only twenty-two now, poor desolate little thing, all alone in the world. Would she have married him, she asked herself this question, as a stranger might have done, with a sad wonder.

Surely she and Luther had loved each other when they married. She was an orphan, and he had taken her and her fortune from her guardian's hands, and proved true to her instead of all her ties—father, mother, brother, as well as tender lover, cherishing husband. Whose fault was it that after five years he had given her back her fortune unimpaired, and they had each gone again on ways as separate as if their lives had never been entwined with a single thread? Was it his fault that a bond between them, it is true, however widely they might be parted. He could never give her back her love, and had given her none since the first the present, she could form no other ties, for there was no loop-hole by which even the law could give her absolute freedom. Was it her fault? Ah, yes! Not hers, she had always said positively, hitherto, in answer to all such questionings of her own heart. Now she hesitated a little, and tried to think honestly where the just blame lay.

I wonder if all such doubtful points will be clear in the light of eternity, and that the future will one sadly now. They had loved each other, she and Luther, but—; and where the disjunctive conjunction had separated her from him. Ah, it was first place, perhaps, seventeen ought not to have wedded thirty. Luther Letchworth was a grave, quiet, studious man, fond of his books, and a master of himself and of others. His habits were fixed, his tastes matured. He thought the fair, sweet child he had married would always be such no will of her own. It was the old dream of moulding a wife—as there ever a case in which it was not a failure?

Ada was not made of material so flexible as he had imagined. She had been used to her own way, after the indulgence of a petted child's life. Her guardian had been a bachelor, for whom a maiden sister had kept house. These two quiet, middle-aged people were devoted to their darling, acting their ward's wishes, or opposing even her whims. They had not been sentimental over her, but they had been kindly careful of her health and her beauty, for the rest letting her please herself. She had not asked her guardian's consent, nor even to be expected to submit her judgment to her husband's, though she would have been ready enough to acknowledge that his was the wiser and more judicious than she. He had given up every thing to her in their wooing days—nearly all man do—and then, after the first year, had begun to show certain tenses, they wonder, when the mask falls, that she turns a Kate on their hands instead of a Griselda.

She was a child-wife, and Luther was a man of few weeks, and Mr. Letchworth had no thought or care but to please his young bride. When they went home from their wedding tour, the room of comers sense to commence, while her six weeks of indulgence had only strengthened her belief in her right to have her own way. Between the years of thirty, Letchworth really held the reins more tightly than reason warranted. An older and better-disciplined woman than Ada might have been pardoned for growing restive.

It would be too long a story to trace the growth of the bitter weeds of discord and cruel words, alternating with reconciliations so sweet, so tender, that Letchworth half longed to anger her again that he might feel the delicious joy of making it up. She slept at first without the good-night kiss which sealed her pardon. She would rage internally, or by wrap, or say some bitter words; but it always ended by her creeping to his side and putting up her innocent child's lips, with the penitent whisper,

"I shall not sleep, Luther, unless you are friends with me."

But after a while, naturally enough, she grew tired of this. She felt that consciously that the fault had been hers she was ready to make atonement; but it was not quite so easy when she was well persuaded that it was her right to take the first side. She went to sleep one night without the kiss, because she waited obstinately for Luther to offer it. She found that he not cry, except a few silent tears once, when she woke in the middle of the night, and saw by the moonlight which came in at the window how much at ease he looked, and how sound his sleep was.

After that the periods of alienation grew longer. She began to be proud and patient also! Looking back now she could see that she had been far from faultless. She made no allowance for his pride, that Luther also had been proud. She had not. She expected the ook to stray with the wind like the aspen, and called strength coldness and want of heart.

So it went for three wretched years, until they both began to believe that they hated each other. And then she had met him one day with his bewitching married her without knowing or caring whether they could make each other happy, because she was rich. She had not been prepared for the stern change that darkened his face, the steel glint in his eyes. Yet he spoke calmly:

"You think so, do you?"

"Yes, and it was your blame. I was too young to judge about it. I only believed you when you said you would devote your life to making me happy. You have cheated me!"

She wondered to see how calmly he took her words. It was a suspicious mildness. He did not commit himself. He looked at her quietly, and only asked,

"What would you wish now? I can not change the past. I am dead."

"Now!" she cried, confronting him with glittering eyes and cheeks aflame—" now I want what I can not have! To get—to be left mistress of myself and my fortune. I ask nothing from you. Give me only my own, and I will go away from you. It will be best for us both. Separate—that is best by-and-by you can get your freedom again, and find a better fate."

He only smiled, a calm smile touched with scorn, and went out.

For three days after that, except in the necessary courtesies of the dinner meals to which they sat down together, he never spoke to her. Nights she heard him moving round restlessly in the room over her head. Sometimes thoughts of their olden love would be almost too strong for her, and she would half resolve to go to him, like a penitent child, and beg him to take her back on any terms. She would shiver with exquisite pain to think how near he was—only a few words of confession, of entreaty, and she might be taken home to that only heart in the world upon which she had a claim, which had been such a haven of rest so many times. Only a few words—words which she baptized by the names of proper pride, womanly self-respect—came to her aid, and she would only weep some passionate tears, and clasp her own hands fiercely against the heart whose mad throbs she could not still, though she forced herself to keep away from him.

The morning of the fourth day he spoke to her, courteously as one might to a stranger, calling her Mrs. Letchworth. Would she have the trials five minutes' attention? He had something to say to her.

She followed him into the parlor with a terrible foreboding, a sense of coming doom, that almost choked her. He laid before her some papers which she tried to read, but she could not see them.

"All your fortune is there," he said, quietly. "I invested in your own name, precisely as it was when I married you. I accept this decree and furniture. I have spent the past three days in effecting a transfer of every thing I had half differently. I have provided you liberally in making any arrangements about this house. I did not know but you might prefer living here to going back to your guardian's."

"Shall I? Would it be proper—alone? Had I better?"

Few things could have touched him as did those helpless, child-like questions. He knew how poor she was fitted to decide for herself. It was the old confiding trust in his habit and consciousness of power, in which she had appealed to him in so many of her perplexities. His heart smote him. His conscience pricked him. What had he been doing right to leave her to struggle with all the difficulties of her position alone? Was not that child's heart hardened himself again. She was rich, he thought. She had that fortune by which she had accused him of being mercenary. She was a woman in the world where Money is King. He answered her coldly,

"It is for you to decide what you prefer. The house is yours, decided to you in your own name. With such a housekeeper as you could easily secure there would be no difficulty in your living here, if you like that way best."

"I think—I am sure I should," she said, meekly.

Did he guess that she clung to that house, even then, for his sake; because no other spot could ever to her like it, because she consecrated by the ghost of o dear a love! He showed no emotion.

"There is nothing more to be done, then," he said, quietly. "My affects are all arranged, arranged for removal. I will send a man for them at noon. They are in the room over yours. If you will be kind enough to let them remain for three hours longer, I will give you no further trouble."

She longed to sob, to shriek, to wail out her agony; but he was so calm it made her calm also. She half put out her hand toward him, and she said quietly, humbly,

"Good-by, then, and may God bless you by-and-by with some one that will make your life happier than I could. Luther, I have loved you alone you. It was only because we ought never to have come together."

Was he afraid to touch those little fingers? He pretended not to see the outstretched hand. He made short work of his good-by; but when he was out of her sight he paused and listened in the hall. and looked round for some token of her. He saw only one, a little blue bow which had been used to fasten her collar, which was suspended on the door. She would never miss it. He picked it up, and thrust it into his bosom.

No matter what she felt when he was gone—how she wore her sackcloth and ashes—what cry of mortal pain was forced from her lips by the pressure of her agony of duress. Her secret developed a strength unknown before. She felt that inaction would kill her. Before night she had suited herself with a housekeeper, and sent to her guardian the only explanation of her situation which she would ever vouchsafe to any one; and settled down to her lonely life in the house which would be no longer a home.

Hearing of all this, of course Luther Letchworth divulged her, as men almost always do misjudge women, and thought that she was not suffering.

It was a nine days' wonder to the good people of Sturbridge, one and all. Mr. Letchworth added to the excitement by quietly removing his business to Boston; and, as the absent are always wrong, his going away transferred to his wife the sympathy even of the women. He had ill-used her dreadfully, they were sure. They began to besiege her with visits of condolence. When they found that she resolutely refused to open her lips upon the subject the tide of popular feeling turned again, and they were confident that she must have been altogether to blame because she had nothing to say for herself.

Ella Mason was Mr. Letchworth's cousin. She liked him, had loved him even, as such selfish natures do love, before Ada's fair face won him. When the separation took place she would have cut Mrs. Letchworth's acquaintance but that she was too prudent to lose the hold of her cousin's home. She was determined to see how she bore her trouble. She stifled her resentment for the solace of her curiosity, and had kept up a sort of semi-friendship with Ada ever since, making her frequent visits which were never returned. They were borne patiently, because she was the only one left to whom she could talk of telling the name which still had power to thrill all the pulses of that lonely, suffering heart.

When the war broke out some numb, foreboding instinct had told Ada that sooner or later he would go; therefore Miss Mason's words had not surprised her. Perhaps they would not so much have pained her but for the insinuation that he went because he had no happy home to leave. If he had been her loving husband still, she thought she would not have held him back. She could have blessed him and sent him forth to do the noblest work of the centuries—work for God and—no, not for self. If he had fallen, she could have gone to him some time when permitted, and—but then how if he went now —went because his life was blighted and worse than less? Would not a curse lie at her door? If he died would he not have had a right to reproach her? and would she ever dare, in all the ages, to come to his side and pray for pardon? Alas! she felt now that nothing on earth or in heaven could atone she should hardly know whether even heaven was bright. And again she asked herself whose the blame had been? and grew more and more ready to bear it all herself.

It was nightfall of the day on which she had heard of his enlistment. She sat in the dim firelight, with-born of hope and agony—came to her, a Lieutenant in the Thirteenth! Had they left Boston? Was he in time to see her once more before he went? She would try. She could tell when she met him whether his heart clung to her still. Ah, yes! She knew that it would. She cut at her through his eyes. If those eyes were pitiless she would only ask him to forgive her for all the pain she had given him. Then she would go home again with no kiss or blessing, only that prayer for pardon. But if she saw love in his look—but it was weeping there at the twilight of what might be, of a full reconciliation, of feeling his arms close round her, his lips on her cheek, hearing his voice call her "Ada" once more. Still her to be so happy? In such hour even death would not be terrible.

The next morning she went to Boston. She took a carriage from the depôt to the State-House, making sure of learning there all she wished to know. At the entrance she met Major Washington Street the driver drew up his horses and stopped. Impatient of the delay she looked out. A regiment was marching by. It filled all the martial music pealing exultantly. She saw the banners wave, the bright arms glitter in the sun; and straining her eyes to watch them, she marched she saw him—Luther. She shrieked aloud, calling his name with a passionate cry, which she thought should have pierced through his heart; but the exultant music swallowed up her weak voice, and she was in the great waves of society, and her husband marched on to the front. When the last man had gone by she wrenched open the carriage door and made her way to the depôt. He dismounted respectfully, and wondered why she was so pale, and what had changed her so in such brief time.

"I have altered my mind," she gasped, hurkily. "You may drive back again to the depôt. I shall not go to the Thirteenth Alone."

She went home again—poor desolate child, only twenty-two, and so solitary in the world. She wondered how she was going to live on, now she was priced, after a day or two, to find that she was less listless and miserable than before. She had an interest now in watching the movements of the Thirteenth; and, though she hardly confessed it to herself, she lived on one hope. He might not be killed; he might be wounded and brought home. She would account no humiliation too great now which could restore him to her.

Months and months passed on. She was not idle. Womanhood grew on her rapidly. She used her wealth and her time for the war. Perhaps something of remorse might help him. That was a motive enough in itself, though I think even without that motive she would have done her utmost, for she had learned to know and sympathize with life.

She shivered when the autumn leaves fell and the winter came. Where was he? how sheltered? how fared? The spring brought her, for his sake only, a flutter of rejoicing. For herself, bird-song and springing verdure, breath of blossoms, numerous music of nature had no power to attract her unheeded. She lived only in her work and her waiting.

So it went till the breathless, turbulent days of the raid into Maryland, when every heart stood still in a wordless silence of terror and expectation. Then one night she read his name in the list of the dangerously wounded. She waited for no confirmation, no further tidings. The next morning she started off, and she hurried on night and day, without pause or rest, guided by some subtle instinct which seemed to fail her when she came to the spot at length she reached the hospital where the sufferers after one of those fierce fights. She went toward it with fainting heart but firm pulses—they would not think her fit to take care of him else.

A tall man in the uniform of a lieutenant was just coming out. She met him on the threshold. She fell fainting across his arms, which opened involuntarily to support her. Surely he knew that white face? but how three years had changed it! He gathered her close to him jealously. He took her to his own quarters and laid her down. He did not know what to do for her, so he waited for her to recover. He had two or three questions to ask then. He was so earnest that his voice sounded stern.

"Why are you here, Ada?"

For answer she drew from her bosom the list of the wounded, and showed him his name. His voice trembled a little as he asked his next question.

"It was a mistake in the returns. Did you come because of that?"

She bowed her head mutely, holding her hand tight over her breast.

"Did you think I would want you to take care of me, Ada—you whom I had not seen for so long?"

"Oh, I did not know! I did not know!" she cried, wildly. "Do not blame me! I came because I could not stay away. I thought you might die, and I wanted to hear you say first that you could forgive me!"

"Had you forgiven me, Ada?" He was looking at her with a gaze which would have eased her heartache had she dared to meet it.

"I do not know, Luther, that I had any thing to forgive. I wonder only that you had patience with me so long. I was such a weak, foolish child. I must have tried you sorely, and that last accusation was so unjust. I knew you better all the time than to think you married me for any thing but love. I am a woman now, and if it were not too late I think I should do better."

"I is too late, Ada? The chief fault was mine. I was too old and too hard to wear such a delicate flower in my bosom. I was stern with you, and expected you to give up more than any woman could. And yet, child, I loved you to madness all the time. I have never ceased to love you just as well. I have been too proud to go back to you—that was where you have shown yourself nobler—but I have cherished your memory as a lost angel thinks of heaven. See this knot. You had dropped it from your collar the morning we parted. It has never left my heart. I have worn it into battle as other men wear breast-plates. See, as yet no blood has stained it. It has been my talisman. Ada, I was not worth your seeking for me thus and here."

"I thought you were," and that blush and smile made Ada young again.

Their joy, but why dwell on it? Who has ever rendered into mortal language the song of the spheres? They had been happy when they were bride and groom, in the old honey-moon time. They were something more, now that long pain had chastened and purified their hearts, and they had learned what love and union were worth by the agony of separation and solitude.

After a few days he sent her home. She was to wait there for him. He is a brave man, and he has no fear of death. He dreams fond dreams of a life beside which the brightest days of the old time were dull and colorless; of happy years with her, and an old age when they will look together toward the sunlight on the distant hills, and the land where the dawning is eternal.

But if they never come, those years, if some bold charge is his last, and the dear eyes waiting at home never see him more, he will not murmur. Her love is mighty to give him peace. He knows that there is a life above and beyond this world, and in the country of souls they who were one here will be one hereafter. So she waits and he fights, and neither will repine whether God's will brings them the fruition of their hopes on earth, or ordains that they shall wait for it till love and faith are glorified with immortality. Sure, let fate do what fate will, that they can not be long apart, they have courage for their work.

A MILITARY TABLEAU.

"I non't approve of it at all—in fact, Miss Mabel, I feel it my duty to say that I most highly disapprove of it."

Mr. Jonas Brown cleared his throat, and tapped his gold snuff-box solemnly as he spoke. For, if bald head and forty years couldn't give weight to a man's opinions, what could?

Mabel Crofton sat opposite to him, a perfect little sweet-pea blossom, with cheeks like damask roses and large wistful hazel eyes. One felt almost inclined to envy the chestnut brown curls that touched her round white shoulders, and the blue belt that circled her trim waist. Only seventeen, and pretty enough to drive a man wild!

She did not reply to Mr. Brown—only put out her scarlet lip with the least bit in the world of a pout.

"I should deeply regret, Miss Mabel, to see any young lady in whom I felt—ahem!—an interest dressed up as 'Columbia,' or 'Britannia,' or any other country on the face of the globe. I must repeat that I consider it improper!"

"It's only tableaux, Mr. Brown!" said Mabel, demurely, laying a fold in her work, and eying it with her hand coquettishly on one side. "And besides, it is for the benefit of the wounded soldiers. What's more, I've promised the girls to be 'Columbia,' and I couldn't possibly disappoint 'em!"

"I am much grieved, Miss Mabel, but—"

Mr. Jonas Brown's sentence was never finished, for just then Mabel sprang up with a little exclamation of pleasure.

"Oh, Charley, I'm so glad to see you!"

How Mr. Jonas hated the tall young volunteer whose hand had closed on Mabel's warm, white fingers, gold thimble and all!

"I'm afraid I interfere, Mr. Arkell!" said he, rising and bowing with what he intended for an air of intense irony.

"Oh, not at all, Sir, I assure you!" said Charley Arkell, in the extremest good faith. "Pray keep your seat!"

"No, I thank you, Sir," said Mr. Jonas, walking off in high dudgeon."

He proceeded straight to the library, where Dr. Crofton sat snugly smoking his after-dinner cigar, and entered with pursed-up mouth and spectacles that quivered with inward wrath.

"Sit down, Mr. Brown, sit down," said the Doctor. "Have a cigar, eh? Oh, I forgot that you don't smoke."

"Thank you, Sir," said Mr. Brown, solemnly. "I do not appreciate the narcotic qualities of the weed."

"Well, how do you get along with Mabel?" said the good-humored Doctor, putting his slipper-ed feet on the stove.

"Not as rapidly as I could wish, Sir. The fact is—"

"The fact is," interrupted Dr. Crofton, "you're not go-a-head enough in the style of your courtship, Mr. Jonas!"

"How do you mean, Sir?"

"Girls like a dashing, ardent sort of fellow! Now, if I were you, I should even go with her to this tableau affair."

"But, Dr. Crofton, I have before mentioned that I disapprove—"

"Oh, hang that sort of thing! No offense, Mr. Jonas; but it is your business to approve whatever she likes just now. When she's Mrs. Brown it is time to remodel her tastes and fancies."

Mr. Jona's solemn facial muscles slightly relaxed at the idea of ripe, rosy little Mabel's being "Mrs. Brown."

"Then it is advisable that I should conform to the popular prejudices, and confer my presence upon—"

"By all means, Mr. Jonas. And whatever you do, don't allow Charley Arkell to get the start of you. I sha'n't interfere with the girl, but I should prefer you for a son-in-law."

Didn't our Mabel look more bewitching than ever as "Columbia" in the coronet of stars, and the silken draperies of "red, white, and blue?" Mr. Jonas thought so—and so did somebody else; for Charley Arkell was there, the busiest and merriest of all the impromptu "stage-managers."

The audience-hall was densely packed, and the curtain just ready to rise, when, lo and behold! the nice young man who was to personate "Our Loyal Prisoners" was discovered to be missing. Gone home, at the eleventh hour, with a jumping toothache.

"What shall we do!" cried Minnie Bell. "Charley, you take the part!"

"Well, I like that," said Arkell. "How can I be a captive in chains and climb up the walls at Donelson, waving the Union flag, at one and the same time?"

"But there's no one else to take it!"

"Yes there is; here's Mr. Jonas Brown!"

"No, no!" gasped Mr. Jonas, "I disapprove on principle—"

"If Miss Crofton imposes the chains you surely will not be so ungallant as to refuse to wear them," said Charley, alertly advancing with an armful of rusty fetters, and before Mr. Jonas could remonstrate, he was wrapped in black serge vestments, his hands and feet manacled, his shoulders draped with chains, and his respectable bald head topped off with a disheveled wig. The very life-currents in his veins stood still with dismay—he opened his dry lips to dissent vehemently, but it was useless. The ting bell had sounded—the green curtain was slowly ascending, and there he sat, he, Mr. Jonas Brown, President of the Bank, and Director of the Insurance Company, paraded before the eyes of the whole town under about forty pounds of rusty iron!

While Charley Arkell and Miss Crofton were indulging in irrepressible giggles that nearly ruined the prestige of their parts—it couldn't—no, it couldn't be possible that they were laughing at him!

It seemed an age before the curtain fell, and then Arkell came forward to lead the manacled hero from the stage.

"Upon my word, Mr. Brown, you act splendidly—sat like a statue! Depend on it your forte is the footlights."

If a look of deeply-lowering indignation could annihilate a man, Charley Arkell would have been knocked flat.

"Just sit in this ante-room a few seconds. I'll come and unlock the manacles the minute I've arranged the next group. There's the bell now!"

And away sprang Charley to his task.

Five minutes passed away—ten—twenty—an hour—and no one arrived to free Mr. Jonas from his shackles. He grew impatient and shouted aloud—still no one came! Ten o'clock struck—he heard the departing rush of many footsteps. The audience were dispersing then—and no Arkell. He rose to his feet with difficulty, under that superincumbent mass of iron, and staggered to the door. Ye fates! it was bolted on the other side. He redoubled his shouting, but in vain, and then—what else could he have done?—sat down and used one or two strong adjectives relative to tableaux in general, and Mr. Arkell in particular.

"Here's a pretty situation for Jonas Brown Esquire to be in!" he groaned. "I shall catch my death of cold. I shall have the rheumatic fever. Thermometer at zero, and no fire!"

And, as he involuntarily shivered, the fetters clanked with dismal distinctness.

Poor Mr. Jonas Brown!

"Dear me, Mr. Brown, who'd ha' thought o' seein' you here?" ejaculated the astounded janitor of the hall next morning as he unbolted the door and bounced into the presence of "Captivity."

"Bless my stars! how on earth—"

"Confound your questions!" roared Mr. Jonas. "Take off these things, or I'll—"

Mr. Hodgson did not stop to hear the alternative, but flew to summon aid. "For he do look awful," said Mr. Hodgson.

Jonas Brown did not wait even for his matutinal coffee, but went straight to Dr. Crofton's, resolved to reveal the full extent of Charley Arkell's villainy, or perish in the attempt.

The sitting-room door was open as he entered, and Mabel stood there, her bright eyes drenched with tears, and her cheek against Arkell's mustache—a sort of tableau not at all to Mr. Brown's taste.

"Hallo! what does this mean?" he stammered, furiously.

"Ah, Mr. Brown, in it?" said Charley, courteously, but without taking his arm from Mabel's waist. "Glad to see you, Sir. I'm just off with the regiment. We march in less than an hour. Hope you'll all take good care of my wife while I'm gone."

"Your wife!"

"Yes. Oh, I forgot that you were unacquainted with the circumstances. The sleighing was so capital last night when we left the Hall that we thought we'd just go on to C—— and get married. One more kiss, love, and good-by."

And so Charley Arkell went merrily off to the wars, and "Love was still the lord of all." As for Mr. Jonas Brown, he is "wearing the willow" and greaning under the rheumatism at the same time.

FORT NEGLEY, TENNESSEE.

PASSING through Nashville, casting your eyes above the houses, the first thing that strikes your eye is the State-house; the second, Fort Negley. The latter, situated upon Nashville Heights, commands a view of the whole country for miles around, while its cannon point in every and any direction. Our artist was not allowed to give any thing but a view of the fort, and we fear it will be contraband to write a description of it; as for the view, it can do no harm.

FORT NEGLEY, NEAR NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. BEARD.—[SEE ABOVE.]

GALLANT CHARGE OF HUMPHREY'S DIVISION AT THE BATTL

E OF FREDERICKSBURG.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 17.]

OVER!

A KNIGHT came prancing on his way,
And across the path a lady lay:
"Stoop a little and hear me speak:"
Then, "You are strong, and I am weak:
Ride over me now, and kill me."

He opened wide his gay blue eyes,
Like one o'ermastered by surprise:
His cheek and brow grew burning red:
"Long looked for, come at last," she said:
"Ride over me now, and kill me."

Then softly spoke the knight, and smiled:
"Fair maiden, where was the need to wile?
"Smile on," said she; "my reign is o'er;
But do my bidding yet once more:
Ride over me now, and kill me."

He smote his steed of dapple-gray,
And lightly cleared her where she lay;
But still as he sped on amain,
She murmured ever, "Turn again:
Ride over me now, and kill me!"

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC. ETC.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

BETWEEN THE SCENES.

I.

FROM GEORGE BARTRAM TO ADMIRAL BARTRAM.

LONDON, April 3, 1848.

"MY DEAR UNCLE,—One hasty line, to inform you of a temporary obstacle which we neither of us anticipated when we took leave of each other at St. Crux. What it was wasting the last days of the week at the Grange the Tyrrels must have been making their arrangements for leaving London. I have just come from Portland Place. The house is shut up; and the family (Mr. Van Stone, of course, included) left England yesterday to pass the season in Paris.

"Pray don't be annoyed by this little check at starting. It is of no serious importance whatever. I have got the address at which the Tyrrels are living, and I mean to cross the Channel after them by the mail to-night. I shall find my opportunity in Paris just as soon (perhaps sooner) as I should have found it in London. The grass shall not grow under my feet, I promise you. For once in my life I will take Time as directly by the forelock as if I was the most impetuous man in England: and, rely on it, the moment I know the result you shall know the result too.

"Affectionately yours,
"GEORGE BARTRAM."

II.

FROM GEORGE BARTRAM TO MISS GARTH.

PARIS, April 13.

"DEAR MISS GARTH,—I have just written, with a heavy heart, to my uncle. I only think I owe it to your kind interest in me not to delay writing next to you.

"My uncle will be grievously afflicted me, but I confess I expected a very different result. My vanity may be misleading me still, for I must acknowledge to you sincerely that I think Miss Vanstone was sorry to refuse me. The reason she gave for her decision—no doubt a sufficient reason in her estimation—did not at the time, and does not now, seem sufficient to me. She spoke in the sweetest and kindest manner; but she firmly declared that her family influences' left her no honorable alternative but to think of my own interests, as I had not thought of them myself, and gratefully to decline accepting my offer.

"She was so painfully agitated that I could not venture to plead my own cause as I might otherwise have pleaded it. At the first attempt I made to touch the personal question she entreated me to pause for a moment, hurriedly left the room. I am still ignorant whether I am to interpret the 'family misfortunes' which have set up this barrier between me as meaning the misfortune for which her parents alone are to blame, or the misfortune of her having such a woman as Mrs. Noel Vanstone for her sister. In which ever of these circumstances the obstacle lies it is no obstacle in my estimation. Can nothing remove it? Is there no hope? Forgive me for asking these questions. I can not bear up against my bitter disappointment. Neither she nor you nor any one but myself know how I love her.

"Ever most truly yours,
"GEORGE BARTRAM.

"P.S.—I shall leave for England in a day or two, passing through London, on my way to St. Crux. There are family reasons, connected with the hateful subject of money, which make me look forward with any thing but pleasure to my next interview with my uncle. If you address your letter to Long's Hotel it will be sure to reach me."

III.

FROM MISS GARTH TO GEORGE BARTRAM.

WESTBOURNE HOUSE, April 16.

"DEAR MR. BARTRAM,—You only did me justice in supposing that your letter would distress me. If you had supposed that it would make me excessively angry as well, you would not have been far wrong. I have no patience with the pride and perversity of the young women of the present day.

"I have heard from Norah. It is a long letter, stating the particulars in full detail. I am now going to put all the confidence in your honor and your discretion which I really feel. For your sake and for Norah's I am going to let you know what the scruple really is which has misled her into the unwise and folly of refusing you. I am old enough to speak out; and I can tell you if she had only been wise enough to let her own wishes guide her she would have said, Yes—and gladly too.

"The original cause of all the mischief is no less a person than your worthy uncle—Admiral Bartram.

"It seems that the admiral took it into his head (during your absence) to entertain us in London by himself, and to satisfy some curiosity of his own about Norah by calling in Portland Place under pretense of paying his old friend's ship with the Tyrrels. He came at luncheon-time and saw Norah, and, from all I can hear, was apparently better pleased with her than he expected or wished to be when he came into the house.

So far this is mere guess-work; but it is unluckily certain that he and Mrs. Tyrrel had some talk together alone when luncheon was over. Your name was not mentioned, and when their conversation fell on Norah, you were in both their minds of course. The admiral (being her full junior and only declared lover) was smitten with pity for her hard lot in life. The scandalous conduct of her sister must always stand the (barely) in the way of her future establishment. Who could marry her without first making it a condition that she and her sister were to be absolute strangers to each other? And even then the objection would remain—the serious objection to the husband's family—of being connected by marriage with such a woman as Mrs. Noel Vanstone. It was very sad; it was not the poor girl's fault—but it was none the less true that her sister's life was a blot on hers. So he ran on, with no real ill-feeling toward Norah, but with an obstinate belief in his own prejudices which bore down all before them, and which people with more temper than judgment would be but too readily disposed to resent accordingly.

"Unfortunately Mrs. Tyrrel is one of those people. She is an excellent, warm-hearted woman, with a sincere affection for your lady judgment—strongly attached to Norah, and heartily interested in Norah's welfare. From all I can learn, she has never forgiven the admiral for his admiral's opinion, in his presence, as worldly and selfish in the last degree; and then interpreted it blindly for Norah's sake by the only courage his nephew's visits, which was a downright insult offered to a lady in her own house. This was foolish enough so far, but worse folly was to come.

"As soon as your uncle was gone Mrs. Tyrrel, most likely eyes grew suspicious for Norah, and repeating the conversation that had taken place, warned her of the reception she might expect from you. Norah, with the reward you in the position of a father, if she accepted an offer of marriage on your part. When I tell you that Norah's love for her sister and to her sister still remains unshaken, and that there is no hidden under her noble submission to the unhappy circumstances of her birth a grovelling cepibility to slights of all kinds, which is deeply rooted in her nature, you will understand the true motive of her refusal, and will respect it rightly and so justly disappointed you. They are all three equally to blame in this matter. Your uncle was wrong to step in between you and your lady and inconsiderately as he did. Mrs. Tyrrel was wrong in her temper get the better of her, and to suppose that Norah remained with me in ignorance of what had passed. And Norah was wrong to place a matter of pride, and a hopeless belief in her sister which no stranger can understand or share, above the higher claims of an attachment which might have secured the happiness and the prosperity of her future life.

"But the mischief has been done. The next question is, Can the harm be remedied?

"I hope and believe it can. My advice is this: Don't take No for an answer. Give her time to consider. Tell her what she has done, and to regret it (as I believe she will regret it in secret—trust to my influence over her to plead your cause for you at every opportunity I can find—wait patiently for the end to come—and ask her again. Men, being accustomed to act on reflection themselves, are a great deal too apt to believe that women act on reflection, too. Women do nothing of the sort. They act on impulse, and they often act right—or at ten they are heartily sorry for it afterward.

"In the mean while you must help your own interests by writing to your uncle. I alter his opinion, or at least to make the concession of keeping his opinion to himself. Mrs. Tyrrel has rushed to the conclusion that the harm he has done he did intentionally, which is as much as to say, in so many words, that he had a prejudice conscious, when he spoke, of the injustice of what she would do when he left it. My explanation of the matter is a much simpler one. I believe that his knowledge of your position meant naturally roused his curiosity to see the object of it, and that Mrs. Tyrrel's injudicious praises of Norah irritated his objections into openly declaring themselves. Any way, your course lies equally plain before you. Use your influence over your uncle to persuade him into setting matters right again; trust my settled resolution to see Norah your wife before six months more are over our heads; and believe me your friend and well-wisher,

"HARRIET GARTH."

IV.

FROM MRS. DRAKE TO GEORGE BARTRAM.

"ST. CRUX, April 17.

"SIR,—I direct these lines to the hotel you usually stay at in London, hoping that you may return soon enough from foreign parts to receive my letter without delay.

"I am sorry to say that some unpleasant events have taken place at St. Crux since you left it, and that my honored master the admiral is far from enjoying his usual good health. On both these accounts I venture to write to you on my own responsibility—for I think your presence is needed in the house.

"Early in the month a most regretable circumstance took place. Our new parlor-maid was discovered by Mr. Mayer, a late hour of the night (with her master's basket of keys in her possession), prying into the private documents kept in the study-bureau. The girl received her dismissal from the house next morning before we were any of us astir, and she has not been heard of since. The matter was hushed up and altered by master very seriously; and to make matters worse, on the day when the girl's treacherous conduct was discovered, the admiral was seized with the first symptoms of a severe inflammatory cold. He was not himself aware, nor was any one else, how he had caught the chill. The doctor was sent for and kept the inflammation down—until the day before yesterday—when it broke out again under circumstances which I am sure you will be sorry to hear as I am truly sorry to write of them.

"On the date I have just mentioned—I mean the fifteenth of the month—my master himself informed me that he was going to be dreadfully disappointed by a letter received from you which had come in the morning from foreign parts, and had brought him bad news. He did not tell me what the news was—but I have never, in all the years I have passed in the admiral's service, seen him so distressingly upset. So unlike himself as he was on that day. At night his uneasiness seemed to increase. He was in such a state of irritation that he could not bear the sound of Mr. Mazey's hard breathing outside the door, and he laid his positive orders on the old man to go into one of the spare bedrooms that night. Mr. Mazey, to his own great regret, was of course obliged to obey.

"Our only means of preventing the admiral from leaving his room in his sleep, if the fit unfortunately took him, being removed, Mr. Mazey and I took it in turns to watch by turns through the night—sitting with the door ajar in one of the empty rooms near our master's bedchamber. We were both of nothing better to do than this—knowing he would not allow us to lock him in; and not having the door-key in our possession, could not have ventured to secure him in his room without his permission. I kept watch for the first two hours, and then Mr. Mazey relieved me. After having had some little time in my own room, it occurred to me that the old man was hard of hearing and that I might hear my self in better in the night his ears were not to be trusted to warn him if any thing happened. I slipped on my clothed again and went to Mr. Mazey. He was neither asleep nor awake—he was between the two. My mind misgave me, and I went up to the admiral's room. The door was open and the bed was empty.

"Mr. Mazey and I went down stairs instantly. We looked in at the breakfast room, and another, and found no traces of him. I thought of the drawing-room next, and, being the most likely of the two, went there to examine. The moment I turned the sharp corner of the passage I saw my master coming toward me through the open door, in his dress, asleep and dreaming, with his keys in his hands. The sliding-door behind him was open also; and the fear came to me that he might have entered the room next door, and, finding it empty, returned with me ever since, that his dream had led him through the Banqueting Hall into the east rooms. We examined those rooms in vain, and followed the steps until he returned of his own accord to his bedchamber. The next morning, I grieve to say, all the old symptoms came back, and none of the remedies employed have succeeded in getting the better of them yet. By the doctor's advice we refrain from telling the admiral what has happened. He is still under the impression that he passed the night as usual in his own room.

"I have been careful to enter into all the particulars of this unfortunate accident, because neither Mr. Mazey nor myself desire to screen ourselves from blame, if blame we have deserved. We both acted for the best, and we both beg and pray you will consider our responsible situation, and come as soon as possible to St. Crux. Our honored master is very hard to manage; and the doctor thinks, as I do, that your presence is wanted in the house.

"I remain, Sir, with Mr. Mazey's respects and my own, your humble servant,

"SOPHIA DRAKE."

V.

FROM GEORGE BARTRAM TO MISS GARTH.

"ST. CRUX, April 29.

"DEAR MISS GARTH,—Pray excuse my not thanking you sooner for your kind and consoling letter. We are in Woodville at St. Crux. Any little irritation I might have felt at my poor uncle's unlucky interference in Portland Place is all forgotten in the misfortune of his serious illness. He is suffering from internal inflammation, produced by cold; and symptoms have shown themselves which are dangerous at his age. A physician from London is now in the house. You shall hear more in a few days. Meantime, believe me, with sincere gratitude,

"Yours most truly,
"GEORGE BARTRAM."

VI.

FROM MR. LOSCOMBE TO MRS. NOEL VANSTONE.

"LOSCOMB'S INSURANCE, May 6.

"DEAR MADAM,—I have unexpectedly received some information which is of the most vital importance to your interests. The news of Admiral Bartram's death has reached me this morning. He expired at his own house on the fourth of the present month.

"This event at once disposes of the considerations which I had previously endeavored to impress on you, in relation to your discovery of St. Crux. The wisest course we can now follow, is to open communications at once with the executors of the deceased gentleman; addressing them through the medium of the admiral's legal adviser, in the first instance.

"I have dispatched a letter this day to the solicitor in question. It simply warns him that we have lately become aware of the existence of a private Document, controlling the deceased gentleman in his use of the legacy devised to him by Mr. Noel Vanstone's will. My letter assumes that the document will be easily found among the admiral's papers; and it mentions that I am the solicitor employed by Mrs. Noel Vanstone to receive communications on her behalf. My object in taking this step is to cause a search to be instituted for the Document—in the very probable event of the executors not having met with it yet—before the usual measures are adopted for the administration of the admiral's estate. We will threaten legal proceedings if we find that the object does not succeed. But I anticipate no such necessity. Admiral Bartram's executors must be men of high standing and position, and they will do justice to you and to themselves in this matter, by looking for the Trust.

"Under these circumstances you will naturally ask, 'What are our prospects when the document is found?' Our prospects have a bright side and a dark side. Let us take the bright side to begin with.

"What do we actually know?

"We know, first, that the Trust does certainly exist. Secondly, that there is no mistake in it relating to the marriage of Mr. George Bartram in a given time. Thirdly, that the time (six months from the date of the testator's death) expired on the third of this month. Fourthly, that Mr. George Bartram (as I have found out by inquiry) has not married. Positive information on the subject possessed by yourself), is at the present moment, a single man. The conclusion naturally to be drawn from these facts is, that the Trust, in this case, is an object that has failed.

"If no other provisions have been inserted in the document—or if, being inserted, those other provisions should be discovered to have failed also—I believe it to be impossible to dispute the evidence can be found that the admiral himself considered the Trust binding on him) for the executors to deal with the property bequeathed as legally forming part of Admiral Bartram's estate. The legacy is expressly declared to have been left to him, on the understanding that he was never it to certain stated objects—add those objects have failed. What is to be done with the money? It was not left to the admiral absolutely by the testator's own showing; and the purposes for which it was left to him have failed, and can not be carried out. I believe (if the case before me does really happens) that the money must revert to the testator's heir-at-law. In every case, however, dealing with it as a matter of necessity, divides it into two equal portions. One half goes to Mr. Noel Vanstone's children; the other half is divided among Mr. Noel Vanstone's next of kin.

"You will no doubt discover the obvious objection to the case in our favor, as I have here put it. You will see that it depends for its practical realization, not on one contingency, but on a series of contingencies, which must all happen exactly as we wish them to happen. I admit the force of the objection—but I must beg you at the same time that these said contingencies are by no means so improbable as they may look on the face of them.

"We have every reason to believe that the Trust, like the Will, was not drawn by a lawyer. That is one circumstance in our favor—that is enough of itself to cast a doubt on the soundness of all or any of the remaining provisions which are found to be acquainted with. Another chance which we may count on is to be found, as I think, in that strange handwriting, placed under the signature on the last page of the Letter, which you saw, but which you unhappily omitted to read. All the probabilities point to these lines having been written by Admiral Bartram; and the position which they occupy is certainly consistent with the theory that they touch the important subject of his own and only obligation under the Trust.

"I wish to raise no false hopes in your mind. I only desire to satisfy you that we have a case worth trying.

"Let the dark side of the prospect I need not enlarge on it. After what I have already written, you will understand that the existence of a sound provision unknown to us in the Trust —which has been properly carried out by the admiral, or which can be properly carried out by his representatives—would be necessarily fatal to our hopes. The legacy would be in this case devoted to the purpose or purposes contemplated by your husband, and from that moment you would have no claim.

"I have only to add, that as soon as I hear from the late admiral's man of business you shall know the result.

"Believe me,
"Dear madam,
"Faithfully yours,
"JOHN LOSCOMBE."

VII.

FROM GEORGE BARTRAM TO MISS GARTH.

"ST. CROIX, May 15.

"DEAR MISS GARTH,—I trouble you with another letter, partly to thank you for your kind expression of sympathy with me under the loss that I have sustained, and partly to tell you of an extraordinary application made to my uncle's executors in which you and Miss Vanstone may both feel interested, as Mrs. Noel Vanstone is directly concerned in it.

"Knowing my own ignorance of legal technicalities, I inclose a copy of the application instead of trying to describe it. You will notice as suspicious of any explanation is given of the manner in which the alleged discovery of one of my uncle's secrets was made by persons who are total strangers to him.

"On being made acquainted with the circumstances, the executors at once applied to me. I could give them no positive information—for my uncle never consulted me on matters of business. But I felt bound in honor to tell them, that, during the last six months of his life, the admiral had occasionally let fall expressions of impatience in my hearing, which led to the conclusion that he was annoyed by a private responsibility of some kind. I also mentioned that he had imposed a very peculiar condition on mesa condition which, in spite of his own assurances to the contrary, I was persuaded could not have emanated from himself—for reserving within a given time (which time has now expired), or of not receiving from him a certain sum of money which I believed to be the same in amount as the sum bequeathed to him in my cousin's will. The executors agreed with me that these circumstances were capable of pointing to only one otherwise incredible story; and they decided that a search should be instituted for the Secret Trust —nothing in the slightest degree resembling this same trust having been discovered up to that time among the admiral's papers.

"The search (terrible in such a house as this) has now been in full progress for a week. It is superintended by both the executors and by my uncle's lawyer, who is personally, as well as professionally, known to Mr. Loscombe (Mrs. Noel Vanstone's solicitor), and who has been included in the proceedings at the express request of Mr. Loscombe himself. Up to this time nothing whatever has been found. Thousands and thousands of letters have been examined—and not one of them bears the remotest resemblance to the letter we are looking for.

"Another week will bring the search to an end. It is only at my express request that it will be persevered with so long. But as the admiral's property has undoubtedly been left by every thing he possessed, I feel bound to do the fullest justice to the interests of others, however hostile to my own interests may be.

"With this view I have not hesitated to reveal to the lawyer a connitutional peculiarity of my poor uncle's, which was always kept a secret among us at his own request—I mean his tendency to somnambulism. I mentioned that he had been observed (by the housekeeper and his old servant) walking in his sleep about three weeks before his death, and that the part of the house in which he had been seen, and the basket of keys which he was carrying in his hand, suggested the inference that he had come from one of the rooms in the east wing, and that he might have opened some of the pieces of furniture in one of them. I surprised the lawyer (who seemed to quite ignorant of the extraordinary actions constantly performed by somnambulists), by informing him that my uncle could find his way about the house, lock and unlock doors, and remove objects of all kinds from one place to another as easily in his sleep as in his waking hours. And I declared that, while I felt the faintest doubts in my own mind whether he might not have been dreaming of the Trust on the night in question—and putting our dream in action in his sleep—I should not feel satisfied unless the rooms in the east wing were searched again.

"It is only right to add that there is not the least foundation in fact for this idea of mine During the latter part of his fatal illness my poor uncle was quite incapable of speaking on any subject whatever.

"From the time of my arrival at St. Croix, in the middle of last month, to the time of his death, not a word dropped from him which referred in the remotest way to the Secret Trust.

"Here then, for the present, the matter rests. If you think it desirable to communicate the contents of this letter to Miss Vanstone, pray tell her that it will not be my fault if her sister's assertion (however preposterous it may seem to my uncle's executors) is not fairly put to the proof.

"Believe me, dear Miss Garth, always truly yours,

GEORGE BARTRAM.

"P.S.—As soon as all business matters are settled I am going aboard for some months, to try the relief of change of scene. The house will be shut up, and left under the charge of Mrs. Drake. I have not forgotten your once telling me that you should like to see St. Croix. If you ever found yourself in this neighborhood If you are at all likely to be in Essex during the time when I am abroad, I have provided against the chance of your being disappointed, by leaving instructions with Mrs. Drake to give you, and any friends of yours, the freest admission to the house and grounds."

VIII.

FROM MR. LOSCOMBE TO MRS. NOEL VANSTONE.

"LINCOLN'S INN-FIELDS, May 24.

"DEAR MADAM,—After a whole fortnight's search—conducted, I am bound to admit, with the most conscientious and unrelaxing care—no such document as the Secret Trust has been found among the papers left at St. Crux by the late Admiral Bartram.

"Under these circumstances the executors have decided on acting under the only recognizable authority which they have to guide them—the admiral's own will. This document (executed some years since) bequeaths the whole of his estate, both real and personal (that is to say, all the lands he possesses and all the money he possesses at the time of his death), to his nephew. The will is plain, and the result is inevitable. Your husband's fortune is lost to you from this moment. Mr. George Bartram legally inherits it, as he legally inherits the house and estate of St. Crux.

"I have no comment upon this extraordinary close to the proceedings. The Trust may have been destroyed, or the Trust may be hidden in some place of concealment inaccessible to discovery after the most patient and prolonged search for it. It is useless for either of us to speculate on the subject now. I will not add to your disappointment by any references to the time and money which I have lost in the unfortunate struggle to assert your interests. I will merely say that my connection (both personal and professional) with the matter must, from this moment, be considered as at an end.

"Your obedient servant,

"JOHN LOSCOMBE."

IX.

FROM MRS. RUDDOCK (LODGING-HOUSE KEEPER) TO MR. LOSCOMBE.

"PARK TERRACE, ST. JOHN'S WOOD.

"SIR,—Having, by Mrs. Noel Vanstone's directions, taken letters for her to the post addressed to you, and knowing no one else to apply to, I beg to inquire whether you are acquainted with any of her friends, for I think it right that they should be stirred up to take some steps about her.

"Mrs. Vanstone first came to me in November last, and took the two first floors of my apartments. On that occasion, and again on this, she has given me no cause to complain of her. She is a lady I know well by sight, and by my due. I am writing, as a mother of a family, under a sense of responsibility—I am not writing with an interested motive.

"After proper warning given, Mrs. Vanstone (who is now quite alone) leaves me to-morrow. She has not received company, and in her circumstances are fallen very low, and that she can not afford to remain in my house. This is all she has told me. I know nothing of the books and carriage, or what she means to do next. But I have every reason to believe she desires to decline all intercourse with her friends and conduct she has altered most shockingly in the last week. I believe there is some dreadful trouble on her mind; and I think it is from what I see of her, that she is on the eve of a serious illness. It is very sad to see such a young woman so utterly deserted; and therefore as she is now,

"Excuse my troubling you with this letter; it is on my conscience to write it. If you know any of her relations, I respectfully hope this time is not to be wasted. If they lose to-morrow, they may lose the last chance of finding her.

"Your humble servant,

"CATHERINE RUDDOCK."

X.

FROM MR. LOSCOMBE TO MRS. RUDDOCK.

"LINCOLN'S INN-FIELDS, June 3.

"MADAM,—My only connection with Mrs. Noel Vanstone was a professional one, and that connection is now at an end. I am not acquainted with any of her friends; and I can not undertake to interfere personally either with her present or future proceedings.

"Regretting my inability to afford you any assistance, I remain, your obedient servant,

"JOHN LOSCOMBE."

THE LAST SCENE.

AARON'S BUILDINGS.

CHAPTER I.

On the seventh of June the owners of the merchantman Swallow were informed that the ship had touched at Plymouth to land passengers, and had then continued her homeward voyage to London. On the tenth of June she came to the East India Docks.

Having transacted the business on shore for which he was personally responsible, Captain Kirke made the necessary arrangements by letter for victualing and paying off his crew at Suffolk, on the seventeenth of the month. As usual, in such cases, he received a list of commissions to execute in the city of London at or before he left London. One of these commissions took him into the neighborhood of Camden Town. He walked from the Swallow at the Docks, and then dismissing the vehicle, set forth to walk back southward toward the New Road. He was not well acquainted with the district, and his attention wandered further and further away from the scene around him as he went on. His thoughts were busy with the memory of his sister again, had led his memory back to the night when he had parted from her, leaving the house on foot. The spell so strangely laid on him in that past time had kept its hold through all after events. The face that had haunted him on the lonely road had haunted him again on the lonely sea. The woman who had followed him, as in a dream, to his sister's door, had followed him on board of his thought, and spirit of his spirit—to the deck of his ship. Through storm and calm on the voyage out, through storm and calm on the voyage home, she had been with him. In the ceaseless turmoil of the London streets she was with him now. He knew what the first question on his lips would be, when he had seen his sister and had her to himself. "Shall try to talk of something else," he thought; "but when Lizzie and I are alone, it will come out in spite of me."

The scheme to run by the last a string of carts pass at a turning before he crossed, awakened him to present things. He looked about in momentary confusion. The street was strange to him; he had lost his way.

The first foot-passenger of whom he inquired appeared to have no time to waste in giving information. Hurriedly directing him to cross to the other side of the road, to turn down the first street he came to on his right hand, and then to ask again, the stranger unceremoniously hastened on without waiting to be thanked.

Kirke followed his directions, and took the turning on his right. The street was short and narrow, and the houses on either side were of the poorer order. He looked up as he passed the corner to see what the name of the place might be. It was called "Aaron's Buildings."

Low down on the right side of the "Buildings" along which he was walking a little crowd of idlers was assembled round two cabs, both drawn up before the door of the same house. Kirke advanced to the crowd to ask his way of any civil stranger among them who might not be in a hurry to go. The first man he spoke to was found a woman disputing with the drivers, and heard enough to discover that the two vehicles had been sent for by mistake when only one was wanted.

The house door was open; and when he turned that way next, he looked easily into the passage, over the heads of the people in front of him.

The sight that met his eyes should have been shielded in pity from the observation of the crowd. At the farther end, in the light of confined face, standing by an old chair placed in the middle of the passage, and holding a woman on the chair in a sitting position, with support herself—a woman apparently in the last stage of illness, who was about to be removed, from the dilapidated house she lived in, to one of the cabs. Her head was drooping when he first saw her, and an old shawl which covered it had fallen forward so as to hide the upper part of her face.

Before he could look away again the girl in charge of her had raised the head and restored the shawl to its place. The action disclosed her face to view, for an instant only, before her head drooped forward on her bosom. In that instant he saw the woman whose beauty was the haunting remembrance of his life—whose image had been vivid in his mind not five minutes since!

The shock of the double recognition—the recognition, at the same moment, of the face, and of the dreadful change in it—struck him speechless and helpless. The steady presence of mind and self-command which had become habitual to him of his life, failed him for the first time. The poverty-stricken street, the squalid mob round the door, swam before his eyes. He staggered back and caught at the iron railings of the house behind him.

"Where are they taking her to ?" he heard a woman ask, close at his side.

"To the hospital, if they will have her," was the reply. "And to the work-house, if they won't."

That horrible answer roused him. He instantly pushed his way through the crowd and entered the house.

The misunderstanding on the pavement had been set right, and one of the cabs was driven off. As he crossed the threshold of the door he confronted the people of the house at the moment when they were leaving her. The cabman who had remained was on one side of the chair, and the woman who had been disputing with the two drivers was on the other. They were just lifting her when Kirke's tall figure darkened the door.

"What are you doing with that lady?" he asked.

The cabman looked up with the insolence of his reply visible in his eyes before his lips could utter it. But the woman, quicker than he, saw the suppressed agitation in Kirke's face, and answered for the cabman in an instant.

"Do you know her, Sir?" asked the woman, eagerly. "Are you one of her friends?"

"Yes," said Kirke, without hesitation.

"It's not my fault, Sir," pleaded the woman, shrinking visibly from the charge in her. "I would have waited patiently till her friends found her—I would indeed!"

Kirke made no reply. He turned and spoke to the cabman.

"Go out," he said, "and close the door after you. I will call you when I want you directly. What room in the house did you take her from when you brought her down?" he resumed, addressing himself to the woman again.

"The first floor back, Sir."

"Show me the way to it."

He stooped and lifted Magdalen in his arms. Her head rested gently on the sailor's breast; her eyes looked up wonderingly into the sailor's face. She was perfectly resigned to him vacantly. Her mind had wandered back to old days at home, and her few broken words showed that she fancied herself a child again in her father's arms. "Poor papa!" she said, softly. "Why do you look so sorry? Poor papa!"

The woman led the way into the back room on the first floor. It was very small; it was miserably furnished. But the little bed was clean, and all the few things in the room were neatly kept. Kirke laid her tenderly on the bed. She caught one of his hands in her burning fingers. "Don't distress mamma about me," she said. "Send for Norah." Kirke tried gently to release his hand; but she only clasped it the more eagerly. He sat down by the bedside to wait until it pleased her to release him. The woman stood looking at them, and crying in a corner of the room. Kirke observed her attentively. "Speak," he said, after an interval, in low, quiet tones. "Speak in her presence, and tell me the truth."

With many words, with many tears, the woman spoke.

She had let her first floor to the lady a fortnight since. The lady had paid a week's rent, and had given the name of Grey. She had been out from morning to night, for the first three days, and had come home again, on every occasion, with a wretchedly weary, disappointed look. The woman of the house had suspected that she was in hiding from her friends, under a false name, and that she had been vainly trying to raise money, or to get employment, when on the three days when she was out for so long, and when she returned so disappointed on coming home. However that might be, on the fourth day she had fallen ill with shivering fits and hot fits, turn and turn about. On the fifth day she was worse; and on the sixth she was too ill to get at one time, and too light-headed at another, to be spoken to. The chemist (who did the doctoring in those parts) had come and looked at her, and had said he thought it was a bad fever. He had left a "mixture drawing" with the woman of the house had paid for out of her own pocket, and had administered without effect. She had ventured on searching the box by which the lady had brought with her, and had found nothing in it but a few necessary articles of linen—no dresses, no ornaments, not so much as the fragment of a letter which might help in discovering her friends. Between the risks of leaving her under these circumstances, and the barbarity of turning a sick woman into the street, the landlady herself had not hesitated. She would willingly have kept the lodgment, on the chances of the lady's recovery, and on the chance of friends turning up. But not half an hour since her husband (a sawyer) came near the house except to take her money —had come to rob her of her little earnings, as usual. She had been obliged to tell him that no rent was in hand for the first floor, and that none was likely to be in hand until the lady recovered, or her friends found her. On hearing this he had mercilessly insisted—well or ill—that the lady should go. There was the hospital to take her to; and if the hospital was full of doors, there was the work-house to try next. If she was not out of the place in an hour's time he threatened to come back and fetch her out himself. His wife knew but too well that he was brute enough to be as good as his word; and no other choice had been left her but to do as she had done, for the sake of the lady herself.

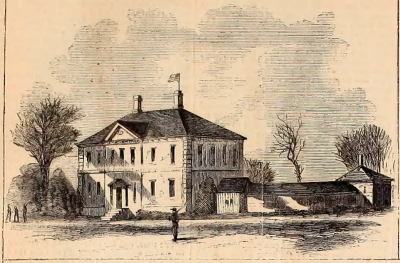
The woman told her shocking story with every appearance of having herself ashamed of it. Toward the end Kirke felt the clasp of the burning fingers slackening round his hand. He looked back at his bed again. The weary eyes were closing, and, with her face still turned toward the sailor, she was sinking into sleep.

LOVE-SONG.

THE light is slowly fading,
The sun is in the sky,
It is the hour for parting—
My only love, good-by!

Hide not those rosy blushes,
Droop not that dark blue eye,
One kiss, and one last blessing—
My only love, good-by!

Dark as the heaven above us,
So doth my future lie;
Thy memory like the moon shall rise—
My only love, good-by!



HOLLY SPRINGS.

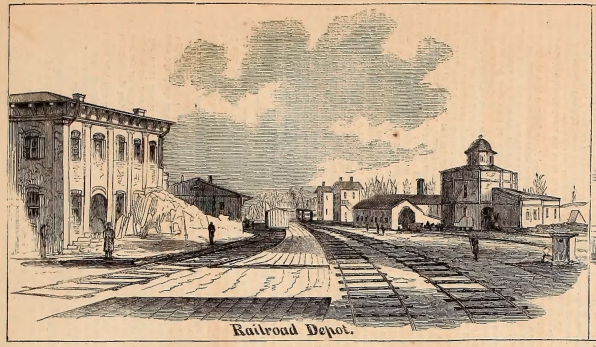
WE publish on page 29 three illustrations of HOLLY SPRINGS, Mississippi, lately occupied by our troops. This little town, one of the prettiest and most salubrious in the South-west, though for a long time occupied by the rebel army of the Southwest. They were driven out of it early last month by General Grant's flank movement, which left it and on to Oxford. Since then the rebels, or rather some guerrilla band claiming to act on behalf of the rebels, fell upon a couple of companies of infantry whom General Grant had left at Holly Springs, captured and paroled them; so that, to the best of our knowledge, at present Holly Springs is in the hands of the insurgents. It is situate on the line of the Mobile and Ohio railway, and is about twenty miles south of Grand Junction, and twenty-eight miles north of Oxford.

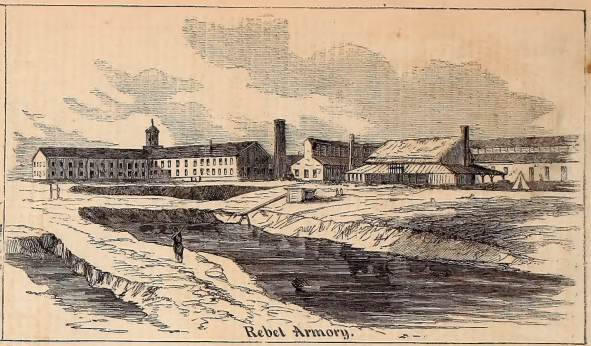
THE BANKS EXPEDITION.

WE publish on page 21 an engraving, from a sketch by our special artist, MR. HAMILTON, of the LANDING OF GENERAL BANKS AND HIS STAFF from the steamer North Star at the levee at New Orleans, on the evening of Sunday, Dec. 14. This solves the mystery which has so long overhung the destination of the Banks flotilla. General Banks has gone to New Orleans to supersede General Butler, and take command of the Department of the Southwest, including the States of Louisiana, Texas, Alabama, and Mississippi. He assumed command on the day after his arrival, and on the following day dispatched an expedition which retook Baton Rouge.

Burnard's House.

Doubleday's Skirmishers.





Franklin's Division Recrossing the River.

The Battle of Fredericksburg.—The Artillery covering the Retreat.—[From Sketches by T. R. Davis.]

Railroad Depot.

Rebel Armory.

Holly Springs, Mississippi.—Sketched by Mr. A. Simplot.—[See Page 27.]

WEDDING WORDS.

A JEWEL for my lady's ear,
A jewel for her finger fine,
A diamond for her bosom dear,
Her bosom that is mine.

Dear glances for my lady's eyes,
Dear looks around her form to twine,
Dear kisses for the lips I prize,
Her dear lips, that are mine.

Dear breathings to her, soft and low,
Of how my lot she's made divine;
Dear silences, my love that show
For her love is mine.

Dear cares lest clouds should shade her way,
That gladness only on her shine,
That she be happy as the May,
Whose lot is one with mine.

Dear wishes hovering round her life,
And tending thoughts, and dreams divine,
To feed with perfect joy the wife
Whose happiness is mine.

BROTHERS IN ARMS.

LAURA CHENERY sat alone, with a gleam of wicked triumph in her handsome eyes. What was there in that fair, false face to make men love each other? Her cousins Robert and Charlie Lansdowne had been true brothers before she came—brave Robert, handsome Charlie! She was a little, slight thing, not large enough, you would think, to be noticed in a ball-room—a tiny, stirish sprite, with cheeks of the delicate flower of the peach; light soft hair, falling whenever it escaped from comb and coiffure into loose, shining curls; small delicate features, almost like a child's, with a mouse-ful curve to the full, red, childish lips; and blue eyes, large, and when she chose, languid, but capable of flashing out baleful fires. She was not accomplished as other women are. She did not sing, but when she spoke her voice thrilled you with a weird sympathy of her own. She did not dance, but her motions had a certain bird-like grace that needed not to be measured of by music. She did not talk much, but every thing she said piqued you into a wonder what she would say next, a sort of curiosity that proved fatal.

It was a civil war when her father died in France, where he had gone after his wife's death, when little Laura was only five years old; and when the boys came back for fifteen years, as politicians sometimes will, meaning every year to go home again.

There was nothing for Laura but to go to her uncle and aunt Lansdowne, whom she had not seen for all those years. Her father made the arrangements for them, during his last illness, by which that after his death there only remained to settle a few last matters, and to make the journey under the escort of old friends.

In judging Laura Chenery it is necessary to remember that she had been motherless for fifteen years; and that her education had been the superficial culture of person and manners, utterly to the neglect of heart and spirit. Her father had seen no faults in her. She was his idol—the child that he had loved in the world since the New England violets had sprung thick above the heart of her mother. In his judgment she could not err. At seventeen he took her from school, and for the next three years she mingled with all the freedom of an American young lady in that gay, Parisian society in which her father found his only divertissement.

She did not like going to the quiet, country home of the Lansdowne's, and there was no help, and so she resolved to make the best, or rather the worst of it. It would go hard, she thought, if there were not some poor, honest country parson, some stupid, gling lawyer, or rising doctor, with whom she could amuse herself for a while, and then—and then she did not know herself. She meant to live and shine in a far different sphere from the one to which she was going; but with cat-like confidence in her power to find in her feet she never worried as other women do.

She was more fortunate than she had expected, for she found herself domesticated under the same roof with two gentlemen whom even her exacting taste could but help approving—brothers, too, and there was wickedness enough in her to feel the delight of an ordinary conquest ten times enhanced by the subtle spice of setting two who ought to love each other by the ears.

Robert and Charles Lansdowne were specimens of the noblest type of the American gentleman. And search the world over you will hardly find the peer of this type. Englishmen are staunch and true and persistent; but, as a race, solid, heavy, clodgged. Frenchmen are too mercurial; their nature overflows in the external, and the sources of their emotions are very deep. They can love and kill themselves; but for the love that lives on silently and suffers, "hopes, and endures, and is patient," they lack the capacity. Germans are misty and phlegmatic. Only the thorough-bred American gentleman is staunch and true and longsuffering as a Briton; gay and contented and chivalrous as a Parisian; and earnest, ideal, and spiritual as the countrymen of Goethe and Schiller. But then it takes culture and polish. Such growths do not run wild in any soil.

Robert and Charlie had been educated well, in the best sense, that is, were strong and true—men of to-day; ready to enjoy as to suffer or to work. Why do such men make easy victims, unless it be because the utterances faith in women is part of both their breeding and their natures?

I think that, unconsciously to themselves, they both loved Laura Chenery at first sight. Their hearts warmed toward her naturally—so fair and young, perhaps those mourning garments which enhanced her pure, blonde beauty as all the tricks of color and ornament could never have done. So shy, too, she seemed, and so pathetically, almost humbly grateful for every attention. They must, each one, to regard her and to treat her as the one her they had always coveted, but never had. They did not guess that, however dear sisters may be, the love is calm, and does not fever pulses or quicken heart-beats.

Laura lay awake two hours—a long time for her—one night, when the first knew them, to decide whether she should marry either of them; for that she could have her choice between them she never doubted. They were both so much fairer, Charlie was handsome, and Robert would have been called so any where but at Charlie's side. They were both cultured, brave, true, in her weak, wicked little heart, that if either of them loved it would be for life and death and forever. But she said "Yes" at the end of the hour's musing. She knew them well enough to be certain that the future the had dreamed of and coveted she could command—might be the wife of either. They would be loving, but never weak. If she was Mrs. Lansdowne, farewell to all her dreams of shining again in the gay world of Paris; of breaking more hearts as a wife than she had ever stirred as a maiden; of queening it by sea and shore and mountain. She must be the loved, honored, cherished wife of one man—no more, no less. With her untouched, careless heart, and her dominant vanity, it would not suit her. So she put the idea aside and went to sleep.

And knowing how fatally well that steadfast handsome nature would love, she set to work herself deliberately at work to captivate them both.

It was no hard task. They had known women enough, but they had never encountered the like of the Syrens. Do you think True Thomas had never seen fair wives faces among mortals when he followed Fay Vivian across the sea? Men have seen women whose presence breathes an atmosphere as fatal as those subtle old poisons they used to sprinkle in handkerchiefs of which I have heard.

I do not know which brother yielded first to the madness. I think the spell was upon them both from the very first day that they saw her; but it was months before they understood themselves.

Laura Chenery enjoyed that summer. There was a piquant charm in the consciousness she was doing. No one knew what was coming; only one guessed her purpose. Mrs. Lansdowne, a gentle, old-fashioned lady, with the blessedness of another's love gives, had read her secret; and hated her, as even such good gentle women can hate for a wrong that is unjust and deserved, when the one which touches their own selves only.

And yet what could she do? She could not send the girl from her house, the only brother away from the protection of her roof. Would warning her soon—her dear boys she called them—do any good? She tried it. Robert was her favorite. She had ways been able to approach him more nearly than any one but his mother. He was like her, in the handsome, good-natured Charley; though all the world of her heart adored Robert for his manly and retient. He had never outgrown his boyish habit of leaning on his mother's shoulder, and her over lounging in his mother's lap. He was very fond of her and interested him—all but Miss Chenery. Up to this time, since her first coming, they had never talked of her. She was a beautiful, but unsympathetic. She always attacked her enemy in the front, and that mode of warfare has its own advantages.

"Which is it," she said, looking at Robert steadily, "that Laura loves, you or Charlie? So far as I can discover she manages you both pretty pretty equally. I should have thought Charlie would have been most to her taste."

Robert Lansdowne frowned like a girl beneath his mother's steady gaze. Her words had opened before him a new aspect of affairs. Could it be that Laura loved his brother, his younger brother, whom he had cherished all his life as the best half of himself? By the keen pang, sharp as a sword thrust, which the thought gave him, he knew how dear she had become to himself. Disguise was useless. His mother had taken him unawares, because he had his defenses down in the weak attitudes of the position. He looked up with the instinctive appeal for sympathy, the helplessness which the strongest man will feel in precisely such a crisis.

"Do you think Charlie loves her, mother? Because, God help me, I know I do."

"Yes, I think she loves him."

"Who does she love, mother? If you have read Charlie's heart and mine, you must have seen hers also."

A shiver of hope shook the strong limbs as the man spoke. He was not prepared for his mother's next answer.

"She has none."

"What, no heart?"

"None. A colder or more utterly selfish woman never lured a good man on to madness. She has been striving for the poor triumph of making you both love her. She has succeeded in every other of you. The only palliation is that she does not know what she is doing. She judges other people's natures by her own. She cannot understand that there are hearts of which an unhappy love makes utter shipwreck. Is it too late, Robert? Are you too far gone for self-control? Can you not learn to forget or despise her?"

Robert Lansdowne had not interrupted his mother; but he spoke now, resolutely.

"Mother, I should not have suffered any one else, man or woman, to say what you have said. Even what is spoken from you I must utter my protest. You do not understand Laura, and you misjudge her sorely. It may be true that she would not marry Charlie if she did not love me, and so to love her. She has been as artless and as careless as a child, and that is where her great charm lies. If we both love her it is our sorrow, and not her blame. She has treated us as brothers—had she not a right to expect to find brothers in the nearest friends she had in the world? She has never given either of us, as I believe—at any rate she has never given me—reason or right to look upon her in any other light."

Mrs. Lansdowne smiled a little bitterly, and a moment afterward sighed. Mothers have played the part of Cassandra till one would think they should have grown to find it easy; but it costs a sharp pang still to see the prophecy they know is all too sadly true rejected with scorn; and the lord one rushing on unheeding, rash tempter of his fate.

Going out of doors Robert Lansdowne met his brother. There was a bitter, murderous feeling stole into his heart. A shudder shook him that he might grow to hate his own brother if Laura loved him. An evil prompting whispered him to go at once to her and see her first. Perhaps her heart was untouched yet, and she might be won by the first comer. And then the old, wild, rival-love storms began to rage. Charly love of fair play, reasserted itself. No matter what it should cost he would deal justly by his own brother. And so they met, and spoke with a firm tone which it cost him an effort to make so steady,

"Do you love Laura—our cousin?"

The tone, the look, the question revealed all to Charlie Lansdowne. He knew his own heart, and knew his brother's. He answered, after a moment, as firmly,

"I do—with all my heart, mind, and strength."

"Have you told her so?"

"No, I have only just found out for myself that she is my only hope on earth."

Robert looked at him with a strange pity for them both in his eyes. He put his hand on his younger brother's shoulder, gently as when they were boys together. He said, in a low, changed voice,

"God help us, Charlie, for I love her too. We are brothers—and she has only a brother's. If you had not been dear to me so many years I would have gone to her now, and won her, if I could, before you knew of her coming. But I will not betray us. But, come what will, we will be honest with each other. She shall know both your love and mine, and let her choose—she has only and be happy. The other—"

"I had already made up my mind what I should do if I found that handsome Charlie's was a strange quiver round his mouth. "The cause so many are dying for needs good men and true. If I can not live for her I can find forgetfulness, perhaps, or a grave, in the war."

"So be it," Robert answered, resolutely. "We will write to her and tell her the truth—bid her choose as her heart guides her, without fear or favor. The Thrones one shall stay at home, and the one she rejects must go to the wars."

"You are the scribe and the poet. You shall write for us both," and Charlie Lansdowne made a vain effort to speak in his old gay tone.

What a scene it was when those two brothers sat down to write the letter which was to die to write the letter on whose reception hinged more than life or death! The sunshine lay warm and still over the lawns and gardens, and the birds sang, and trees and meadows were green and bright—as earth in which, on such a day, Eve might have ceased to mourn for the loss of Paradise—as yet with what a choking anguish of suspense those two hearts throbbed! Robert executed his task faithfully. He told her all—in manly words, but tenderly as they both loved her—one as well as the other. He told her how really either would be to give up all of life he had dreamed of to cherish her more tenderly than ever woman was cherished before. Then he bade her look into her own heart and fix her choice. He said that it should fall would stay to make her happiness and his own—the other would go to find death or peace on the field of battle.

When all was written they read it over, both of them silently, and then they clasped hands over it—a compact which both would hold sacred.

Then they sent it.

They waited two hours before an answer came. They opened it, noticing even then how like Laura it was—the delicate, fragile paper, with its faint rose odor, and the aristocratic monogram at the top of the sheet. The contents also were like Laura—so like her, that for a time they would not believe honestly that she loved neither of them—that such a marriage would not suit her. She wrote artfully. She knew them well. She said, indeed, that, indeed she did; they would break her heart if they doubted it; loved them far too well to choose between them, and could see no way to which she believed would be certain death. They must not ask her. Entreaties would be useless. She would never make a choice. She would cause no more pain to either of those who were so dear to her. It was a pity she had ever come there. She would go away. Then she would be free from care of herself, and they should both stay at home and forget her, and be as happy as they were before the evil hour in which she came.

Her letter was charmingly worded. Nothing could have been prettier or more touching. It produced exactly the effect she had intended. They were both more deeply in her toils than ever; and in either breast arose a feeling which neither cared to confess even to the other. Each thought that if it were not for fear of wounding his brother he should have triumphed; and each felt a pang to the core of his generosity, and to wish that he had waited for no courtesy, but pressed his point before she left, and that he had two hearts instead of one. They struggled with this feeling, and succeeded so far as to suppress its utterance. Charlie was the first to speak.

"Our plan has failed. We must try another. You are the elder. You shall go to her first, and find out whether she would have married you if I had not been in the way. I think when you are with her face to face you can at least learn the truth. If you fail, then comes my chance."

Robert Lansdowne's mood just then was not generous. He was but human, and in love; that is, any other than I, temporarily beside himself. He wrung his brother's hand hard and turned toward the house; for they had been sitting in a little summer-house which they had built together when they were happy boys.

He found Laura in a small parlor which, since her first coming, had been tacitly given up to her as a sort of boudoir. She was looking very lovely. Her hair was falling in soft curling masses about her pinkrose face, and her blue eyes looked misty, as if their beams were half quenched in unshed tears. Standing at the door, Robert Lansdowne looked at her a moment. How beautiful she was! How he longed to take her to his heart, the selfish, chagrined thing! At first she seemed not to notice his approach; but after he had had time for a good, long, hungry look at her, she got up, and with a childlike cry of "Oh, Robert, Robert!" she was in his arms, in his breast. For an instant of perilous joy he believed that she loved him. If he could have died then—but death is seldom reminded, and it was better, perhaps, that he should work out his fate.

"You do love me!" he cried, in a tone of passionate triumph.

"Oh yes, indeed, and Charlie too—as well as if you were my brothers," was the answer which let him know that he had misunderstood her, and had his task to begin over again.

It was all in vain. She was a little intrigante, worthy of her French training. Wildest waves of passion were shivered to fragments, and dashed back from the unmoved, cruel front of her selfishness. He could win no more from her than the letter had disclosed. Even if she did love one of them best, she said, nothing should ever induce her to confess it and banish the other. She was immovable and impenetrable. As a last argument, he told her that the effect of her present course would be to banish them both. If she made no choice both must go instead of one. I think in her wicked little heart she was glad of this. It deferred just then an easy way of disposing of them. She was beginning to find that the spirits she had evoked were too mighty for her. She professed to the dismay, but she did not yield an inch. She would not choose one and banish the other, she persisted; for if she made that cruel way clear they would feel as if she was his murderer—as if his blood was upon her head. If they both wanted to go and break their heart she would be free—at least she would not feel that she had sent them.

Artfully, indeed, she must have kept her promise in Robert Lansdowne's mind, for he thought she was even tenderer at than he had dreamed; but he had to give up his case all the same. She was immovable. He sat with his arms, and pressed a kiss which seemed to scorch her brain upon the forehead. Then he went out and met his brother again.

It was only another failure. Laura was not of a nature to be overpersuaded against what she believed to be her own interests. She was as armor so bullet-proof as want of feeling. Where there is no heart how can any wound be mortal?

It was agreed when Charlie left her, and she curled herself up in the corner of the sofa for a twilight nap, that they would not, indeed, visit rooms of the afternoon, but profoundly self-complacent and as placid as a dormouse.

"I am going to-morrow," Charlie said, going back to Robert, and trying to be brave and careless. There was something in his tone though that went to his brother's heart as no words could have done; making him long for the moment to put aside his own grief and comfort his rival.

"I will have no more of it, Charlie; I am going too," he said, kindly. "We ought to have gone in the spring. We should have been spared some pain."

Charlie did not answer. He sat silently for a time looking toward the west, where the sunset clouds were burning into golden splendor. How many times they had looked out together toward those distant hills, and the sunset burning above them, he and his brother! Would they ever look at them again?

"Who will tell mother?" he asked, after a little while.

"I will," Robert said, quietly. "I am going to her now."

Some of the particulars of that interview were told me afterward. Robert Lansdowne told his mother all the story—showed her the letter in which Laura had answered to their proposals, offered to her their joint resolution. Mrs. Lansdowne tried in vain to convince him that Laura had but verified her own prophecies of the impression of the character which she had entertained from the first. His faith could not be shaken. He believed, moreover, that she loved one or the other of them. With all her heart, only she had been too generous toward both, too grateful for their love, to make her election.

"Do you not know well enough," Mrs. Lansdowne cried, pressed past her patience, "to be more than sure that a woman's pique and unselfishness in quite such a way as to banish the dearest object of our love without even a parting word to cheer him under his sentence?"

I think, tender mother as she was, she would rather either of her sons should die than one should go away, with the certainty of never returning, than to have had him stay to be Laura Chenery's husband. Ah! she knew her sex better than he. She gave them her blessing the next morning, though the tears choked her words; and then she put her head into their faithful arms, turning for comfort, with pale, piteous face, to the love that had been her joy and pride before they were born.

They joined a regiment that had already been some months in the field and seen hard service, and so from the first they became familiar with the actual presence of war. They shared together many a perilous reconnaissance, many a weary march. But all this time there had been a certain reserve between them. The frank, warm-hearted freedom of their boyish love was gone. There were some subjects of which they never spoke. I wonder whether into those true hearts there had not crept a bitter leaven?

At last, fighting boldly side by side, they fell—both of them. Pausing a moment in the fray, the comrades bore them a little off the field and laid them both, wounded and bleeding sore, beside a murmuring brook, under the pitiless southern sky. And there they lay, waiting the surgeon and their turn for care, or waiting death—they knew not which.

In that hour their hearts softened toward each other. They were brothers after all, and had lain in the same mother's arms, climbed the same father's knee! Charlie spoke first, for his was the more demonstrative nature of the two.

"Robbie, boy, those rebels hit hard. I believe they've done for us. Let us die loving brothers, if die we must. Neither of us were to blame for loving her. It was no treachery, for neither of us knew the other's heart. Why should there be any coldness between us?"

Robert Lansdowne remembered just then for how many years he had been proud of his handsome brother. He thought how dear they had been to each other—the dearest, till she came, of any thing the earth held. Could it be that there lurked in his heart a secret willingness that his brother should fall—a thought that, in such a case, it might be that Joy would wait for him at home? Pangs of self-humiliation tortured him even as his sore wounds had done. He writhed along on the sward closer to his brother's side, and threw his arm over his neck.

He did not say any thing. He was too weak just then, or too wretched; but Charlie understood the language of his manly caress, and lifted his face toward the true eyes that sought it so wistfully.

From that moment, come life or death, the bitter leaven was gone; there could never be a cloud between the two hearts.

They did not die there, by that brook-side, under the Southern sun. Their turn for help came sooner than they thought. Before nightfall they were in the hands of a tender, pitying foe. It was the first the surgeon had slight hope of them. Their wounds were similarly located, and their chances for life seemed equal. If they had been less vigorously moulded, less perfect in physical development, they would have died in the beginning of having lived three days, in addition to some possible that they might live yet longer.

I do not know whether they at all hoped to recover. Life is sweet, they say; but how if you have exhausted the foam and the sparkle, and the cup is already at the lees? It would not be hard then to see it overturned on the thirsty sand.

The morning of the fourth day there came a letter. It was to Robert, in his mother's hand. They let him read it, and Charlie lay and watched him. How white his lips grew! and what was that shadow on his face, that darkening gloom as over the proud, masterful face? Charlie shivered with vague apprehension even before his brother handed him the letter and bade him read it.

Mrs. Lansdowne had written with that sort of triumph to which even the best of us are not superior when the end our intuitions verified, and prophecies fulfilled. Perhaps, too, she thought she was but administering a wholesome tonic, which having taken, would be her savory, delicious boys again. Laura, she wrote, was soon to be married to a French gentleman, an old admirer, who had found Laura still without her, and came across the seas to seek her out. She seemed very happy, the guy, careless thing—in a sort of jubilant, exultant vein over the future prospects; and she was without thought or care for the absent ones whom she had driven away. Long before their term of service should have ended she would be settled in another land. Surely they must see at last how unworthy she had been, and so forget her, and bring back the old, fond love to the old cheery home.

I think Mrs. Lansdowne would have cut off the hand that penned those words rather than have written them, if she could but have known where and how they would find her boys. Charlie read them aloud, but could hear so she his dad broken when he knew it false. It is well that all natures do not clung to an object with the tenacity which is so fatal. When he had finished he handed the paper back to his brother.

"I am not surprised, Robbie," he said, quietly. "I have been looking for some time that she was never worth the pangs she cost us. Let her go."

"Thank God you can say so." There was an unspeakable tenderness of anguish in Robert Lansdowne's tone. "I can't. I loved her, and that was the end. I gave her up, but I wanted to believe in her. It was like a blow to rob me of belief. Is there nothing on earth or in heaven but one gigantic falsehood?"

He stopped speaking, with a suppressed groan. His sore wound had begun to bleed again in his excitement, as they say a murdered man's will when his foe draws near who struck the blow. He had got his death in that hour. There had been slight enough chance of saving him before—it was impossible now. He patient all that day and the following tortures to which no groan bore witness, and which were only to be guessed from the shuddering spasms which shook the strong limbs, and the great, cold drops which beaded the wide forehead. Just at midnight he spoke:

"Charlie, I am glad that we were true friends and brothers again before that letter came. Remember I die loving you. Tell my mother if souls live hereafter my soul will find hers there—the only faithful woman I ever knew."

Those were his last words. If his soul going out into the dark uttered any will cry for God's peace and pardon mortal ears did not hear it. There was a smile more beautiful than life on the still face over which the night-lamp gleamed, but the lips were frozen.

The next spring Charlie Lansdowne was at home, worn and enfeebled, a man whose days of proud strength were over, but he lived. He could see the crocus spring up in the meadows, and catch the sweet breath of the violets on the hill-side. His nature was too sunny and cheerful for utter wretchedness, but the joy of the old days could never come back. The friend who had shared those happier times slept under the pines, beneath which they had sat together and dreamed their boyish dreams. Woe for the voice it would never answer again to any summonses—the lips would never smile more. Was there any place in the hereafter where he should see again those true, kindly eyes?

Mrs. Lansdowne was one of that question. She accepted her son's last words as a pledge. She knew that somewhere, when the life of dreams should be over and the life of realities begun, they should find each other, she and her boy—her best loved boy: for she confessed it now to her own heart that he had always been that would have come back to her now and then among the rose odors and the dance music—the waxy whirl which she calls living. Is retribution a thing of the present or the future?

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Meade's Pocket Box of Games—Containing Chessmen and Board, Checkers, Dominoes, Dice and Box, Cribbage Board and Counters, Pack of Cards, all neatly put in the pocket or knapsack. Price $1 50. Sent free by mail for $1 66.

"WAR LIFE." Stories of the Campand Field. Neatly bound. Sent free for $1 00.

CALLENDER & PEECE,
Publishers and Patent Agents, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Something New
For Ladies' and Gentlemen's Wear.

FINE SLEEVE AND BOSOM STUDS.
All colors—Black, Blue, Green, Purple, and White, marked with initial letter in every style. Monograme to order. Every pair warranted a perfect fit. Sets, $1 50. Address JOHN F. PHELPS, 429 Broadway, New York.

SKATERS, SKATERS.—Chilblains, Frost-bites and Cold Feet. The GALVANO ELECTRO METALLIC INSOLES are a perfect cure and preventative. Sold by all Shoe Stores. METTAM & CO., No. 429 Broadway. Send for Circular.

RAILWAY TIME KEEPERS
ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES. Are warranted to run, and keep excellent time. The styles are superior to any thing of the kind before offered, and are decidedly the most taking novelties out. Should retail at price from $20 to $30 each. Are manufactured by the case of six, and are not sold in less quantities. Engraved upon each, Railway Time Keeper. Per half dozen, $39. Heavy silver plated, engine turned, per half dozen, $39. Samples of half of each kind will be sold at wholesale rates, $20 00. Will be sent by express C. O. D. subject to delivery. Soldiers must remit cash in advance, as we can not collect from them. Address orders,
HUBBARD BROS., Engravers,
No. 9 Spruce-st., John and Nassau Sts., New York.

India-Rubber Gloves cure Chapped Hands, Salt Rheum, &c., and render them soft, smooth, and snowy white; are imperviousto water, and wear well. They are an excellent protection in all kinds of house-work. For sale by the trade generally. Sent by mail on receipt of price and 4 stamps to pay postage.
Ladies' sizes 6 to 8. Gents sizes, 81 00.
GOODYEAR'S I. R. GLOVE M'F'G CO.,
205 Broadway, N. Y.
Every description of Rubber Goods, Wholesale and Retail.

GORILLA AND MAN, with Engravings; Sent free. Physiological Journal for January. Sent free. Physiological Journal for January. 10 cents. Ask your bookseller, or send to FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow on the smoothest face, or hair upon a bald face; without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, free of observation, on receipt of price. Address R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

CATARRH!—Dr. Goodale's CATARRH REMEDY is the only remedy in the world that cures Catarrh, exterminates it, root and branch. Price $1 00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. Sold by druggists. Depot, 25 Cortlandt-st., New York.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!
All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Beaufort, Port Royal, Fortress Monroe, or other troops, should be sent, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Send for circular.

THE SCIENCE OF THE SOUL is given in a series of articles in the Phrenological Journal. Jan-uary, 1863; price, 10 cents, now ready. $1 a year. Ask your newsman for it, or send to FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

SOMETHING NEW.
NATIONAL AMERICAN AMUSEMENT CARDS.
Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. Originated by the Author of "Yankee Notions." Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Four packs sealed in case on receipt of Dollar. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN PUBLISHING COMPANY,
14 Chambers Street, New York.

Rheumatism—Who has it?
It has been confessedly acknowledged by thousands who have used them, that the Galvano Electric Metallic Insoles are the only preventive and cure. Sold by all druggists and shoe dealers generally. Price $1; sent by mail for $1 25. Secured by English and American Patents.
Send for a circular. METTAM & CO., 429 Broadway.

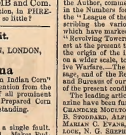
WEDDING CARDS
These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Gilt Edge Card Rooms, 302 Broadway, N.Y. Established 1840. ☞ For Specimens by Mail, send two stamps.

Splendid Holiday Presents.
100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
WORTH $500,000.
To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!
OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.
100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches.....80 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches.....50 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches.....15 00 each.
3000 Vest and Neck Chains.....5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets.....5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " Lockets.....3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Lava Brooches.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gold Pens, Silver Cases.....3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Turquoise and Cameo Ear Drops.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
5100 Gent's Breast Pins.....2 50 to 5 00 each.
5100 Gold Rings.....2 50 to 5 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides.....3 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sets of Sleeve Buttons.....3 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons.....2 50 to 5 00 each.
5000 Pairs Cuff Pins.....2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings.....2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets.....2 50 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry.....5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens with Silver Mounted Holders.....4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
All Gold Pens 14 Carats and Warranted.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one will be, are first carefully mixed, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and the first one that may come all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you have to get, and then, if your option so list, send your dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions, there is a fixed charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be included with the Certificates in remit for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; three for $50; ten for $2; twenty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.



Agents.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one Dollar each. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. A large auction stock to be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

IS HE GOOD-NATURED?—His physiognomy will disclose it. Is he generous, and ill-tempered? His face will show it. For the "signs of character" see PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. JANUARY No. now ready. Price 10 cents. Ask your newsman for it.

MILITARY GOODS.
Sword for Presentation, Sashes, Belts, and Epaulettes, Guns, Pistols, and Revolvers.
Every article in the Military Line Wholesale and Retail.
W. J. Syms & Bro.,
208 Broadway, New York.

J. W. MERSEREAU,
Men's Furnishing Goods
IN STORE.

No. 2 WARREN STREET.
SECOND DOOR FROM BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Represented by N. R. MERSEREAU, L. N. WYANT.

Wanted by a Bookseller.
A thoroughly competent Retail Salesman. One of experience, with the best references, can secure an engagement at once, at a fair salary, by addressing
H. W. DERBY, Cincinnati, Ohio.

BANTAM MEN.—TOM THUMB and COMMODORE NUTT, with portraits and description, in PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Why are they so little?

Just Tribute to Merit.
AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON,
1862.
Duryeas' Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a prize medal. See the unanimous vote of the Royal Commissioners, the competition of all prominent manufacturers in the World. "Pronounced Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding.

Maizena

The food and luxury of children without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Make Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Manges, &c., without Isinglass, with few or no eggs, at a cost astonishing the most economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening roast meats, gravies for fish and meats, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A fair trial will be followed by constant Cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, with directions, by most druggists and grocers. Used for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Manufactured at Glen Cove, Long Island.

Wholesale Depot, 166 Fulton Street.
WM. DURYEA, General Agent.

BEAUTY.—Hunt's Blood of Roses, a charming and perfect beautifier of the hair, for ladies, or gents. It will not stain of, but remains durable for years. Can only be removed with the hair. Sent anywhere on receipt of price via stamps. Used by the celebrated Court Beauties of Europe. Exclusively. Manufactured and prepared for one dollar.
HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 S. Seventh St., Philadelphia.

The Prince of Holiday Gifts or Prizes.
"THE CRAIG MICRO-SCOPE"
Magnifies small objects 10,000 times. So simple that a child may use it. A most suitable present for any person. Price by mail $3 50; with six mounted objects $5. Address HENRY CRAIG, 180 Centre-street, New York.

MOUSTACHES AND WHISKERS IN 42 DAYS Heading, Rubbing, and Manipulation Secrets, all in the Book of Wonders. 5,000 sold. 9th Ed. Price only 20c. If by mail, 25c. Address
HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

PENSIONS, BOUNTY, PAY, PRIZE-MONEY, and all Army and Navy Claims, procured by SOMES & BROWN, 74 Pine Place, New York.
Send for our Hand-Book of Information.

THE HUMAN BODY—OF WHAT COMPOSED!—Read PHYSIOLOGY in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 1863. Only $1 a year. Ask your newsman for it, or send to FOWLER & WELLS, New York.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.
THE BEST IN THE WORLD.
Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.
Unequaled as a dressing. Both for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

To all Wanting Farms.
Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to be seen—only 20 miles from Philadelphia. Healthy, beautiful climate. 30 acre tracts of from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within 4 years. Improved farms for sale. Lots in village are selling. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Agents wanted at Soldiers Relief and Hospital sani tree. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

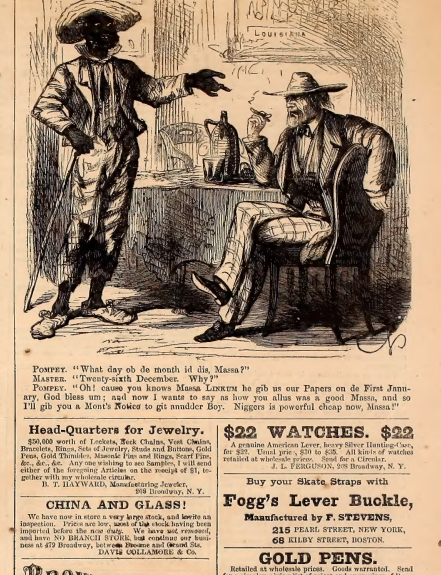
"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position, and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western Prairies.

A Choice Collection of Piano Music.
Nearly 200 Pieces for $2 00.
THE HOME CIRCLE, a volume of 216 pages, containing 33 Marches and Quicksteps, 47 Waltzes, 21 Polkas, 8 Redowas, 5 Mazurkas, 4 Polka-Redowas, 4 Polka-Mazurkas, 2 Varsovianas, 1 Gorlitza, 4 Galopades, 14 Cotillions and Quadrilles, 30 Airs with Variations, &c., arranged for the Piano-Forte, the cheapest and best collection ever issued. Price, in boards, $2 00; in cloth gilt, $2 50. For which, it will be sent, post-paid, by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

The Automaton Regiment;
OR,
INFANTRY SOLDIERS' PRACTICAL INSTRUCTOR, FOR ALL REGIMENTAL MOVEMENTS IN THE FIELD. By Captain WM. HAMILTON, Adjutant U. S. ARMY.
By a simple combination of Blocks and counters, arranged and designated by a carefully considered contrast of colors, is explained the easiest and perfect beginning, where every Officer, Non-commissioned Officer, and Man with each Division, Company, Platoon, Battalion, Field Music, &c., are distinctly marked as to their position in the Battalion, and so that the number of men in each Division, can see at a glance where his company should be placed, as well as his own position. Nearly part up in boxes, price $1 00. ☞ Sent free by mail on receipt of price. Liberal terms for postage.
U. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher of Military and Naval Books, 192 Broadway, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.
Have just published:
MEMOIRS OF MRS. JOANNA BETHUNE. By her Son, the Rev. GEO. W. BETHUNE, D.D. With an Appendix, containing Extracts from the Writings of Mrs. Bethune. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

THE STUDENT'S FRANCE. A History of France from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Second Empire in 1852. By WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT, Jr. Woodcut. Large 12mo, 754 pages, Cloth, $1 25.



☞ Sent by Mail, postage free, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For January, 1863.
The present Number of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE contains the conclusion of MISS MULOCK'S HOUSE-HOLD STORY, "MISTRESS AND MAID," and commences MISS EVANS' Italian Story of "ROMOLA," and of MR. ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S Novel "THE BERTRAMS," both at full length.
MR. J. ROSS BROWNE'S Narrative of a Visit to Ireland, illustrated by Engravings from characteristic Sketches by the Author, is concluded in this number. It will be continued in the Numbers for February and March.—The paper on the "League of Social Reform" closes for the present, describing the various attempts at Union and Dissolution which have marked our national history, and showing that "Revolving Tavern" will be found to be of especial interest at the present time, as giving an accurate account of the origin of the invention, and showing its adaptation, in a wide sense, to the purposes of Offensive and Defensive Warfare.—The full abstracts of the President's Message, and of the Reports of the heads of the Departments and Bureaus of our Government, furnish a complete view of the present condition of the country.
The leading articles in the January Number of this Magazine have been furnished by BENSON J. LOSSING, LUTHER CRAIG, ANTHONY TROLLOPE, MARIE EVANS, CHARLES NORDHOFF, J. ROSS BROWNE, ALFRED H. GUERNSEY, J. ROSS BROWNE, and the Author of "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN," MISS MULOCK, N. G. SHEPHERD, ANTHONY TROLLOPE, and WILLIAM LAIRD.

TERMS.
One Copy for one Year.....$2 00
Two Copies for One Year.....3 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 00 each, or 11 Copies for $20.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.
TERMS.
One Copy for One Year.....$3 00
One Copy for two years.....5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 00 each, or 11 Copies for $20.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.
HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.
Vols. I., II., III., IV., V., and VI., for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, 1861, and 1862, of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $4 37 each, are now ready.
☞ The Publishers employ no TRAVELING AGENTS. Those who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly had better remit direct to the Publishers, or pay their subscription to some Postmaster or Bookseller with whom they are acquainted, and of whose responsibility they are assured.
HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A SPECULATION.

$15 per day made sure, and more if you persevere selling our great NEW STYLE Union Prize and Stationery Package. Something NOVEL and UNEQUALED. Different to all old styles, and containing ALL NEW ARTICLES of good quality. Writing Materials and Fancy Articles worth $1 for only 25 cents. Just the thing for a Splendid Holiday Gift. They are standard goods, and everybody wants them. Profits immense and sales quick. We give as a free present to each person who orders our Packages A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a time-keeper. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted in every Camp and every Town. This is a chance for soldiers in camp or discharged. Send for our New Circulars containing Extra inducements.

S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

AGENTS WANTED in every camp and town, to sell our New Mammoth Eureka Prize Packages. A Splendid Watch free to each Agent. $18 per day sure. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CATELY & CO., 49 Ann St., N. Y.

30 PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES 50
FOR THE USE OF 75 ADAMS PRESS CO. 100
31 PARK ROW, N.Y.

Circular sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type for 6 cents.

HEIMSTREET'S
Inimitable Hair Restorative.

IT IS NOT A DYE,

But restores gray hair to its original color, by supplying the capillary tubes with natural nutriment, imparted by age or disease. All inflammatory dyes are composed of lunar caustic, destroying the vitality and beauty of the hair, and effect of themselves no dressing. Heimstreet's Inimitable Coloring not only restores hair to its natural color by an easy process, but gives the hair a promotes its growth, prevents its falling off, eradicates dandruff, and imparts health and pleasantness to the head. It has stood the test of time, being the original Hair Colorings, and is constantly increasing in favor. Used by both gentlemen and ladies. It is sold by all respectable dealers, or can be procured by them of the enumerated agents, D. S. Barnes, 28 Broadway, N.Y. Two sizes, 50 c. and $1.

LUXURIANT BEAUTY,

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlement. Rich soil. Mild climate. See advertisement of Vineland, on page 495.

CONFEDERATE (REBEL) MONEY.—FACsimile Treasury Notes, as exactly like the genuine that where one will pass current the other will go equally as well. $500 in Confederate Notes of all denominations, sent by mail, postage paid, on the receipt of $5. by

W. E. HILTON,
41 Spruce Street, New York.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON 259
WORK, Wrought, Cast, and Wire. IRON RAILINGS, VERANDAH'S, BALCONIES, GUARDS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description. Illustrated Catalogues mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps.
HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM,
259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

BARTLEY & CO., Needle Manufacturers for the Sewing Machines. Bartlett's Burnished Head Needles, 150 for 25 cents. Free by mail. 421 Broadway, New York.

BEAUTIFUL FACES.—What is the meaning of long noses, short noses, straight noses, crooked noses, sharp noses, blunt noses? And what is indicated by thick lips, thin lips, compressed lips, loving lips? What about laughing eyes, piercing eyes, blue eyes, gray eyes, black eyes? What of chins, broad, narrow, long, and retreating? What if the mouth be large or small? And what is indicated by high hair, dark hair, red hair, straight hair, or curly hair? And of the skin—be it soft, smooth, and fair? or be it freckled, dark, or rough? Why all these different conditions, and what do they mean? Will PHYSIOGNOMY reveal the true character? Is it possible to alter, change, and improve the features? These and other questions answered in THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 1863. Only $1 a year. January No. now ready. Ask your Newsman for it, or send to
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

GOLDEN HILL
SHIRTS.
RETAILING
At Wholesale Prices.
Depot 2 Warren Street. J. W. MERSEREAU.

Rare and Beautiful Flower Seeds free to all who join the "RURAL KEYSTONE CLUB." $5 a year in $1 clear savings on all subscriptions to Newspapers and Periodicals. For full particulars send stamp to P. SUTTON, Hanson, Penn.

THE BEST GIFT
For Soldiers in the Field
Is one of Evans' Portable Tent Heaters.
Can be put up in five minutes. Will heat any tent in the field or camp with ease. Folds flat, packed with extra length of pipe, is but ten inches square and eight inches deep. Price complete $8. Send for Circular.
J. W. EVANS, 91 John Street, N. Y.

JAS. H. WATKINS,
210 Broadway, cor. Fulton Street, N. Y.,
Importer and Manufacturer of LADIES', MISSES', AND GENT'S
FURS
In every Variety.

"IMPORTANT TO AGENTS!!—We have reduced the wholesale price of our GREAT STATIONERY PACKAGES. We also give better Watches to our Agents than any other firm. Send stamp for new circular. J. WEIR & CO., 54 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

An Invention of Rare Merit!
LONG WANTED, AND FOUND AT LAST!
A KEROSENE LAMP CHIMNEY, EASILY CLEANED, AND WHICH WILL NOT CRACK OR BREAK FROM SUDDEN CHANGES OF TEMPERATURE.

THE CHIMNEY in common use breaks from unequal expansion and contraction, caused by the upper portion becoming much more highly heated than the lower portion. This constant liability of the Chimney to be broken by being suddenly cooled or "over-heated," is entirely removed by a unique and beautiful invention, BROWN'S METAL TOP LAMP CHIMNEY, which, being made in accordance with the simple law of expansion and contraction, is found to be the most "fire-proof," so far as heating by the flame of the lamp is concerned.

The clear, positive superiority of the NEW LAMP CHIMney over the old style, are,

1. It will not crack or break from sudden changes of temperature, or "over-heating."

2. The top can be instantly removed, and the glass wiped perfectly clean in a moment without mittens.

3. It is shorter than the common chimney, therefore less liable to accidents, and more convenient for carrying about the house; it is of elegant proportions, and a desirable ornament to any lamp, which will be found to burn with a clear, steady, and beautiful light.

It is really the ideal of perfection in a lamp chimney, and after using one for an evening you will wonder that you could so long tolerate the old, unsightly article.

BE A "BROWN'S METAL TOP LAMP CHIMNEY" IS WARRANTED, with ordinary care, to last as good as long as the lamp on which it is used.

Price only a small neat shade for common size, 25ne top, 25 cents; Brass, 31 cents; Silver-Plated, 50 cents.

Dealers will be furnished, per Express, with a sample box containing one half doz. Chimneys assorted styles and sizes, with circulars, colored show cards, price list, &c., on receipt of $1 25.

Brown's Metal Top Lamp Chimneys are manufactured only by the

NEW LAMP CHIMNEY MANUFACTURING CO.,
MILTON BRADLEY, Treasurer,
Office and Salesroom, 45 Fulton St., N. Y.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a simple Herb that CURES Coughs, Consumption, and all Lung troubles, by sending to D. Adee, 281 Pearl st., N. Y. Hurry and Live. Write for it.—Has cured thousands.

Head-Quarters for Jewelry.

$50,000 worth of Lockets, Sack Chains, Vest Chains, Bracelets, Rings, Sets of Jewelry, Studs and Buttons, Gold Pens, Gold Thimbles, Masonic Pins and Rings, Scarf Pins, &c., &c., &c. Any one wishing to see Samples, I will send either of the foregoing Articles on the receipt of $1, together with my wholesale circular.
B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
918 Broadway, N. Y.

CHINA AND GLASS!

We have now in store a very large stock, and invite an inspection. Prices are low, most of the stock having been imported before the new duty. We have not removed, and have NO BRANCH STORE, but continue our business at 619 Broadway, between Broome and Grand Sts.
DAVIS COLLAMORE & Co.

An Invention of Rare Merit!
LONG WANTED, AND FOUND AT LAST!
A KEROSENE LAMP CHIMNEY, EASILY CLEANED, AND WHICH WILL NOT CRACK OR BREAK FROM SUDDEN CHANGES OF TEMPERATURE.

THE CHIMNEY in common use breaks from unequal expansion and contraction, caused by the upper portion becoming much more highly heated than the lower portion. This constant liability of the Chimney to be broken by being suddenly cooled or "over-heated," is entirely removed by a unique and beautiful invention, BROWN'S METAL TOP LAMP CHIMNEY, which, being made in accordance with the simple law of expansion and contraction, is found to be the most "fire-proof," so far as heating by the flame of the lamp is concerned.

The clear, positive superiority of the NEW LAMP CHIMney over the old style, are,

1. It will not crack or break from sudden changes of temperature, or "over-heating."

2. The top can be instantly removed, and the glass wiped perfectly clean in a moment without mittens.

3. It is shorter than the common chimney, therefore less liable to accidents, and more convenient for carrying about the house; it is of elegant proportions, and a desirable ornament to any lamp, which will be found to burn with a clear, steady, and beautiful light.

It is really the ideal of perfection in a lamp chimney, and after using one for an evening you will wonder that you could so long tolerate the old, unsightly article.

BE A "BROWN'S METAL TOP LAMP CHIMNEY" IS WARRANTED, with ordinary care, to last as good as long as the lamp on which it is used.

Price only a small neat shade for common size, 25ne top, 25 cents; Brass, 31 cents; Silver-Plated, 50 cents.

Dealers will be furnished, per Express, with a sample box containing one half doz. Chimneys assorted styles and sizes, with circulars, colored show cards, price list, &c., on receipt of $1 25.

Brown's Metal Top Lamp Chimneys are manufactured only by the

NEW LAMP CHIMNEY MANUFACTURING CO.,
MILTON BRADLEY, Treasurer,
Office and Salesroom, 45 Fulton St., N. Y.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a simple Herb that CURES Coughs, Consumption, and all Lung troubles, by sending to D. Adee, 281 Pearl st., N. Y. Hurry and Live. Write for it.—Has cured thousands.

$22 WATCHES. $22

A genuine American Lever, heavy Silver Hunting-Case, for $22. Usual price, $30 to $35. All kinds of watches retailed at wholesale prices. Send for a Circular.
J. L. FERGUSON, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Buy your Skate Straps with

Fogg's Lever Buckle,

Manufactured by F. STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK,
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

GOLD PENS.

Retailed at wholesale prices. Goods warranted. Send for a circular, giving list of prices and engravings of Pens. Pens repointed on the receipt of 50 cents in P. O. Stamps.
E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office 15 Maiden Lane, New York City.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE! MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 28c. COIN PREFERRED. Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 120, Boston, Mass.

The American Parlor
Or Floor Skate,
Hard Rubber Rollers,
Anti-friction Axles.

Observe, each Skate is labeled with the trade mark. Also, 50,000 pair of Ladies' and Gents' Ice Skates, comprising all the new and most improved patterns, made From welded steel and iron hardened: Skate Straps and Leather Goods of every description; Fogg's improved Lever Skate Buckle. Sole Agent for Williams, Morse & Co.'s celebrated Skates.
FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK.
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $18, $24 and $27 PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.
FRENCH FLANNEL ARMY SHIRTS, $24, $27, $30 and $33 per dozen.
S. W. H. WARD, from London, No. 387 Broadway.

Nervous Diseases and Physical Debility.—New and reliable treatment. Valuable Reports sent free of charge, by Dr. J. SKILLIN HOUGHTON, No. 2 South Ninth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have Just Published:

MISTRESS AND MAID. A HOUSEHOLD STORY. By DINAH MARIA MULOCK. Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Olive," "The Ogilvies," "The Head of the Family," "Agatha's Husband," "A Life for a Life," &c., &c. 8vo. Paper, 50 cents.

ODLEY FARM. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "North America," "Doctor Thorne," "Framley Parsonage," "The Bertrams," "Castle Richmond," "The West Indies and the Spanish Main," "The Three Clerks," &c., &c. Illustrated by J. E. MILLAIS. 8vo. Paper, 21 25; Cloth, $1 50.

☞ Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 316.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC IN HUTS.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE TEAMSTERS' DUEL.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALFRED R. WAUD.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We continue in this number our illustrations of the Army of the Potomac, from sketches by our special artists in the field.

Mr. Davis has sent us a sketch of the Log-huts in which the troops proceeded to make themselves comfortable after the Battle of Fredericksburg. We reproduce it on page 33. These rude shanties, built of rough logs, with tall wooden chimneys, unthatched roofs and leaky walls, present few claims to architectural merit. But they are a good deal more comfortable than shelter tents, and they can be built in a few hours. Some Colonels, who take proper care of their men, will have a whole regiment comfortably housed in a couple of days.

The Teamsters' Duel, from a sketch by Mr. Waud, on page 33, is one of the humorous scenes in which camp-life abounds. When a driver's nerves get the range of their works and drop a well-aimed shell into them, the schedule which ensues is such as Mr. Homer has depicted.

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, on the twenty-second day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, a Proclamation was issued by the President of the United States, containing, among other things, the following, to wit:

"That on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free; and the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act or acts to repress such persons, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom.

"That the first day of January aforesaid, by proclamation, designated the States and parts of States, if any, in which the people thereof respectively shall then be in rebellion against the United States; and the fact that any State, or the people thereof shall on that day be in good faith represented in the Congress of the United States by members chosen thereto at elections wherein a majority of the qualified voters of such State shall have participated, shall, in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence that such State, and the people thereof, are not then in rebellion against the United States."

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, by virtue of the power in me vested as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, in time of actual armed rebellion against the authority and government of the United States, and as a fit and necessary war measure for suppressing said rebellion, do, on this first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and in accordance with my purpose so to do publicly proclaimed for the full period of one hundred days from the first day above mentioned, order and designate as the States and parts of States wherein the people thereof respectively are this day in rebellion against the United States the following, to wit: Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, (except the parishes of St. Bernard, Plaquemines, Jefferson, St. John, St. Charles, St. James, Ascension, Assumption, Terre Bonne, Lafourche, St. Mary, St. Martin, and Orleans, including the city of New Orleans,) Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia, (except the forty-eight counties designated as West Virginia, and also the counties of Berkeley, Accomac, Northampton, Elizabeth City, York, Princess Ann, and Norfolk, including the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth, and which excepted parts are for the present, left precisely as if this proclamation were not issued.

And by virtue of the power and for the purpose aforesaid, I do order and declare that all persons held as slaves within said designated States and parts of States are, and henceforward shall be free; and that the executive government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of said persons.

And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defense, and I recommend to them that in all cases, when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages.

And I further declare and make known that such persons of suitable condition, will be received into the armed service of the United States, to garrison forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in said service.

And upon this, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution, upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-seventh.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President:

WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1863.

HAVE WE A GENERAL AMONG US?

THEY say at Washington that we have some thirty-eight to forty Major-Generals, and nearly three times that number of Brigadiers; and now the question is, have we one man who can fairly be called a first-class General in the proper meaning of the term?

Before this war broke out, it was the prevailing opinion in military circles—more or less inspired by General Scott—that "Bob Lee," now Commander-in-Chief of the rebel army, was the ablest strategist in our service. He had been chief of staff to the Conqueror of Mexico. Next to him, Albert S. Johnston, who commanded our expedition to Utah, and who fell on the battle-field of Shiloh, was understood to rank in point of military capacity. But it was doubted by General Scott whether either of these two men, or any other officer in the service, was capable of manœuvring 50,000 men.

When the rebellion occurred, and Scott, with his rare sagacity, foresaw the nature of the struggle, and that we must have a Hoche or a Wellington to win it, he turned his eyes to old work, the question arose—who should be the man? Lee and Johnston were with the enemy. Harney was not trusted. Between Scott and Wool, a deadly feud reigned. Twiggs had played traitor. Patterson, like Scott, was superannuated. After much consultation the choice of Government fell upon George B. McClellan, a favorite of fair report, who had been employed for many years in the bureaux at Washington. The recent court-martials have effectually silenced the calumnies which at one time assailed General McDowell's fair fame; no blot now rests upon his honor. But his original appointment was probably due to political influence, and his subsequent record, down to the close of the campaign of 1862, showed that, while his abilities were respectable, he had no claim to the first place among Generals.

To him succeeded McClellan, whom every one pronounced the coming man. Such opportunities as he enjoyed have seldom been vouchsafed to any one in the country for any time. And it is still an open question whether or no he made the most of them. For though his delays were exasperating, it is not sure that greater haste would have been safe; that the peninsular campaign was a failure, it is not sure that this was not caused exclusively by the refusal of the Government to let him have his way. He owed to co-operate with him: though he wasted a precious month in inaction after Antietam, and refused to move at the command of the President, it is not sure that he had not moved he would not have met his Fredericksburg. It is certain that he possesses some of the qualities of a first-rate General. As a strategist, he is admitted to be perfect. He is cool, comprehensive, far-reaching, and safe. He never neglects "lines of retreat." He knows the value of earth-works. He is not a man to make other hit hard. He has made an army, and, more than that, he has won their love, as Napoleon won the love of his vieille garde. But, on the other hand, he has shown the critics of whether he has the dash and daring which are essential to the making of a first-class General. He is said never to have made an attack upon the enemy, but that he was attacked. He is described, in his caution, as being to preponderate over enterprise: he is always prone rather to exaggerate than to underrate the enemy's strength: a man, it is even said, of more science than genius. Such a soldier would be admirable and perfect in command of a fortress, but could not aspire to the name of a great General.

Burnside's place among soldiers is undetermined. He has hitherto given proof of the very qualities which McClellan is said to lack, viz., energy and daring. He has carried the rebel batteries at Roanoke and Newbern, and the attempt to storm Lee's intrenchments at Fredericksburg, were not at all in the Fabian style. They remind us more of Napoleon's methods. He resembles McClellan in his perseverance and in his popularity with his men. It remains to be seen whether he has the other and more genius of that eminent commander—his coolness, his power of combination, his foresight, and his rapidity of conception. If he does, he will prove that he is a General.

Of the West has been prolific of Generals of high merit. Lyon had he lived, would probably have stood high. General Pope, who at one time promised to rival Napoleon, has struck his name off the list of competitors for fame by the disastrous campaign ending at Corinth. Of Sherman, Grant, and Rosecrans, we have every confidence, enterprise, determination, and personal gallantry which have stood them in good stead. He was very fortunate at Fort Donelson. Whether his record at Shiloh will be cleared from the stain destroyed but for accidents beyond his control—will bear the test of inquiry, is a question yet undetermined. Grant has, however, still opportunities of vindicating his valor, to which confidence reposed in him by General Halleck. General W. T. Sherman is making his record at Vicksburg. Hitherto he has shown that he is capable officer and a fighting man. General Curtis did extremely well on the border of Missouri, and showed great administrative ability that, when General Halleck was called to Washington, he succeeded him at St. Louis. General Blunt has lately won laurels in Arkansas; his march to Van Buren is admirable alike for its vigor and its wisdom, and if his expedition threatens successfully he will rank high among our heroes.

At the present moment, however, the most prominent of our soldiers is Charles S. Rosecrans. This officer was selected by General McClellan at the outbreak of the war, and served under him in Western Virginia. He, like McClellan, has been a railroad engineer, resigned, and engaged in scientific and business pursuits. When McClellan was ordered to Washington Rosecrans succeeded him, and thoroughly accomplished his work. He drove the rebels out of Western Virginia, and enabled the people of that State to organize a State government in peace. But Rosecrans's accident he would have "bagged" Floyd and his army. After a period of idleness, he was sent to Corinth, where he spent a few weeks in necessary preparations, knowing that the enemy must attack him if he remained still. The attack came, and resulted not only in the repulse, but in the destruction of the rebel army, and enabled General Grant to move forward to Oxford. Promoted then to the command of the Army of the Ohio, he spent six weeks at Nashville in concentrating his forces, and accumulating equipments and supplies for the campaign. He moved on 29th December, and after five days' desperate fighting, completely defeated, and "drove" the rebel army under Bragg, which, according to the Richmond papers, was "to rescues Nashville within a week." As a strategist Rosecrans has proved himself second to none. In Western Virginia his combinations were most ingenious, and his foresight wonderful. So at Corinth, where he alone or his officers foresaw the battle, and how it would end. His wonderful mathematical ability, which was remarked at West Point, stood him in good stead. At Murfreesboro he seems to have developed personal gallantry of the highest order. Twice, at least, in the course of those five days' battles, he saved the day, and repelled the enemy, by galloping into the thick of the fight, and reanimating his troops by the sportive coolness of his air. He is a man of enthusiasm, as well as a man of calculation: when his army fights, he is with them. If he pursues the enemy as briskly as he attacked them, many of our Generals will stand higher than Rosecrans.

General Banks's record as a soldier has thus far only been that of a military man successful up the Shenandoah Valley, and in the battle of Cedar Mountain. Both operations were correct, and showed that he understood his new calling. Those who have known Mr. Banks expect more of him, and believe that before this war ends he will take a high place among its heroes. West Point has furnished the country with but few generals—but few of a military organization naturally unfits a man for being a great soldier. But we being an art, not a science, a man can no more be made a first-class general than a first-class painter, or a great poet, by professors and text-books; he must be born with the genius of war in his breast. Very few such men are born in a year, and the chief question is rather that they will be found among the millions of the outside people than in the select circle who are educated at West Point.

THE LOUNGER.

THE DUTY OF CHEERFULNESS.

The Italian Opera is again open, under the management of Mr. Maretzek, and the customary winter season of the Academy is not suspended even by the war. The season begins with a prima donna of the truest and impressive and refined action, Clara Louise Kellogg, who is about leaving to fulfill her engagement at Her Majesty's Theatre in London. With Miss Kellogg as the principal attraction across the sea is sighing, will be the tenor. We are to have Miss Kellogg in Polinto, Traviata, Lucrezia Borgia, Martha, and that marvellous opera of which the manager declares that "the New York public will have the priority of representation." Of other vocalists we should name La Grua, Susini, Siedlen, Belvalino, Da Ballo in Maschera, and Diderah, as well as Martha and La Somnambula. It is a brilliant array.

The German Opera also still keeps open its hospitable doors, spreading a feast within such as we have never had in this city. In the true enjoyment of opera is not so much a brilliant and original performance of a few familiar works as the thorough presentation of a large number of the best operas. In a proper metropolis there would be the opera of each nationality, German, French, and Italian. With an Italian it sometimes happens that the less frequent, but, when it is occasion, a far more genuine, and the presently enterprising, German. With an Italian it is said that variety is apt to become permanent. If all the singers are not the best conceivable, there is an orchestra, a chorus, and the whole is a most conscientiously performed. In fact, a German audience is much more exigent and critical than the fashionable science is more common in that people.

We are indebted to the gladness of the hot stress of the times for the fact that we have not only the music of lords. However exquisitely interested we may be in the struggle, it is impossible for the public mind to remain in a state of tension or exclusive devotion to the war would imply. A proper recreation becomes, under such circumstances, a tonic, and it is not difficult to find it in books, in music, in pictures, and to read good books, even while our brave boys are encamped and ready every moment to march and fight. Nor do we always go through the mimic shows, as we used in our late issue, showing the Christmas spirit of the Army of the Potomac. And here we have before us a copy of The New South, a neat pamphlet published, written, and edited by our soldiers in Hilton Head, South Carolina. It is a sheet of literary and social entertaining, fourteen by nineteen inches Mercury. It is, in fact, altogether a most wholesome newspaper than has been published for a long time. It contains the many a dainty little comedy columns are devoted to the news of the camp, of the whole army, and of things at home. There is no editorial column or moral flatter than political.

But in the special point of our remarks. This number contains an account of the Thanksgiving amusements of the army at Hilton Head. By day there were foot-races, rowing matches, target practice, hurdle and wheel-barrow races, and meal fasts, with the greased pole and greased pig's tail. In the evening there were dramatic performances by a part of the Third Rhode Island, and a fete by the officers of the Forty-eighth New York and Company G of the Third Rhode Island. The later holiday amusements were not less cheerful.

While these the soldiers smile in the very face of exposure and danger we need not feel it necessary to look gloomy or to forswear a wholesome enjoyment. There is no fear that our minds and hearts will forget them or the great work before us; while a wise recreation will fit us all the better to help them and to do the work.

THE "ESSEX" AND THE "ALABAMA."

The exploits of the Alabama are very annoying, but the accumulation of invincible proof that the government for capturing and destroying her off hand is childish. A privateer, or any single ship, always has the advantage of a squadron. She roams the boundless ocean at her will, and defies captures, as a solitary incendiary may for months baffle the police of a great city. The feats of the Alabama are like the cavalry raids of the rebels. Nothing is easier for a few daring horsemen than to ride the banks of an invading army. With a perfect knowledge of the country they can pierce the open points of a line which can not be effectively maintained from the Potomac to the Mississippi, taking the risk of a safe escape. Such raids upon the land and saucy privateering upon the sea are most annoying; but we need not suppose that the nation is gone because Stuart dashes into Maryland or Morgan upon a lonely railroad station, or Semmes and Raphael Semmes captures the Ariel and eludes pursuit for months.

The performances of the Alabama are nothing compared with those of the Essex. Admiral Porter, in the war of 1812. A few days after the declaration of war Porter sailed from New York in the Essex, a frigate of 32 guns, with a short cruise he took a large number of British merchantmen. He took one of a fleet of transports conveying troops to Canada and boasted that he knew that our California treasure ships have fallen a prey to Semmes, spite of armed guardians, it will not be an unreasonable supposition. Porter captured in an action of eight minutes the English ship-of-war Alert. By-and-by a British Government frigate, with fifty thousand dollars in specie, fell into his hands. Then he sailed into the Pacific ocean to prey upon the British whale-fishery. Here, having badly injured Peru's trade, and broken up our commerce, he captured a Peruvian privateer which had taken two American whale-ships. For the whole cruise Porter cruised in the Pacific protecting our commerce, capturing twelve British ships, taking four hundred prisoners, and for the time destroying the British fishery.

During all this time Porter lived upon the enemy. In February, 1814, he arrived at Valparaiso, and a week after the British frigate Phœbe, of 36 guns, and the sloop Cherub, of 20, entered the port and anchored near the Essex. They were a part of the force which the British Government sent to scour every sea in search of the Essex. They had ships in the China seas, off New Zealand, Timor, Java, New Holland, and a frigate and sloop lay at La Plata. After getting supplies the Phœbe cruised off Valparaiso for six weeks, and the Essex tried to get out unobserved. But the Phœbe saw her. On the 28th March the Essex attempted to get to sea, but in doubling a headland she was struck by a squall which carried away her mainmast and destroyed several men. Thus crippled, she anchored three miles from the town and a pistol-shot from the Phœbe. Porter had only 255 men. The Phœbe and Cherub. The Essex junior, which was a tender of her namesake, could be of no service with her 14-pound carronades, and she was fought for two hours and a half the Essex surrendered, with a loss of 58 killed, 66 wounded, and 31 missing. The loss of the enemy was 5 killed and 39 wounded.

There is no reason for surprise if the Anglo-rebel pirate Alabama continues for some time longer her predatory career upon the sea. Summer has not added murder to robbery. Indeed the fascinated passengers of the Florida report the marvellous politeness and skill in tradition in the manner of pirates who, as every boarding-school knows, are the most "gentlemanly" of men. The fate of his crimes remains unchanged, that without the warrant of any recognized power in the world, he is waging war upon American commerce.

EDITORIAL RESPONSIBILITY.

A VETERAN editor suggests that it might have been better if the newspapers had been suppressed during the war; upon which another editor of experience remarks that every newspaper would have been suppressed if the Government required it. But when the Government undertook the censorship it virtually allowed the publication of every thing it deemed injurious to be true.

editor burst into the mortified laughter which afterward breaks from every reader, and to strike out the sentence? It may be true. Do you say, but, under the circumstances, don't you think we had better wait until we discover what the result is?

In a word, why should we be at the mercy of every rumor which every correspondent in Washington hears, or fancies he hears, or thinks that he ought to hear? If you are afraid that the story sent to you may be printed in some other paper, and so print it lest yours be behind, you only confirm the impression which has destroyed the value of telegraphic war-news. All the stories, for instance, in all the papers about foreign intervention might be suppressed, and we should have known exactly as much as we do now. Of course such correspondent claims that he knows all about it, and that the nation's information is rubbish. But while no editor can exactly discriminate, every man of sense is sufficient to conduct a paper as can refuse to publish two kinds of rumors, to begin with: first, the stories of what we are going to do, and, second, the irresponsible gossip of bar or tavern lobbies, which makes grave charges against conspicuous men. And this is exactly the common sense in which our papers have been wanting.

ELECTION BY THE PEOPLE.

A FAVORITE remark of the disloyal friends of the rebels at the North is, that the President is not the choice of the people, because he did not receive an actual majority of all the votes cast. The object of this statement is to weaken the sense of duty to sustain the Government, in order that the rebellion may make better terms. But it is simply false. The President is the elect of the people. The laws provide in what way the popular will shall be expressed. They do not require an actual majority of all the votes cast, but a majority of the electoral college. It is a Constitutional and legal majority which is required, and that Mr. Lincoln received as much as any President ever elected, and his tenure of office is precisely that which Washington's was, although there was a vehement opposition to his election.

And what will the disloyal orators inform us? —did a majority of "the people" of this country ever vote? The heaviest vote ever cast for President did not reach two millions, and the people count thirty millions. "The people" is an arbitrary term. It no more follows that the people do not favor the election of a candidate because the majority of the voters reject him than that they reject him because a majority of voters approve. The whole thing is purely political, and the candidate who conforms to the legal requirement is elected by the people in the only way in which he can be.

It is observable that the orators who so loudly declare that a majority of the people did not vote for the President are the same who insist that the election of the present Governor of New York indicates a change of sentiment in the State. But let them apply to the present system and see how it works. The Governor's majority in the city of New York was, in round numbers, thirty thousand; in the rest of the State, ten thousand. What is the inference? Simply that the State of New York gave its opponent twenty thousand majority. Why, then, shall the citizens of Chautauqua and St. Lawrence be told that he is only a city Governor, and not the choice of the State? Certainly, if you follow the lead of the orators of whom we speak.

But the laws of the State declare the conditions of a Governor's election as those of the election subsist the choice of an election of President. And it is in conformity to those laws that Mr. Seymour is Governor, and Mr. Lincoln President; although he has not received his majority in the free States, and the other in the city of New York.

It is needless to add that the people who are most strenuous and persistent in declaring that a President constitutionally elected is not the choice of the country are the loyal conservatives who desire to be seriously alarmed lest every comma of the Constitution should not be respected. Of all ridiculous jokes the chief is that which calls those men, who believe this Government ought not to save itself from destruction, "Conservatives." Alexander Hamilton was a Conservative. So believed the Bermuda Wood-users went to Richmond to lecture about him. Only they will not receive a medium report his opinion of the "Conservation" of the Union he helped to make, to defend, and to declare indissoluble. And this "Conservation" with above all things to save the Union, but only constitutionally! Well, nobody wishes to save it otherwise. It will probably be saved otherwise. And if you are so very anxious to save it constitutionally, why do you incessantly shriek that a President unconstitutionally elected is not elected by the people? Who is he elected by? Suppose the Constitution and laws declare that a majority of the actual voters shall be under certain conditions, elect? Is not that point just as sacred as any other?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

PLEASURES OF MEMORY.

REMEMBERING when you are more than half-way to the Opera, that you have left your bouquet at home upon your dressing-table, and at the same time recollecting that the entrance-fee to that you wished especially to hear

While walking home to dine en famille with your wife, remembering that you've given her old dressmaker a cut up with you, and have quite forgotten to tell her to prepare for dinner.

Remembering at bedtime a business letter which your uncle drew whom you have expectations) bound to write post that morning, and which, you now find, is still in your coat pocket.

Never did an Irishman utter a better bull than did an honest John, who being asked by a friend, "Has your uncle a son or a daughter?" answered, "Upon my life I do not yet know whether I am uncle or aunt."

Young women should not cast examples, for the young men are always following them.

A SMALL CASE OF NEEDLES.

WOMEN sew, and man reaps the advantage of it. Vows, like sainted-shrines, are frequently broken, when they bind a person too tightly.

When you find your property (that mind not your person) is running to waste, then stop it is justifiable to pull in.

Man without a button is helpless indeed, no less so than a ship without its needle.

A QUESTION FOR LORD DUNDWEARY.

If a woman marry a man, and her husband dies, what do people call her? Answer, a widow.

If she then marry again, and the second husband dies what then ought she to be called? Answer, a grievance.

Toward the close of an election, when all the exertions of Sheridan's friends had failed to secure his return, an honest lad, whose father was engaged in a hard contest to retain the position, and climbed one of the supporters of the hustings, in order to get a better view. Whipping off his cap full upon the tar-dab, which he turned to inadvertently account by saying that had he but 100 voters as stylish as the perpendicular gentleman before him, they would soon place him where he wished to be—at the head.

My friend Richards, says a country correspondent, was an inveterate chewer of tobacco. To break himself of the habit he took up another, which was that of breaking a pledge (or so he called it) as often as he could. And when on his bed he said he had broken off for good, but now, as I was not taking tobacco, I thought I might indulge." And, you told me you had given up that habit, but I see you are at it again." "Yes," he replied, "I have gone to chewing and left off lying."

A young lady being asked by a penniless sapsuckerson to marry him, replied that she would rather be excused. "Not but some of my friends have favored me with originals proposals."

Fashionable circles never wear so enormous as they are now. Almost every lady that appears in the streets is the cause of one.

A clergyman advocating corporal punishment for children, said, "A child, when once started in a course of evil cannot be stopped, but by a reasonable use the strap trade. It takes the switch to get it off."

A man should tell the truth without reserve, but a general shouldn't take his army into battle in that way.

You can not preserve happy domestic pairs in family jars.

If you can't coax fish to bite, try your persuasive powers upon a cross dog, and you will be sure to succeed.

A gentleman was constantly in the habit of calling his servant, Mathew Bolt. Mathew, however, was in the habit of rebel with one of them, who let him in a rage, said he was sick of being called Bolt, vowed that he would never answer it again. A few days after, his old master meeting him in the street, said, "Mathew, though you are sorry, you can't offer sir!" "Ah, Sir, I have found that answers me to harmony."

Put a good face upon every thing, unless you are so ugly that you can't.

A handcuff—A box on the ear.

A machine has been invented which is to be driven by the force of circumstances.

"The man put up his hand dogmatically, but a great green leaf waved upon his finger." So is one of the tantalizing passages in a modern novelette.

The man who made an impression on the heart of opposite has taken out a patent for stone-cutting.

A young man advertises his desire for a wife.—" Pretty, and entirely ignorant of the world."

A minister, putting his hand upon a young urchin's shoulder, exclaimed, "My son, I believe the devil has got hold of you." "I believe so too," was the reply.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, January 5th, in the Senate, a bill taxing bank-notes and fractional currency was introduced and referred. Mr. Sherman reported a military bill, and moved its consideration, when the effect of the army to prevent correspondence with rebels, and to establish military sites in insurrectionary districts for sale, were introduced and referred. A resolution was adopted requesting the expediency of consolidating regiments in the field, so that each regiment shall number half as at least one thousand and twenty men, was adopted. A resolution instructing the Military Committee to report at an early day the expediency of modifying or abolishing the duty on foreign products of the soil, was introduced, and after an executive session the Senate adjourned. Mr. Trumbull introduced a bill for the relief of the fugitives by the Indian troubles in Minnesota, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. In the House of Representatives, calling apart lands for a railroad in Washington Territory, and granting lands to Minnesota for Colorado Territory, and providing a survey of swamp and overflowed lands in Arkansas, were introduced. The Judiciary Committee was instructed to report a bill providing for the trial of persons charged with treason, robbery and property in insurrectionary States. A resolution was introduced directing the Secretary of War to furnish to the communicate to the House his reasons, if any, for neglecting to pay to Governor Morton the money for the use of the Indiana troops. A resolution was adopted that on the 19th of December last, inquiring into the names of the officers of Colonel Mitchell's staff, and the amount of his pay of payment of the same; and further, that he do now communicate to the House the reasons, if any, existed why whether he has not paid the said stock, and if so, whether he has not received the same. The bill was made the special consideration of the subject was postponed till next day. A bill making appropriations for the Indian Department for peace was reported.

On Tuesday, 6th, in the Senate, the Military Committee reported back the bill to temporarily suspend the act to prevent and punish fraud upon the Government, and with striking Government contracts, and moved that the bill be put upon the special order for next day after the subject was postponed. The House joint resolution for the relief of Indiana was introduced, read twice and referred to the Military Committee. The bill relative to the discharge of State prisoners was taken up, and Senator Saulsbury, of Delaware, made a speech in opposition to it.——In the House, the Select Committee on emancipation reported a bill providing for the issue of ten million dollars of thirty years bonds, in aid of the emancipation of slaves in Missouri, the Government pledging itself to pay the bonds when the final sum. A resolution was adopted that the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of issuing Government notes bearing 6.65 interest, the amount loaned to be equal to 75 per cent. of the amount now in circulation, and such other sums as the demands of the public service for the current year shall require; that the be issued in the amount of United States 5 per cent. 20-years bonds, which bonds, with the interest, shall constitute a fund for the redemption of the 7.30 Treasury notes, the bonds to be of equal date of the Treasury notes, the interest to be paid in specie. The holders of the bonder notes shall have the right to surrender them to convert the same of $100 is presented, and receive the par value for the same. The holders of the 1.65 Treasury notes shall have the right to convert the same in 20-years 6 per cent. bonds when an amount equal to 25 per cent. of the bonds shall be presented, but not more than one-fifth in any one month. The remainder of the session was devoted to the debate upon the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Appropriation bill.

THE WAR IN TENNESSEE.

HEAD-QUARTERS, FOURTEENTH ARMY CORPS,
CAMP BEFORE MURFREESBORO, TENN.,
IN FRONT OF MURFREESBORO, Jan. 3, 1863.

To Lt. Gen. Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington:

On the 30th of December we marched from Nashville in two columns, the right under Gen. Rosecrans, the left under Gen. Thomas from his encampment on Franklin's pike, with 43,000 men, and encamped that night on the main Murfreesboro pike.

Our left and centre met with a strong resistance, such as the nature of the country permits, the rolling or hilly, but open ground, with occasional farms, and interspersed by small streams, with rocky bluff banks, forming serious obstacles.

General McCook drove General Hardee's corps a mile and a half on Wednesday. "Very," he replied," I have gone to chewing and left off lying."

A young lady being asked by a penniless sapsuckerson to marry him, replied that she would rather be excused. "Not but some of my friends have favored me with originals proposals."

Fashionable circles never wear so enormous as they are now. Almost every lady that appears in the streets is the cause of one.

A clergyman advocating corporal punishment for children, said, "A child, when once started in a course of evil cannot be stopped, but by a reasonable use the strap trade. It takes the switch to get it off."

A man should tell the truth without reserve, but a general shouldn't take his army into battle in that way.

You can not preserve happy domestic pairs in family jars.

If you can't coax fish to bite, try your persuasive powers upon a cross dog, and you will be sure to succeed.

A gentleman was constantly in the habit of calling his servant, Mathew Bolt. Mathew, however, was in the habit of rebel with one of them, who let him in a rage, said he was sick of being called Bolt, vowed that he would never answer it again. A few days after, his old master meeting him in the street, said, "Mathew, though you are sorry, you can't offer sir!" "Ah, Sir, I have found that answers me to harmony."

Put a good face upon every thing, unless you are so ugly that you can't.

A handcuff—A box on the ear.

A machine has been invented which is to be driven by the force of circumstances.

"The man put up his hand dogmatically, but a great green leaf waved upon his finger." So is one of the tantalizing passages in a modern novelette.

The man who made an impression on the heart of opposite has taken out a patent for stone-cutting.

A young man advertises his desire for a wife.—" Pretty, and entirely ignorant of the world."

A minister, putting his hand upon a young urchin's shoulder, exclaimed, "My son, I believe the devil has got hold of you." "I believe so too," was the reply.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, January 5th, in the Senate, a bill taxing bank-notes and fractional currency was introduced and referred. A bill to prevent the employment of military persons, also the efficiency of the army; to prevent correspondence with rebels, and to establish military sites in insurrectionary districts for sale, were introduced and referred. A resolution was adopted requesting the expediency of consolidating regiments in the field, so that each regiment shall number half as at least one thousand and twenty men, was adopted. A resolution instructing the Military Committee to report at an early day the expediency of modifying or abolishing the duty on foreign products of the soil, was introduced, and after an executive session the Senate adjourned. Mr. Trumbull introduced a bill for the relief of the fugitives by the Indian troubles in Minnesota, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. In the House of Representatives, calling apart lands for a railroad in Washington Territory, and granting lands to Minnesota for Colorado Territory, and providing a survey of swamp and overflowed lands in Arkansas, were introduced. The Judiciary Committee was instructed to report a bill providing for the trial of persons charged with treason, robbery and property in insurrectionary States. A resolution was introduced directing the Secretary of War to furnish to the communicate to the House his reasons, if any, for neglecting to pay to Governor Morton the money for the use of the Indiana troops. A resolution was adopted that on the 19th of December last, inquiring into the names of the officers of Colonel Mitchell's staff, and the amount of his pay of payment of the same; and further, that he do now communicate to the House the reasons, if any, existed why whether he has not paid the said stock, and if so, whether he has not received the same. The bill was made the special consideration of the subject was postponed till next day. A bill making appropriations for the Indian Department for peace was reported.

On Tuesday, 6th, in the Senate, the Military Committee reported back the bill to temporarily suspend the act to prevent and punish fraud upon the Government, and with striking Government contracts, and moved that the bill be put upon the special order for next day after the subject was postponed. The House joint resolution for the relief of Indiana was introduced, read twice and referred to the Military Committee. The bill relative to the discharge of State prisoners was taken up, and Senator Saulsbury, of Delaware, made a speech in opposition to it.——In the House, the Select Committee on emancipation reported a bill providing for the issue of ten million dollars of thirty years bonds, in aid of the emancipation of slaves in Missouri, the Government pledging itself to pay the bonds when the final sum. A resolution was adopted that the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of issuing Government notes bearing 6.65 interest, the amount loaned to be equal to 75 per cent. of the amount now in circulation, and such other sums as the demands of the public service for the current year shall require; that the be issued in the amount of United States 5 per cent. 20-years bonds, which bonds, with the interest, shall constitute a fund for the redemption of the 7.30 Treasury notes, the bonds to be of equal date of the Treasury notes, the interest to be paid in specie. The holders of the bonder notes shall have the right to surrender them to convert the same of $100 is presented, and receive the par value for the same. The holders of the 1.65 Treasury notes shall have the right to convert the same in 20-years 6 per cent. bonds when an amount equal to 25 per cent. of the bonds shall be presented, but not more than one-fifth in any one month. The remainder of the session was devoted to the debate upon the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Appropriation bill.

THE WAR IN TENNESSEE.

HEAD-QUARTERS, FOURTEENTH ARMY CORPS,
CAMP BEFORE MURFREESBORO, TENN.,
IN FRONT OF MURFREESBORO, Jan. 3, 1863.

To Lt. Gen. Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington:

On the 30th of December we marched from Nashville in two columns, the right under Gen. Rosecrans, the left under Gen. Thomas from his encampment on Franklin's pike, with 43,000 men, and encamped that night on the main Murfreesboro pike.

Our left and centre met with a strong resistance, such as the nature of the country permits, the rolling or hilly, but open ground, with occasional farms, and interspersed by small streams, with rocky bluff banks, forming serious obstacles.

General McCook drove General Hardee's corps a mile and a half on Wednesday. "Very," he replied," I have gone

General Crittenden reached within a mile and a half of Lavergne.

General Thomas reached the Wilson pike, meeting with no serious opposition.

On the 29th General McCook drove General Hardee from Nolensville and encamped on a commanding position six miles toward Stuttyville, and found that General Hardee had fallen back toward Murfreesboro.

General Crittenden fought and drove the enemy before him, occupying the line from the Creek, and encamping some prisoners with slight loss.

Gens. Negley and Palmer, the vicinity of Nolensville, when he was partially surprised, thrown into confusion, and driven back. The enemy's cavalry driven in, and pushed the enemy four times and protected the flank of the army. Gen. Negley lost 200 men, but subsequent to this outward event, which compelled me to retain the left of the army in position, which it should be rallied, and assume a new position.

On the 31st I made the retrie opened by an attack on me, and were again pushed.

The enemy's right wing was also striking along the front with threats of an attack until about five o'clock in the afternoon, when the enemy advanced, throwing a small division across Stone River to occupy the commanding ground there.

While examining the ground occupied by this division, which had no artillery, I saw a heavy force emerging from the woods on the edge of the battle field, and sweep. They drove our little division, before them after a severe struggle, in which the enemy's artillery suffered and three hundred and seventy five wounded; but they were finally repulsed by our artillery, which opened on the remaining troops of the left wing of General Morton's Pioneer brigade, which was in front of the field and beyond intrenchments, their officers rallying them with great difficulty. But the enemy's right wing was driven back and the left wing had night. The lines were completed at four o'clock in the morning.

The 3d was spent in bringing up and distributing ammunition, burying the dead, and caring for those from the field of battle. The pursuit was commenced by the entire column, the first day brigades crossing at the west ford of Stone River the following. The rebels had retreated on the Shelbyville pike. Their loss has been very heavy.

Gen. Rosecrans entered the town and push the pursuit to-morrow.

Our medical director estimates the wounded in hospital at 5500, and our dead at 1000.

Among the killed is the loss of Lieutenant Colonel Ferreiro, whose capacity and general deportment had already endeared him to the whole army, and whose bravery and gallantry on the field of battle excited their admiration.

W. S. ROSECRANS,
Major-General Commanding.

OUR TRIUMPH IN TENNESSEE.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE CUMBERLAND,
CAMP IN THE FIELD, Jan. 4, 1863.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington:

We have fought one of the greatest battles of the war, and are victorious.

The attack on the 31st ult. was preceded by a surprise of the right flank; but we have, nevertheless, driven the enemy from the field at all points.

They fled with great precipitation on Saturday night.

The loss of rebel officers has been very heavy.

Their loss has been very heavy.

Brig.-Gen. Sillman and others are killed.

Generals Claiborn, Adams, and Breckinridge are wounded.

W. S. ROSECRANS,
Major-General Commanding.

THE ATTACK ON WICKSBURG.

Report says that Gen. Sherman has now in possession of Vicksburg, after a series of desperate battles. The attack was made on the 29th ult. on Chickasaw Bayou on the south bank of the gun-boats, after having shelled the rebel works for two days. The attack was thoroughly repulsed and well defended. The gun-boat Harriet Wes pretty severely damaged by the rebel batteries, and her commander, Captain Gwinn, badly hurt. The enemy had seven bat- rebel rifled guns mounted on the bluffs, and made a stubborn resistance for more than an hour. We have the loss of the 29th and 30th, and the fact that the fleet was lying had been going on for five days, commencing on Saturday, the 27th ult. Gen. Sherman and the fleet commander had captured three lines of the enemy's works. The firing on the fourth and last line of defence on the Jackson and Vicksburg road had ceased, and the indications were that Gen. Sherman would occupy the latter works on Wednesday night. Before taking the fortifications General Sherman sent a flag of truce to the rebel commander with the offer to let Shreveport Railroad—work which was successfully accomplished by the rebels during the night. Gen. Sherman's force and men from General Grant's army, by way of Memphis, and the rebels from Arkansas at Vicksburg, is about forty thousand men.

SUCCESSFUL FORAY INTO TENNESSEE.

Important intelligence has been received from rebel sources of a brilliant operation performed in East Tennessee by the Union troops. From the Lynchburg Virginian, of New-Years day, we find a long article of Gen. Jones's, reported to be very strong, and composed of nine Pennsylvania regiments and eleven cavalry, had advanced nine miles of the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad, and destroyed the bridges over Watauga and Holston Rivers and Wallace's tunnel, and capturing two hundred rebel cavalry and a large number of prisoners. The Virginian says it was the most extensive raid that has been made at any time when the road is traced to its utmost capacity. It also states that the Yankees said, which extended over a space of nearly a hundred miles, was one of widespread during and audacity.

Later Union accounts state that nearly all the bridges between Knoxville and the Virginia State line—a distance of 120 miles—have been destroyed, and the track more or less injured. So continued was the movement that the rebel authorities are engaged in a comparatively short space of time, and, as the rebel express it, the line was so much injured "that it will take several weeks to repair the damages."

ANOTHER VICTORY.

HOLLY SPRINGS, MISS., January 3, 1863.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington:

General Sullivan has succeeded in getting a fight with the rebel Colonel Forrest, and whipped him badly.

General Sullivan has captured six pieces of artillery and four guns, and two hundred prisoners.

General Sullivan has now required at every point except this, and will hereafter.

U. S. GRANT,
Major-General Commanding.

LOSS OF THE "MONITOR."

The Monitor was steamed during a heavy storm on the 31st ult., going down in a gale with Cape Hatteras. The Rhode Island, which was towing her, lost a hawser's crew, it is supposed, to the effort to keep the hawser which connected the vessels.

GENERAL BUTLER'S VIEWS.

On leaving New Orleans, General Butler published an address to the people, in which he said:

"The enemies of my country I shall oppose and imprisonable. I have treated with most unworthy. I hold that in the present condition of the war, I am not to be a civilian, and any posthumous sheet of fame I desire is quieter and more deeply engraven in the hearts of the people of the Government. Upon this thesis have I administered my office. I have found no occasion to depart from it, because I see no occasion of complaint. I do not find that I have received letters of complaint, but horrible heresies has ever been exhibited to disloyal enemies of my country and of mankind. On the one hand, I have been regaled you with the atrocities of British civilization, and on the other with the supposed acts of enforced warfare. You might have been shocked to death at everything that has been proposed by England by reason of a General of the royal house of England; or roasted like the husband of the Spanish Inquisition; your wives and daughters might have been given over to the lust of soldiers, as the Spanish dames treated Spain in the Peninsular war; or you might have been scalped and tomahawked, as the Spanish were by Wyoming by the savage allies of Great Britain in our own Revolution. You could have seen your cities turned over to indiscriminate 'loot,' like the palace of the Emperor of China. You have not yet visited deserted dwellings might have been sent away, like the peninsulas of the Moors; your property might have been left the wreck of cannon like the Spaniards at Dublin; and yet this would have been the result of the civilized warfare practiced by the most polished and the most hypocritical nations of Europe. And now, after all, you are not even the victims of the inhabitants of your city toward the friends of the rebels, before whom, accordingly, you are sufficient preservative and justification."

WHAT HE HAS DONE.

"I found you trembling at the horrors of servile insurrection. All danger of this I have prevented by so treating the slaves that they could not excite it.

"I found the dungeon, the chain, and the lash your only means of enforcing obedience in your armies. I have them peaceful, laborious, controlled by the laws of kindness and love.

"I have demonstrated that the petitioner can be kept from the polls.

"I have added a million of dollars to your wealth in the form of cotton, taken from the bottom of the harbor.

"I have cleaned and improved your streets, canals, and public squares, and opened new avenues to commerce and land.

"I have given you freedom of election greater than you have ever enjoyed before.

"I have taken $800,000 to be administered so impartially that your own sympathies have unanimously approved.

"I have given you freedom of the press.

"You have seen, therefore, the benefit of the laws and justice the Government against which you have rebelled.

"Why, then, will you not all return to your allegiance to that Government—not with lip service, but with the heart?

SLAVERY.

"There is but one thing that at this hour stands between you and the Government, and that is slavery.

"The institution, cursed of God, which has taken its last refuge in this rebellion, and will be rooted out in the term from the wheat, although the plough in torn up in the

"I have given much thought to this subject.

"I have conversed with the foreign born, by habit of mind, by political position, by social affinity, and by interest in your country, and I say it possibility they might be with safety to the Union.

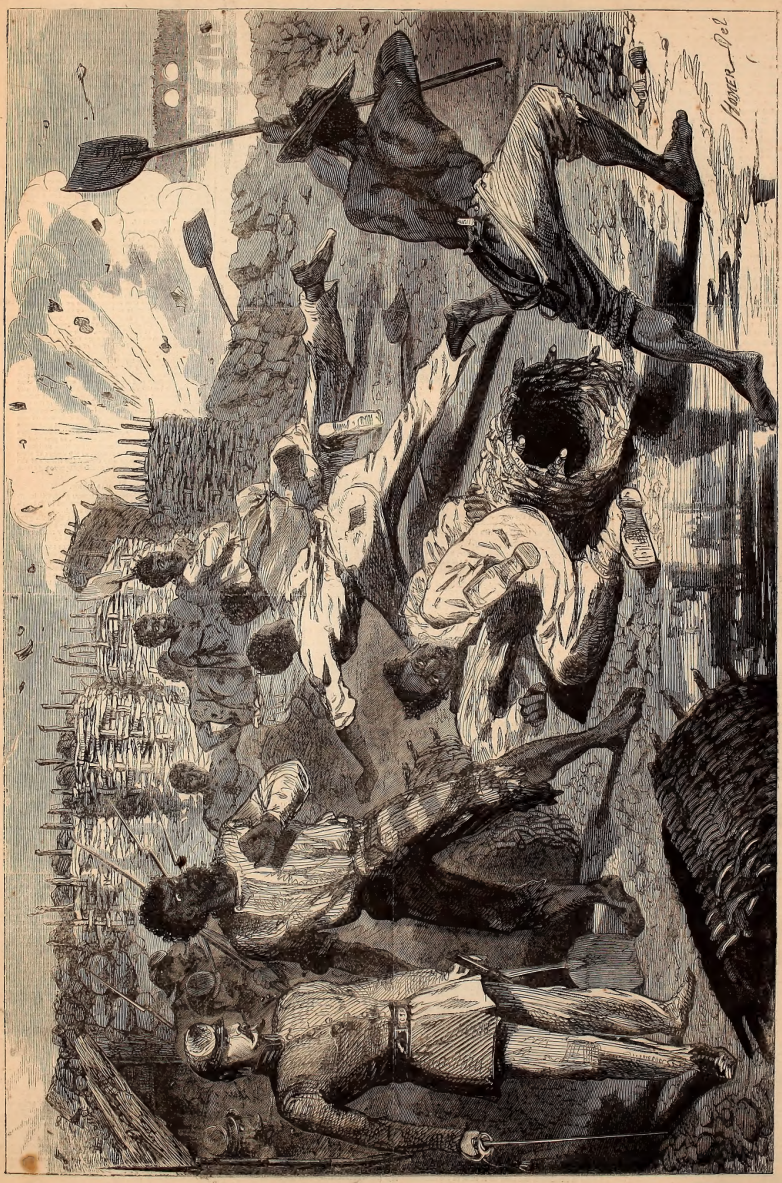
"Months of experience and of observation have forced the conviction that the existence of slavery is incompatible with the permanent welfare of yourselves or of the Union. As the system has grown it has grown to be a power huge enough to overthrow the State, but it cannot be built up but it is better that it could be gradually removed; but it cannot be done, that is the point, and it is the point that it should longer violate the social, political, and fundamental principles of free labor. I am not now on politicalthis view as regards the slaves, but simply as regards the interests of the country. So the view.

"Look around you and say whether this is not the destruction of slavery. Will you not join us in the ranks of the friends of your country.

"Citizens of New Orleans, farewell words of one who has shown all devotion to his country as the peril of the life of his family. In these words are no party politics nor one interest save the good of those whom he addresses: but he who has served, with all energy and power at my goal to Heaven to bear me witness, that such are the views and motives of my conduct.

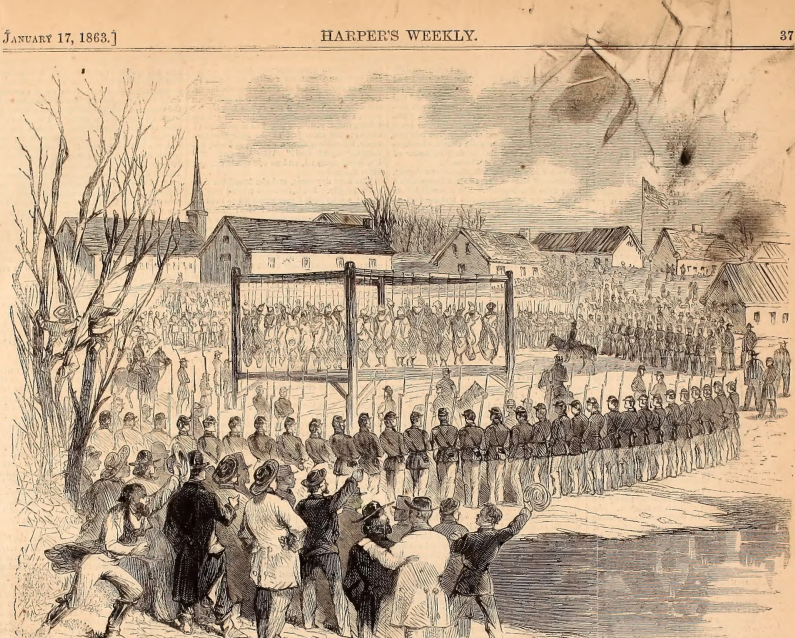
"Come, then, to the unconditional support of the Government of the United States, your own best rest and interests; remould them according to the laws of nations and of God, and your future will be as happy and prosperous as you by geographical position, only a portion of which was heretofore possessed by the people of Britain."

DEATH OF "UNCLE SAM."



At the Head-Quarters of the U. S. Sanitary Commission at Louisville, Ky., on Sunday, the 28th ult., Private Uncle Sam, the Aged Consort of Old Aunt Charlotte, of Our Contraband Camp. The deceased and Aunt Charlotte have already been portrayed in the Weekly of Aug. 16, 1862, as the faithful partner of her husband, lived a long life of humble usefulness, and of placid good-will to all around him. He lived to see the triumph of what his fellow-slaves call "the next true contest," Dress the Flag of God and Liberation, at the advanced age of 70 years.

FOREIGN NEWS.



ENGLAND.

A SPEECH FROM JOHN BRIGHT.

MR. BRIGHT, M.P., in the interests of the laborers of the district of Rochdale, has made a splendid address to his constituents in Birmingham in support of the cause of the Union. Mr. Bright, after alluding to the distress caused in the future of the United States. He quoted Kossuth, Garibaldi, and Victor Hugo to show on which side the sympathies of English people lay. He added that he still retained the hope that the North would be successful in the rebellion, with the loss and free career for the Southern States. He concluded by a vivid sketch of [illegible]

A SHELL IN THE REBEL TRENCHES.—[SEE PAGE 37.]

EXECUTION OF THIRTY-EIGHT INDIAN MURDERERS AT MANKATO, MINNESOTA.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. HERMAN, OF ST. PAUL.—[SEE PAGE 39.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

BY WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN M'LENAN.

Printed from the Manuscript and Early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER I.—(Continued.)

"Is there any one in the front room?" said Kirke, in a whisper. "Come in there; I have something to say to you."

The woman followed him through the door of communication between the rooms.

"How much does she owe you?" he asked.

The landlady mentioned the sum. Kirke put it down before her on the table.

"Where is your husband?" was his next question.

"Waiting at the public-house, Sir, till the hour is up."

"You can take him the money or not, as you think right," said Kirke, quietly. "I have only one thing to tell you, so far as your husband is concerned. If you want to see every bone in his skin broken let him come to the house while I am in it. Stop! I have something more to say. Do you know of any doctor in the neighborhood who can be depended on?"

"Not in our neighborhood, Sir. But I know of one within half an hour's walk of us?"

"Take the cab at the door, and if you find him at home bring him back in it. Say I am waiting here for his opinion on a very serious case. He shall be well paid, and you shall be well paid. Make haste!"

The woman left the room.

Kirke sat down alone to wait for her return. He hid his face in his hands, and tried to realize the strange and touching situation in which the accident of a moment had placed him.

Hidden in the squalid by-ways of London, under a false name, cast, friendless and helpless, on the mercy of strangers by illness which had struck her prostrate, mind and body alike, no he met her again, the woman who had opened a new world of beauty to his mind—the woman who had called Love to life in him by a look! What horrible misfortune had struck her so cruelly, and struck her so low? What mysterious destiny had guided him to the last refuge of her poverty and despair in the hour of her surest need? "If it is ordered that I am to see her again I shall see her." Those words came back to him now—the memorable words that he had spoken to his sister at parting. With that thought in his heart he had gone where his duty waited for him. Months and months had passed; thousands and thousands of miles, protracting their double length on the unresting waters, had rolled between them. And through the lapse of time, and over the waste of oceans, day after day, and night after night, as the winds of heaven blew, and the good ship toiled on before them, he had advanced nearer and nearer to the end that was waiting for him—he had journeyed blindfold to the meeting on the threshold of that miserable door. "What has brought me here?" he said to himself in a whisper. "The mercy of chance? No! The mercy of God."

He waited, unregardful of the place, unconscious of the time, until the sound of footsteps on the stairs came suddenly between him and his thoughts. The door opened, and the doctor was shown into the room.

"Dr. Merrick," said the landlady, placing a chair for him.

"Mr. Merrick," said the visitor, smiling quietly as he took the chair. "I am not a physician—I am a surgeon in general practice."

Physician or surgeon, there was something in his face and manner which told Kirke at a glance that he was a man to be relied on.

After a few preliminary words on either side, Mr. Merrick sent the landlady into the bedroom to see if his patient was awake or asleep. The woman returned, and said she was "betwixt the two, light in the head again, and burning hot." The doctor went at once into the bedroom, telling the landlady to follow him, and to close the door behind her.

A weary time passed before he came back into the front room. When he reappeared his face spoke for him before any question could be asked.

"Is it a serious illness?" said Kirke, his voice sinking low, his eyes anxiously fixed on the doctor's face.

"It is a dangerous illness," said Mr. Merrick, with an emphasis on the word.

He drew his chair nearer to Kirke, and looked at him attentively.

"May I ask you some questions which are not strictly medical?" he inquired.

Kirke bowed.

"Can you tell me what her life has been before she came into this house, and before she fell ill?"

"I have no means of knowing. I have just returned to England after a long absence."

"Did you know of her coming here?"

"I only discovered it by accident."

"DON'T DISTRESS MAMMA ABOUT ME," SHE SAID. "SEND FOR NORAH."

"Has she no female relations? No mother? no sister? no one to take care of her but yourself?"

"No one—unless I can succeed in tracing her relations. No one but myself."

Mr. Merrick was silent. He looked at Kirke more attentively than ever. "Strange!" thought the doctor. "He is here in sole charge of her—and is this all he knows?"

Kirke saw the doubt in his face, and addressed himself straight to that doubt before another word passed between them.

"I see my position here surprises you," he said, simply. "Will you consider it the position of a relation—the position of her brother, or her father—until her friends can be found?" His voice faltered, and he laid his hand earnestly on the doctor's arm. "I have taken this trust on myself," he said; "and, as God shall judge me, I will not be unworthy of it!"

The poor weary head lay on his breast again, and the poor fevered fingers clasped his hand once more as he spoke those words.

"I believe you," said the doctor, warmly. "I believe you are an honest man. Pardon me, if I have seemed to intrude myself on your confidence. I respect your reserve—from this moment it is sacred to me. In justice to both of us, let me say that the questions I have asked were not prompted by mere curiosity. No common cause will account for the illness which has laid my patient on that bed. She has suffered some long-continued mental trial—some wearing and terrible suspense, and she has broken down under it. It might have helped me if I could have known what the nature of the trial was, and how long or how short a time elapsed before she sank under it. In that hope I spoke."

"When you told me she was dangerously ill," said Kirke, "did you mean danger to her reason or to her life?"

"To both," replied Mr. Merrick. "Her whole nervous system has given way; all the ordinary functions of her brain are in a state of collapse. I can give you no plainer explanation than that of the nature of the malady. The fever which frightens the people of the house is merely the effect. The cause is what I have told you. She may lie on that bed for weeks to come—passing alternately, without a gleam of consciousness, from a state of delirium to a state of repose. You must not be alarmed if you find her sleep lasting far beyond the natural time. That sleep is a better remedy than any I can give, and nothing must disturb it. All our art can accomplish is to watch her—to help her with stimulants from time to time—and to wait for what Nature will do."

"Must she remain here? Is there no hope of our being able to move her to a better place?"

"No hope whatever for the present. She has already been disturbed, as I understand, and she is seriously the worse for it. Even if she gets better, even if she comes to herself again, it would still be a dangerous experiment to move her too soon—the least excitement or alarm would be fatal to her. You must make the best of this place as it is. The landlady has my directions, and I will send a good nurse to help her. There is nothing more to be done. So far as her life can be said to be in any human hands, it is as much in your hands now as in mine. Every thing depends on the care that is taken of her, under your direction, in this house." With those farewell words he rose and quitted the room.

Left by himself, Kirke walked to the door of communication, and knocking at it softly, told the landlady he wished to speak with her.

He was far more composed, far more like his own resolute self, after his interview with the doctor than he had been before it. A man living in the artificial social atmosphere which this man had never breathed would have felt painfully the worldly side of the situation—its novelty and strangeness, the serious present difficulty in which it placed him, the numberless misinterpretations in the future to which it might lead. Kirke never gave the situation a thought. He saw nothing but the duty it claimed from him—a duty which the doctor's farewell words had put plainly before his mind. Every thing depended on the care taken of her, under his direction, in that house. There was his responsibility, and he unconsciously acted under it exactly as he would have acted in a case of emergency with women and children on board his own ship. He questioned the landlady in short, sharp sentences; the only change in him was in the lowered tone of his voice, and in the anxious looks which he cast, from time to time, at the room where she lay.

"Do you understand what the doctor has told you?"

"Yes, Sir."

"The house must be kept quiet. Who lives in the house?"

"Only me and my daughter, Sir; we live in the parlors. Times have gone badly with us since Lady-Day. Both the rooms above this are to let."

"I will take them both, and the two rooms down here as well. Do you know of any active, trust-worthy man who can run on errands for me?"

"Yes, Sir. Shall I go—?"

"No. Let your daughter go. You must not leave the house till the nurse comes. Don't send the messenger up here. Men of that sort tread heavily. I'll go down and speak to him at the door."

He went down when the messenger came, and sent him first to purchase pen, ink, and paper. The man's next errand dispatched him to make inquiries for a person who could provide for deadening the sound of passing wheels in the street by laying down tan before the house in the usual way. This object accomplished, the messenger received two letters to post. The first was addressed to Kirke's brother-in-law. It told him, in few and plain words, what had happened, and left him to break the news to his wife as he thought best. The second letter was directed to the landlord of the Aldborough Hotel. Magdalen's assumed name at North Shingles was the only name by which Kirke knew her; and the one chance of tracing her relatives that he could discern was the chance of discovering her reputed uncle and aunt by means of inquiries starting from Aldborough.

Toward the close of the afternoon a decent, middle-aged woman came to the house with a letter from Mr. Merrick. She was well known to the doctor as a trust-worthy and careful person, who had nursed his own wife; and she would be assisted, from time to time, by a lady, who was a member of a religious Sisterhood in the district, and whose compassionate interest had been warmly aroused in the case. Toward eight o'clock that evening the doctor himself would call, and see that his patient wanted for nothing.

The arrival of the nurse, and the relief of knowing that she was to be trusted, left Kirke free to think of himself. His luggage was ready packed for his contemplated journey to Suffolk the next day. It was merely necessary to transport it from the hotel to the house in Aaron's Buildings.

He stopped once only on his way to the hotel to look at a toy-shop in one of the great thoroughfares. The miniature ships in the window reminded him of his nephew. "My little namesake will be sadly disappointed at not seeing me to-morrow," he thought. "I must make it up to the boy by sending him something from his uncle." He went into the shop and bought one of the ships. It was secured in a box, and packed and directed in his presence. He put a card on the deck of the miniature vessel before the cover of the box was nailed on bearing this inscription: "A ship for the little sailor—with the big sailor's love." "Children like to be written to, ma'am," he said, apologetically, to the woman behind the counter. "Send the box as soon as you can. I am anxious the boy should get it to-morrow."

Toward the dusk of the evening he returned with his luggage to Aaron's Buildings. He took off his boots in the passage, and carried his trunk up stairs himself, stopping, as he passed the first floor, to make his inquiries. Mr. Merrick was present to answer them.

"She was awake, and wandering," he said, "a few minutes since. But we have succeeded in composing her, and she is sleeping now."

"Have no words escaped her, Sir, which might help us to find her friends?"

The doctor shook his head.

"Weeks and weeks may pass yet," he said, "and that poor girl's story may still be a sealed secret to all of us. We can only wait."

So the day ended—the first of many days that were to come.

CHAPTER II.

The warm sunlight of July shining softly through a green blind; an open window with fresh flowers set on the sill; a strange bed in a strange room; a giant figure of the female sex (like a dream of Mrs. Wragge) towering aloft on one side of the bed, and trying to clap its hands; another woman (a stranger) stopping the hands before they could make any noise; a mild expostulating voice (like a dream of Mrs. Wragge again) breaking the silence in these words: "She knows me, ma'am, she knows me; if I mustn't be happy, it will be the death of me!"—such were the first sights, such were the first sounds to which, after six weeks of oblivion, Magdalen suddenly and strangely awoke.

After a little the sights grew dim again, and the sounds sank into silence. Sleep, the merciful, took her once more, and hushed her back to repose.

Another day and the sights were clearer, the sounds were louder. Another, and she heard a man's voice, through the door, asking for news from the sick-room. The voice was strange to her; it was always cautiously lowered to the same quiet tone. It inquired after her in the morning when she woke, at noon when she took her refreshment, in the evening before she dropped to sleep again. "Who is so anxious about me?" That was the first thought her mind was strong enough to form: "Who is so anxious about me?"

More days—and she could speak to the nurse at her bedside; she could answer the questions of an elderly man, who knew far more about her than she knew about herself, and who told her he was Mr. Merrick, the doctor; she could sit up in bed, supported by pillows, wondering what had happened to her, and where she was; she could feel a growing curiosity about that quiet voice, which still asked after her, morning, noon, and night, on the other side of the door.

Another day's delay—and Mr. Merrick asked her if she was strong enough to see an old friend. A meek voice, behind him, articulating high in the air, said, "It's only me!" The voice was followed by the prodigious bodily apparition of Mrs. Wragge, with her cap all awry, and one of her shoes in the next room. "Oh, look at her! look at her!" cried Mrs. Wragge, in an ecstasy, dropping on her knees at Magdalen's bedside, with a thump that shook the house. "Bless her heart, she's well enough to laugh at me already. 'Cheer, boys, cheer—!' I beg your pardon, doctor, my conduct isn't lady-like, I know. It's my head, Sir; it isn't me. I must get vent somehow or my head will burst!" No coherent sentence, in answer to any sort of question put to her, could be extracted that morning from Mrs. Wragge. She rose from one climax of verbal confusion to another—and finished her visit, under the bed, groping inscrutably for the second shoe.

The morrow came, and Mr. Merrick promised that she should see another old friend on the next day. In the evening, when the inquiring voice asked after her, as usual, and when the door was opened a few inches to give the reply, she answered faintly for herself: "I am better, thank you." There was a moment of silence; and then, just as the door was shut again, the voice sank to a whisper, and said, fervently, "Thank God!" Who was he? She had asked them all, and no one would tell her. Who was he?

The next day came, and she heard her door opened softly. Brisk footsteps tripped into the room; a lithe little figure advanced to the bedside. Was it a dream again? No! There he was in his own evergreen reality, with the copious flow of language pouring smoothly from his lips; with the lambent dash of humor twinkling in his parti-colored eyes, there he was, more audacious, more persuasive, more respectable than ever; in a suit of glossy black, with a speckless white cravat, and a rampant shirt-frill—the unblushing, the invincible, the unchangeable Wragge!

"Not a word, my dear girl!" said the captain, seating himself comfortably at the bedside, in his old confidential way. "I am to do all the talking; and I think you will own that a more competent man for the purpose could not possibly have been found. I am really delighted—honestly delighted, if I may use such an apparently inappropriate word—to see you again, and to see you getting well. I have often thought of you; I have often missed you; I have often said to myself—never mind what! Clear the stage, and drop the curtain on the past. Dum vivimus, vivamus! Pardon the pedantry of a Latin quotation, my dear, and tell me how I look. Am I, or am I not, the picture of a prosperous man?"

Magdalen attempted to answer him. The captain's deluge of words flowed over her again in a moment.

"Don't exert yourself," he said. "I'll put all your questions for you. What have I been about? Why do I look so remarkably well off? And how in the world did I find my way to this house? My dear girl, I have been occupied, since we last saw each other, in slightly modifying my old professional habits. I have shifted from Moral Agriculture to Medical Agriculture. Formerly I preyed on the public sympathy; now I prey on the public stomach. Stomach and sympathy, sympathy and stomach—look them both fairly in the face when you reach the wrong side of fifty, and you will agree with me that they come to much the same thing. However that may be, here I am—incredible as it may appear—a man with an income, at last. The founders of my fortune are three in number. Their names are Aloes, Scammony, and Gamboge. In plainer words, I am now living—on a Pill. I made a little money (if you remember) by my friendly connection with you. I made a little more by the happy decease (Requiescat in Pace!) of that female relative of Mrs. Wragge's from whom, as I told you, my wife had expectations. Very good. What do you think I did? I invested the whole of my capital, at one fell swoop, in advertisements, and purchased my drugs and my pill-boxes on credit. The result is now before you. Here I am, a Grand Financial Fact. Here I am, with my clothes positively paid for; with a balance at my banker's; with my servant in livery, and my gig at the door; solvent, flourishing, popular—and all on a Pill."

Magdalen smiled. The captain's face assumed an expression of mock gravity: he looked as if there was a serious side to the question, and as if he meant to put it next.

"It's no laughing matter to the public, my dear," he said. "They can't get rid of me and my Pill—they must take us. There is not a single form of appeal in the whole range of human advertisement which I am not making to the unfortunate public at this moment. Hire the last new novel—there I am, inside the boards of the book. Send for the last new Song—the instant you open the leaves I drop out of it. Take a cab—I fly in at the window in red. Buy a box of tooth-powder at the chemist's—I wrap it up for you in blue. Show yourself at the theatre—I flutter down on you in yellow. The mere titles of my advertisements are quite irresistible. Let me quote a few from last week's issue. Proverbial Title: 'A Pill in Time saves Nine.' Familiar Title: 'Excuse me, how is your Stomach?' Patriotic Title: 'What are the three characteristics of a true-born Englishman? His Hearth, his Home, and his Pill.' Title in the form of a nursery dialogue: 'Mamma, I am not well.' 'What is the matter, my pet?' 'I want a little Pill.' Title in the form of a Historical Anecdote: 'New Discovery in the Mine of English History. When the Princes were smothered in the Tower, their faithful attendant collected all the little possessions left behind them. Among the touching trifles dear to the poor boys he found a tiny Box. It contained the Pill of the Period. Is it necessary to say how inferior that Pill was to its Modern Successor, which prince and peasant alike may now obtain—' Et cetera, et cetera. The place in which my Pill is made is an advertisement in itself. I have got one of the largest shops in London. Behind one counter (visible to the public through the lucid medium of plate-glass) are four-and-twenty young men, in white aprons, making the Pill. Behind another counter are four-and-twenty young men, in white cravats, making the boxes. At the bottom of the shop are three elderly accountants posting the vast financial transactions accruing from the Pill in three enormous ledgers. Over the door are my name, portrait, and autograph, expanded to colossal proportions, and surrounded, in flowing letters, by the motto of the establishment: 'Down with the Doctors!' Even Mrs. Wragge contributes her quota to this prodigious enterprise. She is the celebrated woman whom I have cured of indescribable agonies from every complaint under the sun. Her portrait is engraved on all the wrappers, with the following inscription beneath it: 'Before she took the Pill you might have blown this patient away with a feather. Look at her now!!!' Last, not least, my dear girl, the Pill is the cause of my finding my way to this house. My department in the prodigious Enterprise already mentioned is to scour the United Kingdom in a gig, establishing Agencies every where. While founding one of these Agencies I heard of a certain friend of mine, who had lately landed in England after a long sea voyage. I got his address in London—he was a lodger in this house. I called on him forthwith, and was stunned by the news of your illness. Such, in brief, is the history of my existing connection with British Medicine; and so it happens that you see me at the present moment, sitting in the present chair, now as ever, yours truly, Horatio Wragge."

In these terms the captain brought his personal statement to a close. He looked more and more attentively at Magdalen the nearer he got to the conclusion. Was there some latent importance attaching to his last words which did not appear on the face of them? There was. His visit to the sick-room had a serious object, and that object he had now approached.

In describing the circumstances under which he had become acquainted with Magdalen's present position Captain Wragge had skirted, with his customary dexterity, round the remote boundaries of truth. Emboldened by the absence of any public scandal in connection with Noel Vanstone's marriage, or with the event of his death as announced in the newspaper obituary, the captain, roaming the eastern circuit, had ventured back to Aldborough, a fortnight since, to establish an agency there for the sale of his wonderful Pill. No one had recognized him but the landlady of the hotel, who at once insisted on his entering the house and reading Kirke's letter to her husband. The same night Captain Wragge was in London, and was closeted with the sailor, in the second-floor room at Aaron's Buildings.

The serious nature of the situation, the indisputable certainty that Kirke must fail in tracing Magdalen's friends, unless he first knew who she really was, had decided the captain on disclosing part, at least, of the truth. Declining to enter into any particulars—for family reasons, which Magdalen might explain on her recovery, if she pleased—he astounded Kirke by telling him that the friendless woman whom he had rescued, and whom he had only known, up to that moment, as Miss Bygrave, was no other than the youngest daughter of Andrew Vanstone. The disclosure, on Kirke's side, of his father's connection with the young officer in Canada, had followed naturally on the revelation of Magdalen's real name. Captain Wragge had expressed his surprise, but had made no further remark at the time. A fortnight later, however, when the patient's recovery forced the serious difficulty on the doctor of meeting the questions which Magdalen was sure to ask, the captain's ingenuity had come, as usual, to the rescue.

"You can't tell her the truth," he said, "without awakening painful recollections of her stay at Aldborough, into which I am not at liberty to enter. Don't acknowledge, just yet, that Mr. Kirke only knew her as Miss Bygrave of North Shingles when he found her in this house. Tell her boldly that he knew who she was, and that he felt (what she must feel) that he had a hereditary right to help and protect her, as his father's son. I am, as I have already told you," continued the captain, sticking fast to his old assertion, "a distant relative of the Combe-Raven family; and if there is nobody else at hand to help you through this difficulty, my services are freely at your disposal."

No one else was at hand, and the emergency was a serious one. Strangers undertaking the responsibility might ignorantly jar on past recollections, which it would, perhaps, be the death of her to revive too soon. Near relatives might, by their premature appearance at the bedside, produce the same deplorable result. The alternative lay between irritating and alarming her by leaving her inquiries unanswered, or trusting Captain Wragge. In the doctor's opinion, the second risk was the least serious risk of the two; and the captain was now seated at Magdalen's bedside in discharge of the trust confided to him.

Would she ask the question which it had been the private object of all Captain Wragge's preliminary talk lightly and pleasantly to provoke? Yes: as soon as his silence gave her the opportunity she asked it: Who was that friend of his living in the house?

"You ought by rights to know him as well as I do," said the captain. "He is the son of one of your father's old military friends, when your father was quartered with his regiment in Canada. Your cheeks mustn't flush up. If they do, I shall go away."

She was astonished, but not agitated. Captain Wragge had begun by interesting her in the remote past, which she only knew by hearsay, before he ventured on the delicate ground of her own experience.

In a moment more she advanced to her next question: What was his name?

"Kirke," proceeded the captain. "Did you never hear of his father, Major Kirke, commanding officer of the regiment in Canada? Did you never hear that the major helped your father through a great difficulty, like the best of good fellows and good friends?"

Yes; she faintly fancied she had heard something about her father and an officer who had once been very good to him when he was a young man. But she could not look back so long. Was Mr. Kirke poor?

Even Captain Wragge's penetration was puzzled by that question. He gave the true answer at hazard. "No," he said, "not poor."

Her next inquiry showed what she had been thinking of. If Mr. Kirke was not poor, why did he come to live in that house?

"She has caught me!" thought the captain. "There is only one way out of it; I must administer another dose of truth. Mr. Kirke has covered your family's chance," he proceeded aloud, "very ill, and not nicely attended to. Somebody was wanted to take care of you while you were out and to take care of yourself. Why not Mr. Kirke? He was the son of your father's old friend, which is the next thing to being one's old friend. Who had a better claim to send for the right doctor and get the right nurse when I was not here to care you with my wonderful Pill? Gently! gently! you mustn't take hold of my superfine black coat sleeve in that unceremonious manner."

He put her hand back on the bed; but she was not to be checked in that way. She persisted in asking another question. Had Mr. Kirke come here? She had never seen him; she had never heard of him in her life.

"Very likely," said the captain. "But your never having seen him is no reason why he should not have seen you."

"When did he see me?"

Captain Wragge curbed up his doses of truth on the spot without a moment's hesitation.

"Some time ago, my dear. I can't exactly say when."

"Only once?"

Captain Wragge suddenly saw his way to the administration of another dose. "Yes," he said. "Only once."

She relapsed into silence. The next question involved the simultaneous expression of two ideas —and the next question cost her an effort.

"He only saw me once," she said; "and he only saw me some time ago. How came he to remember me when he found me here?"

"Ah!" said the captain. "Now you have hit the right nail on the head at last. You can't possibly be more surprised at his remembering you than I am. A word of advice, my dear. When you are well enough to get up and see Mr. Kirke, try how that sharp question of yours sounds to him—and insist on his answering it himself." Slipping out of the dilemma in that characteristically adroit manner, Captain Wragge got briskly on his legs again and took up his hat.

"Wait!" she pleaded. "I want to ask you—"

"Not another word," said the captain. "I am quite sure you have enough to think of for one day. My time is up, and my gig is waiting for me. I am off to scour the country as usual. I am off to animate the field of philanthropy with the triple plowshare of aloes, seamonny and gamboge." He stopped, and turned round at the door. "By-the-by, a message about your unfortunate wife. If you will allow her to come and see you again, Mrs. Wragge solemnly promises not to lose sight of you next time. Good-by, love. What do you say? May she come?"

"Yes; whenever she likes," said Magdalen.

"If I ever get well again may poor Mrs. Wragge come and stay with me?"

"Certainly, my dear. If you have no objection I should like her beforehand with a few thousand impressions in red, blue, and yellow of her own portrait ('You might have blown this unhappy man with a feather before he took the Pill. Look at her now!'). She is sure to drop herself about perpetually wherever she goes, and is naturally gratifying vanity in an advertising point of view, must inevitably follow. Don't think me mercenary. I merely understand the art I live in." He turned once more away out, for the second time, and turned round once more at the door. "You have been a remarkably good girl," he said, "and you ought to be rewarded for it. I'll give you a last piece of information before I go. Have you heard any bells ringing about you, for the last day or two, outside your door? Ah, I see you have. A word in your ear, my dear. That's Mr. Kirke. He rings the bell from the bedside as regularly as ever. Magdalen heard him advertising himself to the nurse before he closed the door. "If you are not out about it," he said, in a confidential whisper, "the name is Wragge; and the Pill is to be had in neat boxes, price thirteen pence halfpenny, government stamp included. Take a few copies of the portrait of a female patient whom you might have blown away with a feather before she took the Pill, and whom you are simply requested to contemplate now. Many thanks. Good-morning."

The door closed and Magdalen was alone again. She felt no sense of solitude. Captain Wragge had left her with something more than a cure of Hour after hour her mind dwelt wonderingly on Mr. Kirke until the evening came and she heard his voice again through the half-opened door.

"I am very grateful," she said to him, before the nurse could answer his inquiries—"very, very grateful for all your kindness to me."

"If you get well," he replied, kindly, "you will more than reward me if you try to get well."

The next morning Mr. Merrick found her impatient to leave her bed and be moved to the sofa in the front room. The doctor said the suggested the wanted a change. "Yes," she replied, "I want to see Mr. Kirke." The doctor consented to move her on the next day, but he positively forbade the additional excitement of seeing any body until the day after. She attempted a remonstrance—Mr. Merrick was impenetrable. She tried to win him over—he was proof. Her impersonation—the nurse was impenetrable too.

On the next day they wrapped her in shawls and carried her in to the sofa and made her a little bed on it. On the table near at hand were some flowers and a number of an illustrated newspaper. She immediately asked who had put them there. The nurse (failing to notice a warning look from the doctor) said Mr. Kirke had thought that she might like the flowers, and that the pictures in the paper might amuse her. After that reply her anxiety to see Mr. Kirke became too ungovernable to be trifled with. The doctor left the room at once for Mr. Kirke.

She looked eagerly at the opening door. Her first glance at him as he came in raised a doubt in her mind whether she now saw that tall figure and that open sun-burnt face for the first time. But she was too weak and too agitated to follow her recollections far back in Aldborough. She resigned the attempt and only looked at him. He stopped at the foot of the sofa and said a few hearing words in a voice which she had never hearer, and offered him her wasted hand. He tenderly took it in his and sat down by her, but they were both silent. She could not look for sorrow and the sympathy which his silence would fain have concealed. She still held his hand—unconsciously now—persistently as he had held it on the day when he found her. Her eyes closed after a vain effort to speak to him, and the tears rolled slowly over her white cheeks.

The doctor signed to Kirke to wait and give her time. She recovered a little and looked at him. "Tell me about yourself," she said, in a murmured. "And how little I have deserved it!"

"Hush! hush!" he said. "You don't know what a happiness it was to me to help you."

She sound of his voice seemed to strengthen her, and gave her courage. She looked gratefully at him with an eager interest, with a gratitude which artlessly ignored all the conventional restraints that separate the sick woman from the man. "Where did you see me," she said, suddenly, "before you found me here?"

Kirke hesitated. Mr. Merrick came to his assistance.

"I forbid you to say a word about the past to Mr. Kirke," interposed the doctor. "You have had Mr. Kirke to say a word about it to you. You are beginning a new life to-day; and the only recollections I sanction are recollections five minutes old."

She looked at the doctor and smiled. "I must ask him one question," she said, and turned back again to Kirke. "Is it true that you had only seen me once before you came to this house?"

"Quite true!" He made the reply with a sudden change of color, which she instantly detected. She, perhaps, would have noticed it more earnestly than ever, as she put her next question:

"How came you to remember me, after only seeing me once?"

His hand unconsciously closed on hers, and he paused for the first time. He attempted an answer, and hesitated at the first word. "I have a good memory," he said at last, and suddenly looked away from her face. He was evidently a strangely unlike his customary self-possession of manner that the doctor and the nurse both noticed it.

Every nerve in her body felt that momentary pressure of his hand with the exquisite susceptibility which every sensation has in the delicate balance on the way to health. She looked at his changing color, she listened to his hesitating words with every pulse in her throbbing body; and age quickened to seize intuitively on the truth. In the moment when he looked away from her she read his face, she heard his voice, and turned her head aside on the pillow. "Can it be?" she thought, with a flutter of delicious fear that beat high with a glow of delicious confusion burning on her cheeks. "Can it be?"

The doctor made another sign to Kirke. He understood it, and rose immediately. The momentary discomposure in his face and manner had both disappeared. He was satisfied in his own mind that he had not betrayed his secret, and in the relief of feeling that conviction he had become himself again.

"Good-by, till to-morrow," he said, as he left the room.

"Good-by," she answered, softly, without looking at him.

Mr. Merrick took the chair which Kirke had resigned and laid his hand on her pulse. "Just five hours' fasted," remarked the doctor; "too quick by half."

She petulantly snatched away her wrist. "Don't bother me!" she thinking from him. "Pray don't touch me!"

Mr. Merrick good-humoredly gave up his place to the nurse. "I'll return in half an hour," he whispered, "and carry her back to bed. Don't let her talk. Show her the pictures in the newspaper, and keep her quiet if you can."

When the doctor returned the nurse reported that the newspaper had not been wanted. The patient's attention, she said, had wandered, and had not been at all restless, and she had never spoken a word.

The days passed; and the time grew longer and longer which the doctor allowed her to spend in the front room. As soon as she was able to dispense with the bed on the sofa—she could be dressed, and could sit up, supported by pillows, in an arm-chair. Her long convalescence from the bedroom represented the great daily events of her life. They were the hours she passed in Kirke's society.

She had a double interest in him now—her interest in the man whose protecting care had saved her reason and her life; her interest in the man whose heart's dearest and deepest secret she had surprised. Day after day they grew as easy and familiar with each other as old friends; little by little she presumed on all her privileges, and wound her way unsuspected into the most intimate knowledge of his nature.

Her questions were endless. Every thing that he could tell her of himself and his life she drew from him, delicately and insensibly; he, the least self-conscious of mankind, became an egotist in her dextrous hands. She found out his pride in his ship, and practiced on it without remorse. She drew him into talking of the fine qualities of the vessel, of the great things the vessel had done in encounters with the sea-gales; and his life talked yet to any living creature on shore. She found him out in private sea-faring anxieties and unutterable sea-faring exultations, which he had kept a secret from his own mate. She watched his kindling face with a delicious sense of retaining in silence for her ear alone. She stopped him into forgetting all considerations of time and place, and striking as hearty a stroke on the Aldcastry Mill lodging-house table, in the fervor of his talk, as if his hand had descended on the solid bulwark of his ship. His confusion at the discovery of his own foolishness scarcely displighted her: she could have cried with pleasure when he penitently wondered what he could possibly have been thinking of.

At other times she drew him from dwelling on the pleasures of his life, and led him into talking of its perils—from the time when she made mistress the sea, which had absorbed so much of his existence, which had kept him so strangely remote and so strangely near to the world on shore. Twice he had been shipwrecked. Times innumerable he and all with him had been threatened with death, and had escaped their doom by the narrowness of a hair's-breadth. He was always unwilling, at the outset, to speak of this dark and dreadful side of his life; but he was only adroitly tempting him, by laying little snares for him in his talk, that she lured him into telling more of the escapes of his second days. She set him going to him with a breathless interest, looking at him with a breathless wonder, as those fearful scenes—one after another—in the dangerous language in which he told them—fell, one by one, from his lips. His noble unconsciousness of his own heroism—his modesty about the skill which he described his own acts of dauntless endurance and devoted courage, without an idea that they were any thing but the common duty of every man to which he was bound by the vocation that he followed—raised him to a place in her estimation to hopeless distance. Her fear that she became un easy and impatient until she had pulled down the idol again which he herself had set up. It was on these occasions that the most rigid self-exactest from him all those little familiar attentions so precious to women in their intercourse with men.

This last fault—if fault it might be—was a supreme delight in secretly following the indulgence while he was close to her—this hand that has rescued from the drowning now is shifting my pillows so tenderly that I hardly know when they are moved. This hand that has seized men mad with mania and held them down by sheer duty by main force, is mixing my lemonade and peeling my fruit more delicately and more neatly than I could do it myself. Oh, if I could be a man, how I should like to be such a man as this!"

She never allowed her thoughts, while she was in his presence, to lead her beyond that point. It was only when the night had separated them that she ventured to let her mind dwell on the self-sacrificing devotion which had so mercifully rescued her. Kirke little knew how she thought of him, in the secrecy of her own chamber, during the quiet hours that elapsed before she sunk to sleep. No suspicion crossed his mind of the influence which the recurring events of her—of the new spirit which he was breathing into that new life, so sensitively open to impression in the first freshness of returning sense! "She has nobody else to amuse her, poor thing!" he used to think, sadly, sitting alone in his small second-floor room. "I suppose I follow him as much as quite the weary hours, till her friends come here, she is heartily welcome to all that I can tell her."

He was not the only guilty and restless one whom ever he was by himself. Little by little, he fell into a habit of taking long lonely walks at night. Mrs. Magdalen thought he was going down stairs. Once he went away abruptly in the daytime—on business, as he said. Something had caused him uneasiness, and himself he was going before, which had let him into telling him her age. "Twenty, last birthday," he thought. "Take twenty from forty-one! I ought to say something in subtraction—as easy a sum as my little nephew could wish for." He walked to the Docks, and looked bitterly at the shipping. "I mustn't forget how a ship is made," he said. "It won't be long before I am back at the old work again." So he knew his own heart, and paid a visit to a bench ear-sailor, a married man. In the course of conversation, he asked how much older his friend might be than his pretty wife. "Twenty was six years' difference between them." "I suppose that's difference enough?" said Kirke. "Yes," said his friend, "quite enough." Are you looking out for a wife, at last? Try a seasoned woman of thirty-five: that's your mark, Kirke, as near as I can calculate."

The time passed smoothly and quickly—the present time, in which she was recovering so happily—the present time, which he was beginning to distrust already.

Early one morning Mr. Merrick surprised Kirke by a visit in his little room on the second floor.

"I came to the conclusion yesterday," said the doctor, entering abruptly on his business, "that our patient was strong enough to gossip us, at last, in running all risks, and commence acting with her friends; and I have accordingly followed the example of Captain Wragge, Mrs. Wragge, put into our hands. You remember he advised us to apply to Mr. Pendril, the lawyer? I saw Mr. Pendril two days ago, and was referred by him—not over-willingly, as I thought—to a lady, named Miss Garth. I heard enough from her to satisfy me that we have exercised a wise caution in acting as we have done. It is a very, very sad story—and I am bound to say, that I, for one, make great allowances for the poor girl down stairs. Her only relation in the world is her elder sister. I have discovered that the sister shall write to her in the first instance—and then, if the letter does her no harm, she shall see her sister to-morrow. I have not given the address, by way of preventing any visits from being paid here without my permission. All I have done is to prepare the first forward the letter; and I shall probably find it at my house when I get back. Can you stop at home until then, my man with the beard? There is not the least hope of my being able to bring it myself. All you need do is to watch for an opportunity when she is not in the front room, and to put the letter where she can see it when she comes in. The handwriting on the address will break the news before she opens the letter. Say nothing to her about it—take care that the landlady is within call—and leave the rest to herself. I know I can depend on you to follow my directions; and that is why I ask you to do us this service. You look out of spirits this morning. Natural enough. You don't need to plead hard for a cousin, and you're beginning to pine to this close prison!"

"May I ask a question, doctor? Is she pining in this close place, too? When her sister comes, will her sister take her away?"

"Decidedly—if my advice be followed. She will be well enough to be moved in a week or two. Good-day, my dear fellow; early out of spirits, and your hand feels feverish. Pining for the blue water, captain—pining for the blue water?" With that expression of opinion the doctor cheerfully went out.

In an hour the letter arrived. Kirke took it from the landlady's hand, and closed his door softly, without looking at it. Having understood that Magdalen was still engaged at her toilet, and having ascertained that the bustling nurse-sister of remaining within call, he went down stairs immediately and put the letter on the table in the front room.

Magdalen heard the sound of the familiar step on the floor. "I shall soon be ready," she called to him through the door.

He made no reply—he took his hat and went out. After a momentary hesitation he turned his face eastward and called on the ship-owners who employed him, at their office in Cornhill.

THE EXECUTION OF THE MINNESOTA INDIANS.

On page 37 we give an illustration of THE EXECUTION OF THIRTY-EIGHT INDIAN MURDERERS, which took place at Mankato, Minnesota, on 26th ult. The scene selected for it by Mr. St. Peter, for the sketch we have reproduced. The St. Paul Press says:

The gallows stood upon the high street close in front of the levee. It is estimated that not less than four thousand people, exclusive of the military, were in attendance. The gallows was a double affair, in a row of twelve posts. Four less on each angle, sufficient to execute ten on each side. A square was formed around the gallows by the military, and the citizens occupied the land on the river. The drop fell at 10 o'clock, and the whole number were launched out at the same moment before the Great Spirit to answer for their inhuman butcheries.

Upon leaving the state building the condemned set up the death song and kept it up all the way to the gallows.

While the soldiers were at work upon the gallows a Roman Catholic priest, who was present with the condemned, had asked the privilege of "driving one nail." The request was granted, and he drove a nail in a post of the gallows. The soldier handed him his hammer and a nail, and told him where to drive. The nail driven, the priest took into a chair of the platform, thanked the soldier, and descended to the ground.

William J. Duley, who had half his family massacred at Lake Shetek, was assigned to the duty of adjusting and cutting the rope. Another man offered five dollars for the privilege.

At precisely 10 o'clock the condemned were marshaled in a procession, and the death song resumed. They passed out into the street, and directly upon through files of citizens to the scaffold, which had been erected, and which were delivered to the Officer of the DAY, Captain Burt. They mounted the platform, and ranged themselves in a row, standing each over to be shaved, just like a lot of hungry horse-jockeys before the A. T. Stewart's door. Each one was provided by their quarter-stacked arms and followed them, and, when the arms were taken away, by their supporters, etc.

When they commenced the arrest of the scaffold, the death song was again started, and when they had all come up, the noise ceased, and were left to their own devices. The pandemonium had broken loose. It had a wonderful effect upon the Indian visages. Every one of them had been given a clear by one of the reporters, just before they were executed, and the contrast between the two pictures, setting away very coolly during the intervals of the interview. "He-ye-tu-ma-za," and others, who had put on a brave look over his face, he mashed it to get it over his mouth and smear. Another was smoking a pipe, and he took it out of his mouth, and threw the mouthful over the people of each, by Captain Libby, all who ready for the final signal.

The drop fell at 10 minutes past 10 o'clock. A painful and breathless suspense had the next minute. The Indians fell through, and were launched into eternity. Three died, measured, and distinct falls—the others fell through, and their struggles were brief. The signal officer, and the rope was cut by Mr. Duley, the assisted fell, and thirty-nine fellows below knew the difference between heaven and earth. One of the ropes was broken by the fall, and the affair brought to a halt. The executioner fell at a quarter past ten o'clock, and in twenty minutes the bodies had all been examined by Surgeon Le Poussier, Surgeon Finch, Clark, and others, and life pronounced extinct.

The bodies were then cut down, placed in four army wagons, and in charge of Company C, Sixth Regiment, and under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Marshall, and the whole procession moved off in the direction of the lower end of the town, nearly in front of the town.

THE WAR IN THE

WEST.—[See Page 42.]

THE WAR IN THE BORDER STATES.

WE illustrate on pages 40 and 41 THE WAR IN THE SOUTH-WEST.

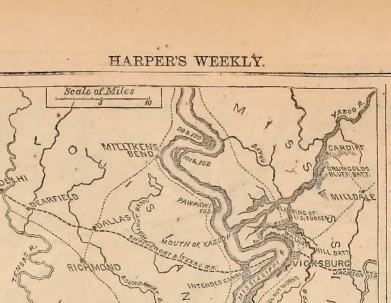
On the left hand, we see some of our Union troops passing through a Border State town. Not a store is open; no vehicles are encountered by them in their march; there is no hurry and bustle of business; all seems to bear evidence of the rebels having hastily left and taken with them every sign of life. One might fancy that not a soul had remained, until some of the concealed inmates, seeing that our errand is not plunder, or murder, or cruelty, emerge from cellars and other hiding-places, and gather courage to beg, in heart-rending tones of despair, for something, be it ever so little, to appease their gnawing hunger. Our gallant soldiers, though not provided with more than sufficient for themselves, can not witness such suffering, nor listen to that plaintive appeal without responding to it. Each gives all he can spare, and blessings are invoked upon their kind hearts. Oh! it is pitiful to see the little children clutch at the hard crust and devour it as eagerly as if it were the daintiest morsel, and delicate women, not accustomed to every luxury, now bereft of every thing but a few rags scarce enough to cover them. But the soldiers' power to alleviate their distress is very limited, and the best they can do goes a very little way. They march on with their memory full of what they have just seen, and the cries of misery ringing in their ears.

On the right hand are the ruins of one of the houses of a town that has been recently bombarded. Others are also visible which have escaped complete destruction, but still bear mournful evidence of what they have undergone. Scarcely a window is left in any of the dwellings; and the church-spire is pierced with many a hole. It looks almost like the ghost of a town—a mere spectre of what it once was. In the fore-ground we see a mother and her two children mourning over a body—her husband, and which she recognizes as that of her husband. She came forth from the place of concealment where he so carefully put her and the little ones, while he thought he would go and try to save a few of the things most necessary to their comfort, and the first object which meets her gaze when she returns out, after the noise of firing has ceased, is that lifeless form. There lie lies among the smouldering ruins, for the first time deaf to the sound of his wife's lovel voice. The children call upon his name in vain; no answer comes from those dear lips, and, frightened at the silence, they shrink timidly together, awe-struck, unable to comprehend why their father lies so quiet and motionless. They look to their mother for comfort, and—heart-broken wail of anguish is the only sound which greets their ears. Fragments of shell are lying all around them, and there is scarcely one living left which they can recognize, and which could tell them that this was once their happy home.

In the corner above this a guerrilla raid is represented—the dread and horror of all the peaceful inhabitants of the country—who lay waste all within their reach, and bear away every thing of value on which they can lay their hands; who commit murder indiscriminately in order to obtain their object; and to whom an act of cruelty and outrage is a good joke. To cause the innocent to suffer, to perform deeds of unparalleled atrocity and wickedness, is their daily work.

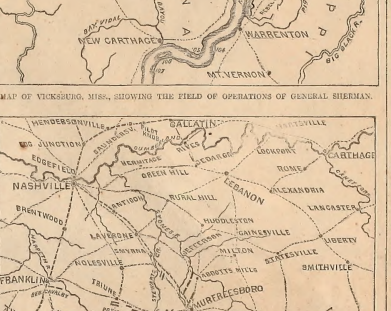
On the opposite corner a party of rebel cavalry is seen approaching, and men, women, children, and negroes are all flying from their home to the friendly woods for protection. The men would willingly stay and defend their homes to the very last; but cui bono? In no other hour did cases in which Union men have been seized, tied with ropes, and at the point of the bayonet obliged to join the rebel army?

In the lower corners the work of destruction still goes on. The left shows us a town being shelled. Once lively and prosperous, it will soon be nothing but a heap of smoking ashes. The handsome houses which once rose so proudly in air will soon be leveled to the ground. Hardly a trace of their former grandeur will be found in the blackened, unsightly ruins.



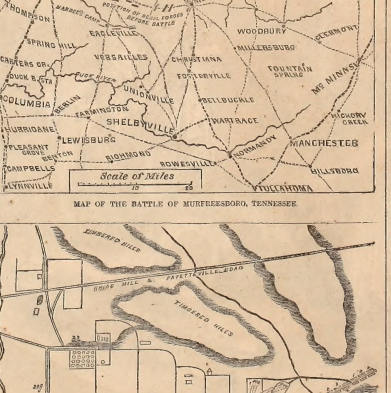
On the other side a bridge is burning; with each plank which falls helplessly into the water go the chances of communication from side to side. It is the same with railroads; one after another is destroyed, and in a country so vast as this, without such means of facilitating intercourse between one distant part and another, the work of progress and civilization ceases, education is neglected, and all advancement stops.

At the top is one of the windows of a prison. Two men are peering through the bars to pass the time away; they can just see the top of the sentry's bayonet as he slowly marches to and fro. The cause of their confinement they are told is treason, but their own reminiscences accuse them of nothing worse than having avowed their Union sentiments too loudly.



At the bottom is a planter's late residence; now there is no sign of life there save a few birds flitting about, no occasional hat, and some rats who may have their own way there undisturbed. Scenes like that bonus lying about would seem to tell of some tragedy having been enacted there, but no living voice remains to relate how it is that the place looks so desolate, and why the grass is allowed to grow in the path, and the garden to be untended and full of weeds.

Here it is, in the Border States, that the real sufferers of the war are to be found. We, in our comfortable homes, hardly form an idea of the acute distress which it entails upon the people of that section.



God grant that this terrible rebellion, with all its fearful consequences, may speedily be crushed; that our beloved country may once more be restored to peace and prosperity; that the accursed work of destruction and of wasting lives may cease; and that the wail of newly-made widows and orphans may be heard no more among us!

MAP OF VICKSBURG, MISS., SHOWING THE FIELD OF OPERATIONS OF GENERAL SHERMAN.

MAP OF THE BATTLE OF MURFREESBORO, TENNESSEE.

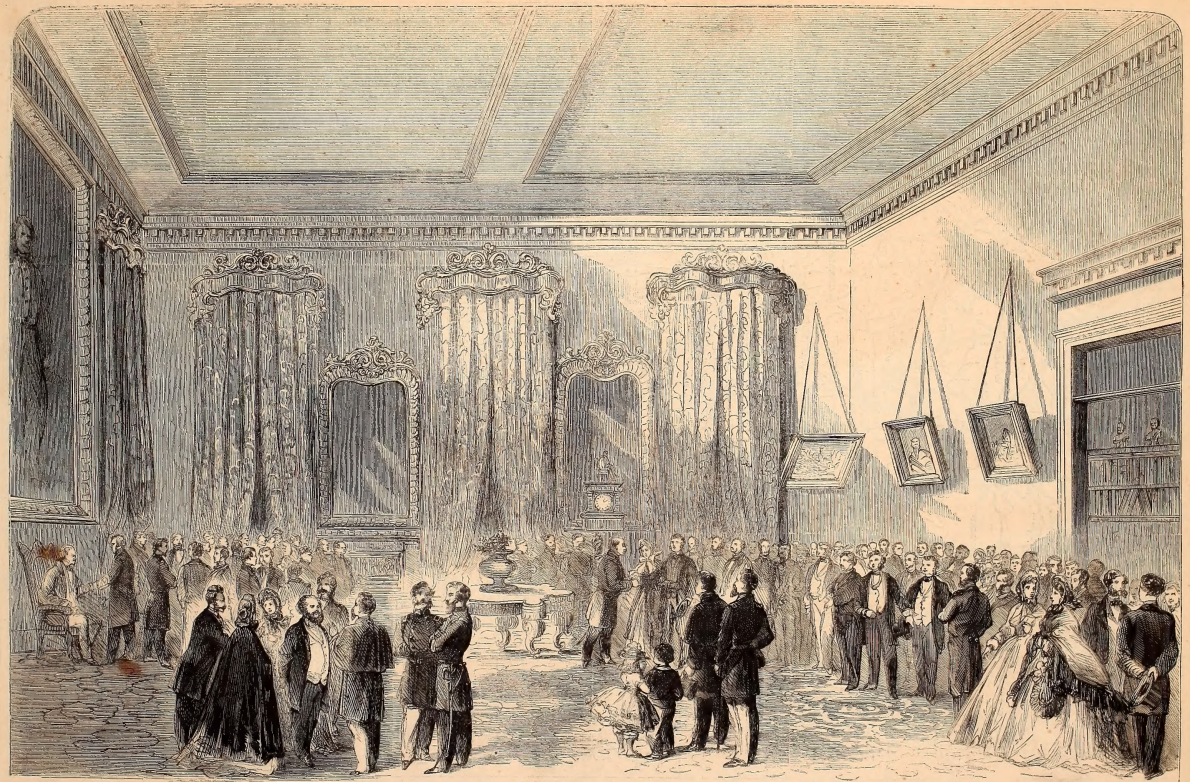
PLAN OF THE BATTLE OF PRAIRIE GROVE, ARKANSAS.—(SEE PAGE 46.)

GENERAL JOHN M'NEIL.

WE publish on page 45 a portrait of the famous GENERAL M'NEIL, whose alleged execution of ten rebels for the murder of a Union citizen of Missouri has attracted so much attention.

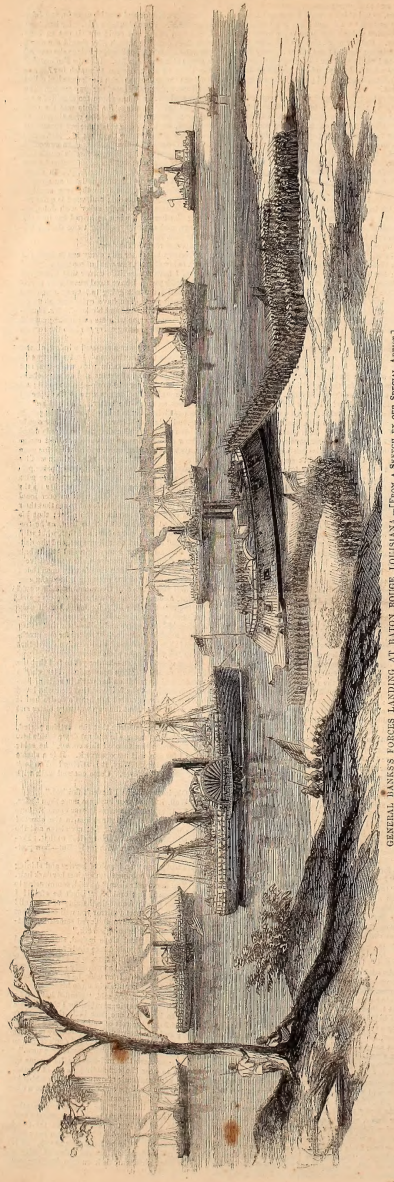
General John M'Neil was born in the British Provinces, of American parents. Emigrating at an early age to Boston, he learned the trade of a hatter, commenced business in New York, failed, and removed, twenty-five years ago, to St. Louis. There he established himself in business and made a fortune, part of which he has lost through Southern repudiation. When the rebellion broke out the rebels Price and Jackson counted upon M'Neil's support, as he was known to be a strong Democrat, and closely allied with Southern men. But the moment the gallant Lyon raised the flag of the Union at St. Louis, M'Neil was one of the first to hasten to its side, and from that hour he has never flinched.

On the 8th of May, 1861, he was sworn into the service of the Government, and fought Harris at Fulton, routing him.

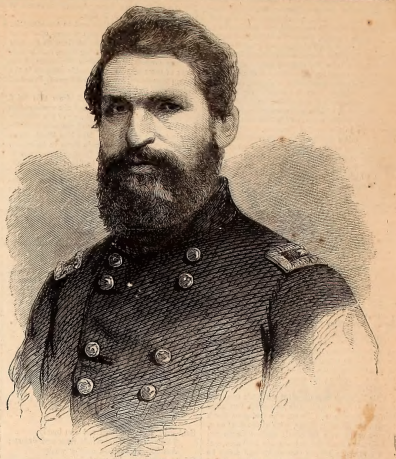


Major-General Frémont soon arrived, and one of his first acts was to put M'Neil in command of the city. He fulfilled his arduous duties with complete success; and when the Provost Marshal, General M'Kinstry, was sent to the field M'Neil was appointed his successor. Here again he gave ample evidence of his faithfulness and administrative abilities. On the 3d of August he was commissioned Colonel of the Nineteenth Missouri Volunteers—"Iron Regiment"—to which he had been designated by General Lyon, and which, in December to accept a colonelcy in the State troops, with the command of a district on the Kansas line, where he spent the winter organizing troops and protecting the Union citizens. He returned to St. Louis in the spring of 1862, and took charge of a cavalry regiment, with command of the District of Northeast Missouri. This was a very responsible post, as the locality was infested with rebel allies, and very many of the old soldiers of Price's army returned, been paroled, and were home apparently with no other motive than to deceive the Government, violate their oaths, disseminate treason, and, by secret means, incite new allies, procure supplies and equipments, and furtively labor to overthrow the Government they had thus deeply forsworn. In July there was a general uprising of the rebels in the northeast under Porter, Poindexter, and Cook. As Union man's life was safe, and robbery, arson, and robbery were of daily occurrence. On the 14th of July M'Neil moved to overtake Porter, and every where punished those who he knew had rendered this daring leader active aid, arrested the violators of parole, many of whom were captured in arms, with the certificate of the Government upon their persons, and ferreted out treason with no cessation. He pursued the main body of Porter's forces till the fall of August, and then at Kirksville, in Adair County, with only 1054 men against 3000 under Porter, fell upon him with daring impetuosity, and, after a seventy-fourth charge, utterly routed the rebels. He came out of this fight with several bullet-holes through his clothing and a severe gun-shot wound upon his thigh. As an evidence of the masterly manner in which he disposed his forces, it should be mentioned that he lost only five killed and thirty-seven wounded, while that of the enemy, as stated in the official report, was one hundred and fifty killed, nearly four hundred wounded, and forty-seven prisoners. Many of these prisoners, by their own admission, had been paroled from previous capture, on their solemn oath, under penalty of death, not again to take up arms against the Government. He carried out the orders of General Halleck regarding such doubly-damned treason, and ordered, that every Governor Gamble instantly appreciated his brilliant and faithful services, and gave him a Brigadier-General's commission as a reward.

From thence M'Neil went into what has been styled "the Gibraltar of treason," Monroe County, driving all before him. He quickly ascertained that where a Union man could not live in peace, a secessionist could not. He sold his last arrival with fire and sword, and on the 14th September attacked and broke up the last camp of rebellion in that region. He made his head-quarters at Palmyra, where he held many prisoners; a scale or more of these being the most desperately bad men among the violators of the most sacred pacts. An old man named Andrew Alleman, a true and faithful adherent to the Stars and Stripes, had just been captured by Porter, and his friends and family appeal to General M'Neil to use his power to rescue him. The General selected ten of the worst criminals he had in arrest, and immediately notified Porter and his confederates who had abducted Alleman, that if the old man was not returned to his family by the hour of October 18, the ten men who had voluntarily forfeited their lives should be executed as a penalty. The notification was extensively circulated, but the facts rolled by and the old man came not to greet his distracted family. The military edict was executed, and ten traitors paid the forfeit for the life of one good citizen, who was doubtless murdered.



A friend of the General writes: "These measures were severe, but not from the character of General M'Neil: he will receive the applause of all earnest patriots for treating treason as it deserves. The fruit of his policy is patently exhibited where he has ruled. Before his advent murders and all lesser crimes were frequent, for no fault of the sufferers except that they were true to their country and to God. Now no more peaceful, stable, and Union-abiding people are to be found than those who live in Northeast Missouri. Jefferson DAVIS is thirsting for the blood of the brave General, and his conspirators in the North are wallowing. General M'Neil, fabricating statements of his brutality, and even asserting the two-fold falsehood that the wife of Alleman petitioned that the rebels might be executed, and that she did not receive a cent returned. But he will bear such calumnies, and live to reap grateful tributes."



MAP OF MISSISSIPPI, SHOWING THE FIELD OF OPERATIONS OF GENERALS SHERMAN, GRANT, AND BANKS.

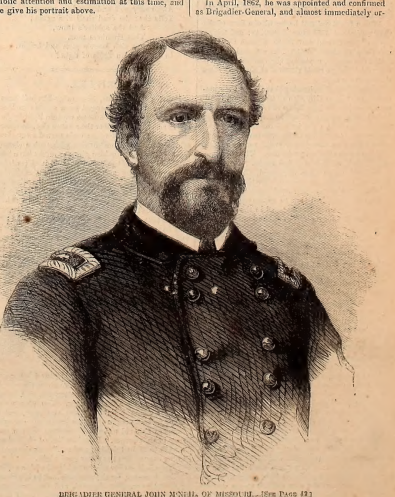
RECEPTION OF THE AUTHORITIES OF NEW ORLEANS BY GENERAL BUTLER PREVIOUS TO HIS DEPARTURE.—DRAWN BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

GENERAL BANKS'S FORCES LANDING AT BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

BRIGADIER-GENERAL JAMES G. BLUNT, OF KANSAS.

GENERAL BANKS AT NEW ORLEANS.

OUR special artist at New Orleans has sent us two sketches, which we reproduce on this and the preceding page. The large picture represents THE GRAND RECEPTION OF GENERAL BUTLER AT THE NEW ORLEANS CITY HALL on the evening preceding his departure for the North. It was a magnificent success: all the loyal citizens were present, together with a crowd of elegantly-dressed ladies, officers of the army and navy, etc. The smaller picture represents THE LANDING OF GENERAL BANKS'S TROOPS AT BATON ROUGE, which event we mentioned in our last.



BRIGADIER-GENERAL JAMES G. BLUNT, OF KANSAS.

THE recent brilliant victories of this officer in the far West are filling for him a large measure of public attention and estimation at this time, and we give his portrait above.

He was born in the State of Maine, and followed the sea for many years, holding the rank of Captain in the merchant service. Having a liberal education, and being well-grounded in the elementary studies of the medical profession, he abandoned his "life on the billows," emigrated to Ohio, settled at the capital, where he pursued the quiet avocations of his professional life until the furor of Kansas emigration carried him, among the first, to that historic field of Free-State achievement and suffering.

At the outbreak of this war he shouldered his musket and enlisted as a private, but was made Lieutenant-Colonel of the Third Regiment Kansas Volunteers, at its first organization. During this period of his military life he participated in the battle of Dry Wood, under command of General Lane; and commanded a force which penetrated far into the Indian country, engaged the force of the celebrated marauder Matthews, killed the leader and dispersed the band, which had for months been the terror of Southern Kansas.

In April, 1862, he was appointed and confirmed as Brigadier-General, and almost immediately ordered to the command of the Department of Kansas, which then comprised Kansas, the Indian Country, Colorado, Nebraska, and Dacotah. He had been preceded in this command, and portions of it, by Generals Sturgis, Denver, and Major-General Hunter. They had all of them, to a greater or less degree, failed. Entering at once upon the discharge of his duties with his characteristic energy and resolution, he soon brought order out of chaos, and succeeded almost immediately in placing the troops of his Department upon the most admirable footing. He reorganized and started the great Southern Expedition, which had been atrociously strangled by his predecessors: and in less than a month they were in the Indian Country, two hundred and fifty miles south of Fort Leavenworth, the starting-point of the Expedition. So admirably was the campaign planned, and so quietly did execution follow upon conception, that, but for an incident which no human sagacity could have foreseen, the Southern forts in that region would have been in his possession last August, long before reinforcements could have reached them.

BRIGADIER GENERAL JOHN MCNEIL, OF MISSOURI.—[SEE PAGE 42.]

The commanding officer of the force in the field was forcibly arrested by his subordinate officers, and general confusion, preferring of charges, and arrests of officers was the result. The enemy, in immense and overwhelming force, was before this little army, and it was disorganized and demoralized. In this condition it fell back to Fort Scott. General Blunt, with his customary promptness, proceeded there himself, accompanied by his staff, heard every thing, listened to every thing, said nothing. After hearing all that was to be said on all sides, he dissolved the court-martial previously ordered, relieved each officer from arrest, and assumed the chief command in person.

Up to this time he had won the approval of all as to his administration of the affairs of the Department, but his capacity in the field was doubted. It was said he was a man of conduct and affairs, but not of action; his forte was the cabinet, not the field.

This idea was soon dispelled when his trumpets sounded "To horse!" His first push was after Coffee, Jackman, and Tracy, who had gone North toward the Missouri River, with about 5000 men, to co-operate with Quantrall against Lexington and Kansas City. Blunt had about 2000 men, and after a forced march of two nights and a day he came in sight of them, when they broke and fled without waiting his impetuous charge. They wheeled toward Arkansas, and he followed them almost to the line, when his jaded horses compelled him to forego further pursuit. His promptitude and efficiency thus saved Lexington and Kansas City from sack and conflagration.

After resting his exhausted stock he started his first brigade—General Salomon, of Wisconsin, commanding—forward to Sarcoxie, to co-operate with General Brown against a large rebel force fortified at Newtonia. General Salomon's advance attacked the place, but was driven back with considerable loss. General Blunt, hearing of this, pushed forward in person, examined the ground, made his dispositions, attacked the enemy with characteristic impetuosity, and in thirty minutes had his broken columns scampering across the prairie, with our flying squadrons in eager and fearful pursuit. The flying enemy was chased to Elk-Horn Tavern, Arkansas.

From this point Generals Schofield, Totten, and Brown, who had accompanied General Blunt from Newtonia, returned to Springfield, Missouri, while General Blunt remained to try to draw the enemy from his cover of the fastnesses of the Boston Mountains.

After a few days' rest he heard of a force of the enemy of about 4000 near Maysville; and taking parts of the Second and Sixth Kansas Cavalry, and Robb's Indiana Battery, he engaged and defeated the enemy, capturing the veritable old battery which Bragg made classical at Monterey some sixteen years ago.

Immediately after, hearing that General Marmaduke was at Cane Hill with 12,000 men, and Hindman hurrying up from below to reinforce him with 15,000 more, he determined to strike and destroy Marmaduke before the junction could be effected. Accordingly he left his transportation behind, and with 5000 men marched forward to the attack. His charge was like an avalanche. The enemy recoiled, fled, rallied, and fled again. He fought them over twelve miles of ground, always in the front rank himself, exposing his life like a common soldier, until under the sacred delay of a flag of truce the enemy had time to get beyond pursuit, while the flag-party was engaged in the ostensible duty of caring for their wounded and burying their dead.

The junction of the rebel forces was effected, and the enemy was 28,000 strong. Notwithstanding the disparity of numbers, General Blunt's little army being but scant six thousand, he pushed boldly into the Boston Mountains, with the persistent obstinacy which forms so large an ingredient of his character, offering the enemy battle in his own strong-hold.

In the mean time Hindman determined to adopt Blunt's tactics, pass him in the night by a parallel road, get to his rear, and attack General Herron, who was marching to his assistance, by order of General Schofield, with reinforcements from Springfield, before he reached his destination. General Blunt, well advised of the enemy's designs, allowed him to pass undisturbed, and then deliberately took his trail, to attack him in the rear while Herron engaged him in front. Some unexpected obstacles intervened, which delayed him longer than he anticipated; but still the gallant Herron maintained his position until the charging squadrons of the First Division made the very earth to tremble beneath their shock and thunder. Then commenced one of the most sanguinary conflicts of the war. The enemy was desperate, and Blunt resolute and elastic as steel. From ten o'clock till dark the battle raged with unabated fury, the enemy growing weaker, and our own gallant troops more intent and earnest with each succeeding hour. We publish on page 42 a plan of this battle, called the BATTLE OF PRAIRIE GROVE, sent us from General Blunt's army by Mr. J. T. Cox.

Darkness at last put an end to the struggle. General Blunt ordered his men to sleep upon their arms, in order to renew the battle with the first faint streak of dawn. Morning came, but the enemy was gone. He had taken advantage of the cover of the night to steal to his retreats in the Boston Mountains, leaving two thousand of his dead and wounded on the field.

It will be readily conceived, from this brief sketch, that the annals of the last six weeks of this gallant little division of the Army of the Frontier sound more like the vagaries of romance than the stately march of history. Men like Blunt are in demand. Our country needs them in high positions. In recognition of services like these, marches so rapid and victories so brilliant and crowded, Government should give him the added star, and make him a Major-General without delay. The little State of Kansas has between thirteen and fourteen thousand troops actually in the field, and but two brigadiers. She is certainly entitled to a Major-General, and Blunt is the COMING MAN!

THE GRAVE BENEATH THE WILLOW.

[Far away, upon the banks of the Mississippi, a soldier pitched his tent by night, died at the dawn of morning, and is buried beneath the weeping willow, to await the morning réveille of the eternal day. These verses, taken from our port-folio of months past, are dedicated to his memory.—M.]

HARD by the river's winding way,
Beneath an aged weeping willow,
Pendent o'er the foaming billow,
Where the breath of blossoms blended,
And the songs of birds ascended;
Just as rising day was dawning,
And the east winds fanned the morning,
Death came rapping,
Softly tapping,
Tapping at the soldier's door—
The weary soldier's door.

Said he, "I've wandered sad and lonely,
Through the night-winds dark and dreary;
Am like yourself—a soldier weary
Of my marching—let us shelter
In this silent vale together:
Let me place my icy fingers
Where thy life-spark warmest lingers."
And then a death-dart
Touched a brave heart,
Silent now to move no more—
Never any more!

Now the willow, and the lilies,
And the eglantine are weeping,
Weeping o'er the soldier sleeping,
Sleeping where no cannon's rattle,
Nor the angry storm of battle,
Can awake him any more!
Nor doth again tap at the door.
The resting stranger,
Freed from danger,
Soundly sleeps beneath the willow—
The hoary, weeping willow!

Around the grave beneath the willow
The ivy and the roses bloom;
The flowery vale is not all gloom;
For weary on their little wing,
The birds light on the boughs to sing;
And every soft and warbling strain
Tells that the dead shall rise again;
And the soldier's brow,
That slumbers now,
Shall wear rich laurels pure and bright,
In the Elysian fields of light!

TRIFLES.

FROM a treacherous, September-like mildness the dying day had changed on a sudden to December sharpness. The fierce western light broke out in scarlet flushes over the sombre sky, and just above the hills thunderous clouds parted away curtain-wise from a dome burning with such a showing of rose through golden glory as might have befitted the gates of the unknown land itself; while the wind coming across the flat meadow-lands drove with a bleak rush and howl at the window by which Hope Easton was sitting. Already it was very dim in the little room, the shadow gaining so fast on the firelight that Hope could no longer see the pine wreaths that she was tying. The air was haunted by a pleasant woodland fragrance; and not Aladdin's palace could boast of such a cornice as the branches massed over door and window. Coziness was the name of the household god enshrined in the cheerful fire-place by which sat little Nellie looking into the bright flame, her fat little hands folded in her lap, and her fresh round face as grave as some little owl reflecting for the first time on the uncertain ways of mice.

Presently,

"Hope," said this reverend personage, "Mary Horton told me to-day that she was tired of Christmas-trees."

"Well?"

"Now I want one so much."

"Well!"

"Isn't it odd that God should give Christmas-trees to little girls that don't care about them? I thought perhaps he had forgotten me, so I asked him to send me a tree to-night. You know what he says about believing when you pray, and I know he could make one grow here easily enough. Suppose I should wake up to-morrow and find one over in that corner. I don't believe I shall sleep a wink to-night thinking about it." As she spoke going over to kiss her sister good-night.

Hope held up her face to be kissed with a smile, belied, however, by the troubled look in her clear, pleasant eyes, that lingered, and deepened, and darkened as if it had been the shadow itself closing about her as she still sat by the window. She could tie boughs together for Nellie's Christmas-tree; and that young person, less blasé than Mary Horton, would think herself happy and fortunate as the possessor of the doll lying in all the state of long-clothes and crocheted cap in the lower bureau drawer. But her quick thought had drawn a parallel between the child and herself. Mary Horton, tired and careless of her Christmas pleasures, her sister—what had the proud and handsome Julia in which Hope Easton could possibly have a common interest?

The outer gate clanged sharply, steps came up the walk; there was a bustle and some laughing in the hall; then somebody came toward the door humming La ci carem. There was no particular need for starting or blushing in the dark when no one could see how marvelously pretty she looked. It was only John Hazlemere, her mother's lodger. They were expecting him; for he had written to say that he should be back that night. (A most business-like epistle, by-the-by, not worthy of the tender keeping to which Hope had confided it.) He came in hesitating in the uncertain light till he had made out the slender figure by the window; and then—oh, the hypocrisy of girls!—such astonishment as she uplifted to him in her brown eyes! John could hardly persuade himself that he wore slippers of silence, or that the wind was in the habit of whistling scraps of Don Giovanni through the key-holes in Mrs. Easton's cottage; but how entirely she must have forgotten the letter (lying at that very moment over her heart) to be so utterly surprised by his appearance! She hardly glanced at him, her hand lay entirely passive in his. She looked interrupted—half displeased—indifferent or unconscious of the very evident pleasure with which he had met her, thought John, clouding fast.

Meanwhile somebody who had been talking with Mrs. Easton came along the narrow hall with a quick clatter of little boot heels and a rustle and swish of silken garments, diffusing a faint odor of violets as she (for the apparition was clearly feminine) entered the shadowed room.

"How dark it is! I can't find my way at all! Mr. Hazlemere, I think you were really barbarous to leave me so!" said a soft, lisping voice.

"You were talking with Mrs. Easton. How could I tell if it were discreet to remain?"

"Oh, you have— Miss Easton!" with a slight start; "you here! I didn't see you at first. I expect you to thank me for bringing Mr. Hazlemere home to you; though, as I was coming here when I found him on the road, it was not specially benevolent after all. How do you feel this evening, Miss Easton? Do you think you are very good-natured?"

"Not particularly," answered Hope, freezingly.

"That is unfortunate, for I came to ask a favor. Miss Golden has been unkind enough to fall ill at the last moment, when we depended on her for the dressing of the font, and we are in such a dilemma! I assure you we are quite desperate enough to seize and imprison you, and make your liberty dependent on your obliging us. You do those things so beautifully; and none of us have a gift that way, even if we were not so busy!"

She was standing as she talked close by the hearth, full in its light, looking even prettier than usual, with her splendid golden hair put away under her little velvet hood, and her cheeks in a glow. She was swinging her muff by its tassels, making the diamonds on her white fingers leap into sudden splendor with every move, and her cloak falling away showed the dainty collar and knot of ribbon, and the sparkling clasp at her slender waist; trifles in themselves, yet not unimportant parts of the effect that she produced—an effect of something dazzling, faultless, altogether of another and higher sphere, being most condescendingly at home in a shabby, wretched little room.

Hope felt it keenly; resented through all her nature the soft, lisping insolence, ten times harder to bear than open imperiousness; the familiarity, so offensive in contrast with Miss Morton's usual half-recognition; worst of all, the easy way in which she assumed entire possession of Mr. Hazlemere and all his faculties, the utter ignoring of all possibilities for him except that of attendance upon herself. I will not go! was Hope's first, angry thought; but her second was of Miss Horton's need, not her insolence, and of shame for her own pettiness of spirit.

"Well?" asked Miss Horton, half-indignant at the long silence.

"I will come," said Hope.

"Oh you are very kind! Mr. Hazlemere, we shall see you, of course; or will you ride home with me?"

"Thank you; but I will wait for Hope."

The "Hope" slipped out naturally—lovingly. Miss Horton gathered her cloak about her with an air.

"Good-evening, then! Come early, Miss Easton."

An odor of violets was all that remained of this unexpected visitation, and Hope sat down to think it over. She was hard at it when John came back, having seen Miss Horton safely to her carriage; and looked such a pretty picture, sitting there in the half light, that he had much ado to sit down like a sensible man on the opposite side of the fire-place, and taking refuge in the first commonplace that came into his head, asked what she was thinking about.

"Constituting myself a Committee of Ways and Means; and at present reading the Honorable Committee is sorely puzzled to find some magic that will make a certain gray merino presentable at Mrs. Horton's; and uncertain how it will get time and strength to construct a Christmas-tree for Nellie, who has gone to sleep in full faith that God will have a tree ready grown in that opposite corner to salute her waking eyes."

"Dear little thing!" said John, looking straight at Hope. "Suppose the Committee imitates her simple faith, and leaves the tree where she left it; while as for the gray merino, in my opinion the Committee is at present in possession of all the magic that is requisite to make the dress the prettiest in the room."

Here Mrs. Easton and candles came in, and John disappeared. Hope clouded again. He had been absent two weeks, and could not sit out an hour with them quietly; though why should she care? she asked, spitefully, pulling her hair as she combed it out as if it had been his. Had the Fool-catcher any thing in his collection to match her? She had been happy because John Hazlemere had called her Hope, and complimented her gray merino. The insane asylum would have been too dignified a retreat for her. A refuge for idiots was the only shelter adapted to her case. She was thoroughly wretched, for of all quarrels those we sometimes hold with ourselves are the most hopeless. She had entertained ambitious projects of an unwonted knot of ribbons, and possibly a fuschia nestled in the coils of her hair; but she now dismissed them contemptuously with her other folly. In short, she was in a mood to extract as large an amount of discomfort as possible from the very smallest given quantity of material; and, what is quite inexcusable, was exceedingly sulky with John, refusing him her hand when he helped her into the carriage, and scarcely speaking twice during the ride to Mrs. Horton's.

Julia met them in the door.

"You are late, after all; every one is here" (as Hope, to her dismay, saw was but too true). "Miss Easton, I have a nice little corner that I reserved specially for you. I have stood guard over it valiantly, and I am not going to let any one come and disturb you. You have quite enough to do without being talked to and hindered. Mr. Hazlemere, you must come with me and make yourself useful. We are pressing every one into the service to-night."

Hope's "corner" was a recessed window, almost shut off from the drawing-room by its heavy curtains. There was a table with work-box and pasteboard, a basket of greens and an easy-chair. Clearly she was there to work—nothing else; all empty formulas of politeness were to be dispensed with; but so much the better. She had neither heart nor inclination to talk with any of the people there, only she would have been glad if her corner had been differently placed, or if she had only dared to draw the curtains, so that she need not see so exactly what Mr. Hazlemere and Miss Horton were doing. Certainly his sphere of usefulness was by no means an extended one, it consisting principally in revolving about Miss Horton, walking with her up and down the rooms, or helping her tie the wreaths when she was seized with an occasional spasm of industry. Impossible not to see that their fingers met and lingered on each other; that his hair brushed her cheek when he bent, as he frequently did, to whisper to her; and that, what with heightened color and sparkling eyes, and the dazzling contrast of her snowy skin and bright hair with the deep azure of her dress, she was positively radiant. Other eyes than Hope's were upon them. Hardly conscious of her presence behind the curtains, all the gossips in the room, as Fate would have it, discussed them and their prospects; and, much against their will, Hope found herself duly qualified to have given in the general vote concerning Mr. Hazlemere and Julia—how that "they were a handsome couple, just suited for one another, and that there could be no possible doubt that the match would take place before spring."

It was hard to listen—harder yet to feel that the hearing of such things was pain. Her cheeks burned, and tears fell on her work in spite of herself; in her heart she believed that God who loved her would have granted her heart's desire had it been well for her, but the cup was very bitter and hard to drink.

It was at this juncture that the curtains parted, and Louis Horton came in and sat down beside her.

"My sister has tabooed this corner," he said; "but I for one will not observe it. It is a shame to keep you here. Why, it is stifling! You look as if you had a fever. Come out and walk with me!"

"Oh, impossible! I haven't finished."

"Well, it is not your business more than theirs, is it? Every one else takes it easy enough. Suppose there are a few letters less in the church! Who will be the wiser? Let my sister and the Committee to which she belongs look to that. Positively you must come with me! But—how pretty that is?"

He had taken up a bunch of berries and shining leaves, and was holding them against her dark hair.

"You must wear them," he said, commencing to fasten them in her braids. "Don't be afraid! I am as deft as any femme-de-chambre of them all! Now when you meet a mirror you will confess that in three seconds I have achieved something prettier than all your evening's work."

And pretty indeed Hope looked, shrinking and turning away her flushed face shyly from his eager look; but not in John's eyes, who coming to look for her, saw and turned sorrowfully away, as Hope came out with Louis from what he styled her den. Louis went with her straight up to his sister.

"Your prisoner," he said, "pleaded hard to be let alone, but I was inexorable, for I thought it a shame to keep this one poor little thing hard at work while all the rest of you were lazily luxuriating; and, by-the-way, Julia, you may set some of those other people at work, for I don't intend to let her go back. She is under my charge now."

And once more that mal-apropos John came up in time to hear the concluding words of Louis's speech, and see the air of ownership with which he gave his arm to Hope and carried her off to a distant quarter of the room.

"Are you hungry?" he inquired, presently. "There is the usual fight going on about the supper-table, but 'only the brave deserve the fair;' and if you say the word— No? I can not say I am very sorry. I like better to look at you. It is such a relief after the blues and reds and yellows of the other girls, and their endless giggling and attitudinizing."

As vinegar upon nitre was all this nonsense to Hose's heavy heart. She thought of home and Nellie with a longing that amounted to pain; and seeing John pass caught him by the arm.

"Do take me home!" she urged. "I am so tired; and you know I must not disappoint Nellie."

"I have promised this next half hour to Miss Horton," he answered, gravely, "but I will go with you then; and you need not be uneasy about Nellie's tea. I will help you with it."

The red seemed to Hope's eyes very purple.

"I will go!" she said to herself, passionately. "I will go!" Louis, who had left her for a moment, was coming back, but she slipped out of a door near by, before he could reach her, to the dressing-room, found her cloak and hood, and stole out by the back way, unseen by all, that the world would wait for her and stop her in the front hall.

So eager was she for the rest and shelter of home, and so morally afraid of being pursued, that she ran till she reached her own door, when she found that she was crying. All was dark and quiet in the little house; her mother and Nellie fast asleep long since time, and only the dimmest possible light in the little sitting-room, where in one corner stood a scorching tall and dark, with wide-spreading, fragrant branches, building all manner of mysterious packages, and gleaming with tapers and gilded fruit.

This was what John had buried himself about! this was the occupation of his indifference to her appeal! As she had always found him in all the year of his stay at her mother's house, so had he proved himself now, strong, thoughtful, and with a tender even of a child's fancies. And she! it would be hard to tell how unutterably she hated and despised herself. Soon she heard him in the hall. He was coming into the room, and there was no escape for her. She must sit still and meet him.

He came in and stood for a while by her in silence. At last,

"Why did you run away?" he asked.

"You know," she wished to make something for Nellie's Christmas."

"You had no confidence in me?"

"How could I know?"

"You might have placed some small trust in me. At least I hoped till now that you did. Did you come alone?"

"Yes."

"Imprudent to a degree, as well as insulting to me."

"Insulting! you mean that! Are you angry?" For it had never occurred to her that this last great evil could happen, and that John could actually be angry.

"I am. I think I have a right to be."

What could she say? She could not explain. He had never asked to know what was in her heart, and she could find no words that would not betray her. Yet, writhing mouthly for words to answer that she could not find, he left her with a curt good-night.

The next night was Christmas Eve, and Nellie, who had all day been quite sure "that God was growing a Christmas-tree for her in the parlor, because Hope had so carefully excluded her," was at last allowed to enter. John came also, dressed to spend the evening with Miss Horton, and saw with one glance that Hope had laid the parcels bearing her name unopened on the table.

"You have not looked at your gifts," he said, coldly.

"No," returned Hope. "I want something more."

"Indeed!"

"I want forgiveness, your forgiveness," she went on timidly, and blushing very much.

"For what?"

"For whatever it was that made you angry."

"Truly you are incorrigible!" burst out John suddenly, at boiling heat; then instantly freezing again.

"I beg your pardon. I have no right to be angry or to forgive you. It was a piece of unpardonable impertinence in me."

"You will not be friends, then."

John looked at her coldly.

"You women are curious, inconsistent things. I could almost think—"

Here Louis gayly intervened.

"Oh! Hope, here is your letter—the one that you dropped out of your dress this morning. I forgot it till I was in bed. I just ran over in my nightgown, where I have had it all the time."

As she held it out John's quick eye caught the signature, and with a sudden change of face, at once altered, looking it high above Hope's head, who vainly tried to reach it, finding that useless, drew paler than before, covered her face with her hands, and tried to make her escape, but he stopped between her and the door, and inexorably held it fast.

"Not yet," he said, with a half smile. "This letter was mine, is now your mother's; what were you doing with it, my property?"

"Oh! please let me go," was the answer.

"Not yet. I have too many questions to ask you; and, first, If you care so much for the letter, how much do you care for the writer?"

Large tear-drops began to find their way through Hope's clasped fingers.

"I think you would hardly weep if you knew how joyful my heart is," whispered John, softly. "I have waited and hoped so long, and, latterly, I feared, in vain. I thought I had lost you."

Hope looked up suddenly, smiling.

"And that, then,"

"What visit?"

"That you were to pay Miss Horton."

"I shall go, indeed—"

"Will!"

"Unless I am bribed with a gift—a Christmas gift."

Hope's answer was too low for other ears than John's to hear; but that he obtained his gift I have no doubt, since their wedding cards are lying on the table before me.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL FOR 1862.

The skies are dim, the trees are stiff,
The earth is gray and cold;
The frost is glittering, as if
Th' very rays were cold.
And men have lost their heritage—
No sweat is on their brow:
Come, Babe, and bring them work and wage,
Be born, and save us now.

Across the sea, beyond our sight,
Roars on the battle's clash;
Down go the men in bloody fight,
The women weep and hate.
And in the night, be which that may,
Surely the strife is long:
Come thou, O Child, thy lowly way,
And right will have no wrong.

Good men speak lies against thine own—
Tongues quick, and hearing slow;
They will not let their will alone,
And think to serve thee so.
If they the children's freedom saw,
In thee, the children's king,
Thy wound be still with holy awe,
Or only speak to sing.

Some neither lie, nor starve, nor fight,
Nor yet the poor deny;
But in their hearts all is not right—
They plot, and wait, and smile.
We need thee every day and hour,
In sunshine and in snow:
Child-King, we pray with all our power,
Be born, and save us now.

We are but men and women, Lord;
Thou art a gracious child:
Oh, fill our hearts, and heap our board,
Of grace, this winter wild.
And though the world be sad and bare,
Hungry and Hate about,
Come, Child, and ill deeds and ill fare
Will soon be driven out.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

I. O. O. F.—THE AMERICAN ODD FELLOW, a Monthly Magazine of 36 double columns octavo, with engravings, devoted to disseminating a knowledge of the sentiments, principles, operations, and condition of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. One dollar a year, in advance. Specimen numbers will be mailed, gratis, on application. Any number of 16 cents, in postage stamps, for each number ordered. Published by JOHN W. ORR, 75 Nassau Street, New York. The first number of the second volume is now ready.

The first volume, bound, will be sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of $1.50.

SOMETHING NEW.

NATIONAL AMERICAN AMUSEMENT CARDS. Colonel for King, Soldiers of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jacks. 36 numbered cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Four packs mailed free on receipt of One Dollar. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN PUBLISHING AGENCY, 14 Chambers Street, New York.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately begun their style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless Watches of British make, and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being the mere manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for packaging and swindling purposes.

In order to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AS ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPERS, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at $20, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Open Face, at $18, and Legions of foreign make, already referred to.

We have issued the new series of WATCH-CARDS. We Explain Notes, which will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is out of date or forgery.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Something New

For Ladies' and Gentlemen's Wear.

Hooks and Eyes on Blank Cards of the finest Ivory, brought to a high polish, of all colors, and engraved with Initial Letter, Old English, &c. Monograms to order. Free by mail on receipt of price. Sets, $1.50. Address

JOHN F. PHELPS, 429 Broadway, N. Y.

CATARRH.—Dr. Goodale's CATARRH REMEDY positively cures the very worst of this terrible disease, and effectually relieves Fever and Sorrow. Price $1.00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. Depot 612 Broadway.

Splendid Holiday Presents.

100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.,

WORTH $500,000,

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches.....60 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches.....50 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches.....10 00 each.
2000 Vest and Fob Chains.....5 00 to 8 00 per one.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets.....5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Pins.....3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Pearl Brooches.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear Drops.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Pearl Ear Drops.....4 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Gent's Breast Pins.....2 00 to 5 00 each.
5000 Watch Keys.....1 00 to 2 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides.....2 00 to 4 00 each.
5000 Lockets.....3 00 to 5 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons.....2 00 to 4 00 each.
6000 Pair Studs.....2 00 to 4 00 each.
6000 Sleeve Set Rings.....2 00 to 4 00 each.
6000 Lockets.....3 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry.....5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Mounted Holders.....4 00 to 8 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils.....4 00 to 6 00 each.

And Gold Pens for Ladies and Gentlemen.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of the above various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed, and when ordered they are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and have the article sent you.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, and paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

Agents in the setting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar. Agents will collect fifteen cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps, for each certificate issued by their correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

193 Broadway, New York.

INVENTORS SHOULD PROCURE Copy of "HOW TO GET A PATENT." Send a 3-cent stamp to FOWLER AND WELLS, New York.

Just Tribute to Merit.

AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON, 1862,

Duryeas' Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" exhibited, and was the only such honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the competition of all prominent manufacturers of Corn Starch and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding.

Maizena.

The food and luxury of children, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custard, Blanc Mange, &c., without Isinglass, with few or no eggs, at a cost astonishing the most economical. A single trial will convince. For West Point greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening soups, gravies, and sauces for fish and meats, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little boiled in Coffee greatly improves it. For coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, with directions. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Manufactured at Glen Cove, Long Island.

Wholesale Depot, 166 Fulton Street.

W. DURYEA, General Agent.

MILITARY GOODS.

Swords for Presentation, Sashes, Belts, and Epaulettes, Guns, Pistols, and Revolvers.

Every article in the Military Line Wholesale and Retail.

W. J. Syms & Bro.,

209 Broadway, New York.

J. W. MERSEREAU,
Men's Furnishing Goods
—AND—

GOLDEN HILL SHIRTS

No. 2 Warren Street.

Fashion Door near Broadway, NEW YORK.

Represented by N. B. MERSEREAU, L. N. WYANT.

India-Rubber Gloves for Chapped Hands, Salt Rheum, &c., and render them soft, supple, and pliable, and restore the skin to its natural color, for cold, and are an excellent protection in all kinds of house-work. Price by mail, post-paid, 50 cents per pair. Any number of pairs and 4 stamps to pay postage.

Ladies' and Gent's Gauntlets, sizes 81-50.

GODDARD'S INDIA RUBBER DEPOT, 20 Park Row, N. Y.

Every description of Rubber Goods, Wholesale and Retail.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for sale by the Soldiers' Relief Association, Hilton Head, Beaufort, and all places occupied by Union forces, should be addressed, and will be forwarded by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Soldiers charged low rates.

The Prince of Holiday Gifts or Presents.

"THE GRAND MICROSCOPE"

Magnifies small objects 10,000 times. So simple that a child may use it. A most valuable present for any person. Price, by mail, 25 cts.; with six mounted objects, 50 cts. Address HENRY CRAIG, 181 Centre Street, New York.

DENSIONS, BOUNTY, PAY, PRIZE-MONEY, and all Army and Navy Claims, Procured by SOMES & BROWN, No. 2 Park Place, New York. Send for our Hand-Book of Information.

WEDDING CARDS

These Celebrated Engraved Cards will only be 2 SHEPHERD'S Building, Ann corner Nassau, Beekman, and Park Row, N. Y. Specimens mailed. For five Specimens by Mail, send two stamps.

Nautical Routine

And STOWAGE, with SHORT RULES FOR NAVIGATION. By J. McKone Mulvihill, and W. N. Jeffers, Jr., U.S.N. 1 vol. 8vo., cloth, $2 50.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, 192 Broadway, N. Y. Copies sent free by mail on receipt of the price.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Best climate. Water of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to become 30 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate—30 acre lots from $100 to $250 per acre, payable either a year. Good schools and society. Hundreds are settling. Apply to Charles K. Landis, Esq., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rural men, Free. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an old settled region, where good markets are near, that I have ever found farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies.

Rare and Beautiful Flower Seeds free to all who join the "RURAL KEYSTONE CLUB." 29 c. in 81 clear cash pays for 1 year's membership and Periodicle. For full particulars send stamp to

F. E. STILSON, Bangor, Penn.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new Cheap Family Sewing Machines. Address

S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils, Ornamental Pencils, and 13 other new articles. 15 circulars free. Address, SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

WHISKERS! WHISKERS!

My Unguent will force them to grow on the smoothest face in 40 days. Sent by mail, with directions, for One Dollar by mail. J. F. JAGGERS, Cahoes, Illinois.

Rheumatism—Who has it?

It has been confessedly acknowledged by thousands who have used it, that the Guinea Pepper Plasters of Dr. Isaacs are the only preventive and cure. Sold by all druggists and shoe dealers generally. Price 25 cents per pair and for $1 25. Secured by English and American Patents.

Send for a circular. METTAM & CO., 629 Broadway.

RAILWAY TIME KEEPERS

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES. Are warranted to run, and keep excellent time. The styles are superior to any thing of the kind before offered in the market, decidedly the most taking novelties out. Should retail at prices from $20 to $30 each. All are fully packed by the case of six, and are not sold in less quantities. Engraved superior, and effectually prevents any half dozen $20. Heavy silver plated, engine turned, per half dozen, $30. Sample dozen of half of each kind will be sent at wholesale rates, $20. Will be sent by express, with bill for collection on delivery. Should any small cash balance remain, as we can not collect from the Army. Address orders,

HUBBARD BROTHERS,
Cor. John and Nassau Sts., New York.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS.

AND ARMS. Selphe's Patent. 515 Broadway, N. Y., opposite St. Nicholas Hotel. Send for a Circular.

"MOUSTACHES AND WHISKERS IN 42 DAYS." Hunting, Fishing, and many other Guns and Rifles. Send for a Circular. 8,000 sold in 1862. Price only 20c. 3 for $1. Mailed Free. Address

R. LUCAS & CO., Hamilton, O.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.
Have just published:

MODERN WAR: Its Theory and Practice. Illustrated from celebrated Campaigns and Battles. With Maps and Diagrams. By Jasmes Shanad, Captain U.S.A. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

THE STUDENT'S FRANCE. A History of France from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Second Empire in 1852. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. Large 12mo, 734 pages, Cloth, $2 00.

SPRINGS OF ACTION. By Mrs. C. H. B. Richards. 12mo, printed on Tinted Paper, Cloth, $1 00; Cloth, Gilt Edges, $1 00.

MEMOIRS OF MRS. JOANNA BETHUNE. By her Son, the Rev. Geo. W. Bethune, D.D. With an Appendix, containing Extracts from the Writings of Mrs. Bethune. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage free, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR January, 1863.

The present Number of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE contains the conclusion of Miss HOLMES'S Household Story, "Hortense and Maid," continuations of Miss ELLET'S Thrilling Story of "Fair Play," and of Mrs. TROLLOPE'S English novel "The Small House at Allington."

Mr. J. Ross Browne's Narrative of a Visit to Ireland, illustrated by Sketches from the Author's own pencil; by the Author, commenced in this month, will be continued in the Numbers for February and March. Mr. Browne's paper on the "League of the States" closes the series of articles describing the various attempts at Union and Secession which have marked our national history.—The article on "Breeding Cattle for the Shambles" is by a practical farmer at the present time, so giving an authentic account of the origin of the improved breeds, and showing the progress on a wider scale, to the purposes of Offensive and Defensive Warfare.—The Record of Current Events, Literature, and of the Reports of the heads of the Departments and Bureaus of our Government, contain a complete view of the present condition of the country.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Any Person sending Five New Subscribers will be entitled to a Sixth Copy for himself, gratis.
Any Person sending Ten New Subscribers will be entitled to a Seventh Copy for himself, gratis.
Any Person sending Twenty New Subscribers will be entitled to a Fourteenth Copy for himself, gratis.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
One Copy for Two Years	5 00

Any Person sending Ten New Subscribers will be entitled to a Copy for himself, gratis.

Any Person sending Twenty New Subscribers will be entitled to a Copy for himself, gratis.

TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 00 each, or Fifteen Subscribers, at $3 00 each, will be supplied by TRAVELING AGENTS.

☞ The Publishers (supply the Harper's Magazine or Parties who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly) find better remit themselves or Genuine, or not their subscription to some Responsible and of whose responsibility they are assured.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

CUTTING HIS OLD ASSOCIATES.

MAN OF COLOR. "Ugh! Get out. I ain't one ob you no more. I'se a Mom, I is!"

UNCLE ABE. "Hello! Ben, is that you? Glad to see you!"
BUTLER. "Yes, UNCLE ABE. Got through with that New Orleans Job. Cleaned them out and scrubbed them up! Any more scrubbing to give out?"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A SPECULATION.

$15 per day made sure, and more if you persevere selling our great NEW STYLE Union Prize and Stationery Package. Something NOVEL and UNESCALED. Different to all old styles, and containing ALL NEW ARTICLES of good quality. Writing Materials and Fancy Articles worth $1 formerly 25 cents. Just the thing for a Soldier to Present to your Friends in the Army. They are snatched goods, and everybody wants them. Profits immense and sales quick. We give as a free present to each person who orders our Package A BRILLIANT WATCH, warranted as a time-keeper. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted in every County and every Town. This is a chance for soldiers in camp or diverted. Send for our New Circulars for 1863, containing future inducements.

S. C. HERARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

PHYSIOGNOMY, or Signs of Character, PHYSIOLOGY, and the Bodily Functions; PHRENOLOGY or the Brain and Nervous System; PSYCHOLOGY, the Science of the Soul; ETHNOLOGY, or the Natural History of Man, with Instructions, in the Choice of Pursuits, Personal Improvement, etc., are some of the topics elucidated in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL AND LIFE ILLUSTRATED for 1863. No. 1 now ready, only $1 a year. Address FOWLER AND WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED everywhere for our Splendid and Mammoth Javelin Prize Package. 100 per cent. to 6. Sent to Watch free to all Agents. $15 per day made. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CATLEY & CO., 49 Ann Street, New York.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON WORK, Wrought, Cast, and Wire. 259
IRON RAILINGS, VERANDAHS, BALCONIES, GUARDS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description. Illustrated Catalogues mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM, 259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $21, $24 and $30 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

THOMAS PLANNEL ARMY SHIRTS, $24, $27, $30 and $33 per dozen.

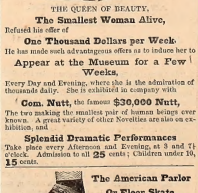
E. W. H. WARD, from London, No. 381 Broadway.

Portable Printing Offices,

For the use of Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to do their own Printing. Circulars sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, etc., on receipt of two 3 ct. stamps.

ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, N. Y.

Buy your Skate Straps with



Fogg's Lever Buckle,

Manufactured by P. STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK,
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

Barnum's American Museum.

The Manager is happy to announce that, notwithstanding

MISS LAVINIA WARREN,

THE QUEEN OF BEAUTY,
The Smallest Woman Alive,
Refused his offer of

One Thousand Dollars per Week

He has made such advantageous offers as to induce her to Appear at the Museum for a Few Weeks,

Every Day and Evening, where she is the admiration of thousands daily. She is exhibited in company with

Com. Nutt, the famous $30,000 Nutt,

The two making the smallest pair of human beings ever known. A great variety of other Novelties are also on exhibition, and

Splendid Dramatic Performances

Take place every Afternoon and Evening, at 3 and 7½ o'clock. Admission to all 25 cents; Children under 10, 15 cents.

The American Parlor Or Floor Skate, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles.

Observe, each Skate is labeled with the trade mark. Also, 50,000 pair of Ladies' and Gents' Ice Skates, comprising all the new and most improved patterns, made from welded steel and iron bottomed: Skate Straps and Leather Goods of every description; Fogg's improved Lever Skate Buckle. Sole Agent for Williams, Horne & Co.'s celebrated Skates.

FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, New York.
68 KILBY STREET, Boston.

Lyon's Kathairon.

This delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is now put up by the original proprietor, and is now made with the same care, skill, and attention, which first created its immense and unprecedented sales of over one million bottles obtained. It is still sold at 25 cents in large bottles. Two million bottles can easily be sold in a year when it is again known that the Kathairon is not only the most delightful hair dressing in the world, but that it cleanses the scalp of scurf and dandruff, gives the hair a lively, rich luxuriant growth, and prevents it from turning gray. These are considerations worth knowing. The Kathairon has been tested for over thirty years, and is warranted as described. Any lady who values a beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon. It is finely perfumed, cheap and valuable. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.

D. S. BARNES & CO.,
New York

Milligan's Patent Mess Kettle

Arranged for four Officers, weight 15 pounds, price $12.

AND

MILLIGAN'S ARMY TENT STOVE.
Patent applied for.

To close with Pipe &c. Packed.

Weight 9½ pounds, price $6 00. Sold by Dealers in Military Goods throughout the country. Wholesale Depot, No. 4 Platt Street, New York.
Send for Circulars. MILLIGAN BROS.

GOLD PENS.

Retailed at wholesale prices. Goods warranted. Send for a circular, giving list of prices and engravings of Pens. Pens repointed on the receipt of 36 cents in P. O. Stamps.
E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office 15 Maiden Lane, New York City.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE!
MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 28c. COIN PREPAID. Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free.
Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 2270, Boston, Mass.

$16 WATCHES. $16

LADIES' WATCHES.—Heavy Gold Plate Hunting Case Lever Watches for $16, equal to solid 18 k. Gold in finish and general appearance. Send for a Circular.
J. L. FERGUSON, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

A REALLY VALUABLE MICROSCOPE, one that a child can use, sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.
S. WOODWARD, P. O. Box 2273, Boston.

Broadway MENAGERIE
AND
Zoological Institute.
Broadway below Houston Street.
Open Daily from 10 A.M. to 10 P.M.
With the most magnificent and complete collection of LIVING WILD ANIMALS
in America. Admission 25 cts. Children under 10, 15 cts.

Confederate Rebel Money.
FAC-SIMILE REBEL TREASURY NOTES,
So exactly like the genuine that where one will pass current the other will go equally well. $500 in Confederate Notes of all denominations, sent free by mail on receipt of $5, by W. E. HILTON, 11 Spruce Street, New York.

An Invention of Rare Merit!

LONG WANTED, AND FOUND AT LAST!

A KEROSENE LAMP CHIMNEY, EASILY CLEANED, AND WHICH WILL NOT CRACK OR BREAK FROM SUDDEN CHANGES OF TEMPERATURE.

A "BROWN'S METAL TOP LAMP CHIMNEY" is warranted, with ordinary care, to last just as long as the lamp on which it is used.

Price (with a small neat shade for common size), Zinc top, 75 cents; Brass, 31 cents; Silver-Plated, 50 cents.

Dealers will be furnished, per EXPRESS, with a sample box containing one half doz. Chimneys assorted styles and sizes, with circulars, colored show cards, price list, &c., on receipt of $1 25.

Brown's Metal Top Lamp Chimneys are manufactured only by the

NEW LAMP CHIMNEY MANUFACTURING CO.,
MILTON BRADLEY, Treasurer,
Office and Salesroom, 45 Fulton St., N. Y.

☞ For further particulars see "Harper's Weekly" of last week or send for a circular.

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlement. Pure soil. Mild climate. See advertisement of Vineland, on previous page.

GOLDEN HILL SHIRTS

RETAILING

☞ At Wholesale Prices. ☜
Depot 2 Warren Street. J. W. MESSEREAU.

IMPORTANT TO AGENTS!—We have reduced the wholesale price of our GREAT STATIONERY PORTFOLIO PACKAGE. Now the best and cheapest in the market. Sells more than any other firm. Send stamp for new circular. WEIR & CO., 34 south Third Street, Philadelphia.

Nervous Diseases and Physical Debility.—New and reliable treatment. Valuable Reports sent free of charge, by Dr. J. SKILLIN HOUGHTON, No. 3 South Ninth street, Philadelphia, Pa.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to D. Adee, 381 Pearl St., N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it—it has cured thousands.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VII.—No. 317.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MAJOR-GENERAL WILLIAM T. SHERMAN.—[SEE PAGE 62.]

BRIGADIER-GENERAL ALVIN P. HOVEY.—[SEE PAGE 62.]

THE NEW ORLEANS MARKET—SOLDIERS EXCHANGING RATIONS FOR FRUIT, ETC.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE FIRST WAITS.

A MEDITATION FOR ALL.

By the Author of "John Halifax, Gent."

So, Christmas is here again!—
While the house sleeps, silent as death,
'Neath the midnight moon comes the Waits' shrill tune
And we listen and hold our breath.

The Christmas that never was—
On this frosty November air,
With clear pale gleam, like the ghost of a dream,
It is painted every where.

The Christmas that might have been—
It is here in the scroll of a reed,
Down the empty street, with the tread of feet
That lie silent underground.

The Christmas that yet may be—
Lies in Bethlehem-star, loads kind:
Yet our life chimes past, hour by hour, fast, fast,
Few before—and many behind.

The Christmas we have and hold,
With a tremulous tender strain,
Half joy, half fears—Be peace in the years,
"Grief passes, blessings remain!"

The Christmas that sure will come,
Let us think of it, fireside fair;
When church bells will sound o'er one small green mound,
Which the neighbors pass to prayer.

The Christmas that God will give—
Long after all these are o'er,
When is day nor night, for the LAMB is our Light,
And we live for evermore.

THE NEW ORLEANS MARKET.

OUR artist, Mr. Davis, some time since sent us a sketch which we reproduce on page 49. It represents our troops in New Orleans "swapping" their rations of flour for tropical fruits and other farm-produce in the markets of New Orleans. Flour has long been extremely scarce at New Orleans; our brave boys, who receive a fair modicum of it daily as part of their ration, manage to dispose of it in market in such a way as to use their own words, "to live like fighting cocks." The scene is rather a striking one.

THE WRECK OF THE "MONITOR."

BOOM—boom!
How the huge waves smite her side—
The waves she has long defied,
In mockery of her doom!

Hark—hark!
The massy rivet snaps!
The jointed armor gapes!
The prompt wave rushes dark!

Creak—creak!
The great pumps labor fast!
The eager men rush past,
With sweat-disfigured cheek.

Toil—toil!
For a ship appears in sight:
But faster comes the night,
And the waves with fury boil.

More—more!
The floods to the hot fires creep,
And the mercury of the deep
Bates not a single roar.

Haste—haste!
Ye eager friends within hail!
Your perilous scheme will fail
If but one breath you waste!

Quick—quick!
Lower the swiftest boat:
Death has them by the throat,
And darkness gathers fast!

Black—black!
Are the mighty rolling waves:
But the boat a handful saves,
And now once more turns back.

Vain—vain!
The sea, with an awful frown,
Beats the mailed warrior down—
He never will rise again!

Swift—swift!
Sinks the pride of the Union tars,
Away from the glowing stars
To the sullen ooze and drift.

OUR NEW SERIAL.

IN this Number we conclude Mr. WILKIE COLLINS'S magnificent Tale, NO NAME; and we begin the publication of a New Story by the Author of "MARY BARTON," entitled

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK.

This will be followed, in March, by a New Serial Work of Fiction by

CHARLES READE, D.C.L,

Author of "IT'S NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," etc.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1863.

THE OPENING OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

IN view of the characteristic perseverance of the American people, the repulse at Vicksburg, and the annoying raids of the rebel guerrillas upon our supply trains and railway communications out West, only render it the more certain that within a given space of time we shall reopen the Mississippi River. Our people are not the sort of men whom obstacles frighten or adverse weary. The greater the difficulties the greater the energy put forth to overcome them. Like our forefathers the English, who always began their wars by getting soundly thrashed by their enemies, and only commenced to achieve success when it was thought they were exhausted, we are warming to the work with each mishap, and learning from each defeat how to secure victory hereafter. Let no man doubt for an instant but that our armies and our fleets will accomplish the business of opening the Mississippi.

It may serve to encourage the faint-hearted to state that the expeditions fitted out for the purpose of opening that river are entirely without parallel in history. No monarch of Europe ever gathered together so many men, so many vessels of war, and so many guns for any single purpose. If the figures were printed they would remind the reader of the semi-fabulous records of the expedition of Xerxes for the conquest of Greece. In comparison with the forces commanded by M'Clernand, Grant, Banks, Porter, and Farragut, the allied expedition to the Crimea was an insignificant affair. Napoleon had perhaps more men when he set out for the invasion of Russia; but he had no naval force, while Porter commands a fleet which alone would constitute a respectable national navy. The British army under Wellington, which carried on the Peninsula War, was less than any of the flying columns of our army of the Mississippi. Lord Clyde employed the rebellion in India, and reduced 100,000,000 people to subjection with fewer men than Grant commands. Should the war be finally settled by a pitched battle in the heart of Mississippi, as Jeff Davis almost predicts, the forces engaged will probably be twice as numerous as those that fought at Waterloo, and our army ought to exceed that of the rebels by a large percentage.

If it be asked why, with so many advantages and so vast a development of strength, we seem to make so little headway, the answer is that it is easier to hold a strong-hold than to take it. The rebels choose their position, fortify themselves, throw up earth-works, dig rifle-pits, plant their guns, and wait for us. We are annoyed, against such odds, in taking their works, as we did at Fort Donelson, they fall back and repeat the performance elsewhere: and with so vast a territory as theirs, there is plenty of room for repeated defeats and repeated retreats to new strong-holds. In the end, there can be but one result: but it must not be forgotten that if our resources and our strength are great, and our hopes high, the job we have undertaken is of the most monstrous character, and its progress will most certainly "try men's souls" at the North.

THE LOUNGER.

FAIR PLAY.

IF there is any maxim which peculiarly expresses the true spirit of American civilization it is Fair Play for All. Our system is a very different one doctrine—equal human rights based upon a common humanity. The departure in practice from that original doctrine has virtually been the ruin of this sanguinary war, which is the struggle of the nation to restore its practice to its true faith and fundamental principle. The obedience to the instinct, as vital in states as in individuals, which temporarily subordinates every right, every guarantee, every principle, and every law to the paramount necessity of self-preservation, the President, Commander-in-Chief, has decreed emancipation in the chief slave-section of the country. Whether as by his order, and by the necessity of the case, the lives of citizens are taken in battle, without due ordinary process of law, as by the same order and necessity the supply trains and property which aid the rebellion are without process of law cut off and seized; and in obedience to the rule of common sense that in a state of war all persons concerned are either friends or foes, and are accordingly to be protected or corrected, he has, in the only way possible, summoned all the friends of the Union and the country to the national standard, assuming that all whose liberty is restrained by the rebels shall be protected by the supreme national power.

It is a war-measure which involves the most vital consequences to the civilization and development of a class of human beings, who have hitherto been the subjects of the most remorseless oppression. In peace the power to take the step was dormant and could not be exercised. But the war upon the Government, waged by those who wished to perpetuate the injustice, awakes that sleeping power, clothes the President with that magnificent authority, and calling God and the world to witness the rectitude of his purpose, and invoking the divine blessing and the national support upon an act just in itself, and justified by the national peril, he has spoken the word which is an edict of fair play to every man in the land: which at once releases a people which has been outraged, and a nation which has been unwillingly privy to injustice. It clears the individual conscience and the national escutcheon. It is an invocation of the spirit of the Constitution to save its form—being merely an exercise of that supreme and irresponsible discretion, vested by the fundamental law in its chief magistrate, during a state of war, for its own protection.

This is the spirit in which the noble picture in this day's paper is conceived. It is a summary of the scope of the act, looking before and after. The picture shows what was in America, and what shall be. It commemorates the restoration of the nation to the faith of the fathers, and to their expressed intention in the practice of the Government they formed, and it depicts at a stroke the sublime scope of a measure which is in its form simply a necessary military order.

Mr. NAST never has done work not only the masterly skill of the artist and the eye of the poet, but the perception of the patriot and the heart of the man. His picture presents the equal humanity of the colored race. It shows them swayed by the same emotions, inspired by the same hopes, capable of the same human enjoyment, as those of us who belong to another race. For America does not say that all men are equal in any thing but rights. That it does not say, places the rebel forever say and maintain, that all men, whether of the Shemitic or anti-Shemitic families, whether Mongolians or Caucasians, whether Kaffirs or Celts, whether Asians, Africans, Europeans, or Americans, are men, and therefore are born with a natural equality of right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

TO THE LOUNGER IN THE NEXT BOX.

IF every Lounger could take a part in all the conversation which he hears around him and which greatly interests him, what a general talking he would keep up! I was anxious, for instance, the other evening, when, dining at a chop-house, I heard a pleasant voice in the next box remark, "Well, I don't think the negroes are worth the half-million of lives they are costing us"—I was anxious, I say, to put my head over the box and say, "Well, what then?"

The remark which I heard is said in a great many ways, and is thought in a great many more. What is the sense of it? Obviously to do or be not think that the security of equal rights to every man is worth a war, what do you think of a war to save a nation from anarchy and self-destruction? That is the question. We had not the option of not fighting, except upon the condition of submission to the demands of the enemy. There had been no unconstitutional act upon the part of the Government—no violation of law in the next box! The new party in power did not even control Congress, did they?

—What is the use? That they had made a great row about Slavery? Certainly they had freely discussed it. Was that unconstitutional? They had said that they hoped to keep it within the States where it was. Was that unconstitutional?

The friends of slavery, on the other hand, said they liked it. Did any body infringe their right to say so? They said they would carry it every where. Did any body deny their right other than a perfectly constitutional resistance? Meanwhile they annulled, so far as they could, the Constitutional right of the Government to be supported and sold into slavery free citizens of other parts of the country. They brutally smote a Senator to the floor—

—Hallo! you friend in the next box! you think the friends of liberty were aggravating, do you? Well, those things were done before the question arose into general public discussion. The offense of the North was that it chose to resist constitutionally the effort of the South to carry on the Government quietly and overrun the country with its extremely "peculiar institution."

Do you say the Vorhees passed Personal Liberty bills? Did you ever read one of them? Do you know what they proposed? Of course you do not. But even assuming them to be exactly what you suppose them to be, that is, a legalized State resistance to the national law, have you asked why they were passed? Obviously because your friends of the slave-holding interest had for many years absolutely nullified the national Constitution by whose laws kidnapping and selling citizens of other States without the least charge of crime. You think that the Personal Liberty laws of the North were very "aggravating." What do you think of the Personal Slavery laws of the South?

You are perfectly right in saying that one wrong does not excuse another. But even admitting that they were wrongs, it does not lie in the mouths of those who have done infinitely worse wrongs, and who proposed to change, by arms, to make objection. The Personal Liberty laws were in no sense such a flat and scornful violation of the Constitution as the laws of the South under the name free citizens. But even had they been so, the course of the discontented Southerners was clearly to say, "Here, we will give you back your laws of your citizens, and we will guarantee you the same rights of speech that you secure to us, and do you repeal your Personal Liberty laws."

They chose not to do so. They chose to shout that we trampled upon the Constitution, and then they fired upon the flag. Now what would you have done? You say that the slaves are not worth such bloodshed. Then you would have surrendered. You would have said: "Any thing for a quiet house. We will repeal our liberty bills, and you shall keep your slavery bills. You shall hang people who say they do not like, and we will mob them. You shall take your slaves into the Territories, and we will help you. You shall bring them North, and sell them here at your pleasure. Don't let us quarrel about negroes, who are only fit for slaves."

Friend in the next box, if the nation had said this, who do you think that history would have recorded as only fit for slaves?

"ROMOLA."

THE novel of "Romola," by the author of "Adam Bede," which is now publishing in Harper's Magazine, is one of the most striking stories that has of late appeared in English literature. The lofty tone, the power, the freshness and the beauty of the work, are all remarkable, while it is the most signal proof of the affluent genius of the author. Turning away from England, and the life, and motives, and characters of to-day, she steps back four centuries; plants herself in Florence; makes the daughter of an old Italian scholar of the revival of letters her heroine; a young Greek, bright and shallow, her hero; weaves her plot of the threads of tragical fate that interlace two natures so entirely different; surrounds it with the most vivid and picturesque grouping of the costume, the customs, the spirit, and life of the time; and develops her hero and heroine into two of the most individual creations of modern fiction—one of the few heroines in literature whose lofty beauty and womanly soul impress the reader as they affect her lover, and one of the few heroes whose fascination is as intelligible as his weakness.

The story is not yet ended, nor is the catastrophe discernible. But no woman can read it without such interest and power since "Jane Eyre," although "Romola" differs as entirely from "Jane Eyre" as the Florence of four centuries ago from the Yorkshire of last year.

SUPPOSE, AND SUPPOSE.

SUPPOSE that a Cavalier, in the time of the great civil war in England, had said in a Tory pump at Nottingham, or in his court at Oxford, "Sire, the Cavaliers and Roundheads are both guilty. They are both responsible for the war. The last limit of the prerogative is not the cause, but only the subject, of the war. Let us look to our own faults. Let us correct ourselves, your Majesty, and let us tell the Parliament that all its rights shall be conceded."

Suppose that, after talking to the King in this vein for an hour or two, the Cavalier had added, as he was leaving the royal presence, "But, of course, the Royal prerogative must be maintained, your Majesty; of course, of course."

Do you think that Charles would have counted much upon the sympathy or services of such a gentleman? Would he have called him to his Privy Council? Would he have given him a responsible command upon the eve of Edgehill or Marston Moor?

Suppose that the same words, changing King to Parliament, had been spoken by a member of the Commons. Would Hampden have trusted him? Would Pym have counseled with him? Would Cromwell have tolerated him? Would it not have been perfectly clear that such a Cavalier would have been willing to see the King defeated, and such a Roundhead to see the Parliament humbled?

Or again, suppose that in the Continental Congress a man had said, "Gentlemen, we have certainly very much aggravated the King. If Lord North has been too slow, we have palpably been too fast. We ought to have averted the war. When our General, the worthy Mr. Washington, of Virginia, says to Governor Trumbull that 'persons who are preying upon the vitals of the country ought not to be suffered to stalk at large,' he forgets himself; he overlooks the important truth that a state of war is exactly the same as a state of peace. In fact, gentleman, if we are to countenance such an extravagant document as the hotheaded gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Jefferson has prepared, where is this war to end? How can we ever hope to make peace with Great Britain? Let us never be deluded into forgetfulness of the fact that when war is once established as this is, the only hope of fighting to a successful issue lies not in swords and cannon, which, always as desperate people, but in palm-branches, and smooth talk, and buncomb, as which the enemy speaks, they will have their ill-manners. And why should we be ill-mannered because they are? Does an impoliteness excuse an impoliteness?"

And so on, and so on, for a couple of hours. Don't you think that in the spirit that would have given us the victory? Don't you think that the policy that would have overthrown North, and humiliated King George, and have brought every nation in the world to our side, full of sympathy and respect? If you had heard those words, would you not have believed that you heard Washington, or Adams, or Otis, or Patrick Henry, or Edmund Henry, or General Greene, or Christopher Gadsden, or Old Put? Would you ever for an instant have imagined that he was Conway, or Charles Lee, or Benedict Arnold, who was speaking?

There might be many similar suppositions made in an ingenious mind; but there will answer for to-day.

RIGHTS AND THEIR VIOLATIONS.

MR. BRECHER seems to fall under the high displeasure of the Conservatives. A few weeks since, while he was attending to the Master's business in a church in this city, they daubed his house with filth; and a few evenings since they threatened to mob him if he lectured in a town in New Jersey. Nevertheless he did lecture, and the only Conservative demonstration was a hooting and howling as he returned to the cars. Now is an interesting and suggestive fact that if, instead of ministering to our soldiers, he had gone to his church to set forth the sinfulness of Northern men in exasperating Wigfall and Toombs, his house would not have been defiled. And if he had gone to Elizabeth to lecture the Jerseymen upon their duty of letting our wayward sisters go, the Conservatives would not have threatened trouble. We do not know the subject of his lecture. But we judge, as the Conservatives probably judged, from his antecedents, that there was danger he might say that people ought not to sell other people's babies merely because they were poor and helpless; and that is a little more than Conservatism can stand.

We say Conservatism, and we say it advisedly. The party which claims that name to-day is the party which has always favored and incited riots for the suppression of free speech in time of perfect quiet, and which now complains because in a time of extreme public peril some few men have been silenced by the Government. The party which to-day assumes to be Conservative is the party which has always said, when the peace has been broken by a mob on account of a speech or lecture which the inciters of the mob did not like, "Of course; served him right. Let him shut up his d—— mouth!" The leaders of the public riots in Boston and Philadelphia, and New York and Syracuse, in the winters of 1859–'60, were what is called "respectable" men, under whose guidance and support the rabble acted; and these "respectable" men are now the chief pillars of the Conservative party, which is so overwhelmed at the arbitrary invasion of the rights of speech by that hoary and appalling despot, Abraham Lincoln.

Moreover, this same Conservative party is the same party which at that time frankly and openly defended the destruction of the plainest constitutional rights at the South. If a man was tarred and feathered in Georgia or Arkansas, "Of course," they said, "why didn't he hold his tongue? If we could only force these fellows to be silent here at the North, we shouldn't all be in danger of being hung when we go into a slave State."

On the other hand, when Toombs lectured in Boston, was he mobbed? When Yancey made a tour through the North, in the very heat of a tremendous political canvass, was he mobbed? When, a little earlier, the dull Simms and the sentimental Thompson lectured in the Lyceums—were they mobbed? No, never. The newspapers of this pseudo-conservatism unblushingly declare that the "Free-speech party" is very zealous for its own speech, and very inimical to that of others. It is simply untrue. A street-mob gathered against an unpopular speaker by the anti-slavery party in this country is an event almost, if not altogether unknown. While the innumerable threats and riotous attempts against the free public discussion of important public questions by American citizens have always been instigated, and often led by those who now claim, as they then claimed, to be Conservative; and, therefore, while we would not hold any party responsible for the excesses of its individual members, the truth of history justifies us in the assertion that the spirit of the Conservative party in this country has favored and still favors the most lawless and dangerous assaults upon individual rights.

To attempt to extenuate such street-mobs by the arrest by Government in time of war of men who are trying to embarrass and defeat its efforts to save itself from destruction is futile and foolish. The Government has not suppressed free speech. It has tolerated not only honest criticism but the most venomous attacks in the interest of disunion and rebellion. In the confusion of the sudden burst of the war it stopped Schnabel's mouth for a little while; but soon released him, and has permitted Vallandigham, and Van Buren, and Rynders to say exactly what they chose. We certainly do not claim that the Government is infallible, or has made no mistakes. But we do claim, and history will confirm, that the friends of that Government, those who brought it into power and those who sustain it now, are not only the especial friends of the natural rights of all men, but of the constitutional privileges of American citizens—while the party that now calls itself Conservative not only denies the rights of man, but systematically, in time of perfect peace, connives at the violation of the constitutional rights of citizens.

A PLUM FOR THE DISCONSOLATE.

THERE is one consolation in contemplating the Proclamation, and that is, that one man, at least, is pleased. What man? No other than our wayward sister Van Buren. On the 13th of July, 1849, he made a speech in Cleveland, Ohio. Will you taste a plum from it, this fine morning? Here it is, at your service:

"Yet there is one thing which remains to be done to perfect this proud fabric [the government], and render it as enduring as time. Strike the manacles from the slave, and elevate him to the position of a moral, rational, intelligent, and, if need be, A POLITICAL BEING!"

It is clear what Mr. Van Buren went to Washington for. It was to urge the President not to falter. And the President has done the very thing which our wayward sister thought was the only thing wanting to make the government eternal!

CHANCE IN BATTLE.

SIR EDWARD CUST, a retired British General, who was contemporary with all the great wars of this century, has been writing their annals. Two of his volumes cover the first nine years of the century, including the battles of Marengo, Austerlitz, Eylau, Jena, and Wagram; Trafalgar and Copenhagen; Assaye, Laswarree, Delhi, Agra; and Talavera—with lesser fights by sea and land.

Such a book has a most timely interest; and one of its chief morals is the truth which General Napier always so strongly stated, that the event of every battle is in a great degree a matter of chance. In a position favorable to cavalry, a dashing charge may turn defeat into victory. Or again, as at Waterloo, an unseen road, which Napoleon did not know, may baffle the shrewdest plan, and wrest from your hands the victory already grasped.

Thus, in speaking of Marengo, which was the first overwhelming triumph of the First Consul—making him, as General Cust thinks, Emperor—he says: "The personal fame accruing to him as the victor and director of the contest has been greatly exaggerated. The battle was clearly lost at four o'clock; and had the Austrian General been where he ought to have been, there was nothing in the renewed combinations of Napoleon which could have carried the day. But when the Austrians were surprised, and at one blow deprived both of Melas and De Zach, so slight an event as a successful charge of cavalry was enough to change completely the state of affairs, and to convert defeat into victory."

If we bore such facts in mind, we should not suffer ourselves to be profoundly depressed or foolishly elated by the success of any single engagement. We should neither suppose that "the backbone of the rebellion" was broken because Vicksburg, for instance, was taken; nor that there was no longer any hope for mankind and civil liberty because Burnside was not successful at Fredericksburg. Marengo alone would certainly not have made Napoleon Emperor. So no single victory, but continued success alone, will subdue the rebellion.

AN AMUSING BOOK.

MR. STEPHEN C. MASSETT, otherwise "Colonel Jeems Pipes of Pipesville," has in the press of Carleton an autobiographical work, called "Drifting About." The title precisely expresses the scope and character of the book. "Colonel Jeems" carries his reader with him all over the world. He drifts from Botany Bay to St. Peter's; from eating Poi with the King of the Sandwich Islands to riding upon a donkey through the bazars of Cairo. From California and Oregon and Australia he passes to India, where he arrives during the Sepoy rebellion. His shrewd eye shows him in all these lands and scenes the most striking and amusing points, and his ready pen nimbly sketches them for the companions who wish to have all the pleasure of drifting without the annoyances. And as the work will be "comically illustrated," whoever selects "Colonel Jeems" as his guide, philosopher, and friend in a rapid circumnavigation of the globe will hardly fail to be diverted and instructed.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A HINT FOR THE LAZY.—The sun wouldn't be as bright as he is if it were not for his early rising.

NURSERY RHYMES.

There was a young lady of Bicester,
One day that her lover had kissed her,
She seemed quite perplexed,
And to show she was vexed
She gave such a slap to her sister.

There was a young lady of Leeds,
Her eyes were the bigness of beads;
When they said, "Do you squint?"
She replied, "I've got lint,
Which I put to my nose when it bleeds."

There was a young lady of Harrow,
Who would go to church in a barrow;
It stuck in the aisle,
And she said, with a smile,
"They build these here churches too narrow."

The first apple was eaten by the first pair.

"Man is placed in this world as a spectator; when he is tired of wondering at all the novelties about him, and not till then, does he desire to be made acquainted with the causes that create these wonders.

We are told that in Michigan they sheer sheep by machinery. We should have thought this had been a sheer impossibility.

The man that forgets a great deal that has happened has a better memory than he who remembers a great deal that never happened.

We are told to "take care;" but it comes soon enough whether we want to take it or not.

One kind of mortar is designed to fill up chinks; another to make them.

Judy Brallaghan having been requested to open some oysters, after knocking them about for some time, exclaimed, "Upon my conscience, then, but they are mighty hard to peel!"

Carriage accidents may be avoided in winter by keeping the horses' shoes and the driver's bottle well corked.

A correspondent writes to ask how much the waist of time measures round?

Mosquitoes are like doctors, they never let blood without running up a bill.

A man cut off by his baker for non-payment of his bill is "struck off the rolls."

People who like so much to talk their mind should sometimes try to mind their talk.

LINES WRITTEN ON GLASS.—The following lines are visible on a window-pane of the Hotel des Pays-Bas, Spa, Belgium:

"1793.
"I love but one, and only one,
Oh, Damon, thou art he;
Love thou but one, and only one,
And let that one be me."

Why should the stars be the best astronomers?—Because they have studded (studied) the heavens ever since the creation.

A girl recently stole a pair of gloves, givin[illegible]son that she only wished to keep her hand in.

A garrulous barber happening to be called on to shave a celebrated wit, asked him, "How shall I shave you, Sir?" "In silence," was the reply.

Why are a pin and a poker like a blind man?—Because they have no eyes.

Beauty is a stronger wooer than loving words; so the women woo us more than we do them.

It sounds oddly that a ship of war, when at sea, keeps every one of her guns in port.

When are gloves unsalable?—When they are kept on hand.

Are the minutes relating to an affair of honor always drawn up by the seconds?

If we grasp quicksilver, it slips through the fingers; and this is apt to be the case with most silver.

Pressures in the money-market are far less pleasant to young people than pressures in the love-market.

The commonest way to steal is to buy and not pay.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Wednesday, January 5, in the Senate, the Military Committee made a report regarding the swords of honor belonging to the late rebel General Twiggs. The Committee recommend that one of the swords be bestowed upon General Butler, another deposited in the library of the Military Academy at West Point, and the third be preserved in the Patent Office as a trophy of the rebellion. A bill to reimburse Minnesota for expenditures incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities was referred to the Military Committee. The resolution regarding State prisoners was then taken up, and Senator Field, of New Jersey, made a speech defending the policy of suspending the writ of habeas corpus, etc. The bill empowering the President to issue letters of marque was referred to the Naval Committee. The bill forfeiting the pay of officers of the army who are absent from their duties over thirty days was passed. A bill was introduced repealing so much of the act establishing the grade of line officers in the navy as authorizes the appointment of rear-admirals and commodores on the retired list; referred to the Naval Committee. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a resolution denouncing General Grant for issuing an order expelling the Jews from his department was laid on the table by a vote of 56 against 53. A resolution of thanks to General Butler for his energetic, able, and humane administration of affairs in the Department of the Gulf was offered. A motion to lay it on the table was negatived—27 against 77. The resolution was then laid aside. The debate on the Bankrupt Bill was then resumed, and several members spoke in favor of the measure. As a test of the sense of the House on the subject, a motion was made to lay the bill on the table, which was rejected by a vote of 59 yeas against 66 nays. The further consideration of the bill was then postponed till Thursday week, and the House adjourned.

On Thursday, 6th, in the Senate, the Military Committee reported back the bill to raise volunteers for the defense of Kentucky, with an amendment as a substitute. A joint resolution giving the thanks of Congress to General Rosecrans and his army, for their gallantry at Murfreesboro, was referred. The bill to tax bank-bills and fractional currency was taken up, and Senator Sherman, of Ohio, made a speech in support of the measure. The debate on the bill for the discharge of state prisoners was then resumed. Senator Saulsbury, of Delaware, severely denounced the Administration, while Senator Anthony, of Rhode Island, defended the Government. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a bill was reported providing ways and means for the support of the Government. The Treasury Bank bill was reported back with a negative recommendation. A resolution tendering the thanks of the House to General Butler, for his able administration of the affairs of the Department of the Gulf, was adopted by a vote of 83 to 28. A resolution calling for a detailed report of operations connected with the negroes at Port Royal, and in Georgia, was laid on the table—81 against 50. On motion of Mr. Dunn, it was resolved that the Attorney-General be requested to inform the House whether the law for the confiscation of rebel property has been enforced in the District of Columbia, and if not, the reason for delaying the execution of the same. A resolution, asking the Secretary of the Treasury why he has not provided the means for paying the army, and why the bonds heretofore authorized to be sold, if necessary, to make such payments, have not been sold, was adopted. The credentials of the member elect from the second district of Virginia, Mr. John B. M'Leod, were presented and referred. In Committee of the Whole a long and interesting debate occurred on national questions, in which Messrs. Stevens of Pennsylvania, Dunlap of Kentucky, Thomas of Massachusetts, Olin of New York, and Lovejoy of Illinois participated.

On Friday, 7th, in the Senate, a bill for the construction of a ship canal from the Mississippi River to Lake Michigan, so as to admit of the passage of armed vessels, and to enlarge the locks of Erie and Oswego canals in New York, to adapt them to the defense of the Northern lakes, was introduced and ordered to be printed. Senator Willey gave notice of a bill to aid Western Virginia in the speedy and final extinguishment of slavery in that State. A bill providing for the punishment of persons convicted of crime in the District of Columbia by confinement in the prisons of States, was passed. Senator Collamer introduced a bill authorizing suits to be instituted by persons who may have been wronged by reason of summary arrest, and for the transfer of such suits to the Circuit Court of the United States. The bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee. The joint resolution for the prompt payment of the army and navy was reported back by the Finance Committee.——In the House, reports for and against raising volunteers for the defense of Tennessee, were presented by the Military Committee. The bill making appropriations for the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the Government was passed. The Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was passed. The remainder of the session was devoted to general debate on national topics, in which Messrs. Bingham, Cox, Biddle, and Norton participated.

Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, 12th, in the Senate, the bill providing for a further issue of bonds and United States notes, with a view to the prompt payment of the army and navy, was passed. A resolution requesting the President to inform the Senate what measures have been taken to enforce the Confiscation bill, and if any additional legislation is necessary for the enforcement of such act, was adopted. A resolution requesting the Committee on the Conduct of the War to report the causes of the non-execution of the Confiscation act, especially in the District of Columbia, was adopted. Notice was given of a bill for the consolidation of regiments in the field, and to facilitate the return of absentees from the army. The bill relative to arbitrary arrests was taken up, and Senator Wilkinson, of Minnesota, made a speech, in which he charged the Democrats with plotting to break up the Government, and Quarter-master General Meigs and Adjutant-General Thomas with disloyalty. The bill to raise volunteers for the defense of Kentucky was passed by a vote of 23 against 18.——In the House, a resolution to discharge the Ways and Means Committee from the further consideration of the bill reducing the duty on imported paper, and that the same be considered in the House forthwith, was laid on the table. The committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duty on rags. A joint resolution, ratifying and approving of the President's emancipation proclamation was introduced, and a motion to lay it on the table was disagreed to—50 against 85. The subject was then referred to the Judiciary Committee. A resolution directing inquiry as to the expediency of granting one hundred and sixty acres of land of any confiscated rebel plantation to soldiers was adopted by a vote of 66 against 59. Mr. Stevens introduced a bill providing for the employment of 150,000 negroes in the military service. A motion to lay it on the table was lost—53 against 83—and the bill was then laid aside till Wednesday week. In Committee of the Whole the bill providing ways and means for the support of the Government was taken up, and Mr. Spaulding delivered an important speech on the subject. He concluded by saying that by military success only could the national finances be maintained and the Union restored.

On Tuesday, 13th, in the Senate, the petition in favor of mediation in our affairs by Switzerland was reported back from the Foreign Affairs Committee with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, which was agreed to. A bill for the consolidation of regiments in the field was introduced and referred. A resolution was adopted requesting the President to furnish the Senate with all official correspondence in reference to the capture of British vessels carrying articles contraband of war intended for the Southern rebels. A resolution was also adopted requesting the President to communicate the correspondence, if any there be, between the State Department and the Mexican Minister at Washington relative to exportations contraband of war from any of our ports to those of Mexico. The death of the late Senator James A. Pearce, of Maryland, was then announced, and, after eulogies on the deceased by different members, the Senate, out of respect to his memory, adjourned.——In the House, the Speaker announced Messrs. Fenton of New York, Kellogg of Illinois, Wadsworth of Kentucky, and English of Connecticut, as a special committee to inquire into the expediency and necessity of a direct railroad between New York and Washington, for the purpose of facilitating the transportation of mails, troops, arms and war munitions. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide ways and means for the support of Government, and Mr. Morrill, of Vermont, spoke at some length on the subject. A message from the Senate, announcing the death of Senator Pearce, of Maryland, was received, and various members, in fitting words, offered tributes to his memory, after which appropriate resolutions were adopted, and the House adjourned.

OUR REPULSE AT VICKSBURG.

General Sherman's repulse at Vicksburg was complete. The entire force, under General M'Clernand, re-embarked on 3d on transports, closely followed by the rebel advance, which, coming in range of the gun-boats, were driven back with severe loss. Our loss, as near as could be ascertained, was six hundred killed, one thousand five hundred wounded, and one thousand missing.

A council of war was held on 4th on board the Tigress, which vessel for the present has been selected by General M'Clernand as his head-quarters. Admiral Porter, Major-Generals Sherman and M'Clernand, with the Generals of the divisions of the army in Kentucky were present. It was determined at this council that it would be folly again to attempt any thing further against Vicksburg with the present force. The rebels had means of communication by which they were too rapidly and heavily reinforced, while the Unionists had no such opportunity or prospect of receiving reinforcements. It was, therefore, deemed expedient that the campaign should be abandoned for the present.

A telegraphic dispatch from General Pemberton to the rebel Secretary of War, dated on the 8th, says that all the Union troops have gone up the river; that there were only seven gun-boats between Vicksburg and Milliken's Bend, and that the city was being strengthened every day, and could be maintained against all attacks. The rebel Generals Pemberton and Price are in command there. The rebel forces have been reinforced to the extent of sixty thousand men. They have an artillery force of one hundred and sixty guns in battery, besides a large number of field-pieces. Our losses in the expedition are from two thousand five hundred to three thousand in killed, wounded, and missing. The enemy's loss is unknown, but it must have been large.

EXPEDITION UP WHITE RIVER.

Dispatches from Memphis state that Commodore Porter's squadron, together with a land force under General M'Clernand, have gone up the White River. General Grant had arrived at Memphis. Holly Springs is said to be nearly consumed.

RECAPTURE OF GALVESTON.

The rebels made an attack on Galveston, Texas, by land and water, on New-Year's Day, and recaptured it. They made a bold assault on steamers protected by cotton bales, from behind which they poured so murderous a fire upon our gun-boats that the Harriet Lane had to succumb, and was taken, after being boarded by the rebel sharp-shooters, and her captain (Wainwright) and most of her crew killed. The flag-ship Westfield was blown up by her commander, Captain Renshaw, in order to save her from capture. He and his first lieutenant and many of his crew perished with her. The small command under Colonel Burrill, at Galveston, were nearly all killed or taken prisoners. We give on page 60 a map of Galveston, which illustrates the event.

The Richmond Enquirer, in describing it, says: "General Magruder, in his official dispatch concerning the capture of the Harriet Lane, says, 'I have taken six hundred prisoners and a large quantity of valuable stores, arms, etc. The Harriet Lane is but little injured.'"

The rebels numbered about 5000. Colonel Burrill's troops did not exceed 300. Our loss is estimated at 160 killed and 200 taken prisoners.

AN ATTACK ON SPRINGFIELD.

On January 8 the rebels, 6000 strong, under Generals Marmaduke and Burbridge, made an attack on the town of Springfield, Missouri, and opened fire upon it without giving notice to remove the women and children. General Brown defended the town. A body of fully 1000 rebel cavalry were visible, drawn up in line of battle.

On 12th General Curtis telegraphed to General Halleck that our troops, under Colonel Crabb, at Springfield, had repulsed the rebels at that place at every advance, and then held the town. Our men behaved gallantly. We lost only 17 killed. The enemy were in full retreat, and General Curtis had three columns in pursuit of them. Thirty-five of the rebels were killed, and a large number of wounded were left in our hands.

AFFAIRS IN TENNESSEE.

Intelligence from the vicinity of Murfreesboro is to the effect that General Bragg had fallen back to Tullahoma, to give his army rest. Tullahoma is situated on Rock Creek, seventy-one miles from Nashville and thirty-two from Murfreesboro, and on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, where it intercepts the M'Minnville and Manchester road. According to a rebel dispatch from Chattanooga, "The enemy [General Rosecrans] has advanced his line seven miles this side of Murfreesboro. He has been guilty of the most outrageous enormities, stealing private property, robbing peaceable citizens, and running off negroes."

ANOTHER SPEECH FROM JEFF DAVIS.

Jeff Davis has been making another speech at Mobile, in which he talks hopefully and boastingly of the ultimate success of the South over "the Yankees, who are seeking to enchain us in the same degrading servitude with themselves, with a baboon for a king."

THE "ALABAMA."

The Alabama appears to have turned up on the 12th ult. off the desert island of Banquitta, coast of Venezuela, where she took in coal from a vessel awaiting her there. The San Jacinto arrived there just twenty-four hours after the pirate left.

Another report says that she has gone to the south coast of Asia.

BURNING OF THE STATE HOUSE AT BATON ROUGE.

The State House at Baton Rouge, the capital of Louisiana, now occupied by General Banks, was totally destroyed by fire on the 28th of December. The library and all the buildings connected with this fine structure were burned to the ground. It was strongly and plausibly suspected that the disaster was the work of rebel incendiaries.

A REWARD FOR BUTLER'S HEAD.

It appears by the Southern papers that Hon. Richard Yeadon has offered a reward of ten thousand dollars for the head of General Benjamin F. Butler. This Yeadon is editor of the Charleston Courier, and is known among the fraternity by the sobriquet of "Sancho Panza." From his personal appearance we should judge that he never had money enough to buy himself a respectable-looking coat.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

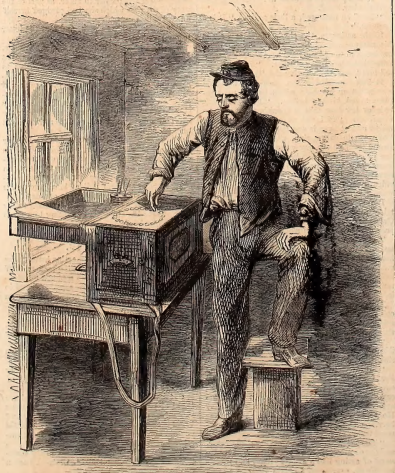
A MEETING OF WORKING MEN.

THE working men of Manchester have made an important demonstration in support of the cause of the American Union, expressing at the same time their approval of the war and emancipation policy of President Lincoln by the adoption of an address of congratulation to him. The Mayor of Manchester presided, but not in his official capacity, and the negro, Jackson, ex-coachman of Jeff Davis, was on the platform. A Union effort "to coerce the South" found favor, and was indorsed by the resolutions.

WINTER-QUARTERS IN CAMP.—THE INSIDE OF A HUT.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE ARMY TELEGRAPH—SETTING UP THE WIRE DURING AN ACTION.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.



WE continue our series of illustrations of the Army of the Potomac. On page 52 we publish a picture by Mr. W. Homer illustrating

CAMP-LIFE IN WINTER.

Mr. Homer shows us the interior of a hut, in which a glowing fire is blazing, shedding light and warmth around. Stretched on the floor, bunks, and seats, are soldiers in every imaginable position—smoking, chatting, reading, card-playing, and sleeping. Almost in every company there is one sharp-witted fellow who can tell a good story. The soldiers' great delight is to get this man into a tent or hut, and start him on a good long old-fashioned yarn, which lasts from dark until far on in the night. The scene—while the narrator is harrowing the imaginations of his rapt hearers, and the red glare of the fire lights up odd spots in the darkness—is very striking. On this page Mr. Waud has illustrated for us the

ARMY TELEGRAPH.

Of this important institution he says: "The army signal-telegraph has been so far perfected that in a few hours quite a large force can be in constant connection with head-quarters. This, while a battle is progressing, is a great convenience. The wire used is a copper one insulated, raised on light poles, made expressly for the purpose, on convenient trees, or trailed along fences. The wire and the instrument can be easily carried in a cart, which as it proceeds unwinds the wire, and, when a connection is made, becomes the telegraph-office. Where the cart can not go the men carry the drum of wire by hand. In the picture the cart has come to a halt, and the signalmen are hastening along—some with the drum, while others with two-bars make the holes for the poles, upon which it is rapidly raised.

THE ARMY TELEGRAPH—THE OPERATOR AT WORK.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.]

A SIGNAL STATION AT NIGHT.—[SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

The machine is a simple one, worked by a handle, which is passed around a dial-plate marked with numerals and the alphabet. By stopping at the necessary letters a message is easily spelled out upon the instrument at the other end of the line, which repeats by a pointer every move on the dial-plate. The whole thing is so simple that any man able to read and write can work it with facility."

Mr. Davis shows us, on page 53,

AN ARMY SIGNAL-STATION AT NIGHT.

The signal corps is one of the most hard-worked and deserving bodies in the service. All day and all night its members are kept busy telegraphing news of movements and orders from one end of the army to the other, by the aid of their inexpressible signals.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN MCLENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER III.

MAGDALEN'S first glance round the empty room showed her the letter on the table. The address, as the doctor had predicted, broke the news the moment she looked at it.

Not a word escaped her. She sat down by the table, pale and silent, with the letter in her lap. Twice she attempted to open it, and twice she put it back again. The hypocrite time was not alone in her mind as she looked at her sister's handwriting—the fear of Kirke was there with it. "Is my past life" she thought. "Who will he think of me when he knows my past life?"

She made another effort and broke the seal. A second letter dropped out of the inclosure, addressed to her in a handwriting with which she was not familiar. She put the second letter aside, and read the lines which Norah had written:

"VENTNOR, Isle of Wight, August 24.

"MY DEAREST MAGDALEN,—When you read this letter, try to think we have only been parted since yesterday, and dismiss from your mind (as I have dismissed from mine) the past and all that belongs to it.

"I am strictly forbidden not to agitate you, or to weary you by writing a long letter. Is it wrong to tell you that I am the happiest woman living? I hope not, for I can't keep the secret to myself.

"My darling, prepare yourself for the greatest surprise I have ever caused you. I am married. It is only a week to-day since I parted with my old name—it is only a week since I have been the happy wife of George Bartram of St. Crux.

"There were difficulties, at first, in the way of our marriage, some of them, I am afraid, of my making. Happily for me, my husband knew, from the letters I wrote, that I really loved him; he gave me a second chance of telling him so after I had lost the first, and, as you see, I was wise enough to do it. You ought to be especially interested, my love, in this marriage, for you are the cause of it. If I had not gone to Aldborough to meet the lost corpse of you—you—George had not been brought there, at the same time, by circumstances in which you were concerned, my husband and I might never have met. When we look back to our first impressions of each other we look back to you.

"I insist on my promise not to weary you. I must bring this letter (sorely against my will) to an end. Patience! patience!—I shall see you soon. George and I are both coming to London to take you back with us to Ventnor. This is my husband's invitation, mind, as well as mine. Since I have married him, I have studied, until I had taught him to think of you as I think—to wish with my wishes, and to hope with my hopes. It would be much more delightful to me, much more about George, if I might only give my thoughts and my pen their own way. But I must leave Miss Garth (at her own special request) a blank space to fill up on the last page of this letter; and I must only add one word more before I say good-by—a word to warn you that I have another surprise in store, which I am keeping in reserve until we meet. Don't attempt to guess what it is. You might guess for ages, and be no nearer than you are now to a discovery of the truth.

"Your affectionate sister,

"NORAH BARTRAM."

[ADDED BY MISS GARTH.]

"MY DEAR CHILD,—If I had ever lost my old loving recollection of you, I should feel it in my heart again now when I know that it has pleased God to restore you to us from the brink of the grave. I add these lines to your sister's letter because I am not sure that you are quite so fit yet, as she thinks you, to accept her proposal. She has not said a word of her husband, or herself, which is not true. But Mr. Bartram is a stranger to you—and if you think you can recover more easily and more pleasantly to yourself, under the wing of your old governess, than under the protection of your new brother-in-law, come to me first, and trust to my reconciling Norah to the change of plans. I have watched the refusal of a little cottage at Shanklin—near enough to your sister to allow of your seeing each other whenever you like, but sufficiently away, at the same time, to secure you the privilege, when you wish it, of being alone. Send me one line, before you leave Ventnor, to say so. And I will write to Shanklin by the next post.

"Always yours affectionately,

"HARRIET GARTH."

The letter dropped from Magdalen's hand. Thoughts which had never risen in her mind yet, rose in it now.

Norah, whose courage under undeserved calamity had been the courage of unselfishness, Norah, who had patiently accepted her hard lot—who! from first to last, had meditated no vengeance, and stooped to no deceit—Norah had reached the end which all her sister's ingenuity, all her sister's resolution, and all her sister's daring, had failed to reach! Norah had been tenderly, with love on one side and love on the other, Norah had married the man who possessed the Combe-Raven secret! Norah Magdalen's own scheme to recover it had opened the way to the event which had brought husband and wife together!

As the light of that overwhelming discovery broke on her mind the old strife was renewed; the old Good Evil struggled for mastery which should win her—but with added forces this time; with the new spirit that had been breathed into her own by the influence of Norah, and had grown with the growth of her gratitude to the man who had saved her, fighting on the better side. All the higher impulses of her nature, which had never, from first to last, let her err with impunity—which had tortured her, before the marriage and after, with the knowledge that no woman inherently heartless and inherently wicked can feel—all the nobler elements in her character which had entered into the present struggle, and strengthened her to meet, with no unworthy shrinking, the revelation that had opened on her view, were now strengthened in the light of its own immortal life, the truth rose before her from the ashes of her dead passions, from the grave of her buried love. She looked, she looked at the letter again—when she read the words once more, which told her that the recovery of the secret had been the work of Norah, not hers, she had victoriously trampled down all little jealousies and all mean regrets; she could say in her heart of hearts, "Norah has deserved it!"

The day wore on. She s t absorbed in her own thoughts, and heedless o the second letter, which she had not opened yet until Kirke's return.

He stopped on the landing outside, and, opening the door a little way only, asked, without entering the room, if Magdalen wanted anything that he could send her. She begged him to come in. His face was worn and weary; he looked older than she had seen him look yet. "Have you put my letter on the table for me?" she asked.

"Yes. I put it there at the doctor's request."

"I suppose the doctor has told you, too, of my sister? She is coming to see me, and Miss Garth is coming to see me. They will thank you for all your goodness to me better than I can."

"I have no claim on their thanks," he answered, sternly. "I have only done what I have done for them but for you." He waited a little and looked at her. His face would have betrayed him to her in the days when she had first betrayed him in the next words he spoke, if she had not guessed the truth already. "When your friends arrive, Miss Garth tells me, they will take you away, I suppose, to some better place than this?"

"They will take me to no place," she said, gently, "which I shall think of as I think of the place where you found me. They can take me to no dearer friend than the friend who has saved my life."

There was a moment's silence between them.

"We have not, after all, begun very happily," he went on, in lower and lower tones. "You won't forget me when we have said good-by?"

She turned away from the words pained his lips; and, leaving her chair, knelt down at the table, so as to look up into his face, and to force him to look into hers.

"Why do you talk of it?" she asked. "We are not going to say good-by—at least not yet."

"I thought you—"

"Yes?"

"I thought your friends were coming here—"

She eagerly interrupted him. "Do you think I would go away with any body," she said, "even with the dearest relation I have in the world, and leave you here, not knowing and not caring whether I ever saw you again? Oh, you don't think that of me!" she exclaimed, with the passionate tears springing into her eyes—"I am sure you don't think that of me!"

"No," he said: "I never have thought, I never can think, unjustly or unworthily of you."

Before he could add another word she left the table as suddenly as she had approached it, and returned to her chair. He had unconsciously replied in terms that reminded her of the hard necessity which still remained unfulfilled—the necessity of telling him the story of the past. Not an idea of concealing that story from his knowledge crossed her mind. "Will he love me, when he knows the truth, as he loves me now?" That was her only thought as she tried to approach the subject in his presence without shrinking from it.

"Let us put my own feelings out of the question," she said. "There is a reason for my not going away, unless I first have the assurance of seeing you again. You have a claim—the strongest claim of any one—to know how I came here, unknown to my friends, and how it was that you found me fallen so low."

"I make no claim," he said, hastily. "I wish to know nothing which it distresses you to tell me."

"You have always done your duty," she rejoined, with a faint smile. "Let me take example from you, if I can, and try to do mine."

"I am old enough to be your father," he said, bitterly. "Your duty is more easily done at my age than it is at yours."

His age was so constantly in his mind now that he could not but be in her mind too. She had never given it a thought. The reference to it had just made to it did not divert her for a moment from the subject on which she was speaking to him.

"You don't know how I value your good opinion of me," she said, entreatingly, "or how I wish to retain her sinking courage. "How can I deserve your kindness, how can I feel that I am worthy of your regard, if you keep concealing my heart from you? Oh, don't encourage me in my own miserable weakness! Help me to tell the truth—force me to tell it, for my own sake, if not for yours!"

He was deeply moved by the fervent sincerity of that appeal.

"You shall tell it," he said. "You are right—and I was wrong." He waited a little, and considered. "Would it be easier to you," he asked, with delicate consideration for her, "to write it than to tell it?"

She eagerly caught at the suggestion. "Far easier," she replied. "I can be sure of myself—I can be sure of hiding nothing from you, if I write it. Shall I begin directly, on your side?" she added suddenly, rising, with a woman's instinctive quickness of penetration, the danger of totalking of yesterday's Weighfield influence over him. "Wait till we meet, and tell me with your own lips what you think."

"When shall I tell it?"

"Here," she said, eagerly. "Here, where you found me helpless—here, where you have brought me back to life, and where I have learned to know you. I can bear the hardest words you say to me, if you will only say them in this room. Not to-day—it is late. I can bear longer than a month; a month will be enough, and more than enough. If I come back—" She stopped suddenly. "I am thinking of myself," she said, "when I ought to be thinking of you. You have your own occupations, and your own affairs. When can you decide for us? Will you say how it shall be?"

"It shall be as you wish. If you come back in a month, you will find me here."

"Will it cause you no sacrifice of your own comfort and your own plans?"

"It will cause me no sacrifice," he replied, "but a journey back to the City." He rose and took his hat. "I must go there at once," he added, "if I shall get back in time."

"It is a promise between us?" she said, and held out her hand.

"It is," he answered, a little sadly. "It is a promise."

Slight as it was, the shade of melancholy in his manner struck her. Forgetting all other anxieties in the anxiety to cheer him, she gently pressed the hand he gave her. "If that won't kill him for me," she thought, "what will?"

It failed to tell him the truth—but it forced a question on his mind which he had not ventured to ask himself before. "Is it her gratitude or her love that is speaking to me?" he wondered. "If I was only a younger man, I might almost hope for love." The bitter, terrible sum in subtraction, which had first presented itself on the day when she told him her name, began to work again in his mind as he left the house. He took twenty from forty-one, at intervals, all the way back to the ship-owners' office in Cornhill.

Left by herself, Magdalen approached the table to read the letter in answer which Miss Garth requested, and gratefully to accept the proposal that had been made to her.

The second letter lay open. She had laid aside and forgotten, was the first object that caught her eye on changing her place. She opened it immediately, and looked at the signature. To her unutterable astonishment her correspondent proved to be no less a person than Mr. Clare!

The philosopher's letter dispensed with all the ordinary forms of address, and entered on its subject without any preliminary phrases of any kind in these uncompromising terms:

"I have more news for you of that contemptible cur, my nephew, than it is in the fewest possible words.

"As I always told you, if you remember, that Frank was a Sneak. The very first trace we discovered of him, after his running away from his employers in China, presents him in that character.

"When he chose to think he turns up at last. He turns up hidden behind a couple of flour barrels, on board an English vessel bound homeward from Hong-Kong to London.

"The name of the ship was The Deliverance, and the commander was one Captain Kirke. Instead of acting like a sensible man, and throwing Frank overboard, Captain Kirke was fool enough to listen to his story. He made the most of his misfortunes, you may be sure—he was half starved; he was an Englishman lost in a strange country, without a friend to help him; his only chance of getting home was to sneak into the hold of an English vessel—and he had sneaked in, accordingly, at Hong-Kong, two days since. That was his story. Any other Jost in Frank's situation would have been rope's-ended by any other captain. Deserving no pity from any body, Frank was, as a matter of course, coddled and compassionated on the spot. The captain took him by the hand, the crew pitied him, and the passengers patted him on the back. He was fed, clothed, and presented with his passage home. Luck enough, so far, you will say. Nothing of the sort; nothing like luck enough for my despicable son.

"The ship touched at the Cape of Good Hope. Among his other acts of folly, Captain Kirke took a woman-passenger on board at that place—not a young woman, by any means—the elderly widow of a rich colonist. Is it necessary to say that she forthwith became deeply interested in Frank and his misfortunes? Is it necessary to tell you what followed? Look back at my uncle's career, and you will see that what followed was all of a piece with what went before. He didn't deserve your poor father's interest in him —and he got it. He didn't deserve your attachment—and he got it. He didn't deserve the best place in one of the best offices in London; he didn't deserve an equally good chance in one of the best mercantile houses in China; he didn't deserve food, clothing, pity, and a free passage home—and he got them all. Last, but not least, he didn't even deserve to marry a woman old enough to be his grandmother—and he has done it. Not five minutes since I sent his letter-writing out to the dust-hole, and tossed the letter that came with them into the fire. The last piece of information which that letter contained is, that he and his wife are looking out for a house and estate to suit them. Mark my words, Frank will get one of the best estates in England; and I, a man the House of Commons will follow as matter of course; and one of the legislators of this Assembly-ridden world will be—My dear Miss Garth—

"If you are the sensible girl I have always taken you for, you have long since learned to look at this in a true value, and have even a send you will only confirm your contempt for him. I wish your poor father could have lived to see Frank's end. Often as I have amused my old gossip, I don't know that I ever felt the loss of him so keenly as I felt it when Frank's wedding-card and the above letter came to this house.

"Your friend, if you ever want one,

"FRANCIS CLARE, SEN."

With one momentary disturbance of her composure, produced by the appearance of Kirke's name in the letter, Magdalen's singular self-command had now fully recovered its sway. Miss Garth had read the letter steadily through from beginning to end. The time when it could have distressed her was gone by; the news that had since fallen from her eyes. Mr. Clare himself would have been satisfied if he had seen the quiet contempt on her face as she folded his letter. The only serious thought it cost her was the thought in which Kirke was concerned. This careless manner in which he had referred, in her presence, to the passengers on board his ship, without mentioning any of them by their names, showed her that Frank must have kept silence on the subject of the engagement once existing between them. The confession of that vanished delusion was left for her to make, as part of the story of the past which she had pledged herself unreservedly to relate.

She wrote to Miss Garth, and sent the letter to the post immediately.

The next morning brought a line of rejoinder. Miss Garth had written to secure the cottage at Shanklin, and Mr. Merrick had consented to Magdalen's proposed visit to the Isle of Wight. Norah would be the first to arrive at the house; and Miss Garth would follow, with a comfortable carriage, to take the invalid to the railway. Every needful arrangement had been made for her: the effect of moving was the one effort she would have to dread.

Magdalen read the letter thankfully—but her thoughts wandered from it, and followed Kirke on his return to the City. What was the business which had once already taken him there in the morning? And why had the promise exchanged between them obliged him to go to the City again for the second time in one day?

Was it by any chance business relating to the sea? Were his employers tempting him to go back to his ship?

CHAPTER IV.

THE first agitation of the meeting between the sisters was passed. The first vivid pleasure, half painful, half painful, had softened a little—and Norah and Magdalen sat together, hand in hand, each rapt in the contemplation of her own joy.

Magdalen was the first to speak.

"You have something to tell me, Norah?"

"I have a thousand things to tell you, my love; and you have ten thousand things to tell me. Do you mean that I should surprise you, which I told you of in my letter?"

"Yes. I suppose it must concern me very nearly, or you would hardly have thought of mentioning it in your first letter?"

"It does concern me very nearly. You have heard of George's house in Essex? You must be familiar at least with the name of St. Crux? What is there to start at, my dear? You are afraid you are hardly strong enough for any more surprises just yet?"

"Will you tell me now?"

"Not now. You shall know it when we are at the sea-side—you shall know it before I accept the kindness which has invited me to your husband's house."

"What can it be? Why not tell me at once?"

"You used often to set me the example of patience, Norah, in old times—will you set me the example now?"

"With all my heart. Shall I return to my own story as well? Yes? Then we will go back to it at once. I was telling you that St. Crux is George's house, in Essex, the house he inherited from his uncle. Knowing that Miss Garth had a curiosity to see the place, he left word (when he went abroad after the admiral's death) that she and any friends who came with her were to be admitted, if she happened to find herself in the neighborhood during his absence. Miss Garth and I, and a large party of Mr. Tyrrel's friends, found ourselves in the neighborhood not long after George's departure. We had all been invited to see the launch of Mr. Tyrrel's new yacht, from the builder's yard at Wivenhoe in Essex. When the launch was over the rest of the company returned to Colchester to dine. Miss Garth and I contrived to get into the same carriage together, with nobody but my two little pupils for our companions. We gave the coachman his orders, and drove round by St. Crux. The moment Miss Garth mentioned her name we were let in, and shown all over the house. I don't know how to describe it to you: it is the most bewildering place I ever saw in my life—"

"Don't attempt to describe it, Norah. Go on with your story instead."

"Very well. My story takes me straight into one of the rooms at St. Crux—a room about as long as your street here; so dreary, so dirty, and so dreadfully cold that I shiver at the bare recollection of it. Miss Garth was for getting out of it again as speedily as possible, and so was I. But the housekeeper declined to let us off without first looking at a singular piece of furniture—the only piece of furniture in the comfortless place. She called it a tripod, I think. (There is nothing to be alarmed at, Magdalen; I assure you there is nothing to be alarmed at!) At any rate, it was a strange three-legged thing, which supported a great pan full of charcoal ashes at the top. It was considered by all good judges (the housekeeper told us) a wonderful piece of chasing in metal; and she especially pointed out the beauty of some scroll-work running round the inside of the pan, with Latin mottoes on it, signifying—I forget what. I felt not the slightest interest in the thing myself, but I looked close at the scroll-work to satisfy the housekeeper. To confess the truth, she was rather tiresome with her mechanically-learned lecture on fine metal-work, and while she was talking I found myself idly stirring the soft, feathery white ashes backward and forward with my hand, pretending to listen, with my mind a hundred miles away from her. I don't know how long or how short a time I had been playing with the ashes when my finger suddenly encountered a piece of crumpled paper hidden deep among them. When I brought it to the surface it proved to be a letter—a long letter full of cramped, close writing. You have anticipated my story, Magdalen, before I can end it. You know as well as I do that the letter which my idle fingers found was the Secret Trust. Hold out your hand, my dear. I have got George's permission to show it to you—and there it is!"

She put the Trust into her sister's hand. Magdalen took it from her mechanically. "You!" she said, looking at her sister with the remembrance of all that she had vainly v[illegible]ured, of all that she had vainly suffere[illegible] Crux. "You have found it!"

"Yes," said Norah, gayly. "The Trust has proved no exception to the general perversity of all lost things. Look for them, and they remain invisible. Leave them alone, and they reveal themselves! You and your lawyer, Magdalen, were both justified in supposing that your interest in this discovery was an interest of no common kind. I spare you all our consultations after I had produced the crumpled paper from the ashes. It ended in George's lawyer being written to, and in George himself being recalled from the Continent. Miss Garth and I both saw him immediately on his return; and he did, what neither of us could do—he solved the mystery of the Trust being hidden in the charcoal ashes. Admiral Bartram, you must know, was all his life subject to fits of somnambulism. He had been found walking in his sleep not long before his death—just at the time, too, when he was sadly troubled in his mind on the subject of that very letter in your hand. George's idea is that he must have fancied he was doing, in his sleep, what he would have died rather than do in his waking moments—destroying the Trust. The fire had been lit in the pan not long before, and he no doubt saw it still burning in his dream. This was George's explanation of the strange position of the letter when I discovered it. The question of what was to be done with the letter itself came next, and was no easy question for a woman to understand. But I determined to master it, and I did master it, because it related to you."

"Let me try to master it in my turn," said Magdalen. "I have a particular reason for wishing to know as much about this letter as you know yourself. What has it done for others? and what is it to do for me?"

"My dear Magdalen, how strangely you look at it! how strangely you talk of it! Worthless as it may appear, that morsel of paper gives you a fortune."

"Is my only claim to the fortune the claim which this letter gives me?"

"Yes—the letter is your only claim. Shall I try if I can explain it in two words? Taken by itself, the letter might, in the lawyer's opinion, have been made a matter for dispute—though I am sure George would have sanctioned no proceeding of that sort. Taken, however, with the postscript which Admiral Bartram attached to it (you will see the lines if you look under the signature on the third page), it becomes legally binding, as well as morally binding, on the admiral's representatives. I have exhausted my small stock of legal words, and must go on in my own language instead of in the lawyer's. The end of the thing was simply this. All the money went back to Mr. Noel Vanstone's estate (another legal word! my vocabulary is richer than I thought), for one plain reason—that it had not been employed as Mr. Noel Vanstone directed. If Mrs. Girdlestone had lived, or if George had married me a few months earlier, results would have been just the other way. As it is, half the money has been already divided between Mr. Noel Vanstone's next of kin, which means, translated into plain English, my husband and his poor bedridden sister—who took the money formally, one day, to satisfy the lawyer, and who gave it back again generously the next to satisfy herself. So much for one half of the legacy. The other half, my dear, is all yours. How strangely events happen, Magdalen! It is only two years since you and I were left disinherited orphans, and we are sharing our poor father's fortune between us after all!"

"Wait a little, Norah. Our shares come to us in very different ways."

"Do they? Mine comes to me by my husband. Yours comes to you—" She stopped confusedly, and changed color. "Forgive me, my own love!" she said, putting Magdalen's hand to her lips. "I have forgotten what I ought to have remembered. I have thoughtlessly distressed you!"

"No!" said Magdalen. "You have encouraged me."

"Encouraged you?"

"You shall see."

With those words she rose quietly from the sofa, and walked to the open window. Before Norah could follow her she had torn the Trust to pieces, and had cast the fragments into the street.

She came back to the sofa and laid her head with a deep sigh of relief on Norah's bosom. "I will owe nothing to my past life," she said. "I have parted with it as I have parted with those torn morsels of paper. All the thoughts and all the hopes belonging to it are put away from me forever!"

"Magdalen! my husband will never allow you—I will never allow you myself—"

"Hush! hush! What your husband thinks right, Norah, you and I will think right too. I will take from you what I would never have taken if that letter had given it to me. The end I dreamed of has come. Nothing is changed but the position I once thought we might hold toward each other. Better as it is, my love—far, far better as it is."

So she made the last sacrifice of the old perversity and the old pride. So she entered on the new and nobler life.

* * * * * *

A month had passed. The autumn sunshine was bright even in the murky streets; and the clocks in the neighborhood were just striking two as Magdalen returned alone to the house in Aaron's Buildings.

"Is he waiting for me?" she asked, anxiously, when the landlady let her in.

He was waiting in the front room. Magdalen stole up the stairs and knocked at the door. He called to her carelessly and absently to come in—plainly thinking that it was only the servant who applied for permission to enter the room.

"You hardly expected me so soon?" she said, speaking on the threshold, and pausing there to enjoy his surprise as he started to his feet and looked at her.

The only traces of illness still visible in her face left a delicacy in its outline which added refinement to her beauty. She was simply dressed in muslin. Her plain straw-bonnet had no other ornament than the white ribbon with which it was sparingly trimmed. She had never looked lovelier in her best days than she looked now, as she advanced to the table at which he had been sitting, with a little basket of flowers that she had brought with her from the country, and offered him her hand.

He looked anxious and care-worn when she saw him closer. She interrupted his first inquiries and congratulations to ask if he had remained in London since they had parted—if he had not even gone away for a few days only to see his friends in Suffolk? No: he had been in London ever since. He never told her that the pretty parsonage-house in Suffolk wanted all those associations with herself in which the poor four walls at Aaron's Buildings were so rich. He only said he had been in London ever since.

"I wonder," she asked, looking him attentively in the face, "if you are as happy to see me again as I am to see you?"

"Perhaps I am even happier, in my different way," he answered, with a smile.

She took off her bonnet and scarf, and seated herself once more in her own arm-chair. "I suppose the street is very ugly," she said; "and I am sure nobody can deny that the house is very small. And yet—and yet it feels like coming home again. Sit there, where you used to sit, and tell me about yourself; I want to know all that you have done—all that you have thought even—while I have been away." She tried to resume the endless succession of questions by means of which she was accustomed to lure him into speaking of himself. But she put them far less spontaneously, far less adroitly, than usual. Her one all-absorbing anxiety in entering that room was not an anxiety to be trifled with. After a quarter of an hour wasted in constrained inquiries on one side, in reluctant replies on the other, she ventured near the dangerous subject at last.

"Have you received the letters I wrote to you from the sea-side?" she asked, suddenly, looking away from him for the first time.

"Yes," he said, "all."

"Have you read them?"

"Every one of them; many times over."

Her heart beat as if it would suffocate her. She had kept her promise bravely. The whole story of her life, from the time of the home-wreck at Combe-Raven, to the time when she had destroyed the Secret Trust in her sister's presence, had been all laid before him. Nothing that she had done, nothing even that she had thought, had been concealed from his knowledge. As he would have kept a pledged engagement with her, so she had kept her pledged engagement with him. She had not faltered in the resolution to do this—and now she faltered over the one decisive question which she had come there to ask. Strong as the desire in her was to know if she had lost or won him, the fear of knowing was, at that moment, stronger still. She waited and trembled; she waited, and said no more.

"May I speak to you about your letters?" he asked. "May I tell you—"

If she had looked at him, as he said those few words, she would have seen what he thought of her in his face. She would have seen, innocent as he was in this world's knowledge, that he knew the priceless value, the all-ennobling virtue, of a woman who speaks the truth. But she had no courage to look at him—no courage to raise her eyes from her lap.

"Not just yet," she said, faintly. "Not quite so soon after we have met again."

She rose hurriedly from her chair and walked to the window, turned back again into the room and approached the table, close to where he was sitting. The writing materials scattered near him offered her a pretext for changing the subject, and she seized on it directly. "Were you writing a letter," she asked, "when I came in?"

"I was thinking about it," he replied. "It was not a letter to be written without thinking first." He rose, as he answered her, to gather the writing materials together, and put them away.

"Why should I interrupt you?" she said. "Why not let me try whether I can't help you instead. Is it a secret?"

"No—not a secret."

He hesitated as he answered her. She instantly guessed the truth.

"Is it about your ship?"

He little knew how she had been thinking in her absence from him of the business which he believed that he had concealed from her. He little knew that she had learned already to be jealous of his ship.

"Do they want you to return to your old life?" she went on. "Do they want you to go back to the sea? Must you say Yes or No at once?"

"At once."

"If I had not come in when I did, would you have said Yes?"

She unconsciously laid her hand on his arm, forgetting all inferior considerations in her breathless anxiety to hear his next words. The confession of his love was within a hair's-breadth of escaping him, but he checked the utterance of it even yet. "I don't care for myself," he thought. "But how can I be certain of not distressing her?"

"Would you have said Yes?" she repeated.

"I was doubting," he answered—"I was doubting between Yes and No."

Her hand tightened on his arm; a sudden trembling seized her in every limb; she could bear it no longer. All her heart went out to him in her next words.

"Were you doubting for my sake?"

"Yes," he said. "Take my confession in return for yours—I was doubting for your sake."

She said no more—she only looked at him. In that look the truth reached him at last. The next instant she was folded in his arms, and was shedding delicious tears of joy, with her face hidden on his bosom.

"Do I deserve my happiness?" she murmured, asking the one question at last. "Oh, I know how the poor narrow people who have never felt and never suffered would answer me if I asked them what I ask you. If they knew my story they would forget all the provocation, and only remember the offense—they would fasten on my sin, and pass all my suffering by. But you are not one of them? Tell me if you have any shadow of a misgiving! Tell me if you doubt that the one dear object of all my life to come is to live worthy of you! I asked you to wait and see me: I asked you if there was any hard truth to be told to tell it me here with your own lips. Tell it, my love, my husband!—tell it me now!"

She looked up, still clinging to him as she clung to the hope of her better life to come.

"Tell me the truth!" she repeated.

"With my own lips?"

"Yes!" she answered, eagerly. "Say what you think of me with your own lips."

He stooped and kissed her.

THE END.

EMANCIPATION.

THIS week we publish, on pages 56 and 57, another double-page drawing by Thomas Nast, the subject of which is the great event of the day—EMANCIPATION.

In the centre of the picture is a negro's free and happy home. Here domestic peace and comfort reign supreme, the reward of faithful labor, undertaken with the blissful knowledge that at last its benefit belongs to the laborer only, and that all his honest earnings are to be appropriated as he may see fit to the object he has most at heart—his children's advancement and education.

On the wall hangs a portrait of President Lincoln, whom the family can not sufficiently admire and revere. They regard him with feelings akin to veneration, and in each heart there is honest love and gratitude for him. Near this is a banjo, their favorite musical instrument, a source of never-ending enjoyment and recreation.

At the top of the picture the Goddess of Liberty appropriately figures. The slaves have often heard of her before, but have rather regarded her as a myth. Underneath is old Father Time, holding a little child (the New Year), who is striking off the chains of the bondman and setting him at liberty forever.

On the left are incidents of everyday occurrence in slave life; and, in happy contrast, on the right we see some of the inevitable results of freedom and civilization. One of the scenes represented is a slave sale. We can not do better than quote verbatim some parts of a report which appeared in the Tribune of March 11, 1859. The sale consisted of 436 slaves—men, women, and children—and were the property of Mr. Pierce M. Butler, and were sold to pay his debts. It took place near the city of Savannah, Georgia:

"There were no light mulattoes in the whole lot of the Butler stock, and but very few that were even a shade removed from the original Congo blackness. They have been little defiled by the admixture of Anglo-Saxon blood, and for the most part could boast that they were of as pure a breed as the bluest blood of Spain.

"None of the Butler slaves have ever been sold before, but have been on these two plantations ever since they were born. [We should have said before that old Major Butler left the property to his two sons, and those sold were only half of them, the others still remaining as before.] Here have they lived their humble lives and loved their simple loves; here were they born, and here have many of them had children born unto them; here had their parents lived before them, and are now resting in quiet graves on the old plantations that these unhappy ones are to see no more forever; here they left not only the well-known scenes dear to them from very babyhood by a thousand fond memories, and homes as much loved by them, perhaps, as brighter homes by men of brighter faces; but all the clinging ties that bound them to living hearts were torn asunder, for but one half of each of these two unhappy little communities was sent to the shambles, to be scattered to the four winds, and the other half was left behind. And who can tell how closely intertwined are the affections of a little band of four hundred persons living isolated from all the world beside, from birth to middle age? Do they not naturally become one great family, each man a brother unto each?

"It is true they were sold 'in families,' but let us see: A man and his wife were called 'a family;' their parents and kindred were not taken into account; the man and wife might be sold to the pine woods of North Carolina, their brothers and sisters be scattered through the cotton fields of Alabama and the rice swamps of Louisiana, while the parents might be left on the old plantation, to wear out their weary lives in heavy grief, and lay their heads in far-off graves over which their children might never weep. And no account could be taken of loves that were as yet unconsummated by marriage, and how many aching hearts have been divorced by this summary proceeding no man can ever know.

"And the separation is as utter, and is infinitely more hopeless, than that made by the angel of death, for then the loved ones are committed to the care of a merciful Deity, but in the other instance to the tender mercies of a slave-driver. These dark-skinned unfortunates are perfectly unlettered, and could not communicate by writing even if they should know where to send their missives. And so to each other, and to the old familiar places of their youth, clung all their sympathies and affections, not less strong, perhaps, because they are so few. The blades of grass on all the Butler estates are outnumbered by the tears that are poured out in agony at the wreck that has been wrought in happy homes, and the crushing grief that has been laid on loving hearts."

The quiet and reserved deportment of the slaves during the few days that preceded the sale, when the buyers, coming from far and near, had leisure to examine them, particularly of the women, is spoken of thus:

"The women never spoke to the white men unless spoken to, and then made the conference as short as possible. And not one of them all, during the whole time they were exposed to the rude questions of vulgar men, spoke the first unwomanly or indelicate word, or conducted herself in any regard otherwise than as a modest woman should do. Their conversation and demeanor were quite as unexceptionable as they would have been had they been the highest ladies in the land; and through all the insults to which they were subjected they conducted themselves with the most perfect decorum and self-respect.

"And now come the scenes of the last partings—of the final separations of those who were akin, or who had been such dear friends from youth that no ties of kindred could bind them closer—of those who were all in all to each other, and for whose bleeding hearts there shall be no earthly comfort—the parting of parents from children, of brother from brother, and the rending of sister from a sister's bosom; and oh, hardest, cruelest of all, the tearing asunder of loving hearts, wedded in all save the one ceremony of the Church—these scenes pass all description; it is not meet for pen to meddle with tears so holy."

In the picture above this is a slaver from Africa laden with its precious freight of hundreds of human beings, packed as close as possible. In the same picture are runaway slaves. One of them has already been overtaken by the unerring scent of the carefully-trained blood-hound; another has yielded up his life rather than his liberty; and some others are trying hard to make their escape to the dismal swamp. The lower picture shows us the overseer compelling the negroes to work by the power of the lash.

The other side of our picture shows us the negroes receiving pay for their faithful labor—their just due for services rendered their employer—and the children going to school.

METHOD.

NATURE, that will not be commanded, never
To arbitrary method hath submitted:
And time, that tends on nature, men not ever
Have into limitary system fitted.

We call a year a year, and bid it cover
Three hundred five and sixty days: who'll trust it?
Mere fiction! since a fraction still stays over,
And we, to keep our plan, must readjust it.

Even if within the hundredth of a minute
We could approach precision, that small fraction
Would still bear our discomfiture within it,
And doom our nicest system to destruction.

Then let us follow nature, glad and fleeting,
Since her fast footstep not her best trap catches;
Content to time her progress by the beating
Of her own bosom, not of our wise watches.

THE EMANCIPATION OF THE NEGROES, JANUARY, 1863—THE PAST A

ND THE FUTURE.—Drawn by Mr. Thomas Nast.—[See preceding Page.]

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK.

By the Author of "Mary Barton," etc.

[Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."]

CHAPTER I.

In the county town of a certain shire there lived (about forty years ago) one Mr. Wilkins, a conveyancing solicitor of considerable standing.

The certain shire was but a small county, and the principal town in it contained only about four thousand inhabitants; so in saying that Mr. Wilkins was the principal lawyer in Hamley I say very little unless I add that he transacted all the legal business of the country for twenty miles round. His grandfather had established the connection; his father had consolidated and strengthened it, and, indeed, by his wise and upright conduct, as well as by his professional skill, had obtained for himself the position of confidential friend to many of the surrounding families of distinction. He visited among them in a way which no mere lawyer had ever done before; dined at their tables—he alone, not accompanied by his wife, be it observed—rode to the meet occasionally, as if by accident, although he was as well mounted as any squire among them, and was often persuaded (after a little coquetting about "professional engagements," and "being wanted at the office") to have a run with his clients; nay, once or twice he forgot his usual caution, was first in at the death, and rode home with the hounds. But in general he knew his place—as his place was held to be in that aristocratic country and in those days. To let it be supposed that he was in any way a tradesman. He respected himself too much for that. He would give the most unpalatable advice, if need were, and could do the most unsparing reduction of expenditure to an extravagant man; would recommend such an abatement of family pride as taxed the wife on one or two happy marriages in some instances; nay, what was the most likely piece of conduct of all to give offense forty years ago, he would speak up for a thoroughly-used tenant; and that with so much temperate and well-timed wisdom and good feeling, that he more than once succeeded in his point. He had one son, Edward. This boy was the secret joy and pride of his father's heart. For himself he was not, in the least ambitious, but it did cost him a hard struggle to acknowledge that his own business was not lucrative and brought in as large an income to keep pace into the hands of a stranger, as it would do if he indulged his ambition for the boy by giving him a college education, and making him into a barrister. This determination on the more prudent side of the argument took place before Edward was at all old. He had had, perhaps, the largest allowance of pocket-money of any boy at school; and he had always looked down upon the boys in Church-lane, along with his fellows, the sons of the squires, his father's employers. It was a severe mortification to him to find that his destiny was changed, and that he had to return to Hamley to be articled to his father, and to assume the hereditary subservient position to lads who had had licked in the playing-fields and beaten at learning.

His father tried to compensate him for the disappointment by every indulgence that money could purchase. Edward's horses were even finer than those of his father; his literary wants were kept up and fostered by his father's permission to form an extensive library, for which purpose a wing was added to Mr. Wilkins's already extensive house in the suburbs of Hamley. And after his year of legal study in London his father left him to choose the prints and with something very like carte blanche as to expenditure, to judge from the packages which were sent home from various parts of the Continent.

At last he came home, came back to settle as his father's partner in Hamley. He was now to be proud of, and right down proud was old Mr. Wilkins of his handsome, accomplished, gentlemanly son. For Edward was not one to be spoiled by the course of indulgence he had passed through; at least, if it had done him an injury, the effect was at present hidden from view. He had no vulgar vices; he was, indeed, rather too refined for the society he was likely to be thrown into, supposing that society was to consist of the highest of his father's employers. He was well read, and an artist of no mean pretensions. And though his father was in the right place," as his father used to observe; nothing could exceed the deference he always showed to his father. And yet Edward was not one to be spoiled by the course of indulgence he had passed through; at least, if it had done him an injury, the effect, at present hidden from view. He had no vulgar vices; he was, indeed, rather too refined for the society he was likely to be thrown into, supposing that society was to consist of the highest of his father's employers. He was well read, and an artist of no mean pretensions. And though his father was in the right place," as his father used to observe; nothing could exceed the deference he always showed to his father. And yet Edward was not one to

I do not know if it was Edward's own ambition or his proud father's wishes that had led him to attend the Hamley assemblies. I should conjecture the latter, for Edward had of himself too much good taste to wish to intrude into any society. In the opinion of all the shire, no society had more reason to consider itself select than that which met at every full moon in the Hamley assembly-room—an excrescence built on to the principal inn in the town by the joint subscription of all the country families. Into those choice and mysterious precincts no tenth person was ever allowed to enter; no professional man might set his foot there, on any account, before he might make his bow to the queen of the night; but the old original founders of the Hamley assemblies were dropping off; minuets had vanished with them; country dances had died away; quadrilles were in high vogue—nay, one or two of the high magnates of Hamley were trying to introduce waltzing, as they had seen it in London, where it had come in with the visit of the allied sovereigns—when Edward Wilkins made his debut on these boards. He had been at many splendid assemblies abroad, but still the little old ball-room attached to the George Inn in his native town was to him a place grander and more awful than the long magnificent saloons he had seen in Paris or Rome. He laughed at himself for this unreasonable feeling of awe; but it was there, notwithstanding. He had been dining at the house of one of the lesser gentry, who was under considerable obligations to Mr. Wilkins, and who was the parent of eight "muckle-mou'ed" daughters, so hardly likely to oppose much aristocratic resistance to the elder Mr. Wilkins's wishes. He replied with that Edward should be presented at the Hamley assembly-rooms. The many squires glowered and looked black at the introduction of Wilkins the attorney's son into the sacred precincts; and perhaps would have been pretty much more gratification than pleasure in their assembly to the young man had it not been for an incident that occurred pretty late in the evening. The lord-lieutenant of the county usually came with a large party to the Hamley assemblies once in a season; and this night he was expected, and with him a fashionable duchess and her daughters. But time wore on, and they did not make their appearance. At last there was a rustling and a bustling, and in sailed the superb party. For a few minutes dancing was stopped; and Edward, like all the rest, had to make his obeisance to the lord-lieutenant, to some of their acquaintances came up to speak to them; and then the quadrilles were finished in order to make room for country-dances. Edward, in which none of the lord-lieutenant's party joined; then there was a consultation, a request, an inspection of the music, a hurrying of the orchestra, and the band struck up a waltz; the duchess's daughters flew off to the music, and were many young ladies anxious for such partners, but, alas! there was a lack of gentlemen acquainted with the new-fashioned dance. One of the stewards belonged to the Hunt Club, which was just returned from the Continent. Edward was a beautiful dancer, and waltzed to admiration. For his next partner he had one of the Lady —s; for the duchess, to whom the —-shire squires and their little county politics and contingents were alike unknown, for no reason but her lovely Lady Sophy should not have a good partner, whatever his pedigree might be, and begged the steward to introduce Mr. Wilkins to her. After this night his fortune was made with the young ladies of the Hamley assemblies. He was not unwilling to waltz with any one of the heavy squires still locked at him askance, and the heirs (whom he had licked at Eton) called him an upstart behind his back.

CHAPTER II.

It was not a satisfactory situation. Mr. Wilkins had given his son an education and taste beyond his station, and he could not provide him with either profit or pleasure with the doctor of the brewer of Hamley; the vicar was old and dead, the curate was married, and half fright ened at the sound of his own voice.' Then, as to matrimony; for the idea of his marriage was hardly more than a floating fancy—nothing to that of his father's—he could hardly fancy bringing home any one of the young ladies of Hamley to the elegant mansion, full of refinement and association to an educated person, so inappropriate a dwelling for an ignorant uncouth ill brought up girl. A wife from London! Even at his father was not, that of all the young ladies who were glad enough of him as a partner at the Hamley assemblies, there was not one of them but would have considered herself offended by an offer of marriage from an attorney, the son and grandson of attorneys. Edward might not perhaps received many a slight and mortification pretty quickly during these years, which yet toil upon his character in silence. Even at his very time they were having their effect. He was of too sweet a disposition to show resentment, as many spare would have done; but he remembered he took a secret pleasure in the power which his father's money gave him. He would buy an expensive house after the most magnificent model to the price, about which a needy heir of one of the proud country families had been haggling for three weeks. He would buy out the last book sellers in England, no matter at what price; his guns were the newest and most improved make, and all those were expensive articles which were among the objects of daily envy to the squires and squires' sons around. They did not much care for the encouragement of art, which report said were being accumulated in Mr. Wilkins's house. But they did covet the horses and hounds he possessed, and the young man knew that they coveted, and rejoiced in it.

By-and-by he formed a marriage, which went on near an hundred miles off, and astonished every body. He was desperately in love with Miss Lamotte, so he was delighted when she consented to be his wife. She was the eldest child in his delight, and, besides, was charmed to remember that Miss Lamotte's mother had been Sir Frank Holmby's favorite sister, and that, although her marriage had been disowned by her family, as beneath her in rank, yet no one could object to her now on the ground of blood, as her father, Lamotte, had left two children, a boy and a girl, of whom their uncle, Sir Frank, took charge, as their father was worse than dead—an outlaw, whose name was never mentioned. Mark Lamotte was in the army; Lettice had a dependent position in her uncle's family; not intentionally made more dependent than was rendered necessary by circumstances, but still dependent enough to grate on the feelings of a sensitive girl, whose natural susceptibility to slights was redoubled by the constant recollection of her father's disgrace. Sir Frank was considerably involved, as Mr. Wilkins well knew; but it was with very mixed feelings that he listened to the suit which would provide his penniless niece with a comfortable, not to say luxurious, home, and with handsome accomplished young man of unblemished character for a husband. He said one or two bitter words respecting to Mr. Wilkins, even while he was giving his consent to the match; that was his temper; his proud, evil temper; but he really and truly was satisfied by the connection, though he would occasionally turn round on his unfortunate son, and rating him with a fervent insult as to his want of birth, and the inferior position which he held, forgetting apparently that his own grandfather and Lettice's father might be at any moment brought to the bar of justice if he attempted to re-enter his native country.

Edward was annoyed at all this; Lettice resented it. She loved her husband dearly, and disdained for him, for she had discernment enough to see how superior he was in every way to her cousins, the young Holsters, who borrowed of his horses, drank his wines, and yet had caught their father's habit of sneering at his profession. Lettice wished that Edward would interest himself more in his domestic life, would let himself drop out of the company of the ——shire squirearchy, and find his relaxation in his wife's society, her library, or lovely drawing-room, so full of white-glistening statues, and gems of pictures. But, perhaps, this was the natural wish of a young wife, especially of one who felt himself fitted in many ways to shine in society, and who was social by nature. Sociality for the sake of killing time many men's rivality. Edward did not care for wine, and yet he was obliged to drink—and by-and-by he grew to enjoy the flavor of the decanter as a judge of wine. His father by this time was dead—dead, happy old man, with a contented heart—and Edward had become more neighborly in loving him, his richer respecting him, his son and daughter-in-law the most affectionate and devoted of children, and had had his healthy conscience at peace with his God.

Lettice could have lived to herself and her husband and children. Edward daily required more and more the stimulus of society. His wife wondered how he could care to accept dinner-invitations from the —shire country-house. What she would have had him share from the pride of her heart, she would have warned him to avoid from conditions to sinful unprofitableness which it led him into. He had begun to spend more than he ought, not in intellectual—but there, Lettice had been wrong—even in purely sensual things. His wines, his table, should be such as no squire's purse or palate could compete with in dinner-parties—such, remember, the viands rare and delicate in quantity, and sent up to table by an Italian cook—whom Edward had secured in London stars without notice with admiration. He would have Lettice dressed in the richest materials, the most delicate lace, jewelry, he said, was beyond their means: glancing with proud humility at the diamonds of the elder ladies, and the alloyed gold of the younger. He was ignorant of many such things. She was made for society, and yet she hated it. And one day she went out of it altogether—for ever. She had been dressing early in the morning when Edward went down to his office in Hamley. At noon he was sent for by Harriet Holmby's messengers. When he got home, breathless and uncomprehending, she was past speech. One glance from her lovely loving black eyes showed that she recognized him with the passionate yearning that had been one of the characteristics of her love through life. There was no word from them. He could not speak any more than could she. He knelt down by her. She was dying; she was dead; before the doctor arrived. They brought him his eldest child, Ellinor, in utter despair as to what to do to rouse him. They had no thought but that the effect of grief would shut up in the nursery during this busy day of confusion and alarm. The child had no idea of death, and her father, kneeling and kissing, was for her an object of surprise or interest to her than her mother, lying still and white, and not turning her head to meet her eyes.

"Mamma, mamma!" cried the child, in shapeless terror. But the mother never stirred; and the father, hearing all this, was for less as the clothes to stifle a cry as if a sharp knife had pierced his heart. The child forced her impetuous way from her attendants and rushed to the bed. Undeterred by deadly cold or stony immobility, she kissed the lips and stroked the glossy raven hair, murmuring sweet words of wild love such as had passed between the mother and child often and often when no witnesses were by; and altogether seemed so nearly beside herself in an agony of love and terror, that Edward arose, and softly taking her in his arms, bore her away, lying back like one dead, so exhausted was she by the terrible emotion they had forced on her childish heart, into his study, a little room opening out of the grand library, into which, for many evenings, never to come again, he and his wife were wont to retire to have coffee together, and perhaps to stroll out of the glass-door out into the open air, the shrubbery, the fields—never more to be trodden by those dear feet. What passed between father and child in the seclusion never came to light. Late in the evening Ellinor's supper was sent for, and the servant who brought it in saw the child lying in no one dead in her father's arms, and before he left the room, watched his master feeding her, the girl of six years of age, with as tender care as if she had been a baby of six months.

CHAPTER III.

From that time the tie between father and daughter grew very strong and tender indeed. Ellinor, it is true, divided her affections between her baby sister and her papa; but he, caring little for babies, had only a theoretic regard for his younger child, while the sister absorbed all his love. Every day that he dined at home Ellinor was placed opposite to him while he ate his late dinner; she sat where her mother had done during the meal, although she had dined and even supped some time before on the more primitive nursery fare. It was a pretty, half amusing to see the little girl's grave, thoughtful ways and modes of speech, as if trying to act up to the dignity of her place as her father's companion, till sometimes the little head nodded off in slumber in the middle of lisping some wise little speech. Mrs. Aldi-fashioned the nurse called her, and prophesied that she would not live long in consequence of her old-fashion. But instead of the fulfillment of this prophecy, the child's light baby was seized with fits, and was well, ill, and dead in a day. Ellinor was left the most sensible alarming from its quietness and contentment. She waited till she was left—as she thought—one night, and then undressed and said her passionate cry for "Baby, baby, come back to me—come back!" till every one feared for the health of the little girl whose childish affections had had to stand two such shocks. Her father put aside all business, all pleasure of every kind, and sat during from her grief. No mother could have done more, no tenderest nurse done half so much as Mr. Wilkins then did for Ellinor.

If it had not been for him she would have just died of her grief. As it was, she overcame it—but slowly and painfully—letting herself love any one for some time, as if the instinctively feared lest all her strong attachments should find a sudden end in death. Then she would sit and listen with an intensity of attention for his footstep. Once she need expressed some wonder as to the time at which Edward could hear her father's approach, saying that she had listened and could not hear a sound, to which her father replied:

"Of course you can not; he is not your papa."

Then when he went away in the morning, after he had kissed her, Ellinor would run to a certain window-from which she could watch him as he left the house, behind a hedge, now reappearing through an open space, again out of sight, till he reached a great old beech-tree, where he lost, apparently, all trace of him. And then she would turn away with a sigh, sometimes reassuring her unspoken fears by saying softly to herself:

"He will come again to-night."

Mr. Wilkins liked to feel his child dependent on him for all her pleasures. They brought her a veritable jealous of any one who devised a treat or conferred a present the first news of which did not come from out himself.

At last it was necessary that Ellinor should have some more instruction than her good old nurse could give; her father did not care to take upon himself the office of teacher, which he thought he foresaw would necessitate occasional harsh, an occasional severity of reproof which might possibly render him less idolized by his little girl; so he commissioned Lady Holster to decide out some governess for him. She found for a governess to his daughter. Now, Lady Holster, who kept a sort of amateur county registry office, was only too glad to be of use to him in this way; but when she inquired a little further as to the sort of person required, all she could extract from Mr. Wilkins was:

"You know the kind of education a lady should have, and I will, I am sure, choose a governess for Ellinor better than I could direct you. Only please choose some one who will not marry me, and who will let Ellinor go on playing me, and doing pretty much what she likes, for she is so good they need not try to make her better, only to teach her what a lady should know."

Miss Monro was selected—a plain intelligent quiet woman of forty—and it was chosen to decide whether she or Mr. Wilkins took the most pains to avoid each other, acting, with regard to Ellinor, pretty much like the famous Adam and Eve in the weather-glass: when the one came out the other went in. Miss Monro had been tossed about and overworked quite enough in her life to value the privilege and indulgence of her evenings to herself, her comfortable school-room, her quiet cozy teas, her book, or her letter-writing afterward. By mutual agreement she did not interfere with Ellinor and her ways and occupations on the evenings the girl had not her father for companion; and these occasions became more and more frequent as years passed on, and the deep shadow was lightened which the sudden death that had visited his household had cast over him. He was always a popular man at dinner-parties, as I have said before. His amount of intelligence and accomplishment was rare in ——shire, and if it required more wine than formerly to bring his conversation up to the desired point of range and brilliancy, wine was not an article spared or grudged at the county dinner-parties. Occasionally his business took him up to London; hurried as these journeys might be, he never returned without a new game, a new toy of some kind, to "make home pleasant to his little maid," as he expressed himself.

He liked, too, to see what was doing in art or in literature; and as he gave pretty extensive orders for any thing he admired, he was almost sure to be followed down to Hamley by one or two packages or parcels, the arrival and opening of which began soon to form the pleasant epochs in Ellinor's grave though happy life.

The only person of his own standing with whom Mr. Wilkins kept up any intercourse in Hamley was the new clergyman, a bachelor, about his own age, a learned man, a fellow of his college, whose first claim on Mr. Wilkins's attention was the fact that he had been traveling-bachelor for his university, and had consequently been on the Continent about the very same two years that Mr. Wilkins had been there; and although they had never met, yet they had many common acquaintances and common recollections to talk over of this period, which, after all, had been about the most bright and hopeful of Mr. Wilkins's life.

Mr. Ness had an occasional pupil—that is to say, he never put himself out of the way to obtain pupils, but did not refuse the entreaties sometimes made to him that he would prepare a young man for college by allowing the said young man to reside and read with him. "Ness's men" took rather high honors; for the tutor, too indolent to find out work for himself, had a certain pride in doing well the work that was found for him.

When Ellinor was somewhere about fourteen, a young Mr. Corbet came to be pupil to Mr. Ness. Her father always called on the young men reading with the clergymen, and asked them to his house. His hospitality had in course of time lost its recherché and elegant character, but was always generous, and often profuse. Besides, it was in his character to like the joyous, thoughtless company of the young better than that of the old—given the same amount of refinement and education in both.

Mr. Corbet was a young man of very good family from a distant county. If his character had not been so grave and deliberate his years would only have entitled him to be called a boy; for he was but eighteen at the time when he came to read with Mr. Ness. But many men of five-and-twenty have not reflected so deeply as this young Mr. Corbet already had. He had considered and almost matured his plan for life; had ascertained what objects he desired most to accomplish in the dim future which is to many at his age only a shapeless mist; and had resolved on certain steady courses of action by which such objects were most likely to be secured. A younger son, his family connections and family interest pre-arranged a legal career for him, and it was in accordance with his own tastes and talents. All, however, that his father hoped for him was that he might be able to make an income sufficient for a gentleman to live on. The eldest Mr. Corbet was hardly to be called ambitious, or, if he were, his ambition was limited to views for the eldest son. But Ralph Corbet intended to be a distinguished lawyer, not so much for the vision of the woolsack, which, I suppose, dances before the imagination of every young lawyer, but for the grand intellectual exercise, and consequent power over mankind that distinguished lawyers may always possess if they choose, a seat in Parliament, statesmanship, and all the great scope for a powerful and active mind that lay on each side of such a career—these were the objects which Ralph Corbet set before himself. To take high honors at college was the first step to be accomplished; and in order to achieve this Ralph had not persuaded—persuasion was a weak instrument which he despised—but gravely reasoned his father into consenting to pay the large sum which Mr. Ness expected with a pupil. The good-natured old squire was rather pressed for ready money, but sooner than listen to an argument instead of taking his nap after dinner, he would have yielded any thing. But this did not satisfy Ralph; his father's reason must be convinced of the desirability of the step as well as his weak will give way. The squire listened, looked wise, sighed; spoke of Edward's extravagance and the girls' expenses, grew sleepy, and said, "Very true," "That is but reasonable, certainly," glanced at the door, and wondered when his son would have ended his talking and go into the drawing-room; and at length found himself writing the desired letter to Mr. Ness, consenting to every thing, terms and all. Mr. Ness never had a more satisfactory pupil—one whom he could treat more as an intellectual equal.

Mr. Corbet, as Ralph was always called in Hamley, was resolute in his cultivation of himself, even exceeding what his tutor demanded of him. He was greedy of information in the hours not devoted to absolute study; Mr. Ness enjoyed giving information, but most of all he liked the hard tough arguments on all metaphysical and ethical questions in which Mr. Corbet delighted in engaging him. They lived together on terms of happy equality, having thus much in common. They were essentially different, however, although there were so many points of resemblance. Mr. Ness was unworldly as far as the idea of real unworldliness is compatible with a turn for self-indulgence and indolence; while Mr. Corbet was deeply, radically worldly, yet for the accomplishment of his object could deny himself all the careless pleasures natural to his age. The tutor and pupil allowed themselves one frequent relaxation—that of Mr. Wilkins's company. Mr. Ness would stroll to the office after the six hours' hard reading were over—leaving Mr. Corbet still bent over the table—book bestrewn—and see what Mr. Wilkins's engagements were. If he had nothing better to do that evening, he was either asked to dine at the parsonage, or he, in his careless hospitable way, invited the other two to dine with him, Ellinor forming the fourth at table, as far as seats went, although her dinner had been eaten early with Miss Monro. She was little and slight of her age, and her father never seemed to understand how she was passing out of childhood. Yet while in stature she was like a child, in intellect, in force of character, in strength of clinging affection she was a woman. There might be much of the simplicity of a child about her, there was little of the undeveloped girl, varying from day to day like an April sky, careless as to which way her own character is tending. So the two young people sat with their elders, and both relished the company they were thus prematurely thrown into. Mr. Corbet talked as much as either of the other two gentlemen; opposing and disputing on any side, as if to find out how much he could urge against received opinions. Ellinor sat silent; her dark eyes flashing from time to time in vehement interest—sometimes in vehement indignation if Mr. Corbet, riding a tilt at every one, ventured to attack her father. He saw how this course excited her, and rather liked pursuing it in consequence; he thought it only amused him.

Another way in which Ellinor and Mr. Corbet were thrown together occasionally was this. Mr. Ness and Mr. Wilkins shared the same Times between them; and it was Ellinor's duty to see that the paper was regularly taken from her father's house to the Parsonage. Her father liked to dawdle over it. Until Mr. Corbet had come to live with him, Mr. Ness had not much cared at what time it was passed on to him; but the young man took a strong interest in all public events, and especially in all that was said about them. He grew impatient if the paper was not forthcoming, and would set off himself to go for it, sometimes meeting the penitent, breathless Ellinor in the long lane which led from Hamley to Mr. Wilkins's house. At first he used to receive her eager "Oh! I am so sorry, Mr. Corbet, but papa has only just done with it," rather gruffly. After a time he had the grace to tell her it did not signify; and by-and-by he would turn back with her to give her some advice about her garden, or her plants—for his mother and sisters were first-rate practical gardeners, and he himself was, as he expressed it, "a capital consulting physician for a sickly plant."

All this time his voice, his step never raised the child's color one shade the higher, never made her heart beat the least quicker, as the slightest sign of her father's approach was wont to do. She learned to rely on Mr. Corbet for advice, for a little occasional sympathy, and for much condescending attention. He also gave her more fault-finding than all the rest of the world put together; and, curiously enough, she was grateful to him for it, for she really was humble, and wished to improve. He liked the attitude of superiority which this implied and exercised right gave him. They were very good friends at present. Nothing more.

All this time I have only spoken of Mr. Wilkins's life as he stood in relation to his daughter. But there is far more to be said about it. After his wife's death he withdrew himself from society for a year or two in a more positive and decided manner than is common with widowers. It was during this retirement of his that he riveted his little daughter's heart in such a way as to influence all her future life.

When he began to go out again, it might have been perceived—had any one cared to notice—how much the different characters of his father and wife had influenced him and kept him steady. Not that he broke out into any immoral conduct, but he gave up time to pleasure, which both old Mr. Wilkins and Lettice would have quietly induced him to spend in the office, superintending his business. His indulgence in hunting and all field-sports had hitherto been only occasional; they now became habitual, as far as the seasons permitted. He shared a moor in Scotland with one of the Holsters one year, persuading himself that the bracing air was good for Ellinor's health. But the year afterward he took another, this time joining with a comparative stranger; and on this moor there was no house to which it was fit to bring a child and her attendants. He persuaded himself that by frequent journeys he could make up for his absences from Hamley. But journeys cost money; and he was often away from his office when important business required attending to. There was some talk of a new attorney setting up in Hamley, to be supported by one or two of the more influential country families, who had found Wilkins not so attentive as his father. Sir Frank Holster sent for his relation, and told him of this project, speaking to him at the same time in pretty round terms as to the folly of the life he was leading. Foolish it certainly was, and as such Mr. Wilkins was secretly acknowledging it; but when Sir Frank, lashing himself, began to speak of his hearer's presumption in joining the hunt, in aping the mode of life and amusements of the landed gentry, Edward fired up. He knew how much Sir Frank was dipped, and comparing it with the round sum his own father had left him, he said some plain truths to Sir Frank which the latter never forgave, and henceforth there was no intercourse between Holster Court and Ford Bank, as Mr. Edward Wilkins had christened his father's house on his first return from the Continent.

The conversation had two consequences besides the immediate one of the quarrel. Mr. Wilkins advertised for a responsible and confidential clerk to conduct the business under his own superintendence; and he also wrote to the Herald's College to ask them if he did not belong to the family bearing the same name in South Wales—those who have since reassumed their ancient name of De Winton.

Both applications were favorably answered. A skillful, experienced middle-aged clerk was recommended to him by one of the principal legal firms in London, and immediately engaged to come to Hamley at his own terms, which were pretty high. But as Mr. Wilkins said it was worth any money to pay for the relief from constant responsibility, which such a business as his involved, some people remarked that he had never appeared to feel the responsibility very much hitherto, as witness his absences in Scotland, his various social engagements when at home; it had been very different (they said) in his father's day. The Herald's College gave him hopes of affiliating him to the South Wales' family, but it would require time and money to make the requisite inquiries and substantiate the claim. Now in many a place there would be none to contest the right a man might have to assert that he belonged to such and such a family, or even to assume their arms. But it was otherwise in ——shire. Every one was up in genealogy and heraldry, and considering filching a name and a pedigree a far worse sin than any of those mentioned in the commandments. There were those among them who would doubt and dispute even the decision of the Herald's College; but with it, if in his favor, Mr. Wilkins intended to be satisfied, and, accordingly, he wrote in reply to their letter to say, that, of course, he was aware that such inquiries would take a considerable sum of money, but that still he wished them to be made, and that speedily.

Before the end of the year he went up to London to order a brougham to be built (for Ellinor to drive out in in wet weather, he said; but as going in a closed carriage always made her ill, he used it principally himself in driving to dinner-parties), with the De Winton Wilkinses arms neatly emblazoned on panel and harness. Hitherto he had always gone about in a dog-cart—the immediate descendant of his father's old-fashioned gig.

For all this the squires, his employers, only laughed at him, and did not treat him with one whit more respect.

Mr. Dunster, the new clerk, was a quiet, respectable-looking man; you could not call him a gentleman in manner, and yet no one could say he was vulgar. He had not much varying expression on his face, but a permanent one of thoughtful consideration of the subject in hand, whatever it might be, that would have fitted as well with the profession of medicine as with that of law, and was quite the right look for either. Occasionally a bright flash of sudden intelligence lighted up his deep-sunk eyes, but even this was quickly extinguished as by some inward repression, and the habitually reflective, subdued expression returned to the face. As soon as he came into his situation he first began quietly to arrange the papers, and next the business of which they were the outward sign into more methodical order than they had been in since old Mr. Wilkins's death. Punctual to a moment himself, he looked his displeased surprise when the inferior clerks came tumbling in half an hour after the time in the morning; and his look was more effective than many men's words; henceforward the subordinates were within five minutes of the appointed hour for opening the office; but still he was always there before them. Mr. Wilkins himself winced under his new clerk's order and punctuality; Mr. Dunster's raised eyebrow, and contraction of the lips at some woeful confusion in the business of the office, chafed Mr. Wilkins more, far more, than any open expression of opinion would have done; for that he could have met and explained away, as he fancied. A secret respectful dislike grew up in his bosom against Mr. Dunster. He esteemed him, he valued him, and he could not bear him. Year after year Mr. Wilkins had become more under the influence of his feelings, and less under the command of his reason. He rather cherished than repressed his nervous repugnance to the harsh, measured tones of Mr. Dunster's voice; the latter spoke with a provincial twang which grated on his employer's sensitive ear. He was annoyed at a certain green coat which his new clerk brought with him, and he watched its increasing shabbiness with a sort of childish pleasure. But by-and-by Mr. Wilkins found out that from some perversity of taste Mr. Dunster always had his coats, Sunday and working-day, made of this obnoxious color; and this knowledge did not diminish his secret irritation. The worst of all, perhaps, was that Mr. Dunster was really invaluable in many ways—"a perfect treasure," as Mr. Wilkins used to term him in speaking of him after dinner; but for all that he came to hate his "perfect treasure," as he gradually felt that Dunster had become so indispensable to the business that his chief could not do without him.

The clients re-echoed Mr. Wilkins's words, and spoke of Mr. Dunster as invaluable to his master, a thorough treasure, the very saving of the business. They had not been better attended to, not even in old Mr. Wilkins's days; such a clear head, such a knowledge of law, such a steady, upright fellow, always at his post. The grating voice, the drawling accent, the bottle-green coat, were nothing to them; far less noticed, in fact, than Wilkins's expensive habits, the money he paid for his wine and horses, and the nonsense of claiming kin with the Welsh Wilkinses, and setting up his brougham to drive about ——shire lanes, and be knocked to pieces over the rough round paving-stones thereof.

All these remarks did not come near Ellinor to trouble her life. To her her dear father was the first of human beings; so sweet, so good, so kind, so charming in conversation, so full of accomplishment and information! To her healthy, happy mind, every one turned their bright side. She loved Miss Monro—all the servants, especially Dixon, the coachman. He had been her father's play-fellow as a boy, and, with all his respect and admiration for his master, the freedom of intercourse that had been established between them then had never been quite lost. Dixon was a fine stalwart old fellow, and was as harmonious in his ways with his master as Mr. Dunster was discordant; accordingly, he was a great favorite, and could say many a thing which might have been taken as impertinent from another servant.

He was Ellinor's great confidant about many of her little plans and projects, things that she dared not speak of to Mr. Corbet, who, after her father and Dixon, was her next best friend. This intimacy with Dixon displeased Mr. Corbet; he once or twice insinuated that he did not think it was well to talk so familiarly as Ellinor did with a servant, one out of a completely different class, such as Dixon. Ellinor did not easily take hints; every one had spoken plain out to her hitherto: so Mr. Corbet had to say his meaning plain out at last. Then for the first time he saw her angry; but she was too young, too childish, to have words at will to express her feelings; she only could say broken beginnings of sentences, such as, "What a shame! Good, dear Dixon, who is as loyal and true and kind as any nobleman. I like him far better than you, Mr. Corbet, and I shall talk to him." And then she burst into tears, and ran away, and would not come to wish Mr. Corbet good-by, though she knew she should not see him again for a long time, as he was returning the next day to his father's house, from whence he would go to Cambridge.

He was annoyed at this result of the good advice he had thought himself bound to give to a motherless girl, who had no one to instruct her in the proprieties in which his own sisters were brought up; he left Hamley both sorry and displeased. As for Ellinor, when she found out the next day that he really was gone—gone without even coming to Ford Bank again to see if she were not penitent for her angry words—gone without saying or hearing a word of good-by—she shut herself up in her room, and cried more bitterly than ever, because anger against herself was mixed with her regret for his loss. Luckily her father was dining out, or he would have inquired what was the matter with his darling, and she would have had to try to explain what could not be explained. As it was she sat with her back to the light during the school-room tea, and afterward, when Miss Monro had settled down to her study of the Spanish language, Ellinor stole out into the garden, meaning to have a fresh cry over her own naughtiness and Mr. Corbet's departure; but the August evening was still and calm, and put her passionate grief to shame, hushing her up as it were with the other young creatures who were being soothed to rest by the serene time of day and the subdued light of the twilight sky.

There was a piece of ground surrounding the flower-garden, which was not shubbery, nor wood, nor kitchen-garden—only a grassy bit, out of which a group of old forest trees sprang. Their roots were heaved above ground; their leaves fell in autumn so profusely that the turf was ragged and bare in spring; but to make up for this, there never was such a place for snow-drops.

The roots of these old trees were Ellinor's favorite play-place; this space between these two was her doll's kitchen, that its drawing-room, and so on. Mr. Corbet rather despised her contrivances for doll's furniture, so she had not often brought him here; but Dixon delighted in them, and contrived and planned with the eagerness of six years old rather than forty. To-night Ellinor went to this place, and there were all a new collection of ornaments for Miss Dolly's sitting-room made out of fir-bobs, in the prettiest and most ingenious way. She knew it was Dixon's doing, and rushed off in search of him to thank him.

"What's the matter with my pretty?" asked Dixon, as soon as the pleasant excitement of thanking and being thanked was over, and he had leisure to look at her tear-stained face.

"Oh! I don't know! never mind," said she, reddening.

Dixon was silent for a moment or two, while she tried to turn off his attention by her hurried prattle.

"There's no trouble afoot that I can mend?" asked he, in a minute or two.

"Oh no! it's really nothing—nothing at all," said she. "It's only that Mr. Corbet went away without saying good-by to me, that's all." And she looked as if she should have liked to cry again.

"That was not manners," said Dixon, decisively.

"But it was my fault," replied Ellinor, pleading against the condemnation.

Dixon looked at her pretty sharply from under his ragged, bushy eyebrows.

"He had been giving me a lecture, and saying I did not do what his sisters did—just as if I were to be always trying to be like somebody else—and I was cross and ran away."

"Then it was Missy who would not say good-by. That was not good manners in Missy."

"But, Dixon, I don't like being lectured!"

"I reckon you don't get much of it. But, indeed, my pretty, I dare say Mr. Corbet was in the right; for, you see, master is busy, and Miss Monro is so dreadful learned, and your poor mother is dead and gone, and you have no one to teach you how young ladies go on; and by all accounts, Mr. Corbet comes of a good family. I've heard say his father had the best stud-farm in all Shropshire, and spared no money upon it; and the young ladies, his sisters, will have been taught the best of manners; it might be well for my pretty to hear how they go on."

"You dear old Dixon, you don't know any thing about my lecture, and I am not going to tell you. Only I dare say Mr. Corbet might be a little bit right, though I am sure he was a great deal wrong."

"But you'll not go on a fretting—you won't now, there's a good young lady; for master won't like it, and it will make him uneasy, and he's enough of trouble without your red eyes, bless them."

"Trouble—papa, trouble! Oh, Dixon! what do you mean?" exclaimed Ellinor, her face taking all a woman's intensity of expression in a minute.

"Nay, I know naught," said Dixon, evasively. "Only that Dunster fellow is not to my mind, and I think he pesters the master sadly with his fid-fad ways."

"I hate Mr. Dunster," said Ellinor, vehemently. "I won't speak a word to him the next time he comes to dine with papa."

"Missy will do what papa likes best," said Dixon, admonishingly; and with this the "pair of friends" parted.

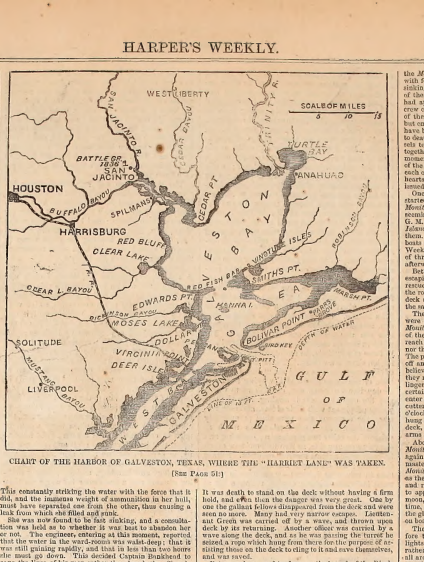

CHART OF THE HARBOR OF GALVESTON, TEXAS, WHERE THE "HARRIET LANE" WAS TAKEN.

(SEE PAGE 61.)

THE WRECK OF THE "MONITOR."

We are indebted to one of the surviving officers of the ill-fated Monitor for the picture of her wreck, which we publish on this page. No event of the war has caused more sorrow than the loss of the brave little vessel. Its history is thus told by an officer:

From ten to eleven P.M. the water still gained rapidly. It was now known for certain that she had opened a leak. The storm was at its height, the waves striking and passing over the Monitor, burying her completely for the instant, while for a few seconds nothing could be seen of her from the Rhode Island but the upper part of her turret, surrounded by foam. This was caused as follows: A huge wave would lift her up, when, in descending to meet another, instead of riding it like other vessels, she plowed through, the projecting armor at her bow striking the water with such force that the spray and foam were thrown around her for the distance of forty feet. This projecting armor is undoubtedly the cause of the leak, as it extended six thirty-two feet, and forward fourteen. This constantly striking the water with the force that it did, and the immense weight of ammunition in her hull, must have separated one from the other, thus causing a leak from which she filled and sunk.

She was now found to be fast sinking, and a consultation was held as to whether it was best to abandon her or not. The engineer, entering at this moment, reported that the water in the ward-room was waist-deep; that it was still gaining rapidly, and that in less than two hours she must go down. This decided Captain Bankhead to save the lives of his men rather than lose both. Signals of distress were now ordered to be made to the Rhode Island; and while these were preparing Captain Bankhead shouted, "What'll cut the hawser?" "I will," answered Mr. Stodder, the Master; and taking a hatchet, he, at the imminent peril of being washed overboard, succeeded in severing the hawser, the waves passing over him at every motion of the vessel. One poor fellow, whose name is not known, strained, but he was dashed off and drowned.

Several of the crew and some of the officers also found a watery grave about this time, by being washed overboard. It was dealt to stand on the deck without having a firm hold, and often than the danger was very great. One by one the gallant fellows disappeared from the deck and were seen no more. Many had very narrow escapes. Lieutenant Greeh was carried off by a wave, and thrown upon deck by its returning. Another officer was carried by a wave along the deck, and as he was passing the turret he seized a rope which hung from there for the purpose of assisting those on the deck to cling to it and save themselves, and was saved.

Between eleven and twelve P.M. the launch of the Rhode Island was manned, and started for the Monitor. About this time the hawser, which now hung loose, became entangled in one of the paddle-wheels of the Rhode Island, so that it could not be worked, thus rendering the vessel unmanageable. She drifted toward the Monitor, as if there was great danger of a collision before the hawser could be extricated. The launch was between the two steamers, and before she could clear them the whole of one of her sides was crushed in, just escaping the waterline. The gallant fellows in her had a narrow escape from a horrible death; but nothing daunted, they struck boldly out for the Monitor with their broken boat, and safely returned with fourteen or fifteen of the Monitor's crew, though in a sinking condition, and landed them all safely upon the deck of the Rhode Island. In the mean time the two vessels had approached so near each other that five or six of the crew of the Monitor seized the rope hanging from the side of the Rhode Island, and started to climb up her side; but only three reached there. The others are supposed to have been struck by the Monitor, when they fell, crushed to death, or perished in the sea. Those on board the vessels tell me that they expected every wave to dash them together, when the loss of both must have occurred. The moment that the Rhode Island was looming up broadside of the Monitor was a terrible one to all. The two passed each other without touching, and many were the relieved hearts and the audibly expressed "Thank God!" that issued from the mouths of the men on both the vessels.

One of the Rhode Island's cutters was now manned and started off about the same time that the launch left the Monitor. They approached each other, and lights were seemingly no chance of preventing a collision, when Dr. G. M. Weeks, of the Monitor, Ensign Taylor, of the Rhode Island, and one of the sailors, sprang to the side to part them. The force of the blow was thus broken and the boats saved from destruction. The right head of Dr. Weeks was caught between the boats, crushing the bones of three of his fingers so seriously that amputation was afterward found necessary.

Between twelve and one A.M. the cutter, after narrowly escaping a collision, started for the side of the Monitor to rescue others. Arriving there, Captain Bankhead told the vessel while he men got into it, the last departing on the deck several times and being carried back by the waves the same as the launch on the previous trip.

The last of the crew and officers that reached on deck were now in the boat, and none remained on board the Monitor but some six or eight who were clinging to the top of the turret. They were told to come down and try to reach the boat, but neither the entreaties of their comrades nor the orders of their officers had any effect upon them. The poor fellows had even their crumbles one by one washed off and delivered in the attempt to reach the boats; and believing that there was no chance of being saved, even if they reached the boat, they preferred to remain there and linger a few moments more than to come down and meet certain death. Captain Bankhead was then compelled to leave the boat without them and leave them behind. The cutter arrived at the side of the Rhode Island about one o'clock, and the men and officers, seizing the ropes which hung from her sides for that purpose, soon climbed to her deck, on reaching which they were received with open arms regardless of rank.

About two o'clock a last effort was made to reach the Monitor, and rescue those on the turret. The cutter was again manned with a picked crew, and D. Rodney Brown, master's mate, took command, and started for the doomed vessel; but whether it reached her or not is unknown, as the boat was last seen making straight for her, pitching and rolling fearfully, her gallant crew working manfully to approach the Monitor as soon as possible, when the waves which had been gradually going down for some time, now entirely disappeared, and the boat was lost in the gloom. (The boat but since been picked up, with all on board.)

The Monitor was last seen at this time also. Just before the moon vanished, a quarter before two o'clock, lights were plainly visible, but her turret and deck were rather indistinct. For a few moments after darkness was all around, the burning lights of the Monitor shot here and there like an ignis fatuus, when suddenly they all disappeared, and then it was known that she had gone down. At this time she was distant from the Rhode Island about a mile and a half, while, when the boat was last seen, she was not more than a third that distance, so that it was almost impossible to have reached her.

We learn, as we go to press, that the new Monitors Passaic and Montauk had hard work in getting down to Beaufort; and it is evident that some further improvements must be made in this class of vessels before they can be deemed safe or seaworthy.

THE WRECK OF THE IRON-CLAD "MONITOR."

A SLAVE-PEN AT NEW ORLEANS—BEFORE THE AUCTION, A SKETCH OF THE PAST.

THE MONITOR.

Oh, loyal souls, sunk in a noble ship
At e'er the waters crossed!
What direful tidings ring from every lip—
"The Monitor is lost!"
Sunk in an instant underneath the wave,
With half the crew lost in a watery grave.

And yet not lost. Within a higher realm
We deem they are at rest,
Where a sure Pilot stands beside the helm:
Surely such peace is best.

There quietly the ship at anchor rides,
Beyond all fear of adverse winds and tides.

Tenderly, brothers, will we name them o'er,
Nor think they died in vain,
Who went down with the Monitor, no more
To look our flag again.
Their early toil has left us more to do;
But who could falter with their names in view?

Ours "Monitor"—she earned her title well,
Though short the race she ran:
She left a record, for the world to tell,
Of "victory nobly won."
Tenderly guard her in thy depths, O sea!
For never nobler vessel sailed o'er thee.

A SLAVE-PEN AT NEW ORLEANS.

In connection with the gradual downfall of slavery, we publish on this page an illustration of a gang of negroes in a slave-pen at New Orleans before an auction. The picture is from a sketch taken by a foreign artist before the war. In describing it the artist wrote:

"The men and women are well clothed, in their Sunday best—the men in blue cloth of good quality, with beaver hats; and the women in calico dresses, of more or less brilliancy, with silk bandana handkerchiefs bound round their heads. Placed in a row in a quiet thoroughfare, where, without interrupting the traffic, they may command a good chance of transient custom, they stand through a great part of the day, subject to the inspection of the purchasing or non-purchasing passing crowd. They look heavy, perhaps a little sad, but not altogether unhappy."

EXODUS OF REBEL WOMEN.

We illustrate on this page a scene which is frequently renewed at Washington, viz., THE DEPARTURE OF SECESH WOMEN FOR RICHMOND.

SECESH WOMEN LEAVING WASHINGTON FOR RICHMOND.—[SKETCHED BY MR. JASPER GREEN.]

One day last week the steamer New York took 450 women and children from Washington to the realms of Secessia. They all had, or claimed to have, friends or relatives in Jeff Davis's kingdom, and were sent South at Government expense. Among the number were several young women whose departure from the Federal capital will lighten the duties of the provost-marshal. The Washington Star says:

Had their baggage passed without inspection they would have added much also to the necessities of the Southerners in dry goods, millinery, medicines, and many other articles and goods much required at the present time in Jeff Davis's dominion. However, there were engaged all last night in examining the baggage that had been sent down. In many of the trunks were found great stores of valuable kinds and textures, plus, medias, thread, etc., which articles were, of course, confiscated.

In one very large trunk a sufficient quantity of dry goods was found to fully stock a country store. Some of the trunks had ten, fifteen, and as high as twenty-five pairs of shoes. No passenger, however, was allowed to take more than two pairs. One lady, when asked why she had packed so many shoes, replied that she expected to wear out two pair per month! All this morning the wharf and the neighborhood of ninth street was crowded with relatives and friends, who resorted there to witness the departure and for the purpose of saying farewell to them.

Judging from the expressions we heard in the crowd seventh sympathized predominated. A gentleman asked an old lady who was going, if whether she was pleased at her departure. She replied, "Yes, thank God! it is a great pleasure to get rid of Government contractors, and Government, and not by Yankee boors." A crowd immediately gathered around, and then commenced expressions of contempt from the lips of the United States Government generally, and Secretary Stanton and Cabinet in particular. One young lady remarked to a friend as she took her parcel, "Oh, my friend, write quickly; you know how to get the letter through." Another lady remarked that she hoped to return ere long, but with the victorious Confederate army.

MAJOR-GENERAL WILLIAM T. SHERMAN.

We publish on page 49 a portrait of GENERAL SHERMAN, commanding the United States forces at Vicksburg, from a photograph by Anthony.

William Tecumseh Sherman was born in the State of Ohio, about the year 1818. He entered West Point in 1836, and graduated in June, 1840, standing about in his class. He entered the Corps of Artillery, and, on 30th November, 1841, was promoted to a First Lieutenancy. During the war in Mexico he served in California, and was brevetted a Captain for meritorious conduct. In 1853 he resigned the service, and, we believe, engaged in mercantile business in New Orleans. At the first break of the rebellion he tendered his services to the Government, and on 14th May was appointed Colonel of the newly-fifteenth Infantry. His regiment he commanded at the battle of Bull Run. He was subsequently appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and shortly afterward commanded a General Anderson in command of the Department of the Ohio. He was in command at Louisville when Secretary Cameron and Adjutant-General Thomas made their famous visit journey to the West, and he took occasion to tell those worthies that 200,000 men would be required to fight the rebellion in Kentucky. This statement—which subsequent experience has abundantly verified—seemed so outrageous to the Cameron that General Sherman was shortly afterward removed, and doubts were cast upon his sanity. He was then in command at Sedalia, Missouri, but resigned the position shortly afterward, and was by General Halleck placed in command of a column in the field. At the battle of Shiloh he took a leading a part in which General Halleck reported to Washington that the success of the day was mainly due to him. He was rewarded by promotion to a Major-General's rank, and subsequently placed in command of the fifth division of General Grant's army, he had charge of the city of Memphis, and received almost absolute authority for vigor and discretion. On 24th December last he departed at the head of an expedition against Vicksburg, and at latest dates had been repulsed, after some very hard fighting.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL ALVIN P. HOVEY.

We publish on page 49 a portrait of GENERAL HOVEY, whose operations in the Southwest have attracted considerable attention. The portrait is from a photograph by Anderson.

Alvin P. Hovey was born in Mount Vernon, Indiana, on the 6th of May, 1823. After receiving a tolerably liberal education, he was licensed, in 1845, to practice law, and entered on the duties of his profession at Mount Vernon, Indiana, under very favorable auspices. Being a young man of energy and close application, he soon rose to rank with the most talented and profound lawyers of the State, and won some of the most honorable positions within the gift of the people. His friends were not surprised to find him among the first to offer his services to the Government when the dreadful fratricidal war was forced upon us. General Hovey was first called to the command of the 24th Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, which was one of the first of the many fine Regiments Indiana had sent to the war. The history of his campaign, at the head of his Regiment, through Missouri and Western Kentucky, is too well known to be repeated here. He led his gallant Twenty-fourth on the bloody fields of Shiloh, and shortly afterward, for "gallant and meritorious conduct," was promoted to the command he now holds. The history of his administration while in command at Memphis, Helena, and other points on the Mississippi, and of his recent daring exploit in penetrating the heart of the enemy's country, is fresh in every mind.

IN THE HOSPITAL.

"WHAT a marvelous power over pillows you possess. Thank you; how kind you are! I wonder if you are so honest."

"As much so as women generally."

"Mo fèi have I offended? I beg pardon. Camp life has made me rude. I wonder what brought you to such a place as this."

"Another wonder which I can better satisfy. Selfishness brought me here. I came to relieve my own suffering."

"In doing good to others worse off. That is a peculiar selfishness; but have you suffered really?"

"So much so that I must not speak of it. Why were you speculating upon my honesty?"

"Because I wish to ask a plain question and receive a straightforward answer."

"Ex cuse."

"I feel pretty sure of you—more so than of those men who petter over me with, "Well, my boy, we must turn you out before long." Turn me out, yes indeed they will. What I wish to ask is, how much longer you think I'll last."

He was not much more than a boy, and looking into his fine clear eyes I hated for once to tell the truth. But day by day I had watched him with the most intelligent interest, and had denied my spending over children of my own; and each day I had seen the silver cord slipping, slipping—slowly, but surely perceptibly, and surely lengthening. After he spoke and lay there closely watching for my answer, scanning eagerly my face, which was too well trained to express even pity when I chose it should not, I was silent for a while.

"Won't you tell me?" he pleaded.

"I want to see you strive more hopefully for health."

A faint smile curled his lip.

"Like all the rest," he whispered to himself.

"I think not," was my reply, while for a moment a prayer from my heart went up for the youth and manhood about to be cut off from the nation's heart, one drop of the great red artery, carrying away in its stealthy flow the pride and glory of our homes.

"How much longer, then," he repeated, "do you think I'll last?"

"God only knows, my dear young friend: not many days, unless there is reaction."

He closed his eyes and grew a little paler, but I did not leave him. No one but I knew I had done rightly.

"Thank you," he said at last, and grasped my hand.

"But you must care more to live; you must not be so passive," I told him.

"No; if you think he would not think so."

"You told me you had no parents: have you not sisters, some one whose presence would cheer you?"

"No," he replied, but the gathering frown of pain or annoyance warned me to change the topic. I rearranged his pillow, and as one does when leaving him, hoping that sleep would refresh him, but he begged me to stay. So I took up a book and began softly reading, but that also had not the desired effect.

"There is one person I wish to see before I die," he would say, "but I am not sure she would come," he muttered; "yet I wish, I long, I must see her. Will you write, or will you go—that would be better—for her? Tell her—" and then he would tell Dick Temple, an dying, and she must come, bid me good-by, or my ghost—" He buried his face in the pillow, and left a beautiful setting for his loneliness, promised to do his bidding.

That is why I am waiting the return of the livcried man who has ushered me in this sumptuous room, and carried my card and note to the lady I have never heard of before to-day.

The house does not differ from the many of wealth and fashion I have been in, the same elegance, and luxury, and comfort in all. There is no more to be guessed from it than from the glistening garb a woman wears at her bridal; no fitness of things in one place or upholsterer and the modiste is about all we get at from either. Lace and damask, ormolu and bronze—tulle, orange blossoms, and veil.

I was rather startled by the footman's return and message in the midst of this reverie, but was too conscious of the necessary calmness and imperturbability in the presence of such functionaries to betray what I felt.

"Will you please go up stairs?"

"Certainly," and I followed his lead.

Noiselessly we ascended, and I by rest hall, up the broad, carved, oaken staircase, to the door where I was ushered in alone.

A young maid-servant met me and whispered quickly:

"My mistress has been very ill: for weeks we have thought mamma would follow papa. Inquire her forehead with her finger; "but as soon as she read your note she brightened, and said she must see you. The nurse is not willing, but she would, if it's right. You will please tell the nurse it is not my fault if you see her."

The room was darkened, the heavy curtains down so that the sunshine filtering through them had the purple tinge of twilight.

A large canopied bedstead, half lost in the pillows, I espied white drapery, and a soft, sweet voice gave me welcome. I approached and told my errand cautiously, for I discovered rightly that I was not the bearer of glad tidings.

At the first glance the face seemed to reiterate what the maid had whispered. She was a very pretty face, the kind that men rave about; of flowerlike beauty and mould, tint and texture. The long drooping lashes raised slowly and the eyes gazed abstractedly, like a child's waking out of a dream. She looked at me as if striving to recall my personality, which I gently explained was one of mercy, no cognizance of. Then she looked at my note, and the light of full reason swept away the mistiness of death which veiled her face of expression.

"You are come from Richard, Richard Temple. Sit down here by me and tell me all about him. Is he so ill: was he very badly wounded?"

"Very badly, very cruelly wounded," I replied, not surprised to see the sudden swaying of her slender form as it strove hard with a sudden gust, and a great driving fall of tears.

"You know, do you not, that he is no relation of mine; that, as Mrs. Withers, I ought not even to call him friend?"

"No; he did not tell me so."

"But he is dying: you can not deny it. It is not wrong for me to think of him now, is it? I am glad he is dying, for I can love him now; there is no harm in it. My darling, darling! oh, how I have been punished! I wonder if God forgives such as I—women so false to their better natures?"

He forgives all who repent."

"But I have not. I have been penitent after closking myself in deceit. I knew Richard loved me long ago, though he had not said it in plain words; even looks and action were full of tenderness; but I was spoiled with flattery and adulation, and piqued that he gave me none; so, in wicked quickness, I allowed others to suppose my heart was free.

"Three summers ago we were at Lake Geneva Papa never disliked Richard, because his family was not distingué, and he was very ambitious that I should make a grand match; so, before I hardly knew what I was doing, I was betrothed to Mr. Withers. At first the novelty and sensation of the thing amused me, and for a week or two I was quite happy; but during Mr. Richard came back from a trip in the mountains, and I was so glad to see him that I quite forgot my fiancé. We strolled around the grounds, and then Mr. Withers had gone sailing, which I could never be induced to do, and at last sauntered in where the people were dancing. The music inspired me somehow, and we were shortered by the bay-window; but in a pause of the band Richard told me the old, old story, which it was too late to hear and not love. It stunned me so completely that I forgot where I was—that his arm was around me, and his lips near mine; but in a differstay was brought so much nearer my heart responded to his glowing words than to the stately offer I had before received, that I dared not tell him the truth. I only felt with my silence and sufficed him; my heart was beating so tumultuously I could not speak; and he was happy—for a short time only—for directly Mr. Withers stood before to dance, calling me familiarly 'Florence;' and I, quickly drawing of my glove, showed him my engagement ring. I shammed dead truth in his eyes, and I whirled away in a redoan with Mr. Withers.

"I have not seen him since. I knew he enlisted as a private, and that he was wounded, and that shock, and the death of my little child, have almost crazed me; but I have told you all this, so you can advise me. Shall I go to him, or will you be wrong?"

Had she been my own child I could not have spoken colder, or been less puzzled how to reply. There was her beautiful face looking up at me with the same pleading that another face lying on a lonely cot had worn.

"Where is your husband? Ask his permission, I evaded.

"He is away from home."

"Can you not write?"

She shuddered a little. "It may be too late then.

It may be I was sinning for a moment in thinking there could be no wrong in her inviting the penitent of the past, but I knew—for once letting custom and appearances, ay, even duty, stand aside—that any woman with natural feeling in her bosom would have hastened to her, as I was, to tell her to go for there she stood watching me with painful intensity and apprehension, as if the boon she craved were in my gift.

"Just once before he dies," she whispered.

"But the cost of that once—your husband's anger—"

She sprang to her feet. "Do you think I care for the cost, or in what way I may suffer for it, while he lies there dying all alone?"

"You have vowed before God to obey your husband. Do you candidly believe he would be willing?"

She sank down again, huskily uttering "No."

My heart was full of pity, but I had the strength to say,

"Then, my dear Mrs. Withers, it is very plain to me that you can not go, and must wait your harbor, though to stifle it makes your cross ten times heavier."

I clasped her hand and drew her head down on my bosom, where it lay motionless for some time; nor would I have had her know the defiant thoughts while I was hurling at the world and all its mockeries.

When I rose to go she thanked me with earnest sincerity, and we parted, I believe, with great tenderness, that though she had always loved him she was striving to be a true wife. Her face had lost all its color, and the twilight left a look of hopelessness. With assurances that I would do all in my power to comfort him I left her—left her in the dungeon gloom and twilight of her darkened room, crowned with youth and beauty and sorrow, for "——this is truth the poet sings,

That a sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things."

It was very hard for me to go back to that little hospital cot with such a return for the important longings spent in vain.

But he bore it manfully, without a tremor in his voice or sigh, when I told him I could not open him all the gentleness and care I would have.

The end was not far off. The shadows were growing heavier in the gathering dusk. Life receding: eternity drawing nigh. Every day I strove to make the narrow path lighter with the Truth, and to direct his dying thoughts to the fadeless, bright spirit, feldom giving way to doubts. Never again had he spoken of Florence Withers.

One snowy afternoon I, finishing a Psalm, the Twenty-third, thought him asleep, and knowing his extreme weakness, rather fearfully bent down to listen to his breathing: it was soft as an infant's. I saw his lips move and heard one word; it was only "Hey"—perhaps, thought I, he is praying, and I moved back softly away.

It must have been so, and his prayer was answered, for when I came back I found a kneeling figure at his side and his head pillowed in Florence's embrace.

Standing alone and gazing out the window was a gentleman whom I knew must be Mr. Withers; and so individually grateful was I for this his unselfish deed, that I regarded him as holding that rarest of all titles, "Nature's nobleman."

They were just in time. Death came with the twilight.

I never have known what prompted Mr. Withers to this kindness, but I am assured as he did so doing it he took the surest method toward gaining the affection which, through no fault of his, had been lavished on another.

CURIOSITIES OF SLEEP.

THERE is much yet unexplained and mysterious about the phenomena of sleep, and to those who wish to speculate on the subject, the following facts relating to dreaming and somnambulism may be interesting.

Whispering in the ears of a person asleep will sometimes produce curious effects. An officer in the expedition to Louisburgh, in 1758, was often practiced upon by his companions. After the army had landed, he was one day found asleep in his tent. There, sounding plainly disturbed him, and he was made to believe that he was engaged. He expressed great fear, and was evidently disposed to run away. Some of his companions were with; but at the same time the groans of the wounded and dying were simulated, and on his frequent inquiries who after those groans, the names of particular friends were mentioned. At length he was told that the man next to himself had fallen, when he leaped from under his bed and out of the tent, and was awakened by falling over the tent-ropes.

A gentleman assumed that he had enlisted as a soldier, joined his regiment, and deserted. He was captured, taken back, tried, sentenced to be shot, and on the day appointed, the preparations were made, and a gun was fired. He then awoke, and found that a noise in an adjacent room had both caused his dream and awakened him.

Dr. James Gregory dreamed of ascending the crater of Mount Etna, and of feeling the warmth of the ground under his feet. He was allowed to sleep with a vessel of hot water at his feet. He had ascended Mount Vesuvius, where he felt this sensation of heat, and had descended on the side of the crater. He also dreamed of wintering at Hudson's Bay, and of suffering acutely from the cold. On awaking he found that one foot of his bed-clothes were off. A few days before he had been perusing an account of the condition during winter of the people of which he had dreamed.

A gentleman and his wife during a period of great excitement both dreamed at the same time of the expected French invasion. The dreaming it was found that a pair of tongs had fallen in the room above, and the noise made by this accident was the cause of the simultaneous excitement dreams. Dr. Reid states, that when the dressing of a blister on his head had become ruffled so as to cause considerable irritation, he dreamed that he fell into the hands of savages, who scalped him. A patient in the Edinburgh Infirmary talked a great deal when asleep, and remembered very distinct references to patients who had been in the ward two years ago, at which period she herself had been there. A similar case is recorded of those cases which were then in the ward. A gentleman who had been chased by a bull forty-five years before, and of which all recollection of circumstance had almost invariably dreamed of his perilous adventure ever since it occurred, whenever he had eaten unripe supper, or any thing indigestible.

A gentleman connected with a bank in Glasgow was paying money at the teller's table, when a payment of six pounds was demanded. The person who made this demand was impatient, and somewhat noisy, and, although his turn had not arrived, a gentleman requested that he might be paid and got rid of. Eight or nine months after, a deficiency of six pounds was discovered on the account of this person. Several days and nights were vainly consumed in efforts to discover this error, and the gentleman who had made the payment just mentioned went home greatly fatigued. He then dreamed of the whole transaction with the impatient client, and every conduct had annoyed him at the time, and awoke with the belief that this dream would bring about an extraction from the difficulty in the bank accounts. Accordingly, he found that this sum of six pounds had not been entered in the book of interests, and thus the deficiency was made good. The gentleman to whom we are indebted for this and many other of our facts, considers this case "exceedingly remarkable."

A gentleman of landed property in the vale of Gala was prosecuted for, considerable arrears of tithe, of which he was said to owe to the whole family. He believed that these tithes had been purchased; but, after examining his father's papers, the public records, and those with whom he had transacted law business with his father, he was unable to obtain evidence of such a purchase. He therefore resolved to ride to Edinburgh, and compromise the affair as well as he could. Going to bed with the intention of putting this plan in execution on the morrow, he dreamed that his father, who had been dead many years, appeared to him. He inquired the cause of his anxiety, and when the gentleman had replied, and had added that the payment was the more unpleasant, because he had a strong conciousness that it was not owing, although he could not prove that to be the case, "You are right, my son," answered the father; "I did acquire right to the tiends for which you are now prosecuted. The papers relating to the transaction are in the hands of Mr. ——, a writer (or attorney), in a now retired from professional business, and resides at Inveresk, near Edinburgh. He was a person whom I employed on that occasion for a particular reason, but who never, on any other occasion, transacted business on my account. It is very possible that Mr. —— may have forgotten a matter which is now of a very old date; but you may call it to his recollection by this token, that when I came to pay his account, there was difficulty in getting change for a Portugal piece of gold, and that we were forced to drink out the balance at a tavern." The gentleman rode to Inveresk, and inquired of Mr. ——, a very old man, if he had transacted a certain business for his father. The old gentleman could not remember; but when the Portugal piece of money was mentioned, the whole came to his mind, and he at once sought for the papers, and found them.

Some years ago an investigation was made in the north of Scotland respecting an atrocious murder. A man came voluntarily forward, and stated that he had dreamed of a house near to which a voice had seemed to tell him that the pack of the murdered peddler was buried. The spot mentioned was examined, and the pack was found near to it, but not precisely at the place. The individual accused was convicted; he confessed, and in the strongest manner exculpated the dreamer from any knowledge of or share in the murder. It appeared, however, that immediately after the murder the two men had been together in a state of almost continual drunkenness, and some statements had probably then slipped from the murderer, which his companion might not remember when he was sober, but which the dream now recalled.

A lady dreamed that an aged female relative had been murdered by a black servant, and the dream occurred more than once. She was then so impressed by it that she went to the house of the lady to whom it related, and prevailed upon a gentleman to watch in an adjoining room during the following night. About three o'clock in the morning the gentleman, hearing footsteps on the stairs, left his place of concealment, and met the servant carrying up a quantity of coals. Being questioned as to where he was going, he replied, in a confused and hurried manner, that he was going to mend his mistress's fire—which, at three o'clock in the morning, in the middle of summer, was evidently impossible; and, on further investigation, a strong knife was found concealed beneath the coals. Another lady dreamed that a boy, her nephew, had been drowned, along with some young companions with whom he had engaged to go on a sailing excursion, in the Frith of Forth. She sent for him in the morning, and with much difficulty prevailed upon him to give up his engagement; his companions went and were all drowned. Dr. Abercrombie declares these anecdotes to be "entirely authentic."

A clergyman went to Edinburgh from a place at a short distance, and was sleeping there, when he dreamed of seeing one of his children in the midst of a fire. He awoke, and instantly returned home, and when he came within sight of his house he found it on fire. He arrived in time to rescue one of his children who had been left in a dangerous situation.

A gentleman in Cornwall dreamed that he was in the lobby of the House of Commons. A small man entered, wearing a blue coat and a white waistcoat; and immediately after another man, wearing a brown coat with yellow basket metal buttons, drew a pistol from under his coat and fired it at the first man, who instantly fell. Blood issued from a wound a short distance beneath the left breast. The murderer was seized, and the dreamer saw his countenance. He awoke and told the dream to his wife, who made nothing of it; but in the same night the dream was repeated three times, with precisely similar circumstances. He felt greatly disposed to warn Mr. Percival, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer; but some friends whom he consulted told him that he would be treated as a fanatic. Shortly after this gentleman heard of Mr. Percival's death, he was in London, where he saw a picture of the murder in the print-shops, in which he recognized the countenance and dress of the individuals seen by him in his dream—the blood on Mr. Percival's waistcoat, and the yellow basket-buttons on Bellingham's coat, corresponding precisely with what he had seen. Dr. Abercrombie received the particulars of this case from the gentleman himself.

Dr. George Moore is our authority for the following remarkable anecdote: An individual whom he knew well dreamed that he was in a church-yard reading the epitaphs, when a new grave attracted his notice. A remarkable stone at its head contained the name and the date of death of a friend whose company he had that evening enjoyed. This dream strongly impressed his memory; but thinking it superstitious to regard such a matter, he thought little or nothing of it till seven months afterward, when the death of his friend occurred at the precise time of which he had dreamed. A young lady of Ross-shire dreamed that she saw her lover slain at Corunna on a particular day, and the dream proved a true one.

Dr. Macnish dreamed of the death of a relative who was three hundred miles distant, and three days after he learned that his dream was correct, although there had not been the least expectation of his death.

A gentleman whom Dr. Darwin mentions was so deaf that for thirty years it had been necessary to converse with him by writing or by signs. He told Dr. Darwin that he never dreamed of hearing persons speak, or of conversing with them but by the fingers or by writing. Two persons who were blind also assured him that they never saw visible objects in their sleep since they had lost their sight. But Dr. Blacklock, who became blind when a few months old, had a consciousness in his dreams of the possession of a sense which he had not when awake. He fancied that he was joined to objects by a species of distant contact, which was effected by means of strings or threads.

After forty years of total blindness, Huber dreamed of the sights of his childhood. Dr. Gregory says that he has employed thoughts in his lectures and writings which occurred to him in his dreams. He even used the expressions in which they were conveyed. Condorcet said that he more than once made calculations in his sleep; and various instances of literary composition during sleep are on record.

A distinguished lawyer was consulted upon an important and difficult case, which he studied for several days with anxious care. His wife then saw him rise in the night and go to a desk in the bedroom. He sat down and wrote a long paper, which he carefully placed in the desk. He then returned to bed, and in the morning told his wife that he had dreamed of delivering a clear and luminous opinion about a case which had greatly perplexed him, and that he wished he could remember the train of thought of his dream. She directed him to the desk, and there he found the opinion clearly copied out, which proved to be correct.

Moffat, the missionary, after wandering for some days in an African desert, without food or drink, says: "The tongue cleaving to the roof of the mouth, from thirst, made conversation extremely difficult. At last we reached the long-wished-for waterfall; but it was too late to ascend the hill. We laid our heads on our saddles. The last sound we heard was the distant roar of the lion; but we were too much exhausted to feel any thing like fear. Sleep came to our relief, and it seemed made up of scenes the most lovely. I felt as if engaged in roving among ambrosial bowers, hearing sounds of music, as if from angels' harps. I seemed to pass from stream to stream, in which I bathed, and slaked my thirst at many a crystal fount flowing from golden mountains enriched with living green. These pleasures continued till morning, when we awoke speechless with thirst, our eyes inflamed, and our whole frames burning like a coal."

Somnambulism and dreaming appear to be closely allied. Possibly the truth may be that, when dreaming, we are not perfectly asleep, and that the somnambulist is still more awake, without being fully in possession of the physical and mental powers which he has when completely awakened. He is half awake. But more probably the phenomena depend on some special condition of the nervous system not yet ascertained.

Horstius mentions a young nobleman who rose in his sleep, wrapped himself in a cloak, and passed through a window, in the citadel of Breslau, to the roof. Here he tore the nest of a magpie in pieces, and, wrapping the young birds in his cloak, returned to his room and went to bed. In the morning he stated that he had dreamed of doing these things, and could not be persuaded that his dream was a reality until the birds in his cloak were shown to him. Dr. Pritchard tells of a man who rose, dressed himself, saddled his horse, and rode to the place where a market was held, all in his sleep. Martinet states that a saddler was accustomed to rise and pursue his calling when asleep; and Professor Upham tells of an American farmer who rose in his sleep, went to his barn, and there threshed five bushels of rye in the dark, and yet he separated the grain and straw with the greatest accuracy. Many cases are recorded where somnambulists have studied or composed.

Dr. Abercrombie received the following case from an eminent medical man, whose pupil the somnambulist was. This pupil was a botanist, and had lately received the first botanical prize from a public institution. One night, after a long botanical excursion, his master heard a heavy, measured footstep on the stairs; and, on going into the passage, he found his pupil in his hat and shirt, with his tin case slung across his shoulders, and a large stick in his hand. "His eyes," says his master, "were more open than natural; but I observed he never directed them to me, or to the candle which I held. While I was contemplating the best method of getting him to bed again, he commenced the following dialogue: 'Are you going to Greenwich, Sir?' 'Yes, Sir.' 'Going by water, Sir?' 'Yes, Sir.' 'May I go with you, Sir?' 'Yes, Sir; but I am going directly; therefore please to follow me.' Upon this I walked up to his room, and he followed me, without the least error in stepping up the stairs. At the side of his bed I begged he would get into the boat, as I must be off immediately. I then removed the tin case from his shoulders, his hat dropped off, and he got into bed, observing he knew my face very well—he had often seen me at the river's side." A long conversation then passed between the pupil and the imaginary boatman, which continued for three-quarters of an hour, and in which he never made an irrelevant reply. But when asked, in this conversation, who had gained the first botanical prize, he named another gentleman, but did not mention himself. "Indeed!" was the reply; "did he gain the highest prize?" but he said nothing. And when asked, "Do you know Mr. ——?" after much hesitation he answered, "If I must confess it, my name is ——." With these two exceptions, he never hesitated in the conversation. He now lay down in bed, saying that he felt tired, and that he would wait until the professor came. But he soon sat up, and conversed with another gentleman with correctness, and without hesitancy, even in uttering long sentences. After talking for about an hour, he said, "It is very cold on this grass; but, I am so tired, I must lie down." Shortly afterward he did lie down, and was quiet through the night. In the morning he was quite unconscious of what had passed, and could not remember that he had even dreamed of any thing.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!
All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

Hints to Company Officers
ON THEIR MILITARY DUTIES.
By CAPT. C. C. ANDREWS, U.S.A.
1 vol. 18mo, red cloth, 50c.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, 192 Broadway, N. Y.
Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

STRONG'S
SOLDIERS' VALENTINE PACKAGE, NO. 1,
CONTAINS
1 very fancy Valentine, new style........15
1 elegant embossed Envelope........2
1 handsome Valentine, new style........10
1 nicely embossed Envelope........2
3 Military Comic Valentines, new style........9
1 Poetry Valentine Writer........6
2 fancy Valentine Cards........5
PRICE FIFTY CENTS.
SOLDIERS' VALENTINE PACKAGE, NO. 2,
CONTAINS
1 elegant Valentine, new style........30
1 fancy Envelope........2
1 very rich Valentine, new style........20
1 fancy embossed Envelope........2
1 beautiful Valentine, new style........10
1 embossed Envelope........2
3 nicely colored Military Comic Valentines, new designs 18
1 Valentine Writer........6
2 splendid Valentine Cards........10
PRICE ONE DOLLAR.
The above packages are enclosed in a handsome illuminated envelope, printed in colors, and will be sent by mail, free of charge, on receipt of the price. Sutlers and the trade furnished at a liberal discount. Send your order early. T. W. STRONG, Importer and Publisher,
98 Nassau Street, New York.
☞ Send for a circular.

Meade's Pocket Box of Games—Containing Chessmen and Board, Checkers, Dominoes, Dice and Boxes, Cribbage, Backgammon, &c., &c., all in a neat box for the pocket or knapsack. Price $1 50. Sent free by mail for $2 00.
"WAR LIFE." Stories of the Camp and Field. Neatly bound. Sent free by mail for 50 cents.
CALLENDER & PERCE,
Publishers and Patent Agents, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

CATARRH!—Dr. Goodale's CATARRH REMEDY penetrates to the very seat of this terrible disease, and exterminates it, root and branch. Price $1 00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. Depot 612 Broadway.

Rheumatism—Who has it?
It has been confessedly acknowledged by thousands who have used them, that the Galvano Electro Metallic Insoles are the only preventive and cure. Sold by all druggists and shoe dealers generally. Price $1; sent by mail for $1 25. Secured by English and American Patents.
Send for a circular. METTAM & CO., 429 Broadway.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS
AND ARMS. Selpho's Patent. 516 Broadway, N. Y., Opposite St. Nicholas Hotel. Send for a Circular.

LONDON LANCET for JANUARY is now issued.—Articles of the first eminence, including two on the Health and Surgery of the American Armies.
Publishing Office, H. DEXTER, No. 113 Nassau Street.
JAS. HERALD, Proprietor.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.
THE BEST IN THE WORLD.
Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.
Unequaled as a dressing. Both for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

Just Tribute to Merit.
AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON,
July 11th, 1862,
Duryea's Maizena
Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the competition of all prominent manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding.
Maizena
The food and luxury of the age, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without isinglass, with few or no eggs, at a cost astonishing the most economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little boiled in milk will produce rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, with directions.
A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.
Manufactured at Glen Cove, Long Island.
Wholesale Depot, 166 Fulton Street.
WM. DURYEA, General Agent.

INVENTORS SHOULD PROCURE A Copy of "HOW TO GET A PATENT." Send a 3 cent stamp to FOWLER AND WELLS, New York.

MILITARY GOODS.
Swords for Presentation, Sashes, Belts, and Epaulettes, Guns, Pistols, and Revolvers.
Every article in the Military Line Wholesale and Retail.
W. J. Syms & Bro.,
300 Broadway, New York.

India-Rubber Gloves cure Chapped Hands, Salt Rheum, &c., and render them soft, smooth, and snowy white; are impervious to water either hot or cold, and are an excellent protection in all kinds of house-work. For sale by the trade generally. Sent by mail on receipt of price and 4 stamps to pay postage.
Ladies' sizes 87 c. a pair; Gents sizes, $1 00.
GOODYEAR'S I. R. GLOVE M'F'G CO.,
205 Broadway, N. Y.
Every description of Rubber Goods, Wholesale and Retail.

To all Wanting Farms.
Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to be seen—only 30 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate—20 acre tracts of from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good schools and society. Hundreds are settling. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rural sent free. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.
"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position, and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies."

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDE
For VIOLIN, FLUTE, AND GUITAR, ACCORDEON, PIANO, MELODEON, FIFE, FLAGEOLET, and CLARIONET, containing Instructions to enable the pupil to obtain a knowledge of playing without a teacher; with a choice collection of Music. Each, 50 cents. Teachers, pupils, and dealers desirous of obtaining a low-priced Instruction Book, one that is useful and attractive, will find these books fully suited to their wants. The instructions are adapted to all grades of scholars. The exercises are sprightly and enlivening, and the selection of music comprises the most popular melodies of the day. Mailed, post-paid, by DITSON & CO., Boston.

Splendid Holiday Presents.
THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES.
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE-BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC., ETC., ETC.,
Worth $500,000,
To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the country.
J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 208 Broadway, New York.

Army Musical Boxes!
A BEAUTIFUL PARLOR ORNAMENT!
A Cheerful Companion for the Soldier!
Richly ornamented, and performing all the popular Airs of the day. Can not get out of order.
Size No. 1, per half dozen, assorted........$30.
Size No. 2, per half dozen, assorted........42.
Size No. 3, per half dozen, assorted........54.
Samples, comprising 2 of each kind, assorted 42.
To Sutlers and other Dealers:
When a dozen or more are ordered, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made. NOT SOLD IN QUANTITIES OF LESS THAN SIX. Will be sent by Express, with bill for collection. Persons ordering in this manner, must remit one quarter of the bill as a guarantee that the goods will be paid for, or deposit the whole amount with the Express Agent, sending a certificate of the same. These rules will not be deviated from under any circumstances. Order explicitly.
SAMUEL F. SCHAFFER & CO.,
Corner Maiden Lane and Broadway, New York.

PENSIONS, BOUNTY, PAY, PRIZE-MONEY, and all Army and Navy Claims, procured by SOMES & BROWN, No. 2 Park Place, New York.
Send for our Hand-Book of Information.

Portable Printing Offices,
For the use of Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to do their own Printing. Circular sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., on receipt of two 3 ct. stamps.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

THE BEST SELLING HISTORY OF THE REBELLION IS ISSUED BY THE AUBURN PUBLISHING CO. ☞ BOOK AGENTS should send at once for full particulars, private terms, and a well paying business, to E. G. STORKE, Auburn, N. Y.

To the Nervous.
Dr. Adam Laurie's Life Pills,
The great Nervous Remedy, are for sale at the Sole Agency, No. 4 Union Square, New York.
Price One Dollar per box, with full directions.
All letters with enclosures must be addressed as above.

Rare and Beautiful Flower Seeds free to all who join the "RURAL KEYSTONE CLUB." 25 c. in $1 clear saving on all Subscriptions to Newspapers and Periodicals. For full particulars send stamp to P. SUTTON, Ransom, Penn.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machines. Address,
S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils, Oriental Burners, and 13 other new articles. 15 circulars free. Address, SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

WEDDING CARDS
These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Old Establishment, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane St., N. Y.
☞ Established 1840. ☞ For Specimen by Mail, send two stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have Just Published;

SPRINGS OF ACTION. By Mrs. C. H. B. RICHARDS. 12mo, printed on Tinted Paper, Cloth, $1 00; Cloth, Gilt Edges, $1 25.

MEMOIRS OF MRS. JOANNA BETHUNE. By her Son, the Rev. GEO. W. BETHUNE, D.D. With an Appendix, containing Extracts from the Writings of Mrs. Bethune. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

BUTTERFIELD'S OUTPOST DUTY. Camp and Outpost Duty for Infantry. With Standing Orders, Extracts from the Revised Regulations for the Army, Rules for Health, Maxims for Soldiers, and Duties of Officers. By DANIEL BUTTERFIELD, Brig.-Gen. Vols., U. S. A. 18mo, Flexible Cloth, 63 cents.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage free, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.
TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.
☞ The Publishers employ no TRAVELING AGENTS. Parties who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly had better remit direct to the Publishers, or pay their subscription to some Postmaster or General Agent with whom they are acquainted, and of whose responsibility they are assured.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

The Bird of Freedom and the Black Bird.

A New Plan to frighten Fine Old English Gentlemen.

Reception of the "Brute Butler" by the Ladies of the North.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Agents. Soldiers

In camp or discharged, can make easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp can act as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Package in endless variety and at all prices. Fine Jewelry and Watches at low prices. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements.

S. C. HICKARD & CO., 103 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Price Package House in the World.

The American Parlor Or Floor Skate, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles.

Also, 50,000 pair of Ladies' and Gents' Ice Skates, comprising all the new and most improved patterns, made from rolled steel and iron bandered: Skate Straps and Leather Goods of every description; Fogg's improved Lever Skate Buckle. Sole Agent for Williams, Morse & Co.'s celebrated Skates.

FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, New York.
68 KILBY STREET, Boston.

Nervous Diseases and Physical Debility—New and reliable treatment. Valuable hygienic and dietetic treatise by A. MILLER HOUGHTON, No. 2 South Ninth street, Philadelphia Pa.

VALENTINES.

Lay in your Stock,
BUT FIRST
Read our Circular.

Sent free. Address
AMERICAN PUBLISHING AGENCY,
14 Chambers Street, N. Y.

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlement. Rich soil. Mild climate. See advertisement of Vineland, on previous page.

IMPORTANT TO AGENTS!!—We have reduced the wholesale price of our GREAT STATIONERY POSTPOID PACKAGE. We also give better Watches to our Agents than any other firm. Send stamp for new circular. WEIR & CO., 34 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

Confederate Rebel Money.
FAC-SIMILE REBEL TREASURY NOTES,
So exactly like the genuine that where one will pass current the other will go equally well. $500 in Confederate Notes of all denominations, sent free by mail on receipt of $5, by W. E. HILTON, 11 Spruce Street, New York.

HEIMSTREET'S
Inimitable Hair Restorative.
IT IS NOT A DYE,
But restores gray hair to its original color, by supplying the capillary tubes with natural sustenance, impaired by age or disease. All Unfortunate Dyes are composed of lunar caustic, destroying the vitality and beauty of the hair, and offend of themselves no dressing. Heimstreet's Inimitable Coloring not only restores hair to its natural color by an easy process, but gives the hair a
Luxuriant Beauty,
promotes its growth, prevents its falling off, eradicates dandruff, and imparts health and pleasantness to the head. It has stood the test of time, being the original Hair Coloring, and is constantly increasing in favor. Used by both gentlemen and ladies. It is sold by all respectable dealers, or can be procured by them of the commercial agent, D. S. Barnes, 25 Broadway, N.Y. Two sizes, 50 c and $1.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON 259
WORK, Wrought, Cast, and Wire. All
IRON RAILINGS, VERANDAHS, BALCONIES,
GUARDS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description. Illustrated Catalogues mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM.
259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

$16 WATCHES. $16

LADIES' WATCHES.—Heavy Gold Plate Hunting Case Lever Watches for $16, equal to gold 18 k. Gold in finish and general appearance. Send for a Circular.
J. L. FERGUSON, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

GOLD PENS.

Retailed at wholesale prices. Goods warranted. Send for a circular, giving list of prices and engravings of Pens. Pens repaired on the receipt of 20 cents in P. O. Stamps.
E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office 15 Maiden Lane, New York City.

A REALLY VALUABLE MICROSCOPE, one that a child can use, sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.
A. WOODWARD, P. O. Box 2175, Boston.

Valentine Packages

And Valentines for soldiers. New, and very attractive, PRIZE PACKAGES. Many varieties adapted for the Army. Send for NEW Circular.
G. S. HASKINS & CO., No. 30 Beekman St., New York.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to D. Ades, 381 Pearl St., N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

AGENTS WANTED every where for our Splendid New Mammoth Eureka Prize Package. 250 per cent. profit. Superb Watch free, to all Agents. $10 per day made. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CATELY & CO., 49 Ann Street, New York.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE! MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 28c., COIN PREPAID. Five different powers, $1. Boiled Objects, Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

PHYSIOGNOMY, or Signs of Character, PHYSIOLOGY, and the Bodily Functions; PHRENOLOGY, or the Brain and Nervous System; PSYCHOLOGY, the Science of the Soul; ETHNOLOGY, or the Natural History of Man, with Instructions, in the Choice of Pursuits, Personal Improvement, etc., are some of the topics elucidated in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL AND LIFE ILLUSTRATED for 1863. No. 1 now ready. Only $1 a year. Address FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

BEWARE THE SNOW HEATERS!

BROWNE'S IMPROVED PATENT METALLIC WEATHER STRIPS totally exclude Cold, Wind, Rain, and Dust from around Doors, Windows, and Skylights of every description, and stops the rattling without interfering with the free use of the same; are warranted good, Winter and Summer, for 5 years, and are endorsed by thousands of the leading men of New York and vicinity.
For Circular, address the
PATENT METALLIC WEATHER STRIP CO.,
212 Broadway, cor. of Fulton St., N. Y.
Agents wanted in every city.

$50 per week net profit.—NEW ARTICLE. Everybody must have it. Retails for $1 00. Exclusive rights for sale low. For terms, &c., address BALLOU & SON, Haverhill, Mass. ☞ P. S. Samples for Agents sent by mail for 30 cents, Postage Currency. Address as above.

Buy your Skate Straps with

Fogg's Lever Buckle,

Manufactured by F. STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, New York,
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $21, $24 and $30 PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.
FRENCH FLANNEL ARMY SHIRTS, $24, $27, $30 and $33 per dozen.
S. W. H. WARD, from London, No. 387 Broadway

THE SOLDIER'S GUIDE TO HEALTH.
In Embracing Rules for Preserving the Health of the Soldier, and Hints on Camp Life, to which are added Instructions for Applying Field Dressings and Discharging Duties from the Revised "Army Regulations." Hall's Journal of Health, and other eminent sources.
PRICE 10 CENTS. FINER EDITION 25 CENTS.
Sent Free of Postage.
☞ Every Officer and Private in the Army needs this little work; it is an invaluable companion. The Rules for Preserving Health and Instructions for obtaining Furloughs and Discharges are worth one hundredfold its cost.
AGENTS WANTED. Address the Publisher,
G. G. EVANS,
Philadelphia, Pa.
N.B. Those having friends in the Army should send this little book to them, as lives and health are saved by it.

$5.—A BEAUTIFUL Engraved GOLD PLATED WATCH, English Movement, perfect time-keeper. Sent to any address for $5. Fine Watches and Jewelry at low prices. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 49 Ann St., or P.O. Box 5027.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Have just published,
MODERN WAR: its Theory and Practice. Illustrated from celebrated Campaigns and Battles. With Maps and Diagrams. By Arthur Sherard, Captain U.S.A. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 318.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ARMY BEEF.—Drawn by Mr. Theodore R. Davis.—[See Page 75.]

GINERAL BUTLER.

[LINES RIT TU RICHARD YEADON, A RANK, PIZEN REBBEL, WHU HES OFFERED TEN THAOUSAND DOLLARS FUR THE HED OV GINERAL BUTLER. I ONLY WISH THE AMERIKAN EGLE MAY LIVE TILL HE GITS IT!]

Yu offer us ten thaousand fur the hed ov Butler, du ye?
Wa'al, I vaow I wunder at it! But yu may jest spare yure pains.
I tell yu (ef yu know enuff tu git the idee thru yu),
Yu'd better wish, a tarnal site, fur Gineral Butler's brains!

Here's a fust-rate chance tu make a pile!—a bribe fur human natur!
Naow is the time fur Judases tu clap thare hands and larf;
Ten thaousand dollars offered fur the sarvice ov a traitor?
Why thare's menny a poor scoundrel thet wood du the work fur half!

Want the hed ov Gineral Butler! Wa'al, I never! 'tis surprisin!
Yu fellers daown in Dixie must be fallin off from grace.
Not hevin enny decent hed (that fact thare's no disguisin),
Yu want tu take yure nabor's, es ef that wood help yure case!

Ten thaousand dollars offered! Specie payment is't, I wunder?
Bein a Yankee born, yu know, p'r'aps I am kind o' cute.
Yure promises air fair enuff—but fokes du sumtimes blunder,
And them Confederate notes ov yourn—'tain't every wun they'd suit!

Ten thaousand dollars offered fur the hed ov Butler! Reely!
Haow long is't sense yu larfed et him, and called him "Pickayune?"
Did yu find he was tu big a coin fur yu tu hold genteely?
Or has he put yure notes ov war a leetle aout ov tune?

Yu offer us ten thaousand fur the hed ov Butler, du yu?
Wa'al, I don't mutch wunder at it—but yu may jest spare yure pains;
But I'll tell yu (ef yu know enuff tu git the idee thru yu),
Yu'd better (fur yu need 'em) wish fur Gineral Butler's brains!

Charity Grimes.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Saturday, January 31, 1863.

NO SURRENDER!

THE Army of the Potomac is again in motion. In the Southwest General M'Clernand, after the brilliant operation against the Post of Arkansas—the most complete triumph won by our arms since the capture of Fort Donelson—is preparing to renew the struggle at Vicksburg. Rosecrans is in the heart of Tennessee. Banks is thundering at the gates of Port Hudson. Foster may have taken Wilmington. Every where our armies are moving; and though success has lately been unequal, there is no diminution of energy on the part of the North.

For the spirit of the North is undaunted. No one has quailed at the reverses which the Union arms have lately encountered. In Wall Street a few craven voices have been heard praying for peace. But the spirit of the country at large is as stout as ever, and the purpose of our Anglo-Saxon millions as fixed as ever upon the preservation under one Government of the entire territory of the United States.

The true reason of this stern and resolute fixity of purpose is simply the practical impossibility of negotiating a peace except upon terms which secure the restoration of the Union. No international division of the territory of the United States can by any ingenuity be devised. No line can be imagined which could be permanent, or which should secure to either section the blessings of peace and a chance of material prosperity. If to-morrow we acknowledged the independence of the rebel Confederacy, and granted them a border line, war would break out in less than twelve months. They would object to Northern travelers expressing Northern sentiments in their midst, and they would demand that we should catch and return their fugitive slaves. On the other hand, our people would be more apt to catch slave-owners than slaves; and if Northern men were molested South, an account of and reparation for the injury would be exacted. The South would attempt to discriminate against our manufactures and in favor of those of their European sympathizers, which would lead to angry and irreconcilable disputes. The freedom of the Mississippi would prove an endless source of quarrel. It might be declared free by statute of the rebel Confederacy; but any slave-driver overflowing with rage and whisky might close it at an hour's notice with a single piece of cannon, and defy the whole State of Mississippi to control him—as was the case in the spring of 1861. Passing over the impossibility of discovering a boundary which would be satisfactory to both parties, it is obvious that the successful secession of the South would be followed by further steps toward disintegration, which, in the event of the success of the slave-owners' rebellion, would be feebly resisted by the Government at Washington. The West would, in course of time, seek to establish a central empire. New England and the Middle States would agree to differ, and part company. The Pacific States would follow the fatal example. Thus, in the course of ten years, we should witness a repetition of the Central American broils in our own country: and the great republic of which we are citizens would be split up into half a dozen or more "feeble, jarring States, exhausting their strength in internecine conflicts."

Hence it is that, notwithstanding our military failures and the disasters which every now and then befall us, there is no change of sentiment among the people of the North. It was hoped and believed at Richmond that the triumphs of the Northern Democracy at the October and November elections insured the success of a party pledged to the acknowledgment of Southern independence. But in fact the representative Democrats are as stanch in their hostility to the severance of the Union as the best friends of the President. Here, in New York city, we have a few sneaks, who have wormed themselves into positions of political prominence, who have all along sympathized with the rebels, and would now grant them all they ask. But these creatures have no more power or influence than that eminent British prig, Mr. Gladstone. The heart of the Northern Democracy is sound and loyal to the core.

Again, it is because we believe that the dissolution of the Union is the greatest possible misfortune which could befall this country—a misfortune not limited in its effects to this generation alone, but transmitted with geometrically increasing intensity to our children, our children's children, and their posterity forever—that we are about to consent to an unparalleled adulteration of our national currency, which will produce in Northern society and Northern commerce changes as extensive as those which might be caused by a complete political revolution. It is now settled that there is no chance of obtaining more money on loan, and the Treasury Department is consequently preparing to flood the country with irredeemable paper. This policy will enable the Government to carry on the war to a successful issue, which is the one thing desired by loyal people. That it will produce the ruin of thousands, will defraud creditors, impoverish the rich, and press heavily on the mechanic, the working man, and the man of fixed income, create an enormous advance in all articles of necessity, and generate an era of speculation which will eventually cause most of the property of the Northern people to change hands, is too clear for argument. But if it should ruin the entire race of Northern men now alive, a wise judgment would deem the price not too dear for the preservation of the Union. For, though we be all ruined, our sons may still work their way in the world, and achieve success and prosperity; whereas the destruction of the Union would insure not only our ruin but theirs, and their children's.

No such war as ours has ever been waged since the Crusades. It is cheering, in the face of bad news, day after day, to realize that the stout, manly spirit of the Northern people has not yet shown signs of surrender, and that we are all as fixed as ever in our purpose of maintaining intact the integrity of our country, whatever may become of the renegade, degraded, and brutified people who inhabit its Southern section.

THE LOUNGER.

LIBERTY AND LICENSE.

In his Essay upon Milton, Macaulay says what many of us may ponder with profit to-day. He is speaking of the royal Conservatives in England, who foolishly held Liberty responsible for the excesses of License:

"There is only one cure for the evils which newly-acquired freedom produces, and that cure is freedom. When a prisoner first leaves his cell he can not bear the light of day; he is unable to discriminate colors or recognize faces. But the remedy is not to remand him into his dungeon, but to accustom him to the rays of the sun. The blaze of truth and liberty may at first dazzle and bewilder nations which have become half blind in the house of bondage. But let them gaze on, and they will soon be able to bear it. In a few years men learn to reason. The extreme violence of opinion subsides. Hostile theories correct each other. The scattered elements of truth cease to contend, and begin to coalesce. And at length a system of justice and order is educed out of the chaos.

"Many politicians of our time are in the habit of laying it down as a self-evident proposition that no people ought to be free until they are fit to use their freedom. The maxim is worthy of the fool in the old story who resolved not to go into the water until he had learned to swim. If men are to wait for liberty until they become wise and good in slavery, they may wait forever.

"Therefore," he adds, "it is that we decidedly approve of the conduct of Milton, and all other wise and good men, who, in spite of much that was ridiculous and hateful in the conduct of their associates, stood firmly by the cause of Public Liberty."

REACTION.

"When you spoke some time since of a reaction, dear Mr. Lounger, what did you mean?"

Simply that the purpose of the nation is relaxed. It is no longer resolved, as it was eighteen months ago, to subdue the rebellion at all costs. There is a large party at the North which hates another Northern party more than it does the rebels. A great deal of the energy and eloquence of the North is now devoted to the alienation of various sections of country among ourselves. Some have lost all hope of military success. Some are appalled by the prospect of an enormous debt and commercial distress. Some think the war the result of unlawful agitation. Some openly sigh for peace. And a very large party see in the prosecution of the war by every means the sure destruction of its own party-power, and so, under the plea that the Constitution is unconstitutionally maintained, it embarrasses in every way the action of the Government. There is a frank excuse for secession, if not its plain justification, in many mouths; there is an open repudiation of the principles of the founders of the Government; and a deliberate assent to those laid down by Alexander H. Stephens.

The cause of this reaction is found in the fact that party-spirit is stronger than patriotism. The war is a conflict of principles. It is so understood and stated at the South. It is denied at the North. Consequently the rebels are united, firm, and desperate: and we are divided, languid, or worse. The rebellion says frankly, "We repudiate the Union and Constitution because they will gradually develop the personal liberty of every man; and we don't believe in liberty." The rebellion puts at its head, therefore, the men who most truly represent that infidelity and hate. It knows its aim and strikes steadily. On the other hand, the nation, instead of saying in reply, "Of course the Union and Government will secure personal liberty, but they will achieve it peacefully and under law, and without any grievance of which you can fairly complain," falls to vituperation and crimination in its own ranks: affirms or denies the essential principle involved—and instead of meeting conviction with conviction, unity with unity, and desperation with resolution, halts, higgles, doubts, and paralyzes its own efforts.

The consequence of the reaction, if it continues, will be defeat, disgrace, national dissolution, and anarchy. There is but one road to peace, and that is the absolute suppression of the rebellion by force, and the gradual yielding of the rebel section to the conviction that the will of the nation is a stronger will than its own. Compromise and separation are equally impracticable. There may yet arise a party strong enough to insist upon trying to effect one or the other. But each must fail. The rebels honestly repudiate all reconstruction, for they are not fools. Davis and his men know where the secret of the war is. It is the old secret, despotism and liberty; privilege and right; aristocracy and democracy. The sole safety of the rebels is in secession, for our subjugation is not possible. But separation is equally impracticable, for separation is total dissolution—no line can be devised but by the vote of States; and to concede that States may stay in the Union or leave it, is to allow a principle which justifies Fernando Wood's proposition for the withdrawal of the city of New York from the State.

The reaction and the rebellion are but the Northern and Southern aspects of anarchy. One man in earnest is the match of six who are indifferent. The rebels are the man in earnest. Are we the indifferent six?

IN THE CARS.

"There it is, Sir," said Rusticus to Civicus in the cars, "I can not see why you make such a pother about Slavery. If we had it in this State it would be a different thing. But if you paid a minister for preaching, and liked to go to church and thought it your duty to go, how would you like to hear Sunday after Sunday about the heathen in China? Heathenism is bad, and once in a way a man may say so; but why ding, ding, ding forever about it and never go near China? I don't like slavery, and never did. I wouldn't have a slave if you would give him to me. But there's no fear of our having any slaves in Chautauque, and why should we preach and discuss all the time the sins of other people?"

But, my good friend, if you lived in China and were still a Christian, and knew that any where within the Chinese wall Heathenism was struggling hard, and even with apparent success, to get the whip-hand of Christianity—although there might be no heathen in your town, do you think it would be a question that you had no business to discuss? If you cared any thing at all for your religion, don't you think you would be a zany if you folded your arms and said, "It's none of my business. We haven't any heathen for ten miles round."

"Ah! in that case—"

Yes, but take one nearer home. Let us suppose that you drink no intoxicating liquor; that you think it wrong to make, sell, or drink it; that you believe half of the crime and poverty in the land to be caused by rum; but still that there is no grog-shop, no drunkard, and, so far as you know, no drop of liquor in your town or county.

"Well, in that case, I hope that we should reserve our censure for our own sins, and not those of the next county or the rest of the State."

Stop a moment. You live in a State of many counties. You are a voter, and you have these views of rum-selling and drinking. Now in other counties the liquor interest, we will say, is straining every nerve, spending endless money, and openly declares its intention to be to secure the entire political control of the State, so that it may repeal all license laws and submit the State to the direction of one interest, and that interest rum; and suppose that the would-be drunkards in your town and county cried Amen, and were trying to help that interest in every possible way, do you think that you would then say that you thought you had better reserve your censure, and since you were none of you drunkards, therefore you would not discuss dram-drinking?

"No, by George!"

But if you should hear any body declare that to discuss the Liquor question in your county was an impertinent meddling with the rights of other voters, would you not be tempted to ask, "Friend, how much does the Liquor interest pay you for talking in that style up here?"

"You'd better believe it! I should say to him, I am a citizen of this county, but also of the State. I don't believe in liquor; but if men have made it and bought it, and the law protects them, very well. But when they say we are going to run the State for the benefit of that interest, I say, 'Not if I can help it.' And I turn to and try to persuade every one of my neighbors to vote against it."

Well, and if the Liquor interest says that if it does not succeed it will overthrow the Government, then what?

"If my liver isn't white, that makes no difference."

Well, suppose the Liquor interest is lawfully beaten, and actually tries by force to execute its threat?

"I shall hope to be on hand."

And if it turns upon you fiercely and says that you caused the row, because you insisted upon saying that you didn't like liquor, and thereby helped influence public opinion so that the Liquor interest couldn't get votes enough to obtain lawful control of the Government, then what would you do? Tell me that.

"I should laugh out loud."

You wouldn't think the Liquor question was like that of heathenism in China?

"No, Sir."

Neither should I.

A MARYLAND "YANK."

At the second battle of Bull Run a Maryland Union soldier lost both his eyes by a single shot. He was young, brave, devoted. When he recovered from the stunning blow he found himself lying upon the ground, and the noise of battle was dying away. Suddenly he heard a groan near him, and listened intently to the words he heard.

"Hallo!" cried he, at length.

"Hallo!" was the faint reply.

"You're a reb, a'n't you?" said the blind soldier.

"Yes; and I s'pose you're a Yank?" feebly answered the other.

"Yes, I'm a Yank. Where are you wounded?"

"My legs are broken," returned the rebel.

"Well, now, reb, if you'll lend me your eyes I'll lend you my legs. Hey?"

"I'll do it," said the cripple.

The blind man then groped his way to the rebel, and took him upon his back. The rebel guided him safely, and as they were already within the enemy's lines they reached head-quarters without difficulty. Directed to a surgeon, the two wounded men at length lay down together upon the ground. An officer, seeing the blue coat of the blind soldier, approached and said, in a brisk but not unkindly tone,

"Well, Yank?"

"Well?"

"Lost your eyes, hey?"

"Yes, I'm blind."

"Well, now, a'n't you sorry you came? Haven't you got enough of it? What did you come for?"

"To put down the rebs," stoutly answered the Marylander.

"Well, well; don't you wish you'd staid to home?"

"No, I don't," replied the youth, good-humoredly.

"Yank, if you had both your eyes, and were safe out of our lines—come, now—what do you think you would be doing?"

"Well, I reckon I should be sighting a reb," rejoined the indomitable hero; and the officer, finding that the young man was just as much in earnest as he, and understood exactly why he had come to fight, and regretted his lost sight not for himself but for his country, turned and left him, but not without a special charge to the surgeon to treat him well.

MRS. HOMESPUN UPON PLAYERS.

Mrs. Sarah Homespun writes to the Lounger about plays and theatres. She came to town with her daughter, and she says:

"What I want to ask you is this: We went to the theatre, at Mr. Wallack's in Broadway Street, a few nights back, and saw a very funny piece, called 'A Bachelor of Arts.' * * * Every once in a while the gentlemen actors on the stage swore horrid oaths, and when they didn't swear, they were vulgar, and said, 'the devil,' and 'devilish,' and all such mean sort of truck as that. Now, Sir, I brought my daughter Sarah up to despise such works, and I know she is as good a girl as can be; but she laughed when these things were said, though I knew she didn't think it was funny. Don't you think it shameful for actors to use such language before decent folks? * * * Mr. Lounger, if people must have theatres, and plays, and that sort of thing, what use is there to cuss and swear, and rip right out, as I tell my old man sometimes? It isn't a bit funny, and I declare I couldn't help feelin' sorry for that young woman on the stage, who was obligated to stand by and hear such pirate's talk. Do write a piece in your paper about it.

"P.S. I guess if them actors heard the comments people made about them behind their backs, they wouldn't use such vulgar talk."

Mrs. Homespun's postscript answers her note. The conduct of actors is not determined by what is said behind them, but before them. If Miss Homespun did not laugh when the actors swore, they would soon cease to be profane. The only proof players have that they are amusing is the response from the audience. If the house hissed when the stage was vulgar, it would very soon be decent. Mrs. Homespun knows probably that hot bread for breakfast is not considered wholesome food. But, upon her travels, she must have observed that every hotel table is covered in the morning with hot bread. The reason is that people like it and eat it. They ought not to like it, but landlords provide what the public approves. Actors do exactly the same thing. The reform must begin in the customers. Let Mrs. Homespun and her family hiss lustily when there is swearing or indecency upon the stage, and she will soon purify it.

ONE-IDEA MEN.

THERE is a loud outcry in certain quarters against people of one idea. We are informed that we are in prodigious danger from such people. There are plenty of us who have no ideas whatever, but we are not formidable. There are plenty more who have false and sophistical ideas, but they are honorable and innocent.

The danger, it seems, is not in having inhuman, impolitic, unjust, and extravagant ideas, if you only have enough of them. There must be enough to pass out of the singular number. But if a man has one idea, no matter how wise, how true, how elevated, and beneficent, he is a nuisance, a pest, and, in short, a man of one idea.

Let us look at this matter a little. Our own history, like that of every nation in the world, is full of one-idea men from the beginning. Washington was eminently their leader. He had one fixed, dominant idea. That idea governed his life and his thoughts. For that idea he relinquished the charms of home and risked his life and fortune. That idea he defended in debate and in the field. For the sake of that idea he was willing to see his native land desolated by war, he was willing to hazard the lives and fortunes of his neighbors. For that idea he saw trade languish and commerce expire. For that idea he endured every kind of contumely, slander, and enmity; and after working strenuously for seven years, with one idea in his soul and heart and brain, he saw it triumph in the independence of America. Had he swerved from that one idea of independence—had he yielded to the taunts and threats and sneers and arms of his opponents, he might indeed have won from shallow lips the praise of not being a man of one idea; but he would have lost from the heart of mankind, and the eternal gratitude of his country, the fame of Washington.

In this very moment of our history there are three classes of men, each of one idea. The first class believes in the maintenance of the Government by every means known to war. The second class hope solely at its destruction. The cause of the country, that is the one idea of every man who loves country more than party. The cause of the rebellion, that is the one idea of every man who hates the Union.

But there is a third class of one-idea men. It is composed of those who love party more than country, more than national union or disunion. It is the least respectable of all, and it is the one which incessantly denounces the first class as fanatics of one idea, and the second as gentlemen who have been goaded into hasty action. When a ship is in dire peril of going down there can be but three parties, and they have each one idea. The one would save her at all risks. The second would let her sink. The third is careless whether she sinks or swims.

In the peril of the ship of State every man must choose which one idea he will favor. And when he has decided, let him not be bullied by other one-idea men that he is a man of one idea.

FINE NAMES.

THE country has been recently favored with another "Conservative" demonstration. There was a Senator to be elected in Pennsylvania. The "Conservatives" had one majority upon joint ballot. There were doubts as to the result; so Mr. M'Mullen, an eminent "Conservative," who is to Philadelphia what our own Rynders is to us, headed a thousand other Conservatives of the same kind, and went to Harrisburg. That the peace of that capital was endangered, that the Legislature sat in practical duress, and that a Pennsylvania Senator was elected under the menace of a mob, no sensible man will deny. In like manner the rowdies of Tammany Hall and the Five Points prevented the organization of the New York Assembly last week.

It was a truly "Conservative" proceeding. It was strictly in accordance with "Conservative" principles. Two years ago last autumn Mr. Yancey, who was then a most distinguished "Conservative," although his views are entirely unchanged, came to New York and made a speech, and told us that if we persisted in voting as we chose, and constitutionally electing a President, he and his friends would dissolve the Union. That was "National" and "Conservative" speech-making at that time. The thing is always the same, whatever you call it. It is a principle at war with law, with order, with human rights, and with constitutional guarantees. It was so then; it is so now. And when well-meaning but deluded men observe that all disturbance of public order and outrage of law, all pandering to the basest prejudice and denial of generous principle, is made by the most unscrupulous politicians and the most disreputable men, who call themselves "Conservative," he will gradually wonder whether that word correctly describes that kind of thing and person. For some time in Paris at a certain café the most popular dish was hare curiously stewed. The demand was immense. Every body was eating and praising the wonderful hare. It was so exquisite, so delicate, so nutritious. Suddenly one of the patrons conceived a horrible suspicion. He inquired—he discovered—and cried out to the appalled company, "It's cat!" Hare ceased to be in demand from that day.

LITTLE PEOPLE.

WHEN paragraphs appeared in the newspapers stating that a wonderful little lady was holding court at the St. Nicholas Hotel, and that she was all that the most fastidious fancy could desire in a small woman, the thoughts of the sagacious instantly turned to the American Museum. But when a "correspondence" was published between Mr. Barnum and the prodigy, in which the latter declined his offer of ten thousand dollars a day, more or less, upon the plea that she was only waiting the completion of her wardrobe and of the setting of her precious stones before sailing for Europe to visit the "crowned heads," etc., every body knew that Mr. Barnum had secured another dwarf, and was advertising his success. Her name is Lavinia Warren. She is 21 years old, 32 inches high, and weighs 29 pounds. Unquestionably she is one of the most interesting of the many wonders of the kind which the Museum has offered to the public. General Tom Thumb and Commodore Nutt are henceforth not without hope. The poets of the press describe her faultless form, her winning voice, her sparkling dark eyes, her rich, dark, waving hair, her exquisitely modeled neck and shoulders, her bust a sculptor's study (!), and her singular intelligence. If Bottom should stray into the American Museum he would be sure that he beheld Titania. In the words of one of the enthusiasts—"What more could we desire?"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"How is it you never wear a great-coat?" said Jones to a friend. "Because I never was," replied the wag.

Wetherbee, who "drives the Harleck stage," is a great wag. "There's a young woman lying in that 'ere house yender," said he to us, as we were riding on the outside with him last summer; "there's a young woman been a lyin' there near about a month, and they haven't buried her yet!" "Why not?" we innocently inquired. "'Cause she ain't dead!" quietly remarked Mr. Wetherbee, and then he tickled the ear of the nigh leader slightly with his whip.

A gentleman who is in the habit of never "going home till morning," while dining at a friend's house, ventured to suggest that he thought there was more noise made about garroting than was necessary, and addressing his conversation to the hostess, said, "No attempt has ever been made to garrote me, and I go out a great deal." "That is," replied the lady, "because you go out too late for the garroters."

It is singular how rapidly some young gentlemen from the country lose their color when visiting large cities. They go there very green, and invariably come away done very brown.

An old bachelor, who has dined out on Christmas-Day for several years, says: "If, when you visit a friend, his wife tells you, in a husky voice, to 'make yourself at home,' obey her literally as soon as possible."

"Mamma," said Harry, "how fat Amelia has grown!" "Yes," replied his mamma; "but don't say 'fat,' dear; say 'stout.'" At the dinner-table on the following day Harry was asked if he would take any fat. "No, thank you," said Harry; "I'll take some stout."

A wealthy French financier being suspected of filling his own coffers at the expense of the royal treasury, was deprived of his office and dismissed from the court. He manifested no confusion at his disgrace, and was merely heard to say, "They have acted very foolishly to dismiss me. I had provided sufficiently for myself, and was just going to exert myself for the state."

The swell of the ocean is said to be a dandy midshipman.

An elderly dandy, who was more noted for running into debt than for paying his tradesmen, made an exception in favor of his wig-maker, that he might be enabled to say that he wore his "own hair."

What is the schoolmaster's tree?—Birch.

"Say, Jack, can you tell us what's the best thing to hold two pieces of rope together?" "I guess knot, Jack."

For a lady to sweep her carpet with embroidered under-sleeves would be considered indecently dirty; but to drag the pavement with her skirts seems to be very genteel.

What kind of a fever have those who wish to get their names in print?—Type-us fever.

At a recent conference meeting the members were asked, "How many brethren can you accommodate at your house?" One lady rose and said, "I can sleep two, but I can eat as many as you will send."

Few ladies are so modest as to be unwilling to sit in the lap of ease and luxury.

A French paper represents the Chancellor of the Exchequer as having delivered his well-known speech in Newgate instead of Newcastle.

"How often do you knead bread?" asked one housekeeper of another. "How often? Why, I might say we need it continually," the other replied.

A machine has been invented which is to be driven by the force of circumstances.

Why is a bird a greedy creature?—Because it never eats less than a peck.

What musical instrument has had an honorary degree conferred upon it?—Fiddle D. D.

Resolve on that course of life which is most excellent, and habit will render it the most delightful.

Why is the sun like a good loaf?—Because it's light when it rises.

A man so intoxicated that he can't hold up his head is a tip-top fellow.

What is that which never asks any questions, but requires many answers?—The street door.

A promising young man may do very well, perhaps—a paying one much better.

What light could not possibly be seen in a dark room?—An Israel*ite*.

A man with a scolding wife, when inquired of respecting his occupation, said he kept a hot-house.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

With what two animals do you always go to bed?
Two calves.

Why is the cook at the Palace like a man sitting on the top of St. Paul's?
Because both are in a high cool and airy (culinary) situation.

My first is a ruffian that riots in blood;
My second has a rough coat, and is son of the wood;
My whole is a phantom that scares you by night,
When the tapers burn blue and the moon gives pale light.
Bug-bear.

What English word has all the vowels following each other?
Facetiously (a e i o u y).

What famous battle was fought in a most vulgar place?
Agincourt (a gin court).

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Wednesday, January 14, in the Senate, ex-Governor Hicks, the new Senator from Maryland, was qualified and took his seat. The Judiciary Committee reported back the House bill granting aid for the emancipation of slaves in Missouri, with an amendment. The Military Committee reported back the bill to consolidate the regiments now in the field. The Committee on the Conduct of the War were directed to inquire relative to the transportation of disloyal women to and from within the rebel lines. The consideration of the joint resolution annulling treaties and forfeiting the lands and annuities of the Sioux Indians, was postponed till the 21st inst.——In the House, a joint resolution providing for the immediate payment of the army and navy, was adopted. A resolution directing the arrest of Simon Stevens, for contempt in refusing to answer questions before the Select Committee on Government Contracts, was adopted. A bill to provide for a military and postal road between New York and Washington was referred to the Select Committee on the subject. The remainder of the session was occupied in debate on the war and national politics.

On Thursday, 15th, in the Senate, the credentials of Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, the new Senator from Pennsylvania, were presented. A resolution calling for information respecting the accident to the steamer Ossipee was adopted. The papers relating to the French Spoliation claims were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Finance Committee reported back the joint resolution to provide for the payment of the army and navy, and it was adopted by a vote of 38 against 2. Senator Collamer introduced a bill relative to suits for damages growing out of arbitrary arrests. The bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy at West Point was next considered, and, after some debate, passed, by a vote of 29 against 10.——In the House, the credentials of Mr. Jennings Piggot, of North Carolina, and the protest of Charles Henry Foster against his admission to a seat, were presented and referred to the Committee on Elections. The remainder of the session was devoted to debate, in Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide ways and means for the support of the Government.

On Friday, 16th, in the Senate, a communication was received from the Secretary of the Interior asking for an appropriation of half a million for the Capitol extension, and two hundred thousand dollars for the new dome. The Military Committee reported back the bill to suspend the sale of land on the South Carolina and Georgia coast, with an amendment as a substitute. A resolution directing the Naval Committee to inquire into the efficiency of the construction of iron-clad vessels of war was introduced. It was stated that the whole matter had been referred to a board of competent engineers, whereupon the resolution was rejected. The bill providing pecuniary aid for emancipating the slaves in Missouri was then taken up, and Senator Henderson, of Missouri, made a speech in support of the measure. At the conclusion of his remarks the bill was laid aside. The bill providing for consolidating the regiments in the field was discussed and postponed. A resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on Territories to report whether the publication of the Message of the Governor of Utah had been suppressed; if so, what were the causes and what was the message. The bill to increase the clerical force of the Quarter-master's Department was called up, and Senator Lane reiterated his suspicions of the loyalty of General Meigs.——In the House, several private bills were considered. The bill reported last June from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with amendments, authorizing the enlargement of the Mississippi and Michigan canal for the passage of gun-boats, munitions of war, etc., and also the enlargement of the Erie and Oswego canals for similar purposes, connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario with the Hudson River, was taken up, and a motion to lay on the table disagreed to by a vote of 42 against 93. The debate on the bill providing ways and means for the support of the Government was then resumed, and continued until the adjournment. Both Houses adjourned until Monday.

On Monday, 19th, in the Senate, a communication was received from the Post-Office Department, stating that the detention of the mails between New York and Washington was caused mainly by the increased travel on account of the war, but that it would be remedied. Senator M'Dougall introduced a series of resolutions declaring the attempt of the French to subjugate Mexico hostile not only to the United States but to free institutions every where; that it is the duty of the Government to require the withdrawal of the French forces; and that it is also the duty of the Government to lend such aid to Mexico as may be required to prevent the forcible interposition of European Powers in the political affairs of that republic. The resolutions were laid over till Thursday next. The debate on the bill in relation to the discharge of state prisoners was then resumed by Senators Powell and Wright. A special Message was received from the President, stating that he had approved the joint resolution authorizing the issue of an additional $100,000,000 of United States notes for the payment of soldiers and sailors, and urging upon Congress the necessity of restricting the circulation of paper currency, and the expediency of taxing the paper issues of banking institutions.——In the House, a bill appropriating $10,000,000 in aid of the emancipation of slaves in Maryland was introduced and referred to the select committee on the subject. A bill authorizing duties on importations to be paid, if desired by importers, in legal tender notes, with 33 per cent. added, was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. The Secretary of War was requested to inform the House what sums had been paid since the breaking out of the rebellion to the various railroad companies for the transportation of troops and munitions of war between Washington and New York. The credentials of John B. Rogers, claiming a seat as a representative from Tennessee, was referred to the Committee on Elections. The debate on the Finance bill was then resumed in Committee of the Whole and continued till the adjournment.

On Tuesday, 20th, in the Senate, the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported a bill to pay the French spoliation claims. The bill provides that these claims are to be adjusted to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, and to be paid pro rata in United States five per cent. stock. The Naval Committee reported back the bill to authorize letters of marque and reprisal, with amendments, and notice was given that it would be called up at an early day.——In the House, the President's special Message recommending a tax on the paper issues of State banks, etc., was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed. A resolution was adopted that the Secretary of the Navy communicate any information in his possession to show that American vessels, cleared for any foreign ports, have engaged in the coolie slave-trade, or submit such suggestions to prevent it as he may deem proper. The Judiciary Committee submitted resolutions explanatory of the Tax law, that the salaries of the President, Vice-President, and Judges of the Supreme Court and inferior courts of the United States be exempted from tax. The resolution declaring Mr. Vandever, of Iowa, not entitled to a seat in the House since he joined the army as Colonel of the Ninth Iowa regiment, in 1861, was discussed, and finally adopted by a majority vote. The question was raised that the resolution was one of expulsion, and consequently required a two-thirds vote. The Speaker overruled the point, and an appeal from the decision was made. Pending the question the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Finance bill. Mr. Spaulding, on behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, proposed amendments to the first section, which were agreed to, viz.: To authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding $300,000,000 for the current fiscal year, and $600,000,000 for the next fiscal year, and to issue therefor coupon or registered bonds, payable at the pleasure of the Government after twenty years from date, and of such denominations (though not less than fifty dollars) as the Secretary may deem expedient, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually in coin. Mr. Thomas offered an amendment, which was agreed to, making the coupon or registered bonds payable at the pleasure of the Government after twenty years from date in coin. Mr. Spaulding moved to strike out the restriction of the sale of bonds at not less than par, so that the Secretary may in his discretion dispose of them at any time upon the best terms he can obtain. Pending the consideration of this amendment the Committee rose and the House adjourned.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

The news received in Washington from the Army of the Potomac on 20th is said to have caused a great deal of excitement there. The character of the news has not been promulgated.

THE CAPTURE OF THE POST OF ARKANSAS.

The following has been received at the head-quarters of General Grant:

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
POST OF ARKANSAS, Jan. 11, 1863.

Major-General U. S. Grant, commanding the Department of the Tennessee:

GENERAL,—I have the honor to report that the forces under my command attacked the Post of Arkansas to-day at one o'clock, having stormed the enemy's works. We took a large number of prisoners, variously estimated at from seven to ten thousand, together with all his stores, animals, and munitions of war.

Rear-Admiral David D. Porter, commanding the Mississippi squadron, effectively and brilliantly co-operated in accomplishing this complete success.

JOHN A. M'CLERNAND,
Major-General Commanding.

JEFF DAVIS'S MESSAGE.

Jeff Davis has issued his annual Message to the rebel Congress. He speaks of the early determination of England, France, and other European Powers to confine themselves to recognizing the self-evident fact of the existence of a strict neutrality during the progress of the war, but draws from this the conclusion that their course of action was but an actual decision against the South, and in favor of the Union, at the same time tending to prolong hostilities. He denounces the conduct of the Union armies as atrocious and cruel.

HIS VIEWS OF THE PROCLAMATION.

In relation to President Lincoln's emancipation proclamation, he says he may well leave it to the instincts of that common humanity which a beneficent Creator has implanted in the breasts of our fellow-men of all countries to pass judgment on a measure of which several millions of human beings of an inferior race, peaceful and contented laborers in their sphere, are doomed to extermination; while, at the same time, they are encouraged to a general assassination of their masters by the insidious recommendation to abstain from violence, unless in necessary self-defense. Our own detestation of those who have attempted the most execrable massacre recorded in the history of guilty man is tinctured by a profound sentiment for the impotent rage which it discloses. As far as regards the action of this Government on such criminals as may attempt its execution, I confine myself to informing you that I shall, unless in your wisdom you deem some other course more expedient, deliver to the several State authorities all commissioned officers of the United States that may hereafter be captured by our forces in any of the States embraced in the proclamation, that they may be dealt with in accordance with the laws of those States, providing for the punishment of criminals engaged in exciting servile insurrections. In its political aspect this measure possesses great signification, and to it in this light I invite your attention. It affords to our people the complete and crowning proof of the true nature of the designs of the party which elevated to power the present occupant of the Presidential chair at Washington, and which sought to conceal its purposes by every variety of artful grace, and by the perfidious use of the most solemn and repeated pledges on every practicable occasion. He gives extracts from President Lincoln's inaugural, and comments fully upon the subsequent acts by Congress and the Administration.

NO SURRENDER.

After briefly referring to the campaigns since his last annual message, he says:

The anticipations which entered into the contest have now ripened into a conviction, which is not only shared with us by the common opinion of neutral nations, but is evidently forcing itself upon our enemies themselves. The advent of peace will be hailed with joy. Our desire for it has never been concealed. But, earnest as has been our wish for peace, and great as have been our sacrifices and sufferings during the war, the determination of this people has, with each succeeding month, become more unalterably fixed to endure any suffering, and continue any sacrifice, however prolonged, until their right to self-government, and the sovereignty and independence of these States, shall have been triumphantly vindicated and established.

THE "ALABAMA" AGAIN.

The Alabama is again at her work of destruction upon our merchant ships. The schooner Union, which arrived at Jamaica on the 8th inst., was captured by the rebel pirate, but subsequently released, as her cargo belonged to British subjects. She brought with her, however, the crew of a Boston bark—the Parker Cook—which had only the protection of the Stars and Stripes, and not the ensign of England, to protect her, and hence was seized and burned by the Alabama.

The Vanderbilt has arrived at Fortress Monroe after an unsuccessful cruise after the Alabama.

THE SKIRMISH ON THE BLACKWATER.

Major-General Dix contradicts the statements of the Richmond papers that our troops were defeated by the rebel General Roger A. Pryor on the 9th inst., at Providence Church, near Suffolk. It appears from the official report of General Peck that the enemy crossed the Blackwater in considerable force, and attempted to drive in our right wing. Infantry, cavalry, and artillery were employed by the rebels; but they were repulsed by Major Wheelan's New York mounted rifles. At dusk the enemy's advance was charged upon and driven back upon his support. So that it was a victory for our arms, instead of a defeat, as boastingly claimed by Pryor.

NO MORE OFFICERS TO BE EXCHANGED.

Orders have been issued by Jeff Davis that officers of the United States Army captured after the 12th inst. are to be handed over to the Governors of the rebel States within whose jurisdiction they are taken, to be dealt with in accordance with Jeff Davis's recent declaration that they are to be regarded as persons inciting servile insurrection under President Lincoln's emancipation proclamation. General Halleck has issued an order, which may be regarded as retaliatory, commanding that no rebel officers shall be released until further orders.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR ON AMERICAN AFFAIRS.

IN France the Emperor Napoleon did not allude to American affairs in his reply to the diplomatic corps during his New Year's reception. When the Emperor passed where the United States Minister (Mr. Dayton) stood, he inquired, "What news, Mr. Dayton?" and on Mr. Dayton referring to the bad news which had just been received, his Majesty replied that he regretted it, and hoped "it would be better within the year."

THE FRENCH TO USE NEGRO SOLDIERS.

The French transport Seine has received instructions to go to Alexandria for a battalion of one thousand men, composed of negroes of Darfour, which Said Pacha, of Egypt, has offered the Emperor for his expedition to Mexico. They are old, well-trained troops, sufficiently brave, and not liable to be affected by hot weather or fever, which qualities will give them an immense advantage over the Mexican guerrillas.

CONTRABANDS COMING INTO CAMP IN CONSEQUENCE OF THE PROCLAMATION.—DRAWN BY MR. A. R. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 78.]

APPEARANCE OF THE SITE OF THE DESERTED REBEL CAMPS NEAR MURFREESBORO.—DRAWN BY MR. F. BEARD.—[SEE PAGE 79.]

MURFREESBORO, TENNESSEE.—SKETCHED BY MR. F. BEARD.—[SEE PAGE 79.]

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK.

By the Author of "Mary Barton," etc.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER IV.

The summer afterward Mr. Corbet came again to read with Mr. Ness. He did not perceive any alteration in himself, and indeed his early-matured character had hardly made progress during the last twelve months, whatever intellectual acquirements he might have made. Therefore it was astonishing to him to see the alteration in Ellinor Wilkins. She had shot up from a rather puny girl to a tall, slight young lady, with promise of great beauty in the face which a year ago had only been remarkable for the fineness of the eyes. Her complexion was clear now, although colorless—twelve months ago he would have called it sallow—her delicate cheek was smooth as marble, her teeth were even and white, and her rare smiles called out a lovely dimple.

She met her former friend and lecturer with a grave shyness; for she remembered well how they had parted, and thought he could hardly have forgiven, much less forgotten, her passionate flinging away from him. But the truth was, after the first few hours of offended displeasure, he had ceased to think of it at all. She, poor child, by way of proving her repentance, had tried hard to reform her boisterous tom-boy manners, in order to show him that, although she would not give up her dear old friend Dixon at his or any one's bidding, she would strive to profit by his lectures in all things reasonable. The consequence was, that she suddenly appeared to him as an elegant, dignified young lady, instead of the rough little girl he remembered. Still, below her somewhat formal manners there lurked the old wild spirit, as he could plainly see after a little more watching; and he began to wish to call this out, and to strive, by reminding her of old days, and all her childish frolics, to flavor her subdued manners and speech with a little of the former originality.

In this he succeeded. No one, neither Mr. Wilkins, nor Miss Monro, nor Mr. Ness, saw what this young couple were about—they did not know it themselves; but before the summer was over they were desperately in love with each other, or perhaps I should rather say Ellinor was desperately in love with him, he as passionately as he could be with any one; but in him the intellect was superior in strength to either affections or passions.

The causes of the blindness of those around them were these: Mr. Wilkins still considered Ellinor as a little girl, as his own pet, his darling, but nothing more. Miss Monro was anxious about her own improvement. Mr. Ness was deep in a new edition of Horace, which he was going to bring out with notes. I believe Dixon would have been keener-sighted, but Ellinor kept Mr. Corbet and Dixon apart for obvious reasons—they were each her dear friends, but she knew that Mr. Corbet did not like Dixon, and suspected that the feeling was mutual.

The only change of circumstances between this year and the previous one consisted in this development of attachment between the young people. Otherwise every thing went on apparently as usual. With Ellinor the course of the day was something like this: Up early and into the garden until breakfast-time, when she made tea for her father and Miss Monro in the dining-room, always taking care to lay a little nosegay of freshly-gathered flowers by her father's plate. After breakfast, when the conversation had been on general and indifferent subjects, Mr. Wilkins withdrew into the little study, so often mentioned. It opened out of a passage that ran between the dining-room and the kitchen, on the left hand of the hall. Corresponding to the dining-room, on the other side of the hall, was the drawing-room, with its side-window serving as a door into a conservatory, and this again opened into the library. Old Mr. Wilkins had added a semi-circular projection to the library, which was lighted by a dome above, and showed off his son's Italian purchases of sculpture. The library was by far the most striking and agreeable room in the house; and the consequence was that the drawing-room was seldom used, and had the aspect of cold discomfort common to apartments rarely occupied. Mr. Wilkins's study, on the other side of the house, was also an afterthought, built only a few years ago, and projecting from the regularity of the outside wall; a little stone passage led to it from the hall, small, narrow, and dark, and out of which no other door opened.

The study itself was a hexagon, one side-window, one fire-place, and the remaining four being occupied with doors, two of which have been already mentioned, another at the foot of the narrow winding stairs which led straight into Mr. Wilkins's bedroom over the dining-room, and the fourth opening into a path through the shrubbery to the right of the flower-garden as you looked from the house. This path led through the stable-yard, and then, by a short cut, right into Hamley, and brought you out close to Mr. Wilkins's office; it was by this way he always went to and returned from his business. He used the study for a smoking and lounging room principally, although he always spoke of it as a convenient place for holding confidential communications with such of his clients as did not like discussing their business within the possible hearing of all the clerks in his office. By the outer door he could also pass to the stables, and see that all proper care was taken at all times of his favorite and valuable horses. Into this study Ellinor would follow him of a morning, helping him on with his great-coat, mending his gloves, talking an infinite deal of merry fond nothing, and then, clinging to his arm, she would accompany him in his visits to the stables, going up to the shyest horses, and petting them, and patting them, and feeding them with bread all the time that her father held converse with Dixon. When he was finally gone—and sometimes it was a long time first—she returned to the school-room to Miss Monro, and tried to set herself hard at work at her lessons. But she had not much time for steady application. If her father had cared for her progress in any thing, she would and could have worked hard at that study or accomplishment; but Mr. Wilkins, the ease and pleasure loving man, did not wish to make himself into the pedagogue, as he would have considered it, if he had ever questioned Ellinor with a real steady purpose of ascertaining her intellectual progress. It was quite enough for him that her general intelligence and variety of desultory and miscellaneous reading made her a pleasant and agreeable companion for his hours of relaxation.

At twelve o'clock Ellinor put away her books with joyful eagerness, kissed Miss Monro, asked her if they should go a regular walk, and was always rather thankful when it was decided that it would be better to stroll in the garden—a decision very often come to, for Miss Monro hated fatigue, hated dirt, hated scrambling, and dreaded rain; all of which are evils, the chances of which are never far distant from country walks. So Ellinor danced out into the garden, worked away among her flowers, played at the old games among the roots of the trees, and when she could seduce Dixon in the flower-garden to have a little consultation as to the horses and dogs. For it was one of her father's few strict rules that Ellinor was never to go into the stable-yard unless he were with her; so these tête-à-têtes with Dixon were always held in the flower-garden, or bit of forest ground surrounding it. Miss Monro sat and basked in the sun, close to the dial, which made the centre of the gay flower-beds, upon which the dining-room and study windows looked.

At one o'clock Ellinor and Miss Monro dined. An hour was allowed for Miss Monro's digestion, which Ellinor again spent out of doors, and at three lessons began again and lasted till five. At that time they went to dress preparatory for the school-room tea at half past five. After tea Ellinor tried to prepare her lessons for the next day; but all the time she was listening for her father's footstep—the moment she heard that she dashed down her book, and flew out of the room to welcome and kiss him. Seven was his dinner hour, he hardly ever dined alone, indeed he often dined from home four days out of seven, and when he had no engagement to take him out he liked to have some one to keep him company. Mr. Ness very often, Mr. Corbet along with him if he was in Hamley, a stranger friend, or one of his clients. Sometimes, reluctantly, and when he fancied he could not avoid the attention without giving offense, Mr. Wilkins would ask Mr. Dunster, and then the two would always follow Ellinor into the library at a very early hour, as if their subjects for tête-à-tête conversation were quite exhausted. With all his other visitors Mr. Wilkins sat long—yes, and yearly longer; with Mr. Ness because they became interested in each other's conversation, with some of the others, because the wine was good, and the host hated to spare it.

Mr. Corbet used to leave his tutor and Mr. Wilkins and saunter into the library. There sat Ellinor and Miss Monro, each busy with their embroidery. He would bring a stool to Ellinor's side, question, and tease her, interest her, and they would become entirely absorbed in each other, Miss Monro's sense of propriety being entirely set at rest by the consideration that Mr. Wilkins must know what he was about in allowing a young man to become thus intimate with his daughter, who, after all, was but a child.

Mr. Corbet had lately fallen into the habit of walking up to Ford Bank for the Times every day, about twelve o'clock, and lounging about in the garden until one; not exactly with either Ellinor or Miss Monro, but certainly far more at the beck and call of the one than of the other.

Miss Monro used to think he would have been glad to stay and lunch at their early dinner, but she never gave the invitation, and he could not well stay without her expressed sanction. He told Ellinor all about his mother and sisters, and their ways of going on, and spoke of them and of his father as of people she was one day certain to know, and to know intimately; and she did not question or doubt this view of things, she simply acquiesced.

He had some discussion with himself as to whether he should speak to her, and so secure her promise to be his before returning to Cambridge or not. He did not like the formality of an application to Mr. Wilkins, which would, after all, have been the proper and straightforward course to pursue with a girl of her age—she was barely sixteen—not that he anticipated any difficulty on Mr. Wilkins's part, his approval of the intimacy which at their respective ages was pretty sure to lead to an attachment, was made as evident as could be by actions without words. But there would have to be reference to his own father, who had no notion of the whole affair, and would be sure to treat it as a boyish fancy; as if at twenty-one Ralph was not a man as clear and deliberative in knowing his own mind, as resolute as he ever would be in deciding upon the course of exertion that should lead him to independence and fame, if such were to be attained by clear intellect and a strong will.

No; to Mr. Wilkins he would not speak for another year or two.

But should he tell Ellinor in direct terms of his love, his intention to marry her?

Again he inclined to the more prudent course of silence. He was not afraid of any change in his own inclinations: of them he was sure. But he looked upon it in this way: If he made a regular declaration to her she would be bound to tell it to her father. He should not respect her, or like her so much if she did not. And yet this course would lead to all the conversations, and discussions, and references to his own father, which made his own direct appeal to Mr. Wilkins appear a premature step to him.

Whereas he was as sure of Ellinor's love for him as if she had uttered all the vows that women ever spoke; he knew even better than she did how fully and entirely that innocent girlish heart was his own. He was too proud to dread her inconstancy for an instant; "besides," as he went on to himself, as if to make assurance doubly sure, "whom does she see? Those stupid Holsters, who ought to be only too proud of having such a girl for their cousin, ignore her existence, and spoke slightingly of her father only the very last time I dined there. The country people in this preciously Bœotian ——shire clutch at me because my father goes up to the Plantagenets for his pedigree—not one whit for myself—and neglect Ellinor; and only condescend to her father because old Wilkins was, nobody knows—who's son. So much the worse for them, but so much the better for me in this case. I'm above their silly antiquated prejudices, and shall be only too glad when the fitting time comes to make Ellinor my wife. After all, a prosperous attorney's daughter may not be considered an unsuitable match for me—younger son as I am. Ellinor will make a glorious woman three or four years hence, just the style my father admires—such a figure, such limbs. I'll be patient and bide my time, and watch my opportunities, and all will come right."

So he bade Ellinor farewell in a most reluctant and affectionate manner, although his words might have been spoken out in Hamley market-place, and were little different from what he said to Miss Monro. Mr. Wilkins half expected a disclosure to himself of the love which he suspected in the young man; and when that did not come, he prepared himself for a confidence from Ellinor. But she had nothing to tell him, as he very well perceived from the child's open unembarrassed manner when they were left alone together after dinner. He had refused an invitation, and shaken off Mr. Ness, in order to have this confidential tête-à-tête with his motherless girl; and there was nothing to make confidence of. He was half inclined to be angry; but then he saw that, although sad, she was so much at peace with herself, and with the world, that he, always an optimist, began to think the young man had done wisely in not tearing open the rosebud of her feelings too prematurely.

The next two years passed over in much the same way—or a careless spectator might have thought so. I have heard people say, that if you look at a regiment advancing with steady step over a plain on a review-day, you can hardly tell that they are not merely marking time on one spot of ground, unless you compare their position with some other object by which to mark their progress, so even is the repetition of the movement. And thus the sad events of the future life of this father and daughter were hardly perceived in their steady advance; and yet, over the monotony and flat uniformity of their days, sorrow came marching down upon them like an armed man. Long before Mr. Wilkins had recognized its shape, it was approaching him in the distance—as, in fact, it is approaching all of us at this very time: you, reader, I, writer, have each our great sorrow bearing down upon us. He may be yet beyond the dimmest point of our horizon, but in the stillness of the night our hearts shrink at the sound of his coming footstep. Well is it for those who fall into the hands of the Lord rather than into the hands of men; but worst of all is it for him who has hereafter to mingle the gall of remorse with the cup held out to him by his doom.

Mr. Wilkins took his ease and his pleasure yet more and more every year of his life; nor did the quality of his ease and his pleasure improve; it seldom does with self-indulgent people. He cared less for any books that strained his faculties a little—less for engravings and sculpture—perhaps more for pictures. He spent extravagantly on his horses, "thought of eating and drinking." There was no open vice in all this, so that any awful temptation to crime should come down upon him, and startle him out of his mode of thinking and living; half the people about him did much the same, as far as their lives were patent to his unreflecting observation. But most of his associates had their duties to do, and did them with a heart and a will, in the hours when he was not in their company. Yes! I call them duties, though some of them might be self-imposed and purely social; they were engagements they had entered into, either tacitly or with words, and that they fulfilled. From Mr. Hetherington, the Master of the Hounds, who was up at no one knows what hour to go down to the kennel, and see that the men did their work well and thoroughly, to stern old Sir Lionel Playfair, the upright magistrate, the thoughtful, conscientious landlord—they did their work according to their lights—there were few laggards among those with whom Mr. Wilkins associated on the field or at the dinner-table. Mr. Ness—though as a clergyman he was not so active as he might have been, yet even Mr. Ness fagged away with his pupils and his new edition of the classics. Only Mr. Wilkins, dissatisfied with his position, neglected to fulfill the duties thereof. He imitated the pleasures and longed for the fancied leisure of those about him—leisure that he imagined would be so much more valuable in the hands of a man like him, full of intellectual tastes and accomplishments, than frittered away by dull boors of untraveled, uncultivated squires—whose company he never refused, be it said, by-the-way.

And yet daily Mr. Wilkins was sinking from the intellectually to the sensually self-indulgent man. He lay late in bed, and hated Mr. Dunster for his significant glance at the office-clock, when he announced to his master that such and such a client had been waiting more than an hour to keep an appointment. "Why did not you see him yourself, Dunster? I am sure you would have done quite as well as me," Mr. Wilkins sometimes replied, partly with a view of saying something pleasant to the man whom he disliked and feared. Mr. Dunster always replied, in a meek, matter-of-fact tone, "Oh, Sir, they would not like to talk over their affairs with a subordinate."

And every time he said this, or some speech of the same kind, the idea came more and more clearly into Mr. Wilkins's head of how pleasant it would be to himself to take Dunster into partnership, and thus throw all the responsibility of the real work and drudgery upon his clerk's shoulders. Importunate clients, who would make appointments at unseasonable hours and would keep to them, might confide in the partner, although they would not in the clerk. The great objections to this course were, first and foremost, Mr. Wilkins's strong dislike to Mr. Dunster—his repugnance to his company, his dress, his voice, his ways—all of which irritated his employer, till his state of feeling toward Dunster might be called antipathy; next, Mr. Wilkins was fully aware of the fact that all Mr. Dunster's actions and words were carefully and thoughtfully prearranged to further the great unspoken desire of his life—that of being made a partner, where now he was but a servant. Mr. Wilkins took a malicious pleasure in tantalizing Mr. Dunster by such speeches as the one I have just mentioned, which always seemed like an opening to the desired end, yet for a long time never led any further. Yet all the while that end was becoming more and more certain; and at last it was arrived at.

Mr. Dunster always suspected that the final push was given by some circumstance from without; some reprimand for neglect, some threat of withdrawal of business that his employer had received; but of this he could not be certain; all he knew was that Mr. Wilkins proposed the partnership to him in about as ungracious a way in which such an offer could be made; an ungraciousness which, after all, had so little effect on the real matter in hand, that Mr. Dunster could pass it over with a private sneer, while taking all possible advantage of the tangible benefit it was now in his power to accept.

Mr. Corbet's attachment to Ellinor had been formally disclosed to her just before this time. He had left college, was entered at the Middle Temple, and was fagging away at law, and feeling success in his own power; Ellinor was to "come out" at the next Hamley assemblies; and her lover began to be jealous of the possible admirers her striking appearance and piquant conversation might attract, and thought it a good time to make the success of his suit certain by spoken words and promises.

He needed not have alarmed himself even enough to make him take this step, if he had been capable of understanding Ellinor's heart as fully as he did her appearance and conversation. She never missed the omission of formal words and promises. She considered herself as fully engaged to him, as much pledged to marry him, and no one else, before he had asked the final question as afterward. She was rather surprised at the necessity for those decisive words.

"Ellinor, dearest, will you—can you marry me?" and her reply was—given with a deep blush I must record, and in a soft murmuring tone—

"Yes—oh yes—I never thought of any thing else."

"Then I may speak to your father, may not I, darling?"

"He knows; I am sure he knows; and he likes you so much. Oh, how happy I am!"

"But still I must speak to him before I go. When can I see him, my Ellinor? I must go back to town at four o'clock."

"I heard his voice in the stable-yard only just before you came. Let me go and find out if he is gone to the office yet."

No! to be sure he was not gone. He was quietly smoking a cigar in his study, sitting in an easy-chair near the open window, and leisurely glancing at all the advertisements in the Times. He hated going to the office more and more since Dunster had become a partner; that fellow gave himself such airs of investigation and reprehension.

He got up, took the cigar out of his mouth, and placed a chair for Mr. Corbet, knowing well why he had thus formally prefaced his entrance into the room with a—

"Can I have a few minutes' conversation with you, Mr. Wilkins?"

"Certainly, my dear fellow. Sit down. Will you have a cigar?"

"No! I never smoke." Mr. Corbet despised all these kind of indulgences, and put a little severity into his refusal, but quite unintentionally; for though he was thankful he was not as other men, he was not at all the person to trouble himself unnecessarily with their reformation.

"I want to speak to you about Ellinor. She says she thinks you must be aware of our mutual attachment."

"Well!" said Mr. Wilkins. He had resumed his cigar, partly to conceal his agitation at what he knew was coming. "I believe I have had my suspicions. It is not so very long since I was young myself." And he sighed over the recollection of Lettice, and his fresh, hopeful youth.

"And I hope, Sir, as you have been aware of it, and have never manifested any disapprobation of it, that you will not refuse your consent —a consent I now ask you for—to our marriage."

Mr. Wilkins did not speak for a little while —a touch, a thought, a word more would have brought him to tears; for at the last he found it hardest to give the consent which would part him from his only child. Suddenly he got up, and putting his hand into that of the anxious lover (for his silence had rendered Mr. Carbet anxious up to a certain point of perplexity—he could not understand the implied he would and he would not), Mr. Wilkins said,

"Yes! God bless you both. I will give her to you, some day—only it must be a long time first. And now good-by—go back to Jacobs—for I can't stand this much longer."

Mr. Corbet returned to Ellinor. Mr. Wilkins sat down and buried his head in his hands, then went to his stable, and had Wildfire saddled for a good gallop over the country. Mr. Dunster waited for him in vain at the office, where an obstinate old country gentleman from a distant part of the shire would igfiore Dunster's existence as a mere matter, and pertinaciously demanded to see Mr. Wilkins on important business.

PRINCE HASSAN AND THE OGRE.

EASTER MONDAY, about seventeen thousand years ago, fell on Tuesday, the 1st of April; and on that very day the gallant young Prince Hassan, his servant, and all the Cashmere went out with hound and horn to hunt the deer. A fine buck was soon found; but as it went away twice as fast as the dogs could run after it, and the dogs ran twice as fast as the prince could gallop, and the prince galloped twice as fast as any body else, you will not be surprised to hear that, after three hours' hard riding, his royal highness found himself quite alone; and moreover, on looking round him, he perceived he was in a place where he had never been before.

Presently, however, he espied in the hill-side the mouth of a large cavern; and as he was exhausted with heat and thirst, he determined to enter it, in hopes of finding shelter and water. In this he-light there was a cool spring rising just inside; but no sooner had he knelt down and taken a draught than he heard a dreadful roar from the bottom of the cavern: and, looking, he beheld a frightful ogre, who came up to him in two strides, and caught him by the waist between his finger and thumb. This monster's head was as big as a haystack; his mouth was like a great oven, with rows of grinders like immense tomb-stones; his eyes were like the red lamps that you see on railways; and as for his nose, it was such an object that there really is nothing in the world ugly enough for me to compare it to. Few ogres are handsome; but this one was so horrid and nasty, even for an ogre, that none of the other ogres would live with him, and no ogress would marry him; so he was forced to sulk by himself in this solitary bachelor cavern. His name was Uglymuggiuse; but the prince didn't know that.

"I'll teach you to come into my house and drink my water without my leave," said the ogre, in a dreadful voice; "all's fish that comes to my net, and I shall swallow you as you would an oyster—if you have any Cashmere."

So saying, he went to his cupboard and took out the pepper-caster and vinegar-cruet, each of which was the size of a sentry-box.

"I am sure I am very sorry to have offended you, Sir," said the prince (though the ogre held him so tight that he could hardly speak), "I meant no harm; and as for swallowing me, I really think you had better not. I don't say this on my own account; but I am certain I've got fit to eat; you will find me very nasty, you will, indeed."

"Ho, ho," said the ogre, "so much the better! The nastier things are, the more I like 'em. There's nothing that I can't swallow! Why, if you could bring me any thing I couldn't swallow, I'd give you the run of the cave for my head."

"Begging your honor's pardon," said the prince, "I think I have seen a great many things that a nice, clean, gentlemanlike ogre like you would never be able to swallow; and if you would just let me go home I'll tell you about it on a bit. And then I could bring you something of the sort; and then I hope your honor would not forget what you said just now!"

"Very well," said the ogre, after reflecting a little, "I don't mind letting you have a trial—indeed, as I am very eager to want you to come, it will suit me very well. I will give you leave to try four times; but mind, you must give me your word of honor to come back here every day at noon; and unless you bring me something that I can't swallow, I shall swallow you yourself on the fourth day—that's all!"

Now you must understand that the ogre did not say this out of very nicety for the prince; but the fact is, he had got into the things that I just make every body else sick even to look at; and he thought this would be a good opportunity for getting a choice supply of all the dainties that he was so fond of without any trouble; for he wanted some variety, and was tired of picking up dead dogs and nibbling the pig-styes.

The prince gave his word to come back very duly, for he thought he should have no difficulty in bringing the ogre something that even he would find too horrible to swallow; and so the giant let him go, and showed him a track way out of the cavern, which, to his great surprise, opened on the ninth just above his father's palace, to which he returned before he had been missed.

You may think that the ogre was rather simple for supposing that the prince would come back again to be eaten up after he had once got away; but he knew that no prince ever broke his word, you know, seventeen thousand years ago.

No sooner had he got home than Prince Hassan set about making a pudding, which he hoped the ogre would find too much for his stomach. He took fifty adders, fifty rats, a dozen old shoes, a hundred python's eggs (addled), and two scuttlefuls of rubbish out of the dust-hole; over these he poured six bottles of blacking, tied it all up in a beggar's old shirt, and for water to boil it in desired the Grand Mistress of the Slop-pails to bring him the dirty soup-suds from all the kitchens in the palace. With this precious mess he knocked at the ogre's back door exactly at twelve o'clock the next day.

"Well, my young gentleman, let us see what you have got here," said the monster, taking up the pudding; "it seems very heavy." And, in the dismay of the poor prince, instead of flinging it away in disgust, he popped it into his mouth and munched it up like a penny bun!

"Ho, ho," he said, "not bad—not bad! Do you call that nasty? You must bring me something very different if you expect me not to swallow it. Ho! come again to-morrow."

And then he took out the pitchfork which he used as a tooth-pick, and went back to his den.

The next day the prince thought he would be very cunning, and bring the giant a meal that he did not expect. Since he seems so fond of nasty things, he said to himself, I will try if I can't puzzle him by a dish of something very nice.

So he went round to all the pastry-cooks in the town, and bought up all the twelfth-cakes, the gingerbread, sprigs-pies, and turkey-ovgre in their shops; and again, at twelve o'clock exactly, he knocked at Uglymuggiuse's door.

When the ogre saw what was brought him he fell into a furious passion.

"How dare you bring me such disgusting rubbish?" he roared out. "Is this proper food to set before a gentleman ogre? Take it away this instant; but—no! Stop! You shan't escape me that way. I will eat you, but if you dare to play me such a trick again, I will skin you alive and stick you in my mustard-pot. I will make you envy the very frogs and rats that you used to catch when you were at school! I will!" Then, holding his nose and shutting his eyes, he thrust all the dainties between his enormous jaws, and swallowed them down with a great gulp. "Ho, ho," he said, "you see that won't do either, my young friend. Come again to-morrow; and, remember, no more nonsense!"

This was a sad disappointment to Prince Hassan, and his only consolation was that the expression of the giant's face showed some hopes that he was suffering from stomach-ache.

But as he was returning home he happened to pass the dominion's shop to which, in the days of his boyhood, his mamma used to send for black doses; for she made a rule of administering one to him the first Monday in every month, according to the ancient customs of the Court of Cashmere. The night gave him new hopes. "I am saved!" he joyfully exclaimed; and immediately sent a herald round the town with a proclamation that all the rhubarb, all the jalap, all the castor-oil, and all the senna-tea that could be found should be mixed together in a tub and brought to the palace. His orders were obeyed, and on that happy night no physic was taken in the whole city.

The next day at twelve o'clock exactly the prince again went to the ogre's back door, taking the tub with him; for this time he was full of confidence.

"I have kept him this time for certain," he said to himself; "if he were ten times an ogre he would never be able to swallow such a draught."

But, alas! he was no sooner had the monster seen the horrid mixture than he tossed it off like a glass of lemonade, smacking his lips after it.

When the prince saw that, he gave up despair, for he felt that his last chance was gone.

"Ho, ho," said the giant, with a dreadful grin, "don't be sorry, my boy! You shall have one more chance, you know; try again. Why don't you bring me such a thing as a tough old woman now? Perhaps I shouldn't be able to swallow that: ho, ho!' And then he laughed in such a violent and vulgar way that he shook down six large trees.

"No, no," said the prince; "I see it would be no use; you had better take me at once and have done with it; I give up; you can't swallow any thing if you could swallow what I brought you just now. Besides, where should I find an old woman who would consent to take my place?"

"As for that," said the ogre, with an odious wink, "I should have thought a stout young man like you could have managed to persuade an old woman to come this way without much trouble. And as for my being able to swallow her, I don't know—I can't say—I am a little dainty sometimes —at any rate, it is worth your while to try.I should think; for remember, to-morrow is the fourth day! Ho, ho!"

So saying he went back into his cave; and the prince heard him sharpening his knife and cleaning his fingers in a way that froze his marrow.

The unhappy young man now gave himself up for lost, and went home to the palace in the worst possible spirits. He had got a very different day this time to-morrow," thought he. However, he concealed his feelings as well as he could, not to distress his parents, for he was a dutiful son. All night he lay awake, and as soon as it was day he got up and went out to take a last walk in the country, and while away the time till the dreadful hour of noon. After walking some time he came to a wretched, tumble-down old cottage, and looking in through the window (which was broken) he saw within an equally wretched and tumble-down old woman, dressed in rags, shivering with cold and lean with hunger.

"How now, Goody?" said he, walking into her miserable room through the broken door. "You don't seem over-comfortable here."

"Comfortable?" said she, in a cracked and wheezy voice; "I haven't known what that word means for these twenty years. I am old, and poor, and sick; I have got the ague, and the rheumatics, and the toothache, and the earache, and oh, such dreadful corns! I have nobody in the world to care for me; and I heartily wish I was dead, for I don't know what to live for, I'm sure."

When the prince heard the old woman talk in this way he wicked thought which the ogre had put into his head came back to him and began to tempt him. "Surely," he said to himself, "there and watching the path by which the prince was to come; and you may fancy his rage and disappointment when he saw him coming.

"What!" he roared out, "no old woman? no cow? no ewe? Where is she? Bring her! Quick!"

"Sir," said the prince, as bravely as he could, "I have brought you no old woman; but you see I have kept my word, and come back myself."

"You!" cried the ogre. "You, indeed! What! a good-looking young fellow like you compared to a fine, tough, bony grandmother? Why haven't you brought me one, you villain? What have you been about? Are you such a goose that you couldn't find one ever since yesterday?"

"No," said the prince. "I did find one; but I didn't choose to bring her." And then he told the ogre all he had seen at the cottage, and all he had thought, just as I have told it to you.

As he was telling his story the giant got into such a fury that he could hardly contain himself.

"What!" he bellowed out as soon as the prince had finished, "do you mean to tell me that you have been such a noodle, such a nincompoop, such a chicken-hearted baby, that when you had a chance of saving yourself at the expense of one poor old woman you wouldn't do it? Nonsense! I'll not believe it! You must tell me some more likely story, for I CAN'T SWALLOW THAT!"

No sooner had he uttered these words than there came a loud clap of thunder, and the monster turned as white as a sheet; and then there came a second clap, and the monster's knees began to tremble and his teeth to chatter in his head; and then there came a third clap, and the roof of the cavern burst open, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Fairies came sailing in, seated on his great fifteen-hundred-pound arm-chair, with four bats with parchment wings and traces of red tape.

"You wicked and nasty ogre," said his lordship, in a very loud and cross voice, "you have spoken your own sentence, and I have come to see it put in execution. But as you have been so candid give him leave to eat off your head if he could bring you any thing that you could not swallow; you have just confessed that he has, and now your honor is come."

So saying he drew forth the great Sword of Justice, eighteen feet long, which he always carried in his waistcoat pocket, and presented it to the prince.

"Sir," he said, "meritorious youth; cut the head off that vile and hateful monster, and cast it out to the kites, wolves, and foxes."

The prince took the sword with respectful bow, and going up to the ogre, who was now rolling on the floor and blubbering like a great coward as he was, flourished the weapon thrice, and then brought it down with so fair a blow on the giant's neck that the head rolled from the shoulders; so there was an end of Uglymuggiuse.

"Young man," then said the Chief Baron of the Fairies, "I am pleased with your conduct on the whole, though you allowed a bad thought to get the better of you for a moment: as if there is any thing that you would like, mention it before the Court rises and I will grant it you."

"My lord," said the prince, again bowing respectfully, "I have more than I deserve already, and I wish for nothing but my liberty; but if you could do any thing to make that poor old woman more comfortable who taught me so good a lesson I should be much obliged to you."

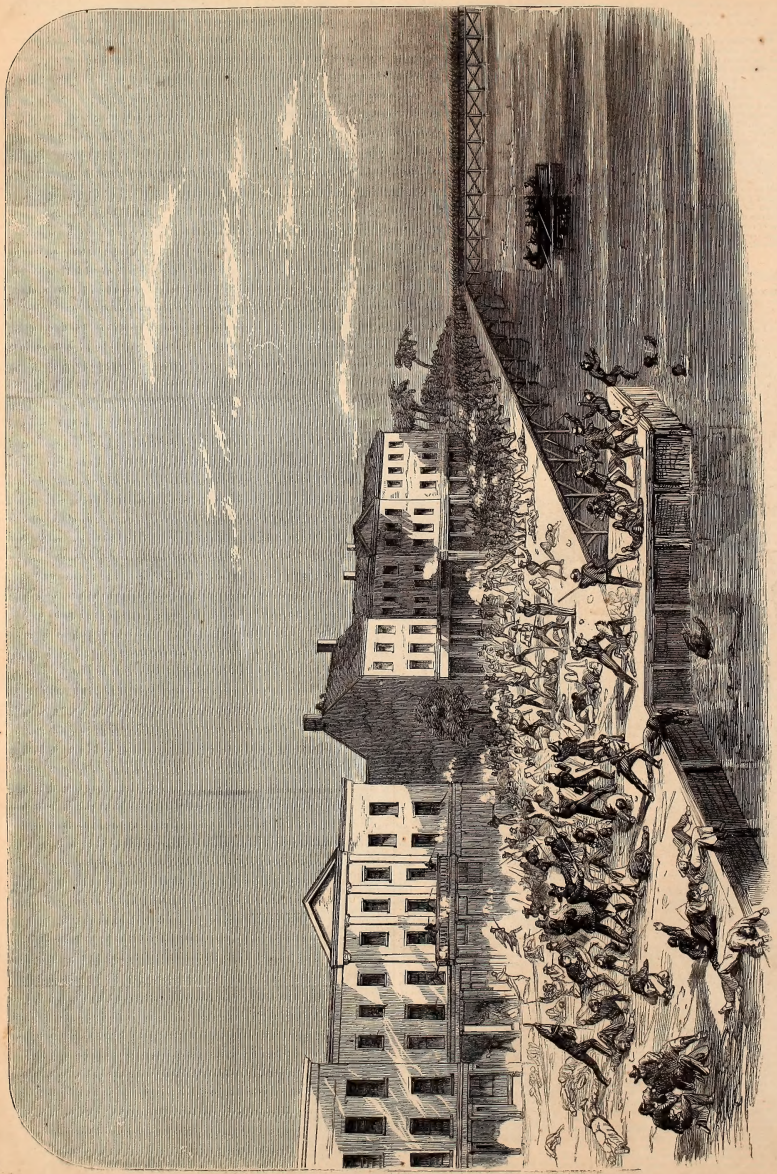
"Very well," said his lordship, "so be it; if you call upon her as you go home I think you will see a change for the better."

So the prince walked cheerfully down the hill again; but when he came to the old woman's house what do you think he saw? Why, that the wretched, tumble-down old hovel that he had left he saw the prettiest, neatest white cottage you ever imagine, covered with roses and honey-suckles; and walking in he found the old lady nicely dressed, sitting in a comfortable arm-chair, and looking as sing and happy as possible.

"Well, ma'am," said he, "how do you do again? hope you find a little better than you were?"

"Oh, Sir!" said she, "I am sure I don't know what has come over me! All my pains are gone; the house and every thing about me is clean and fresh again; and if I only had some nice young companion to live with me and look after me a bit I should not wish for the Queen of Cashmere herself."

No sooner had she said this than the door opened, and a pretty little maiden, dressed in white and walking rather lame, came in with a pail of water, and without saying a word set about getting down the cups and saucers and making the old lady some tea.



"Whom and what are you, my dear?" said the dame in astonishment, "and who sent you here?"

"Please, ma'am," said the little maiden, "I am the pigeon that you were so kind to. A fine little gentleman, sitting on a flying lukstand, touched me just now with a wand, and told me to come to what you see; and then he told me to come and live with you for the rest of your days; which I am sure I shall be very happy to do."

So the prince went home very well contented; but he ever afterward took care not to lose his way out hunting.

ARMY BEEF.

On page 65 we publish a graphic illustration by Mr. Theodore R. Davis, which is appropriately entitled ARMY BEEF. The killing, cutting up, cooking, and final devouring of the ox constitute scenes of no little interest to the soldier. In an army like that of the Potomac several hundred head of cattle perish daily. Much of the army up the Peninsula, and the various movements in Maryland and Northern Virginia, leave left their mark behind them in huge piles of whitening beef-bones. The Southern soldiers are not so well provided as ours in their rations. Beef-steak is a luxury; in the Army of the Potomac it has been so abundant as to be wasted.

REBEL ATTACK UPON THE FORTY-THIRD MASSACHUSETTS VOLUNTEERS AT GALVESTON, TEXAS.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 79.]

ATTACK OF THE REBELS UPON OUR GUN-BOAT FLOTILLA AT GALVESTON, TEXAS, JANUARY 1, 1863.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 79.]

THE SNOW AT FREDERICKSBURG.

Drift over the slopes of the sunrise land,
  Oh wonderful, wonderful snow!
Oh! pure as the breast of a virgin saint,
  Drift tenderly, soft and slow!
Over the slopes of the sunrise land,
  And into the haunted dells
Of the forests of pine, where the sobbing winds
  Are tuning their memory bells!

Into the forests of sighing pines,
  And over those yellow slopes,
That seem but the work of the cleaving plow,
  But cover so many hopes!
They are many indeed, and straightly made,
  Not shapen with loving care;
But the souls let out, and the broken blades,
  May never be counted here!

Fall over those lonely hero graves,
  Oh delicate-dropping snow!
Like the blessing of God's unfaltering love
  On the warrior heads below!
Like the tender sigh of a mother's soul
  As she waiteth and watcheth for One
Who will never come back from the sunrise land
  When this terrible war is done.

And here, where lieth the high of heart,
  Drift—white as the bridal veil—
That will never be worn by the drooping girl
  Who sitteth afar, so pale.
Fall, fast as the tears of the suffering wife,
  Who stretcheth despairing hands
Out to the blood-rich battle-fields
  That crimson the Eastern sands!

Fall in thy virgin tenderness,
  Oh delicate snow, and cover
The graves of our heroes, sanctified
  Husband and son and lover!
Drift tenderly over those yellow slopes,
  And mellow our deep distress,
And put us in mind of the shriven souls
  And their mantles of righteousness!

BESSIE CROMPTON.

"I am Miss Bessie Crompton, Pim," I said.

I spoke with the dignity of a young lady fresh from a boarding-school. I had been at the Clergy Daughters' School for four years, being educated for the express purpose of becoming a teacher; yet when my allotted term was ended, my sister Felicia, who had been a governess herself, decidedly declined the offer of the lady superintendent to find me a situation, and desired that I should return home at once. Yet though I had been absent so long, only old Pim, our servant, who had been errand-boy to my father's grammar-school longer than I could remember, met me at the station. I was almost ashamed of recognizing him as he waited at the back of the platform, in an antiquated, threadbare black suit of my father's, looking like the embodiment of decrepitude and poverty, and blinking with a bewildered, purblind gaze, at the long train and crowd of passengers, like an owl dragged out into the tormenting light of day. I approached him with sufficient stateliness and distance to convince any by-stander that he was nothing to me than a servant.

"Lord love you, Miss Bessie, it can't be you!" he exclaimed, instantly reviving from sixty to thirty years of age, "the master himself 'll not know you again. If you wouldn't be above it, miss, when we're out of sight, I should like to shake hands with you for this once; if it's not too great a liberty. You gave old Pim a kiss when you went away."

"Oh, Pim! dear old Pim!" I cried, seizing his big hand, covered with a very worn pair of my father's gloves. All the dignity of the Clergy Daughters' School vanished as if it had never been, "I love you just the same, old Pim; and I'm coming to live at home again, you know, so we shall have the old times back."

Pim aged into sixty again in a moment, and shook his bended head feebly; halting and flagging as if unable to keep up with my young, impatient step, as he walked a few paces behind me. When I tried to question him about home, he replied reluctantly. Once even he produced a Jews-harp, and began to twang a doleful tune upon it, as he had been used to do when, as a child, I had asked him unanswerable questions; but, recollecting himself, he replaced it in his pocket with an humble and despondent apology, and we walked on without further conversation.

Our home was an old, rambling mansion attached to the Elizabethan Grammar School, of which my father had been master for thirty years. The endowment was fifty pounds a year, and the scholars on the foundation were only twelve in number; but under former masters the school had won something more than mere local reputation, and one after another had retired, either in possession of a comfortable competency, or with the presentation to a church-living. College Hill, where the school was situated, was one of the oldest and narrowest streets in Tamford, and no thoroughfare of business; the buildings consisting chiefly of a row of decaying houses, property in Chancery, and a large, inclosed quadrangle, entered by an arch-way opposite the school-house, and surrounded by alms-houses for twenty-five aged men. The character of the street depended altogether upon the condition of the school. No surer index was needed than its aspect at noon and evening when the scholars dispersed; if Tamford Grammar School was prospering, the walls echoed to the shrill whoop of school-boys, and the pavements rang with their clattering footsteps, followed by the wrathful maledictions of the alms-men. But not a sound was to be heard as we entered it, save the lagging step of a foundationer, who slunk close to the wall, with a sly, insolent, side-long glance at me, as we passed him. In the dark shadow of the porch, which stretched across the narrow causeway, I saw Felicia watching for me. The pale beams of the wintry sun glistened through the lattice casement of the projecting window of the study over the porch, upon my father's snow-white head, which was bowed weariedly upon his hands. Neither of them moved as I appeared, but Felicia's beautiful, sad face kindled into a sudden glow, which faded before I had run quickly across the little space between us. When I threw my arms round her neck, she bent her lofty head to mine and kissed me coldly, without a word of welcome.

We passed on into a bare and empty lobby, across which she led me to our old parlor, so often pictured and repainted by my imagination that it had become a very pleasant place; not grand or gorgeous, for Felicia had hinted gently in her letters at a blight of poverty fallen upon us, but at least a tasteful, simple, home-like sitting-room. The paper was discolored with damp, and hung in mouldy shreds from the blank walls. The long narrow casements were uncurtained, and the boarded floor had no carpet, except a dingy rug on the hearth; a square, uncovered table, where nothing was lying, stood in the centre, and four chairs only broke the straight line of the low lining of wainscot. The room was a large one, and it wore an empty, desolate, and chilling aspect.

"You shiver," said Felicia, in her soft voice, which sounded caressingly, though she spoke no words of endearment; "there is a fire in the school-room. We generally sit there now."

I had forgotten how low and dark the unlighted passages were, and how bleak-looking the white-washed walls; and, when the massive door of the school-room swung heavily from Felicia's hold, I scarcely recognized the lofty and spacious hall. It had the look of a chapel, with its decorated ceiling high above us, and the rostrum of black oak, surmounted by a sounding-board, which stood at the opposite end; the fixed desks and forms down each side; the horizontal windows with diamond lattices and stone casements far above; the memorial tablets inscribed with the titles of deceased patrons; and the doubtful shadows lurking about the farthest corners, as if it was not worth while for the darkness to leave altogether the ancient room, oppressed me with the solemn, eerie feeling of being in a church at twilight. I had thought of it as a scene of frolic and boyish games; and I turned uneasily to the huge corner fire-place, where Felicia was stirring into a blaze a handful of smouldering embers.

"I thought my father would have come down," I said.

"He is either at his book or asleep," she answered, sighing.

"Felicia," I cried, bursting into tears, "what is the matter? Is this home? Are you always like this?"

Before Felicia could answer, Pim came forward from an obscure corner, and addressed me in a quick, cheerful tone:

"Ay, little Miss Bessie," he said, "it is home, but it's not always like this. Bless you, my dears, the master's going to finish his big book, and we shall all ride in our carriage. Or Miss Bessie 'll be certain to marry some grand gentleman, and make our fortunes. And Mr. Edward, in Canada, he'll grow money on his farm, 'specially when I go out to him, as I'm waiting to do as soon as you're all settled here. Lord love you! Whenever I feel a little down in the mouth, I go and read inside Master Garforth's desk. You look here, Miss Bessie, what he's wrote. Here's 'Faint heart never won fair lady;' 'Hope on, hope ever;' 'Never say die;' and this here Latin, my dear, means 'Love conquers all;' and 'While there's life there's hope.' He was a head-boy, he was—a regular taw; and his desk's like a chapter out of the Bible to me."

"But, Pim," I said, "I did not know—" And then tears stopped my utterance.

"I could not tell you, Bessie," said Felicia, sadly, "when all your letters were looked at. But we were obliged to have a sale to pay our debts; and there are no boys now but the foundationers; and my father—Pim says, is getting on with his book. During my absence as a governess to the children of Colonel Clarke"—here my sister unaccountably checked herself—"he sunk deeper into the fatal habit of opium-eating, and now he is so great a slave to it that the instruction of the few poor burgesses' sons who come to school devolves upon me. Our affairs were bad enough when you went, if you had been old enough to notice. And now, dear, we are very poor and very lonely."

I suppose Felicia was worn down to this lifeless existence; at least she accepted it with a grave patience peculiar to herself. Her very footstep, languid and inelastic, might have been timed to the measured ticking of the school clock, and her low voice never rose or fell beyond a certain cadence, which bore in its reiterated tone a monotony, as the harping burden of some sorrowful song, like Barbara's song of willow. From the household work to the school-room, where the rough scholars grew quiet in her quiet presence, and thence to the alms-houses, she passed daily in a dull routine, with a meek acceptance of these duties, to which I could never attain. Only once, disturbed by some words of mine, there came a wistful, longing, weary look into her blue eyes, followed by rare but passionate weeping, before which Pim himself was silenced, and retreated into his own corner of the vast school-room, whence he watched her with mute anxiety and distress. My father spent most of his time in the study, amidst a litter of books and papers, where he could sleep in peace, unreproached by our presence. Sometimes when I went past the unfastened door, which had neither latch nor lock, singing loudly—for I could still sing when the sun shone brightly without—he would start at the sound, and seize his pen quickly, like a child caught in a fault; but the nerveless fingers relaxed in a moment, and the gray head nodded again over the half-written papers, while I stole away guiltily, with a sense of shame at having seen his miserable disablement and prostration.

Thus a year and a half passed away, taming down the wild pulses of my youth. It was the second winter since I had left school, but a change was coming now—a very slight change, but there was an element of excitement and hope in it. Pim had been seeking constant employment as rural messenger in the post-office, by which he would earn fourteen shillings a week. Another candidate for the office had been recommended, and it was yet uncertain whether he would succeed, and to-night he was gone to hear the final decision. My father had gone to bed, as his custom was, at nine, and I, crouching beside the fire, was watching Felicia, as she paced to and fro into the ruddy gleam of the fire, and back to the cold, clear moonlight at the upper end of the hall. There was an impatient tread in her usually measured footstep, and I could see that her little hands, roughened with coarse work, were clenched feverishly together, while at every sound without she turned sharply toward the door, betraying how eager she was for this good fortune, and how in secret she chafed at the privations and narrowness of our lot. She had just paused for a moment beside me, when we heard the twang of Pim's Jews-harp, and she darted back to the door, but before he could reach it he entered and closed it after him.

"I've got it," he said, in a voice of agitation; "it's all right. Little Miss Bessie, I'm her Majesty's Rural Messenger to High Overton, with fourteen shillings a week. God bless Queen Victoria!"

"It's all right, Miss Crompton," repeated Pim, taking my sister's hand, "all right, my dear. Bless you, we shall be as happy as the day altogether, 'specially of a night when I'm come home. I shall be back in time for any odd jobs about the house; only I sha'n't see much of the master, Lord love him! It was so uncommonly kind of him to write that beautiful recommendation for me, when he's so busy with the big book. I'm a made man through it, with fourteen shillings a week clear."

"It's all right, my dears," he reiterated; "right to a tittle. Every thing's right. But I shouldn't have got it without Mr. Garforth. It's been uncommon difficult to keep my temper over this business. You wouldn't believe it, but this postmaster—he's not a Tamford man—asked me if I was any blood relation to the master."

"And what did you say, old Pim?" I asked.

"Why, I'm afraid I swore a little," he replied, with a deprecating glance at Felicia, who had come to my side; "I'm afraid I said I'd be something'd if I was; but I didn't mean it."

"Pim!" murmured Felicia.

"I couldn't help it," he continued; "he was so uncommonly impertinent, 'specially about my character, though the master himself had written that letter for me. Saving your presence, Miss Crompton, and yours, Miss Bessie, he went so far as to say he'd been told my father and mother weren't married, and that's forty years ago clear."

Felicia's face flushed with a deep crimson, but I could not help laughing.

"That was no fault of yours, Pim," I said.

"Just the remark as Mr. Garforth made, Miss Bessie. I didn't use any bad language then, Miss Crompton. I only said, 'Sir, it's a awful thing when the Master of us all, who has got wisdom and discretion, begins to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children; but when a man that hasn't got any sort of wisdom sets about it—' Mr. Garforth said, 'True, old fellow!' to me."

Felicia's hand, lying upon my shoulder, rested there more heavily, as she stood silent, with drooping head and downcast eyes. In all the large moonlit room there was neither sound nor motion, and I felt a superstitious panic creeping over me.

"What is that, Felicia?" I cried.

A low, gentle tapping at the northern door, not as loud as the stroke of a robin's wing against the window, a feeble, irregular knock, like the beating of a child's open hand against the iron-studded panels, succeeded by a pitiful wail, which stole into the quiet room, and filled it for a moment with a babyish, pleading tone of trouble. Felicia shivered as she leaned against me, and old Pim stood paralyzed, gazing back to the dark end of the hall; but when a second cry came, a shrill, sharp, passionate scream of fright, I sprang to my feet, and pushing past them both, ran hastily to the door. It was bright, clear moonlight, and the shadows slanted across the street, making alternate spaces of light and darkness. Scarcely more soundless and deserted was it than in the daytime; even less so, for as I stopped for a moment looking out, the cry burst forth again, and I saw the form of a little child, pattering swiftly along the pavement, in the deepest shadows of the school walls. I followed the little flying figure, but it fled from me in increased fear, a fear so intense and overwhelming, that when I caught it, and taking it in my arms sat down on the step of an untenanted house, it was long before all my caresses and soothing could still the vehemence of its sobs. At length it lay passive in my arms, and I looked up to Felicia, who stood before us, the moonlight falling upon her white, grave face, and lending a pale glory to her golden hair, like a halo round the calm forehead of a saint.

"Pim is looking for the woman," she whispered, as if afraid of being overheard; and she stooped down to lay her hand gently on the little head lying languidly on my bosom.

"See how frightened it is, Felicia," I cried, "the poor little bird! Where can it have come from?"

"She has been deserted," answered Felicia, in a bitter tone.

"Deserted? Impossible!" I replied. "What are we to do with it?"

"We can not talk about it here," she said; "take the child in, Bessie, while Pim and I look every where. We must search every corner."

So, with the child sobbing itself to sleep in my arms, I returned to the old house, and the hearth where I myself had been the last little infant, the youngest born of our family. I felt a deep instinctive love for this wailing, forsaken child; and before Felicia and Pim returned, I had collected a number of unanswerable arguments for adopting her into our household if they found no clew to account for her appearance.

They came in utterly foiled. Every nook in the quadrangle had been searched, and the doors of the alms-houses tried, often to the great anger of the alms-men within. All the untenanted dwellings in the street were apparently empty, and their doors carefully locked; neither sound nor sight had hinted any thing to them. Only one thing could be decided upon, and that we resolved unanimously. The child must remain with us till the morning, and then we would have a private discussion before my father was up, so that we might have a definite plan beforehand which he would not take the trouble to interfere with.

I employed all my eloquence and arguments in that discussion, pleading with Felicia to let us keep the little waif, and Pim lent his voice to mine.

"Who can tell whose child she may be?" I said; "for I am sure she is no common child, Felicia. See what a noble face she has! Are there no marks upon her clothes?"

"None," said Felicia, who was examining them closely; "they are worn and poor, Bessie."

She sighed heavily as she laid down the little garments, and stood undecided for a minute, watching me feed the child with bread and milk, which the child was taking hungrily. "I will be a mother to it, Felicia. God helping me, I will be a better mother than the one that has forsaken it, if that be true."

Felicia, usually so cold and reticent, fell down on her knees before us, and clasped me and the wondering child in her arms, murmuring in a voice that only I could hear, "God forgive the mother! God pardon the poor, wretched, abandoned woman! God help my Bessie!"

Ever after life wore a different aspect to me. The monotony and gloom were gone. The child, after a day or two of fretfulness, became a merry laughing, romping little creature, "gurgling," as Pim called it, about the old house, with a keen enjoyment of the sounding, empty rooms. To Pim and me she was a priceless treasure. Even my father would rouse himself to take her, whe she was quiet, upon his knee, and let her fall asleep in his arms, himself yielding to the dreamy lethargy, which now always brooded over him with heavy wings. Only Felicia, allowing herself but a hurried notice of the child now and then, retained the melancholy step and glance of former times. We used to have long conversations about her at night, when Pim returned from his round; canvassing every conjecture that arose in our minds, until the subject became the one absorbing, predominant idea of my brain. I no longer avoided the main streets of my native town, hurrying down by-paths to hide my poverty-stricken appearance.

It was a totally unlooked-for misfortune when Pim fell ill, in the spring succeeding this autumn; but the doctor who attended the alms-men said a few days' rest would set him up again if we could get a substitute for his work. This consisted of a walk into the country of about seven miles, with no very heavy load of letter-bags; only a trustworthy and intelligent person was needed. After many objections raised at home, and some demur at the post-office, I was at last allowed to take Pim's place until he fairly recovered. I was young and strong, and the walk in the pleasant spring mornings and evenings, with the long days' rest in the country air, would be good for me. I said to Felicia the early hour at half past five in the morning, and the dusk in the evening, would hide me from the curiosity of our townspeople.

But neither of these circumstances availed me in the country, where I met with idle querists who considered me a fair enigma offered for their solution. Yet there was nothing remarkable about me. I was commonplace and insignificant enough to go through my work unnoticed; not like Felicia, who moved and spoke like a discrowned queen. One woman especially, a widow, living about two miles from Tamford, waylaid and catechised me so rigorously that in a little time I began to suspect her of some sinister meaning. She was born to excite suspicion. Such depths of dissimulation there were in her heavy, slow-moving eyelids! such fraud in the forced smile on her thin lips! such lines of cunning on her face! She was so humble, too, so affable and insidious; she asked me impertinent questions so delicately that I found her worming out all the little secrets of our secluded household. I dislike to think of that woman to this day.

"I have a letter for you," she said, one evening—"a most important letter, and I wish to see you put it safely into your basket, where you can not lose it. Not with the others, please; I should like it kept separate, and posted separate, so that you may remember it particularly."

I put it into my own basket to satisfy her, and went on my way homeward, very weary, and thinking only of the rest by the school-room fire, with Felicia and our little child. Pim met me at the entrance of the town to take my light burden from me, and as the child was with him we walked on forgetfully and happily enough, leaving him to proceed to the post-office. Not till I was luxuriating in my anticipated rest, with Felicia waiting upon me, and little I busily unlacing my boots, did I remember the important letter in my basket.

I recollect it lying there, in the brightest light of our one candle, with the thick, marked characters, unlike a woman's handwriting. An idle feeling of curiosity mingled with my irritation, and I took it up again to examine it more closely. Beneath the thin envelope I deciphered but too readily this sentence: "The child is safe enough, at school with the daughters of a clergyman, who is master of."

Such a clear, decisive clew I had never had before. Mrs. Barn's inquisitiveness, the strange suddenness of her interest in me, the familiarity and ease with which she had caught the names of our little household, rushed instantly upon my mind. I kept silence, and before many minutes of thought were passed I determined to conceal my suspicions from Felicia, and from Fim if possible, for I had begun to doubt his simple capacity, and I resolved to follow out this clew myself. I would waver at nothing that would tend to solve the mystery of Bell's birth. Still holding the letter in my trembling hand, I was rapidly coming to the decision to retain it, when Fim returned, and Felicia took it from my reluctant grasp, and sent him away again to post it.

It is a hard thing to confess to crime; harder, perhaps more humiliating, when there is something mean in it. A bold, brave, great sin, or a soft, passionate error one can recall with a kind of palliating tenderness and pity for ourselves. When Fim, a few days after my discovery of this apparent clew, was well enough to resume his work, and at my secret solicitation came home to have some breakfast, bringing his letters with him, which was transgressing a strict rule, and I looked them over, and the words "Try Fazeley" would lead Mrs. Barnett to suppose that it had been detained in Tamford for our days, that the boy's memory was might see if it belonged to any one in his delivery. Pim would confirm this opinion if she spoke to him about it. The envelope was not sealed, and could be opened and reclosed readily. Yet I hesitated. I followed Felicia about, afraid of being left alone, and watched Fim play placidly at her stitching, with the child at her feet attempting to sew a piece of cloth, the pretty little features puckered into lines of great anxiety. At last she looked up with large, grave, childish eyes into Felicia's face.

"Will mamma come to-day?" she asked; for I talked often to her of the mother who was gone for her some time, and love her more than we could.

"No," answered Felicia.

"I wish she would," sighed the child wistfully; "I'm so tired."

That decided me. I went back into the dining-room, where the sooty class of poor scholars had assembled, and nestled myself at poor old Pim's desk —the head-boy's desk, with its mottoes of hope, which he had appropriated to his own use, and concealing myself behind the heavy lid, which rested upon my forehead, I unfastened the envelope with a wicked daring, and drew out the letter, which was wrapped within a blank paper."

There was nothing whatever but a few shillings' worth of postage-stamps, without a line of writing. I suppose if I had been a greater adept in crime I should have been disappointed at the failure of my private communication; I had been saved from doing Mrs. Barnett the treacherous injury I had designed. Now, when I had refastened the envelope, and Pim had taken it to her, I should feel as if I had done her very little wrong; and, having once taken the bitterness and humiliation of dishonor, I should never fall into the same temptation again.

I was obliged to leave it, until the boys were gone, carefully locked up in Pim's desk. The morning were slowly away, but at length the fumigation-dishes were dismissed, and my father prepared to lounge out for his noonday stroll. He was loitering at the school-door, deliberately drawing on his gloves, when I stood beside him, confident for his departure, when at the turning into College Hill there appeared an extraordinary group, escorted by a few policemen. The great constable and a stranger walking briskly toward us, and behind them a policeman, with our poor old faithful Pim, trotting, too quickly to give me any comment's time for thought, they entered the schoolroom after my father, who retreated hastily at the sight of them, and shut the door in the white faces of the boys and slam-men clustering round. Their errand was speedily told. A letter containing much money had been posted in Tamford, detected the honesty of the town letter-carrier, and had been addressed only to "Mrs. Barnett, Tamford" —selected, almost at random—in the confirmation that it would necessarily pass into the hands of the suspected man; but the postmaster, knowing no one of that name except the lady of Fazeley, had put it among Fim's letters for him to try, first, whether it belonged to her. The detective—the pleased and satisfied-looking stranger—had come down to Tamford to learn the success of his experiment, and, upon finding the postmaster's statement, had repaired to Mrs. Barnett's to reclaim the letter. Finding it was not delivered, he had gone on to Pim's private door, whose confusion and frightened manner had already condemned him in his eyes. They were come now to institute a search for the missing letter.

"Oh, Miss Bessie," cried Pim, falling upon his knees before me, "have pity upon me, my dear. Don't you say one thing to break my heart, I won't be hard to bear if you don't get into trouble, and your mother left you in my charge. Don't speak—don't speak!"

I saw it all in a moment—every consequence, every dire dreary result of my fault. Pim's tears were falling fast upon my hands, which he kissed imploringly, while he reiterated his prayer to me to be silent. But I had no power to speak. Suddenly he seemed to lose a long way from me, and his words sounded like indistinct mutterings, only I heard him say it was all right now, as I felt Felicia's arms round me, and was conscious of nothing more.

That night, after the dreadful afternoon was over, with its confusion and dismay, and the solemn magisterial visit of the mayor and rector, who were trustees of the grammar-school, I had to tell my secret to Felicia—not to my father, he could neither counsel nor aid me. But I was unprepared for the terrible paroxysm of agitation and anguish into which my shameful confession threw her. It was nearly dark in the school-room, for we had had no heart to light a candle, and I could scarcely see her white face; but she trembled violently, and gasped in broken sentences.

"What ought I to do, Felicia?" I asked, trying to look steadfastly at our position.

"I can not tell," she said, wringing her hands; "we ought not to let Pim suffer this for us; he has done so much for us!"

"I wish we had one friend," I sobbed, thinking of all our townspeople, who were attending their business and pleasure without any care for us, and we had no one to help us.

"We have a friend," said Felicia, many minutes afterward, as if she had not dared to mention him before, "and to-morrow I will send for him. Lawyer Carfoth, Bessie, may know shall have to tell him all. We will abide by his decision."

It was not strange that I should lie awake all night, wondering whether such things events were real. I waited through the long and weary hours of the morning for the arrival of Mr. Carfoth, who was to decide what I was to do. The sudden helplessness of Felicia as the time drew near increased my vague apprehensions. It was I who had to admit him—a grave, stern-looking man, not the boy I dimly remembered, into whose face I did not dare to glance, as I conducted him through the empty lobby to my father's study, where Felicia was waiting for him: Felicia, in her faded dress, but with a soft dawn of color on her delicate face, and with decision and pride, which she could not vain as he approached her.

"Felicia—Miss Crompton," he said, eagerly, "I was not prepared to find you here. I heard of it in my office this morning. Why did you not send for me at once?"

"The trouble if my sister's," she answered, in her cold, quiet tone. "I should not have sent for you on my own account merely."

She drew me to her side, with an unusual show of affection; but, as if recollecting herself, pushed me gently away from her, while she told him an abrupt, unvarnished story of the last twelve months, without a word to appeal to his sympathy or interest, until she came to my confession. He took me to spoke with tears, and with every plea on my behalf which could soften his judgment and reprobation. When Felicia finished, Mr. Carfoth paused for a long time absorbed in thought.

"You know," he said, suddenly and simply, "that Pim could not part, if he will, and there seems no doubt about that, poor fellow! Your sister can not take the consequences of the imprudent act."

For the first moment I met his eyes, which had been fastened on Felicia's face; deep, tranquil eyes, that were full of confidence at once. He saw it, and smiled rather sadly.

"The consequences are worse than the fault," he continued, "and I am not sure Bessie's child. We can not lay bare the history of your family before the public. We dare not expose you to the ridicule which would be placed; and the punishment will not be all his."

"But for Fim to be in jail," I cried. "Oh, Mr. Carfoth, you will not, little Bessie!" he replied; "and knowing all, I decide as I do. Go away now; I wish to speak to your sister alone."

I left them with my head Bell's shrill little voice calling to me from the garden, and I went out to her, under the windows of the parlor, where Felicia was standing with Fim's letter in her hand regarding us intently and furtively from one side of the deep chestnut, and I saw him for a moment put his face with his hands in a quick, mute gesture of trouble.

We went the next day—Felicia, and Mr. Carfoth, and I—to Fim's little cottage at Fazeley, where I clung to Mr. Carfoth's steady arm, but Felicia walked before us with her smooth tranquil step, and slightly bowed head. It is the long, low, wide gages and jealously-locked gates could not move her frigid quietism, nor the thought of seeing Fim in prisoner quicken her pace. She was calm still. Even when we stopped before the door of his cell, and the turnkey was unfastening the massive lock, she did not turn to us, nor stand on one side for Mr. Carfoth to enter first.

Pim was at work when we went in, and looked up shyly, with a kind of sullen resentment in his face, which was changing into one of delight at seeing Felicia and me, when his eyes fell upon Mr. Carfoth, and his face grew pale. He laid down his work and began his slow, deliberate movements to put on his coat.

"Oh, Miss Bessie, you've told," he exclaimed, "and you've told him! I wouldn't have had you tell him for all the world. Any body but him; any body but Mr. Carfoth, the head-boy. He knows enough about us already."

"Come, old fellow," said Mr. Carfoth, laying his hands on Pim's shoulders, and forged like the master knows every thing in school and out. He should have more confidence in me. Do you think I have forgot Tamford Grammar-school?"

"No, Sir; no, Mr. Lawrence," he sobbed, "we can't either of us forget the school; nor Mrs. Crompton, God bless her; and I should be ashamed of seeing her face in heaven if any harm came to the children, any worse harm, Mr. Carfoth. It was only a young thing's curiosity at first, not love things alone, but must rest them out somehow; and, Lord love you! being here don't hurt me a bit, but it's the misery of the poor, helpless, dumb creature like her. I've chapel every morning, and it's fetching up my religion better than at home. Besides, it wasn't altogether her fault; she was driven to it, Mr. Carforth."

Mr. Carforth bent his head without speaking.

"And I've been a deal happier since Fim, following into a reverential tone, "that somehow it's the grandest thing a poor man like me can do, who was born a shame—it's the grandest thing I can expect to do, to bear trouble and disgrace for somebody else, and save them. You see, by having my life a little bit heavier and harder, I can make hers light and easy, as it ought to be. Bless you, when I think I can save little Miss Bessie; save you, my dear, I feel as proud as if the call couldn't hold me. I'm not ashamed of being born then; and I sha'n't be ashamed when I stand before the judge. If I've not done my duty by Miss Crumpton and Mr. Edward, I shall have done it by you; and if ever I have a chance in heaven, I shall be bold to tell your honored mother—"

"But I can not bear it, Fim," I said, weeping till my words were lost in sobs.

They tried to comfort me, making light of my fault, and the penalty which would fall upon Fim; Mr. Carfoth promising to make every effort in his power to secure a short term of imprisonment. But the case was too clear; the abstraction of the letter, Fim's guilty confession when it was demanded from him, his evasive answers, which were both confessions, and the discovery of its notes in his own locked desk, formed an unbroken chain of circumstance too conclusive to be evaded. Mr. Garforth spoke frequently for him, and my father was roused to the exertion of rising to the occasion to avoid his long and faithful services; but the sentence could not be otherwise than it was—twelve months' imprisonment and hard labor in Shrewbury jail.

They told me nothing about it at the time, for was too ill to bear the knowledge of it. Life often so low that it was only by the doubtful hope that I would ever swell buoyantly again with the full tide of youth and health. Even after it had turned, with a flood of life, and the increase of strength, Felicia spoke of Fim with caution, and read fictitious letters to me, written in his name by Mr. Garforth, for which I was glad to let me that Felicia only write once a quarter, so full of his quaint pleasant, chattering cheerfulness, that they seemed like Fim's own words. I learned from some of the secret of Felicia's endurance in my helpless ness, and in our whispered conversations I told her of it feeling as if the sad impatience of my youth was quelled forever by the memory of my fault. Often, too, when little Bell was lying in my arms, her head resting against mine, and her tales of our life for the last twelve months, without a word to appeal to his sympathy or interest, until we came to my confession. Then I spoke in spoke with tears, and with every plea on my behalf which could soften his judgment and reprobation. When Felicia finished, Mr. Carfoth paused for a long time absorbed in thought.

"You know," he said, suddenly and simply, "that Pim could not part, if he will, and there seems no doubt about that, poor fellow! Your sister can not take the consequences of the imprudent act."

For the first moment I met his eyes, which had been fastened on Felicia's face; deep, tranquil eyes, that were full of confidence at once. He saw it, and smiled rather sadly.

"The consequences are worse than the fault," he continued, "and I am not sure Bessie's child. We can not lay bare the history of your family before the public. We dare not expose you to the ridicule which would be placed; and the punishment will not be all his."

"But for Fim to be in jail," I cried. "Oh, Mr. Garforth, you will not, little Bessie," he replied; "and knowing all, I decide as I do. Go away now; I wish to speak to your sister alone."

I left them with my head Bell's shrill little voice calling to me from the garden, and I went out to her, under the windows of the parlor, where Felicia was standing with Fim's letter in her hand regarding us intently and furtively from one side of the deep chestnuts, and I saw him for a moment put his face with his hands in a quick, mute gesture of trouble.

We went the next day—Felicia, and Mr. Garforth, and I—to Fim's little cottage at Fazeley, where I clung to Mr. Garforth's steady arm, but Felicia walked before us with her smooth tranquil step, and slightly bowed head. It is the long, low, wide gages and jealously-locked gates could not move her frigid quietism, nor the thought of seeing Fim in prisoner quicken her pace. She was calm still. Even when we stopped before the door of his cell, and the turnkey was unfastening the massive lock, she did not turn to us, nor stand on one side for Mr. Garforth to enter first.

Pim was at work when we went in, and looked up shyly, with a kind of sullen resentment in his face, which was changing into one of delight at seeing Felicia and me, when his eyes fell upon Mr. Garforth, and his face grew pale. He laid down his work and began his slow, deliberate movements to put on his coat.

"Oh, Miss Bessie, you've told," he exclaimed, "and you've told him! I wouldn't have had you tell him for all the world. Any body but him; any body but Mr. Carfoth, the head-boy. He knows enough about us already."

"Come, old fellow," said Mr. Garforth, laying his hands on Pim's shoulders, as he forged like the master knows every thing in school and out. He should have more confidence in me. Do you think I have forgot Tamford Grammar-school?"

"No, Sir; no, Mr. Lawrence," he sobbed, "we can't either of us forget the school; nor Mrs. Crompton, God bless her; and I should be ashamed of seeing her face in heaven if any harm came to the children, any worse harm, Mr. Garforth. It was only a young thing's curiosity at first, not love things alone, but must rest them out somehow; and, Lord love you! being here don't hurt me a bit, but it's the misery of the poor, helpless, dumb creature like her. I've chapel every morning, and it's fetching up my religion better than at home. Besides, it wasn't altogether her fault; she was driven to it, Mr. Garforth."

Mr. Garforth bent his head without speaking.

"And I've been a deal happier since Fim, following into a reverential tone, "that somehow it's the grandest thing a poor man like me can do, who was born a shame—it's the grandest thing I can legacy of one thousand pounds, which in Canada will make her an independent woman."

"Oh, I understand it all now!" I exclaimed. "My poor Felicia! my darling, my darkest Felicia! she loved Colonel Clarke; they loved one another. And is he dead?"

"He is," was the brief answer; and after a pause he continued, "to Felicia and Fim will go to Canada. I have written to them that you behind if you can think of any friend you could stay with happily. Think, Bessie. Could you be happy with me?"

I could only bow down my head upon the hand lying on the desk before me, murmuring the word "happy" over and over again, as our child had done when she could only speak a few lisping syllables.

"Let us go to Felicia," I said, a long time afterward, when the evening brightness was fading away; and we turned with hand in hand among the passages trodden by children's feet to the parlor, where we found her sitting in the twilight, with little Bell's head snuggling on her lap. The soft and beautiful smiles played upon her face when Mr. Garforth told her of our betrothal, and she put the child down to take me into her arms.

But Bell, the little, excitable, sensitive child, as if foreboding some separation, wept bitterly, and I could not comfort her, though Mr. Garforth, who had never caressed or fondled her before, tried playfully to soothe her. Ever since my protracted illness she had been brought into a listless and passive quietness. Of late, whenever I was not with her, she had been used to climb up to the window and press her little pale face against the panes in wistful watchings for the mother who never came. I felt my heart ached at having filled her with a hope that now would never be realized.

During the next month, while we were busy making preparations for the intended expiration as soon as Fim was released, I was often startled with Mr. Garforth's mother until our marriage, I found myself in a position to approach the tacitly forbidden theme, and besought him to let me speak to child with me; but he refused it, my first request, with a look of pain which I never saw on his face, though it awoke a dread of him, and at the time when I should be left alone to his stern authority, which he had softened to mildness and reserve sprang up between us. But my darling, my youngest little one, was declining now visibly and surely, and every other interest was absorbed in that one for her. Perhaps that low ebbing of my life which she had seen with the bewilderment and vague fear of childhood, and the mysterious pain and grief unnessed in my father when he did not awake at the sound of our crying; or the oppression of Felicia's sadness that no often weighed me down in all the trouble, and privation, and care had burdened the young heart till it shuddered at life, and recoiled from it, dimly conscious of its sorrows.

It was the evening I had been looking forward to so long, and Mr. Garforth was gone to Shawbury to bring Fim home once again to the waiting world. Through many hours of the day I had carried my child—a light burden now—to and fro in the large deserted mansion, resting sometimes myself, but only for a few minutes, for she would lie in no other arms but mine; while Felicia followed us unceasingly, with delicate and helping eyes which gave mine to ask unutterable questions. She was asleep now upon my lap, as she had slept the first night we had found her, and Felicia, on a low chair upon the hearth, had buried her face from all sight and sound, in an attitude of motionless anguish. The room was as still as it had been during the day for the moan of the child; yet they entered so noiselessly, with such a solemn hush of care, that I did not know they were come until Mr. Garforth had his hand upon my head, and I looked up into poor Fim's face stooping over us with tears streaming down his cheeks and sudden shocks.

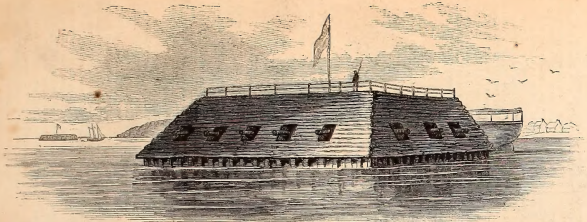
"The Lord love her!" he said; "the dear Lord love her, and keep her forever!"

"Pim," I whispered, "it is so long for the poor mother to be here. The child ought to die in her arms, not mine."

I spoke so softly that the child in its sobbing slumber did not move; but Pim groaned aloud, and stretched out his hands beseechingly to me, while he cast an awe-stricken glance at Felicia, I, too, gazed with terror at the tall, slender, bending figure gliding forward with an air of indescribable pleading and humiliation.

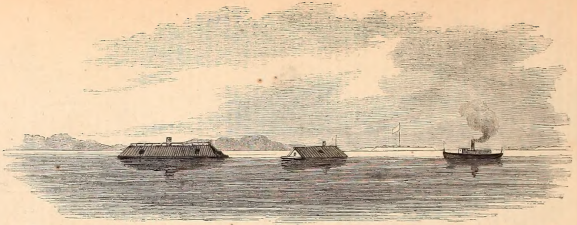
"Oh, Bessie, Bessie!" she cried, sinking to my feet, and hiding her face in my dress, "I never wanted you to know it; but"—I could hear her heart beat—"but little Bessie is—" She whispered the rest against my knee and ear.

Even at that moment, with the awe and shock of this confession, I looked to Lawrence. His triumphal face was bent down upon us with a grave and quiet comfort, while he laid his hand once more gently upon my head.



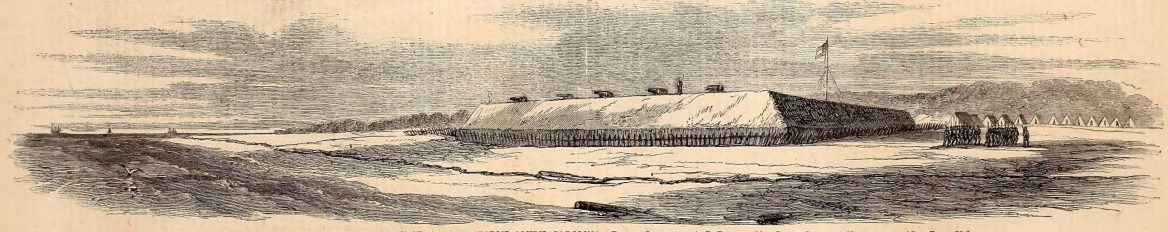
"Speak to her," urged Felicia. "tell her that you'll not cast her off. For your mother's sake forgive her. God knows she's suffered. Speak to her or she'll die, Bessie."

Still Felicia lay motionless, and she did not answer, only her hands clasped my feet more closely, until I heard Mr. Garforth lift her down, and the child stirred restlessly upon my lap, and her transparent purple-veined eyelids opened widely.

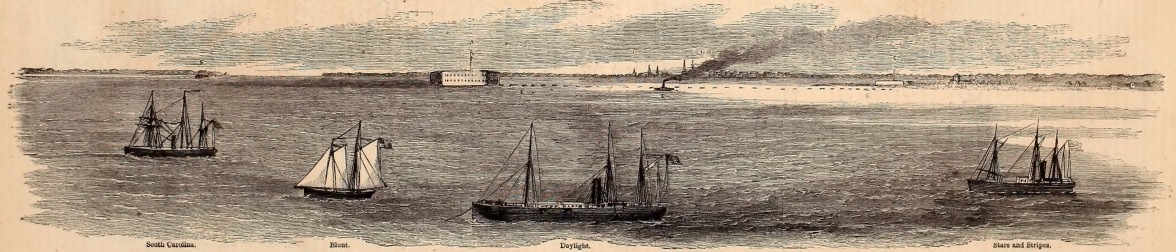


"Little Bell's dear mother is come at last," I said, and the wonderful childish eyes kindled with a strange glow as they gazed up dreamily into mine. "Call your mother, little Bell."

"Mother," breathed the faint voice, and a smile, like a feeble moonbeam upon some little mountain stream, glimmered in her face as she stretched her wistful eyes away from me in earnest expectation —not vainly, for Felicia was bending over with the sacred love and anguish of a mother pleasing through her familiar features. The child was satisfied, and lifting feebly her little fingers, let them flutter for a moment playfully upon the mother's forehead and the golden hair falling over it; but the effort lasted only for a moment. Utterly forgetting look passed over her innocent face, and once again she spoke to Felicia."



"Good-by, mother," she whispered.



MIDDLE-GROUND BATTERY, Charleston, S. C.—Sketched by A. P. Palmer, 21st South Carolina Volunteers.—[See Page 79.]

THE CHARLESTON IRON-CLAD FLEET.—Sketched by A. P. Palmer, 21st South Carolina Volunteers.—[See Page 79.]

FOLLY'S BATTERY, NEAR THE LIGHT-HOUSE, AT CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.—From a Sketch by A. P. Palmer, 21st South Carolina Volunteers.—[See Page 79.]

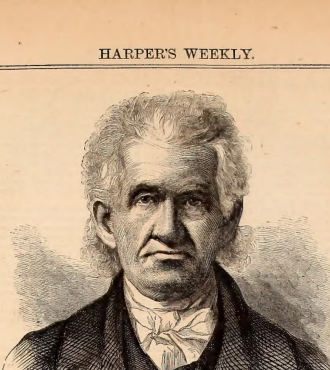
Ripramascus.—A, Fort Sumter.—B, Charleston City.—C, Fort Moultrie.—D, Rebel Tug at work on the Obstructions.—E, E, Obstructions.—F, Fort Johnson.—G, Mount Pleasant Batteries.

OUR BLOCKADING FLEET OFF NORTH CHANNEL, CHARLESTON HARBOR, SOUTH CAROLINA.—Sketched by a Naval Officer.—[See Page 79.]

THE LATE REVEREND LYMAN BEECHER.

WE publish herewith a portrait of the REV. LYMAN BEECHER, who died on 10th January in the city of Brooklyn, at the age of eighty-seven; and we condense the following sketch of his life and services from a longer biographical memoir:

Lyman Beecher was born at New Haven, Connecticut, October 12, 1775; graduated at Yale College in 1797; and studied theology under the direction of President Dwight. In December, 1798, he was ordained pastor of a church at East Hampton, Long Island, upon a salary of $300 per annum. In 1810 he removed to the care of the first church, at Litchfield, Connecticut. Here he remained about sixteen years, during which time his remarkable qualities as a preacher and as a zealous and active minister brought him a great reputation and a remarkable influence throughout New England. In 1826 he was installed over the newly-established Hanover Street Church, Boston, and, during his residence there, devoted himself with both zeal and ability to the various work committed to his guidance. His ministry necessarily partook largely of a controversial character. He threw himself into the thickest of the battle, and was sustained by the confidence and fervent admiration of the religious body to which he belonged. The sincerity and spirituality of his preaching was generally acknowledged, and it was attended by decisive results, in a revival of the spirit and increase in the numbers of evangelical Christians. In 1832 the Lane Theological Seminary was established at Cincinnati, and Dr. Beecher was invited to take the direction. He carried the same strength and ardor into his new connections, and electrified a considerable part of the country by the publication, soon after his arrival, of a tract sounding the alarm of Roman Catholic supremacy at the West. He remained in Cincinnati about ten years, having, in addition to the care of the Seminary, the pastoral charge of the Second Presbyterian Church. After leaving there he resided for many years in Boston, without fixed employment, but with undiminished intelligence and vigor, even at a very advanced age. During the more active portion of his life few or none of his profession were better known to the people of the United States, and it is probable that the labors of no other have produced a more immediate and apparent effect. His fame as an orator was widely spread.



Of Dr. Beecher's thirteen children not a few have attained to eminence as writers and ministers. Mrs Catherine Beecher, Dr. Edward Beecher, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Revs. George, Charles, Thomas, William, and James Beecher are all known in certain spheres of public usefulness, and each in his specialty has done service in his day and generation.

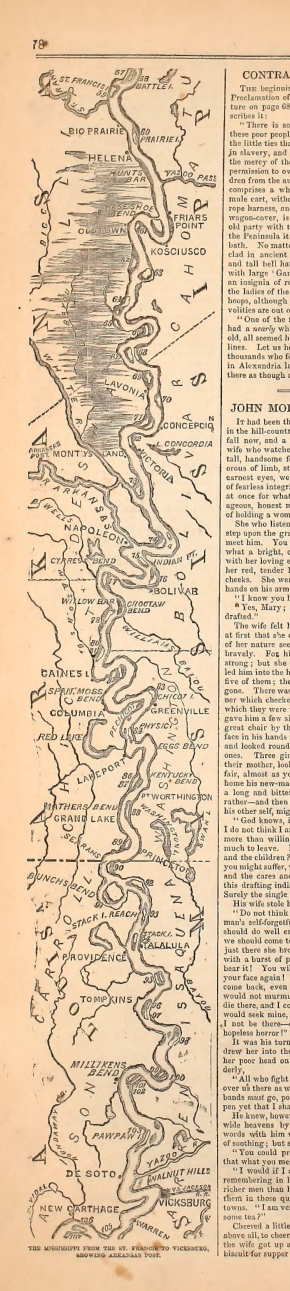
Of his son Henry, Dr. Beecher was peculiarly fond and proud, and during the last ten years of his life beg been more or less with him. About five years since he became a permanent resident of Brooklyn, living within a stone's-throw of his son's house and church. At the latter place he was for some time an honored Nestmark of a former generation, and an object of universal esteem and affection. Latterly, however, during the past three years, his body, originally so erect and sinewy, had rapidly failed.

At the close of the morning sermon on January 11, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher paused a moment, and then, in a voice tremulous with deep emotion, which sent a thrill throughout the vast congregation, he proceeded to say, in substance:

Last night, at five o'clock, at the ripe age of eighty-seven, my venerated father went to his eternal rest. His life was singularly blameless—simple, natural, full of the noblest Christian heroism, faithfulness, and devotion to the cause to which he early consecrated his powers. For about a year and a half his mental condition has been exceedingly feeble and child-like. He has been like a weary child, and packed his trunk in anticipation of a journey, and, expecting every moment to start, could not unpack it. But now the long-expected journey has been made. He has reached the place where, all his mental powers unlocked, not as here on earth, but with every faculty brightened, and every sense glorified, he can employ them as never before in the service of his divine Master. He had long been ready to depart. Almost the last sentient act of his life occurred about two years ago, when, on his recovery from a severe sickness, he called for "that passage." After reading a multitude of passages, for he was unable to designate the particular one he desired, the reader opened, by the good providence of God, to these verses: "For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only—"

They were proceeding to read further, but my father cried "Stop! that is not for me! This is my testimony; write it down so mine." And I think he could use those words so fully and so justly as the man that wrote them. One of the most touching characteristics of his later years was his affectionate remembrance of his early associates in the Christian warfare. His heart clung with peculiar tenderness to the memory of Taylor, Ewarts, Cornelius, and Wisner. He loved them all, but especially Taylor. And in his last years, and in his dying hours, his heart turned not to Boston, the scene of his brightest triumphs; not to Brooklyn, where for so many years he had lived so near our beautiful Greenwood, from where shall rise so many on the Last Day, when the trumpet shall sound which only they who are called shall hear; not even to Litchfield, where lies buried the wife of his youth, for whom he cherished all the tender affection which his loving nature could lavish upon an object; but his last request was, "Lay me by the side of brother Taylor." And there, in the old grave-yard at New Haven, shall repose side by side the bodies of these two Christian soldiers and heroes, until the day when they shall rise glorified and incorruptible, to dwell forever before the face of God in heaven.

THE LATE REV. LYMAN BEECHER, D.D.



THE ATTACK OF VICKSBURG.

THE picture given below illustrates one of the most daring feats of arms ever attempted in the progress of this war, and not surpassed by any thing in the annals of warfare. When General Morgan L. Smith's division of General Sherman's command undertook to storm the enemy's works on the banks of the bayou in the rear of Vicksburg, the Sixth Regiment of Missouri Volunteers, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Blood, was detailed for the advance. The enemy's works were very strong, there being a steep bank of thirty feet high to ascend, fortified with heavy works and rifle-pits, with a heavy force drawn up in line of battle behind them. The only approach was by a road across a sand-bar in the bayou, exposed to a double cross-fire from the enemy, and the only way of ascending the bank was by cutting a road. An order was received for two companies to be sent over in advance for the purpose of cutting the road —one with picks and shovels, and the other with muskets to protect the workers from the enemy's sharp-shooters in the rifle-pits over their heads. Company F, Captain Boutell, and Company K, Captain Buck, were the first to volunteer, the peril being so great that Colonel Blood was reluctant to order a detail. Their services were accepted, and the two companies of heroes went across under a most terrific fire, which left more than a tenth of their number stretched upon the sand. On getting across they immediately commenced operations on the bank, and very soon made a large excavation, almost sufficient for the purpose, when the position of the enemy's forces and batteries were found to be such that the further prosecution of the attempt would be certain destruction to all concerned in it, and without accomplishing any thing. In the mean time Lieutenant-Colonel Blood, with the balance of the regiment, had crossed over to their support, but with still greater loss, one-sixth of his force being killed or wounded.

Shortly afterward, the attempt being found impracticable, the regiment was recalled; and under cover of our guns, and favored by approaching darkness and a heavy shower of rain, succeeded in returning without further loss. During the whole time the regiment was crossing, and while it was under the bank, it was exposed to a heavy cross-fire which threatened it with annihilation; but it never faltered or hesitated, but marched steadily on, apparently heedless of the storm of bullets which assailed it. Private M'Gee was shot four times, and thirteen bullets penetrated his clothing. As he lay upon the bar, unable to proceed, the enemy's balls still came whistling around him, and to protect himself he scooped a hole with his hands in the sand and crawled into it. The Sixth Regiment Missouri Volunteers has certainly won a right to a niche in the temple of fame. Notwithstanding the ill success of the attack on Vicksburg, such exploits as this will redeem the history of the affair in the memory of our soldiers.

THE BATTLE AT VICKSBURG—GALLANT CHARGE OF THE SIXTH MISSOURI REGIMENT.

THE MISSISSIPPI FROM THE ST. FRANCIS TO VICKSBURG, SHOWING ARKANSAS POST.

CONTRABANDS COMING IN.

THE beginning of the effect of the President's Proclamation of Freedom is illustrated in our picture on page 66. Its author, Mr. Waud, thus describes it:

"There is something very touching in seeing these poor people coming into camp—giving up all the little ties that cluster about home, such as it is in slavery, and trustfully throwing themselves on the mercy of the Yankees, in the hope of getting permission to own themselves and keep their children from the auction-block. This party evidently comprises a whole family from some farm: the mule cart, without a particle of leather about its rope harness, and with a cover thrown over it for wagon-cover, is unique in its dilapidation. The old party with the umbrella is a type. Down on the Peninsula it is generally an old hat. Sabbath. No matter how fine a day, the old darkeys, clad in ancient dress-suits, white cotton gloves, and tall hats, always make their appearance with large 'Gampish' umbrellas—as I conjecture an insignia of respectability. Somehow or other the ladies of the colored persuasion manage to get hoops, although bonnets and other fashionable frivolities are out of their reach.

"One of the family represented in the picture had a nearly white child, a girl; and, young and old, all seemed highly delighted at getting into our lines. Let us hope they fare better than the thousands who found a refuge from the institution in Alexandria last year; the poor creatures died there as though a plague had smitten them."

JOHN MORGAN'S SUBSTITUTE.

IT had been the day for drafting in a little town in the vicinity of Cincinnati, and it was night-fall now, and a man walked slowly home to the wife who watched and waited for him. He was a tall, handsome fellow—thirty-five, perhaps—a vigorous of limb, strong of muscle, with kindly yet earnest eyes, well-cut features, and an expression of fearless integrity. You would have known him at once for what he was—a good, unselfish, courageous, honest man, worthy of winning, capable of holding a woman's love.

She who listened for his coming heard the slow step upon the gravel, and sprang from the door to meet him. You could see, even in that dim light, what a bright, cheery, pretty woman she was; with her loving eyes; her dark, satin-smooth hair; her red, tender lips; and the fresh rose in her cheeks. She went up to her husband and put her hands on his arm lovingly.

"I know you have bad news for me, John!"

"Yes, Mary; I must go. I was the third one drafted."

The wife felt her limbs shake, and she thought at first that s'he could not stand. All the forces of her nature seemed giving way, but she rallied bravely. "Then, my husband, you must be calm and strong; but she could not speak just then. She led him into the house, where their children were—five of them—the eldest only in its July, just gone. There was something in their father's manner which checked the noisy demonstrations with which they were wont to greet his coming, and they gave him a few silent kisses as he sat down in the great chair by the west window. He buried his face in his hands for a while, and then he lifted it and looked round on the little group of his loved ones. Three girls and two boys, and his wife, their mother, looking, in spite of years of care, as fair, almost as young, as the day he brought her home his new-made bride. His chest heaved with a long and bitter sigh—a sort of despair, it was rather—and then he said, as if he feared even she, his other self, might misunderstand him:

"God knows, it is not for my own sake, Mary. I do not think I am afraid to die. I would go with more than willingness, set it so, if I had not so much to leave. If I fall, what will become of you and the children? I can not bear to think of what you might suffer, with no one to stand between you and the cares and sorrows of the world. Mary, this drafting indiscriminately does not seem just. Surely the single man ought to go first."

His wife stole her hand into his very gently.

"Do not think of us," she said, with a true woman's self-forgetfulness. "It is not that. We should do well enough. You need not fear that we should come to want. But oh! John—" And just there she broke down—she had tried and with a burst of passionate tears, "No, I can not bear it! You will die! I shall never, never see your face again! If I could only know that you would come back, even were it maimed and helpless, I would not murmur; but to think that you might die there, and I could not go—that your boys would seek mine, your hands grope for mine, and I not be there—oh! John, I shall go mad with hopeless horror!"

It was his turn to be the comforter now. He drew her into the shelter of his arms; he rested her poor head on his breast; he whispered, tenderly,

"All who fight do not die, Mary. God watches over us; there are still hopes. Some women's hearts bands must go, poor child! Something may happen yet that I shall not have to."

He knew, however, no adverse chance under the wide heavens by which he could escape. The words with him were but the vaguest utterance of soothing; but she caught at them eagerly.

"You could procure a substitute, perhaps—that what you mean?"

"I would if I could," he answered, evasively, remembering in his own mind the difficulty far richer men than he had experienced in procuring them in those quiet, thinly-peopled, agricultural towns. "I am very tired, Mary; can you give me some tea?"

Cheered a little by her new hope, and anxious, above all, to cheer him and make him comfortable, the wife got up and went into the kitchen. The biscuit for supper were already made, and in a few minutes tea was upon the table. John Morgan drank cup after cup of it, with an eager, feverish thirst, but eating with him was a mere feint. When the meal was over the children were put to bed, all but the two eldest girls. They stole out to the open door, and sat down in the September moonlight, their arms round each other—feeling, with a sort of dumb pain, that a shadow which they could not resist had fallen upon the household. Their mother, meantime, had lighted her lamp and taken her work—child's frock which she was finishing—to the little round stand. She would not let this evening seem more unlike other evenings than she could help.

Soon there came a footstep up the gravel-walk; this time a quick, firm tread. The girls in the door made way for the new-comer to enter, and he came in and stood silently for a moment in the centre of the little sitting-room. This was a slender, elegantly-moulded man. You could see at a glance that the flare of his manhood had never yet been tested by any tough struggle with fate. Yet one would not have doubted his untried courage. In shone in his steady blue eyes, and with an unspoken pain; it betrayed itself in the curl of his lip, the curve of his nostril. They say no soldiers ever fought more bravely than the gentry of England—white of hand, lavishers of gold, delicate of feature. Some such blood flowed in the veins of Ash Thornycroft. He was the only son of the rich mill-owner whose fortune John Morgan was. He was no stranger at the little cottage; and even in this sorrowful hour there was no danger of his being unwelcome. He was the first to speak.

"It is hard on you, Morgan, this draft. My father was saying to-night that he did not know how he should continue to spare you. So well as you're doing now, too—already comfort and competence for you and yours, and better things in prospect."

"It's useless talking. I think I was not born under a lucky star. You were. Mr. Thornycroft's son, to begin with; young, rich, without a tie to bind you; and of course he can't draft spare you."

"Without a tie! Do you call that happiness?"

John Morgan's eyes fell beneath that sad, steady gaze of reproach. He remembered then one who had died in March, on whose grave the lonesome spring rains had wept tears which sprang up again in rose and violets—for the gentle girl whom Ash Thornycroft had loved so long and well.

"Forgive me," he said, in a low, penitent tone. The other went on:

"I think you forget yourself a little when you replne at this stroke as if it were the worst thing which could happen to you. Would you give up your wife, or one of your children, even to escape from the perils of this war?"

"Did you think I was a coward?" and the honest soul looked indignantly out of John Morgan's eyes. "It was not for myself I feared, but for those. If I were to fall what would they do? I have struggled to shield them so far as I could from toil, or care, or privation. How are they fitted to tread the world's paths alone?"

"No, I did not take you for a coward. If I had I should not have thought your life worth saving. I think I know pretty well how you feel in your place. It is a place in which I shall never stand. I am going to stand, John. It is my duty, for I have nothing to keep me at home. I am ready to give all that I have to my country. If I fall I shall only go to those whom all my longings tend. What is to hinder my sparing you to your happy fireside? I came to propose myself as your substitute."

"It is not, are you sure it is not, to spare me? Would you go in any case?" John Morgan asked, with a keen glint in his eyes.

"Do not fear that I am going for your sake. I made up my mind as soon as the call came for the volunteers. I am going for this very thing—the chance, if I should not be drafted myself, of saving some man who was to the woman who loved him. I am glad it is you, John, my good old friend, to whom I can render this service."

John Morgan was a man of few words, of feelings which lay so deep that they seldom rose to the surface; but there was something which Ash Thornycroft needed no language to interpret in the look of his eyes, in the grasp of his hand, as he hurried out of the room.

Thornycroft was one of those men with a vein of tenderness in the midst of their strength which always allies them more nearly to women than to men. Left alone with Mrs. Morgan, he said what he would have said to her husband. It was when she thanked him, with earnest words, and sobs and tears of joy yet more eloquent.

"There's no one, Mrs. Morgan, who loved me as well as you love John. You do not need to thank me. All that I ever could do for any other woman I would do for her sake. You have seen her; you know how fair and sweet she was; but I think no one save me knows all her purity, her saint-like goodness. I have had only one hope ever since she died, that I might be fit to go to her. If I die in this good cause, think of me as happy with an unspeakable happiness. I will but be opening the golden gates the sooner. I shall not see you again, so I will bid you good-by now."

Her tears fell upon his hand, her lips touched it. She whispered brokenly her blessing, the blessing of one who owed to him more than her own life; and so, anointed for his work, as it were, by those holy tears and prayers, he went away.

The girls at the door saw his face in the moonlight, and felt the solemn and tender. They ran in to their mother asking their childish questions—

"What must Mr. Thornycroft look so? What was he here for?"

"Father is not going away: Mr. Thornycroft is going in his stead. We shall keep father at home."

And then, woman-like, she fell to hugging them and crying over them; and just then John came back, and took the three all together in his strong arms.

It was one of the supreme moments of life which, whether of joy or grief, intoxicate themselves to our minds and need no description.

Ash Thornycroft walked away with a firm tread. He turned aside when he came to the church, with the old burying-ground in its rear, full of grass-grown mounds. He went in there and knelt beside a grave on whose head-stone the name of Constance Ireton gleamed white and clearly out in the moonlight.

"Oh, my darling, my darling!" he cried, with his lips pressed to the sod. If the dead could hear, that still heart beneath should have throbbed again to the accents of such love. Many a night had he talked to her there, as now, with a strange sense of nearness—a full belief in the communion of their souls.

"You are not here, I know, and yet I know you hear me. I am going away to-morrow, God's soldier and yours. Give me your blessing, Constance, and pray for me, you who have already seen the Father's face, that I may do my work without faltering, and the end may come soon."

It was but a dream of his own overwrought fancy; but he seemed to see a cloud draw near, from which a face looked—a white, sweet face, sad with waiting, yet glorified with immortal hope. He seemed to hear a voice, which said,

"Go forth, my beloved, and do your work. Soon will the struggle be over, and the reward is long and sure."

For an instant he seemed to see the smile upon her face, the look of faithful love in the immortal eyes. Then, when he stretched out his arms toward it, the cloud seemed to melt into the white moonlight; not even an echo of the voice thrilled the September air—he was alone with the night.

He went away next day to join his regiment, one which had already seen hard service. There was in him the mettle of a true soldier. His day might be short—he would be busy while it lasted. Besides, I think he liked his grim work. He was known to be found among the volunteers for any desperate service. In many a fierce charge he led the van, with his bright fair hair glittering golden-ly in the sunlight, and a blue glint in his eyes. He was never wounded. Nothing happened to dismble him from his duty. He had refused well-earned promotion, and more, when a true comrade who marched always at his side had asked him the reason why, he answered,

"Because I shall be here so little while."

"I thought you volunteered for three years. I had heard that you came in place of a nine-months' man, but that you chose to enlist for the longer time and join an old regiment."

There was no answer to the inquiring tone which made a question of this remark, and Steven Chase, who understood his comrade too well to press the point, was as much puzzled as ever.

He comprehended it all later the night before Fredericksburg. They sat together on a stone a little way from their tent. For a while both had been thinking silently of what the dawning was to bring.

"It will be a tough fight," Chase said, at length. "I wish you could say so, Ash Thornycroft answered. "It is a terrible responsibility to assume, that of leading men to such certain destruction; and yet, if we are not with the advance, I shall be hardly a man but would be willing to sell his life for that. It is the only regret I have in going in, that I shall never know which side conquers."

"Nonsense, man, don't get blue after seeing as much blood split as you have, and coming out of so many hard battles! Cheer up!"

"It was not my time hitherto. It is now. I have had my call. But I'm not blue, never fear. I shall go into that fight more joyfully than ever dred chief went home. I have only one wish. If you pull through alive take care of my body. I want to be buried at home, beside a grave that was made last March, in the Westville church-yard. You must send to my father—David Thornycroft, Westville, Connecticut. Here it is written down for you. Papers that I left at home explaining my wishes will be sufficient for the rest."

His manner carried conviction with it, conviction at least of his own faith in his forewarning, but Steven Chase tried to shake it off.

"I never made a presentiment to come true in my life," he said, sturdily. "You will talk over the matter with me twenty times more than now."

Thornycroft only smiled, as he said,

"Do you promise what I asked, Steven? Will you send my body to my father if it is within your power to protect it?"

"Yes; for your satisfaction I promise. I shall not bid you good-night though."

They were toiling up the hill, that fatal afternoon of the next day, side by side, when suddenly Thornycroft paused, and with kindling eyes to his comrade. He stretched out his hand with a smile which the other will never forget if he lives till his hair is white.

"Good-by, Steven!"

The next instant he fell heavily. A rebel shot had given him his release.

With exertions which would seem half incredible if I should relate them, Steven Chase succeeded in bringing off the field. He was not dead, and a hope still lurked in his true comrade's heart that he might yet live to tell at home the story of his life and death. Even when the wounded found him—the thin ranks out of which so many brave feet had marched forever. Just at dawning he looked up, and met his friend's eyes. He faltered, feebly,

"A defeat, Steven! I lived to know—victims, not conquerors." Then his face brightened with a strange radiance, and he whispered, so softly that his friend could scarcely catch the words—whispered as to some invisible auditor—

"Yes, my darling, yes!"

The next instant the faint heart-beat under Steven Chase's hand was still.

They have buried him, since then, beside the grave where he knelt in the moonlight the night before he went away. Only a foot of earth between the two who loved each other so dearly. Is there so much? Surely our dreams of the future are not all in vain. Surely somewhere, in the heaven which is "anchored off this world," where sickness and sorrow never come, and there are neither wars nor rumors of wars, somewhere in that still Land of Peace they are tasting the cup of joy which we denied them.

John Morgan, and John Morgan's wife and children, will speak the name of Ash Thorycroft all their lives with such reverent tenderness as befits the memory of one who is enshrined in their hearts as saint and as deliverer. We know not yet for how long, and to and from whom Felix will hire laid down their lives—God grant that we may know hereafter—that the seed sown in tears we may reap with exceeding great joy.

MURFREESBORO, TENNESSEE.

WE publish on page 69 a view of MURFREESBORO, TENNESSEE, now occupied by General Rosecrans, from a sketch by our special artist, Mr. R. Berrel. The Times correspondent says of the place:

Murfreesboro is a town which once contained some ten thousand inhabitants, it situated upon a level plain, but two miles are visible—the Bigelow Female Institute and the Soule Female College—and an academy for males, six churches, a court-house, &c.

In the centre of the town is a public square, containing a very handsome court-house. Around this square are the principal business-houses of the place. The streets are wide, and contain many handsome residences. At present the place is entirely deserted by its former residents. It was always strictly rebel in sentiment, and the few citizens who were indeed with Union sentiments have been refugees from home since the retreat of Bragg last year. During my stay not a store was open save those taken for the use of Commissary and Quarter-master's stores. No citizens were upon the streets, nor a woman or child visible—every thing is about the town in military.

The other picture on the same page illustrates a curious spectacle which met the eyes of our army as they advanced to Murfreesboro. This was a forest of abatis—trees which had been cut down by the rebels to keep their lines warm, and had been left standing when they decamped. Mr. Beard counted these chimneys by hundreds. They gave a funereal aspect to the place.

THE LOSS OF GALVESTON.

WE publish on pages 72 and 73 two illustrations of the FIGHT at GALVESTON, TEXAS, on 1st January, from sketches by our special artist in the Gulf. One of these represents the GUN-BOATS ENGAGED.

The Herald correspondent thus described this scene:

When morning dawned signals were sent up from the flag-ship, which were responded to by all the gun-boats except the Harriet Lane, and now it was that the Confederates first discovered that she had fallen into the hands of the enemy.

The flag also revealed the position of the enemy's fleet, and the preparations for an attack from the shore with artillery and infantry.

It was now determined by the Commodore to retake the Harriet Lane, and he ordered the Owasco to head to and open fire. This gun-boat has an armament of one 11-inch and two 9-inch guns, and she opened with her heaviest.

No sooner had she sent one of her shells than the rebels crowded our prisoners on board of them wherever and everywhere—upon the deck of the Harriet Lane. They then raised a flag of truce, and paraded and trotted the officers over the Harriet Lane, and her only surviving officer, on board the flag-ship, was dispatched to Commodore Renshaw to the effect that if another shot was fired upon the Harriet Lane every man on board would be shot before the enemy overboard. In consequence of this message Commodore Renshaw ordered the firing to cease, and made no further attempt to recapture the vessel.

The loss of the enemy's fleet was at this time as follows: The two vessels which had accomplished the capture of the Harriet Lane were still lying near her, severely warming with shot-shrouds. Two more lay further off towards the bay, while the fifth laid further inland at a considerable distance. This fifth vessel was reported to be the flag-ship, and had received the most severe punishment, as below on board the previous caress of General Magruder, whom she had carried off, were the captains of the rebel fleet, who had been carried from Yorktown to Galveston. But it is probable that they are still lying near by, as they were warming with shot-shrouds. Two more lay further off towards the bay, while the fifth laid further inland at a considerable distance. This fifth vessel was reported to be the flag-ship, and had received the most severe punishment, as below on board the previous caress of General Magruder, whom she had carried off, were the captains of the rebel fleet, who had been carried from Yorktown to Galveston. But it is probable that they are still lying near by, as they were warming with shot-shrouds.

During the morning the enemy opened fire upon our vessels with a rifle gun, and the city, of course, was very now in full possession. Their sharp-shooters, breaking upon the house along the levee, took possession, and fired from the windows, while the batteries which had been placed in position opened. They were promptly met by our gun-boats, and the mutual exchanges of courtesies continued for about an hour, without much effect on either side.

The rebels had placed two guns upon a point of land inside of mid near the entrance to the harbor. The gun-boat Corwin was ordered to shell these guns, and performed her work very handsomely. She fired first from her bow gun, then from her stern gun, and then from her broadside, and fired from her gun off, then rounded again and delivered a broadside. This she did twice, when the enemy's guns were effectually silenced.

TERRIBLE EXPLOSION—DEATH OF COMMODORE RENSHAW.

The flag-ship Westfield was aground, and a little before noon took in the forenoon the Commodore determined to board her, and the expedition resolved in the steam launch, which cost the Commodore his life. He covered the deck, and was standing on the after part of the vessel ready to mount her burning and had her set on fire. He then left the vessel in charge of Lieutenant Commanding, and Engineer William R. Green and two sailors, to proceed to another vessel. But the launches had been left lying, and seriously had the Commodore and his comrades waited themselves to the shore when a terrible explosion occurred. The magazine, which was stored with ammunition, shells, &c., had exploded, and the flagship and the Commodore's boat were scattered through the air in ten thousand fragments. Not one of the unfortunate men on board the vessel at the time or in the boat escaped instantaneous death. It is certain that it was never perfected by the rebels before, but the number is estimated at ten to twenty officers and soldiers. Some say that the Commodore remained on board, and the vessel sit unharmed; but what remained was scattered.

Immediate the rebels were making formidable preparations on shore to prevent the escape of the vessels. They were seen to drag artillery with heavy mule teams to the point commanding the bar, and were busily engaged in planting their batteries and training their guns to prevent the exit of our ship. The transport Mary Boardman, which is rigged privately like a gun-boat, was lying near the flag-ship at the time of the explosion, and the officers of the Commodore was known only on board this vessel. It was supposed on board the other vessels that the Commodore had gone on board this ship. They therefore signaled her, asking "What shall we do?" Major Burt, a volunteer aid-de-camp on the staff of Governor Hamilton, told the captain of the vessel that they had no signals with which to reply, but that there was one signal which they could make which he thought would be heeded. He proposed to run at once, and the captain, agreeing to this, immediately started. This was taken as a signal of retreat, and the Boardman was followed by all the other vessels in our possession. The passage over the bar was exceedingly dangerous, and the vessels were now grounding hopelessly several times; but they all escaped before the enemy had formed line sufficiently to be able to open fire upon them.

The transports, which had gone to carry supplies to the Banks's expedition, safely got to sea and returned to this city, the gun-boats remaining behind.

The other picture represents

THE FIRE AT MOBILE,

where the gallant Colonel Burrill with the Massachusetts Forty-second was overpowered by the enemy. A prisoner describing the affair to the Times correspondent spoke in the highest terms of the conduct of the Forty-second Massachusetts. He says they were completely shut in at one end of the wharf, where there was no possibility of escape or manœuvring, and that they fought with the most desperate bravery, and were outnumbered at least ten to one. Several times they fairly drove back the rebel torrent that was rushing down upon them, and the enemy were at last compelled to take to clubs and the bayonet. How many of our gallant fellows were killed he does not say, but he knows that the wounded were taken prisoners to Havana, and that the rebels had twenty-five killed in the struggle.

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE illustrations on page 76 will give the reader some idea of the position of affairs at Charleston, South Carolina, and of fortifications and places of which some of the names are familiar to us in the course of a day or two. How our illustrations were obtained is a mystery which we do not at present propose to gratify rebel curiosity by revealing. Suffice it to say that, while the rebels have been very active in strengthening their works, our gallant officers have not been idle, and the Union navy still rides proudly find, when the tug of battle comes, that we know more of the nature and position of their defenses than they imagine.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

An opportunity that seldom occurs is now afforded those desiring a really handsome and serviceable time-piece at a low price. We are closing out a large importation of the Improved Sweep-Second Duplex.

In sterling Silver Cases, with English crown work, and superior adjusted movement, with "stop," to be used by engineers, artificers, &c., in marking time. Price, with guarantee, $25. For officers, engineers, and others, requiring a really handsome, elegant, and convenient watch, reliable find, when the tug of battle comes, that we know more of the nature and position of their defenses than they imagine.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

An opportunity that seldom occurs is now afforded those desiring a really handsome and serviceable time-piece at a low price. We are closing out a large importation of the Improved Sweep-Second Duplex.

In sterling Silver Cases, with English crown work, and superior adjusted movement, with "stop," to be used by engineers, artificers, &c., in marking time. Price, with guarantee, $25. For officers, engineers, and others, requiring a really handsome, elegant, and convenient watch, this fills a desideratum long felt. Will be sent by Express with $20 for Collection. Express charges to be paid on receipt of Order. Address

HOWARD EXPRESS COMPANY,
No. 59 Broadway, N. Y.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,
AN IMPORTANT MILITARY WORK.
ELEMENTS OF MILITARY ART AND HISTORY.
Embracing the Modern Practice of War, Grand Operative Arms, the Combination of the Arms, and the minor operations of War. By Lieut.-Col. Edward de la Barre Duparcq, Captain of Engineers, and Professor of the Military Art in the Imperial School of Staff, Paris. Translated by Gen. George W. Cullum, U.S.A., Chief of the Staff of Maj.-Gen. H. W. Halleck, U.S.A. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, with illustrations. Price $4. D. VAN NOSTRAND,
Publisher, No. 192 Broadway, N. Y.

Milligan's Patent Mess Kettle.

Weight 9½ pounds; price $6 00. Sold by Dealers in Military Goods throughout the country. Wholesale Depot, No. 4 Platt Street, New York.
Send for Circulars. MILLIGAN BROS.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MOUSTACHIOS? If so, procure them to grow lavishly in six weeks (upon the smoothest and tenderest skin) by using the Argo. Price $1 sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. GRAHAM & CO., No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Portable Printing Offices,

For the use of Merchants, Druggists, and others who wish to do their own Printing. Circular sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., on receipt of two 3 cent. stamps.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, N. Y.

Rheumatism—Who has it?

It has been confidently acknowledged by thousands who have used Alcock's Porous Plasters, that of all remedies are the only preventive and cure. Sold by all druggists, and by dealers everywhere. Price 25 cents each; or sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of $1 25. Secured by English and American Patents. Send for a circular. BETTAM & CO., 429 Broadway.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, and all Army and Navy Claims, promptly collected. Reliable information furnished, rules of claims adjusted upon the best principles, and accounts cashed. A pamphlet of Laws and Instructions sent gratis by enclosing a one-cent stamp to SOMES & BROWN, 3 Park Place, N. Y.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

"THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES."
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE-BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC., ETC.,

Worth $500,000,

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to cost, and not to be sold for more than one dollar, whether you send for one or more.

Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 208 Broadway, New York.

Fine Sleeve and Bosom Studs.

Sleeve and Bosom Studs made of the finest Pearl, brought to a high polish, of all colors, and engraved with Initial Letter, Old English, &c. Monograms to order. Free by mail on receipt of price. Sets, $1 50. Trade supplied.
JOHN F. PHELPS, 423 Broadway, N. Y.

"MOUSTACHES AND WHISKERS IN 42 DAYS." Hinkle's Fishing, and many other Great Secrets, all in the Book of Wonders. 8,000 sold. 24th Edition only 20c. 3 for $1. Mailed Free. Address
HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS
AND ARMS. Sayford's Patent. 516 Broadway, N. Y., Opposite St. Nicholas Hotel. Send for a Circular.

CATARRH!—Dr. Goodale's CATARRH REMEDY possesses to the very last at this terrible disease, and invariably relieves Nasal Catarrh in 10 to 20 minutes. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. Depot 612 Broadway.

Army Musical Boxes!
A BEAUTIFUL PARLOR ORNAMENT!
A Cheerful Companion for the Soldier!
Newly-arranged, and performing all the popular Airs of the day. Can not get out of order.
Size No. 1, per half dozen, assorted. . . . $30.
Size No. 2, per half dozen, assorted. . . . 42.
Size No. 3, per half dozen, assorted. . . . 54.
Samples, comprising 2 of each kind, assorted. 42.

To Sutlers and other Dealers:
When a dozen or more are ordered, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made. NOT SOLD TO QUANTITIES OF LESS THAN SIX. Will be sent by Express, with bill for collection. Express charges to be paid on receipt. Cannot re-mit one quarter of the bill as a guarantee that the goods will be paid for on the receipt of the Musical Box. Express Agent, sending a certificate of the same. These rules will not be departed from under any circumstances. Order explicitly.
SAMUEL F. SCHAFFER & CO.,
Corner Maiden Lane and Broadway, New York.

INVENTORS SHOULD PROCURE A Copy of "HOW TO OBTAIN A PATENT." Send a 3 cent stamp to FOWLER AND WELLS, New York.

SOMETHING NEW.
NATIONAL AMERICAN AMUSEMENT CARDS.
Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 52 varieties, with Portraits of Jeff. Davis, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Sent free on receipt of One Dollar. The usual discount to the trade. Address AMERICAN PUBLISHING AGENCY,
Box 4,000, Chambers Street Post Office, New York.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils, Oriental Burners, and other new articles. Sample circulars free. Address, SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

WEDDING CARDS
These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Old Established, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane St., N. Y.
Established 1840. Copy the number, 302 Broadway, two stamps.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!
All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Beaufort, and all Places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by Rail, via PHILADELPHIA EXPRESS. No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

LONDON LANCET for JANUARY is now ready. Contains the first eminent surgeon's lecture on the Health and Surgery of the American Armies. Publishing Office, H. DUPUY, 129 Nassau Street.
JAS. HERALD, Proprietor.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Potatoes, &c., to be seen—only 20 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate. 70 acre tracts of from $15 to $30 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good schools and society. Handbooks are sent free. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Send 6 cents for Pamphlet containing Map and all necessary information.

To the Nervous.
Dr. Adam Laurie's Life Pills,
The great Nervous Remedy, are for sale at the Sole Agency, No. 4 Union Square, New York.
Price One Dollar per box, with full directions.
All letters with enclosures must be addressed as above.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire many Agents at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machines. Address
S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

India-Rubber Gloves cure Chapped Hands, Salt Rheum, &c., and render them soft, smooth, and snowy white; are impervious to water either hot or cold, and are an excellent protection in all kinds of house-work. For sale by the trade generally. Sent by mail on receipt of price and 6 cents for postage.
Ladies' size 8½ or 9, pair; Gents' size, $1 00.
GOODYEAR'S I. R. GLOVE MFG CO.,
205 Broadway, N. Y.
Every description of Rubber Goods, Wholesale and Retail.

Meerschaum.

POLLAK & SON, manufacturers of Meerschaum Pipes and Fine Bronze Steel, near Bowery, New York, have always on hand a well-assorted stock of Meerschaum Pipes, Tubes, &c., at the lowest prices. They import the raw meerschaum from Smyrna, and manufacture to order. Pipes and out of town orders solicited, and they will be served to the best. Repairing neatly done.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For February, 1863.

CONTENTS:

A CALIFORNIAN IN ICELAND. SECOND PAPER. Illustrations.—The Capital of Iceland.—Church at Reykjavik.—Governor's Residence.—Iceland Women.—Islanders at Work.—Geir Zoega.—Icelandic Heroes.—English Party.—Among the Lava Stuff.—Icelandic Dog.—Geir Zoega and Brass.—Entrance to the Almannagja.—The Althing.—Interior of Church.—Old Islanders.—Outline View of Thingvalla.—Fall of the Almannagja.—Outline View of Thingvalla.—Church at Thingvalla.—The Pastor's House.—The Pastor of Thingvalla.—Thingvalla, the Lagberg, and Almannagja.—Skeleton View of the Lagberg.—Diagram of the Lagberg.

DOCTOR HAWLEY. PART I.

Illustrations.—The Doctor and his Daughter.—Uncle and Nephew.—Husband and Wife.—In full Costume.

ROMOLA. By the Author of "ADAM BEDE."
CHAPTER XXVII. The Sunday Walk.
CHAPTER XXVIII. The Painted Record.
CHAPTER XXIX. A Moment of Physical Anguish.
CHAPTER XXX. The Avenger's Secret.
CHAPTER XXXI. Felix Is Sent to Bed.
CHAPTER XXXII. A Revelation.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Walking.—Coming Home.—The Painted Record.

PHILIP AUVERNE'S SACRIFICE.
A TILT AT THE WOMAN'S QUESTION.
THOMAS HALLOPP'S REVELATIONS.
GENTLEMEN OF THE PRESS.
JUMPING JACK'S DAUGHTER.
THE HARDY METHOD.
UP TO THE HILLS.
THE SMALL HOURS AT ALLINGTON.
CHAPTER XIII. A Visit to Gosstwick.
CHAPTER XIV. The Lesson Taken a Walk.
CHAPTER XV. The last Day.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Soldiers.—"Why, it's young Eames!"

THE GUN-BOAT ESSEX.
THE POLICEMAN'S CHRISTMAS TRAMP.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
ILLUSTRATION.—On the Pond.
THE DEAD DRUMMER BOY. [Illustrated.
FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Lady and Child's Street Dress.—Negligée Robe.

TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for one Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $3 00 each. With a Club of 11 Copies for $30, HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, for $30.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $3 00 each, or 6 Copies for $15.

☞ The Publishers employ no Travelling Agents. Parties who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly will remit the money to the Publishers, or pay their subscription to some Postmaster or General Agent with whom they are acquainted, and all wholesome responsibility they are secured.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have just Published

NO NAME. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Queen of Hearts," &c. Illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $1 00.

MY DIARY NORTH AND SOUTH. By WILLIAM HOWARD RUSSELL, Author of "British Expedition," &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $1 00.

BARRINGTON. A Novel. By CHAS. LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Harold Fitzgerald," "The Martins of Cro' Martin," "The Dodd Family Abroad," "The Dodd Family Abroad," "One of Them," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

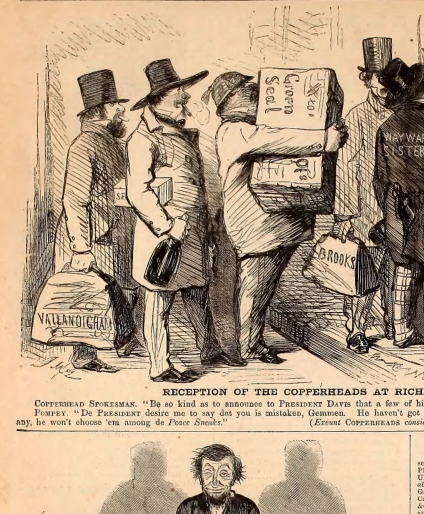
AURORA FLOYD. A Novel. By M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Lady Audley's Secret." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF FRANCE. A History of France from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Second Empire in 1852. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. Large Type. Uniform with "The Student's Hume," "The Student's Gibbon," "Student's Lingard," "Student's Hallam," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

MODERN WAR: Its Theory and Practice. Illustrated from Celebrated Campaigns and Battles. With Maps and Diagrams. By ERNEST SARAZIN, Captain U. S. A. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

SPRINGS OF ACTION. By Mrs. C. H. B. RICHARDS. 12mo, printed on Tinted Paper, Cloth, $1 00; Cloth, Gilt Edges, $1 25.

MEMOIRS OF MRS. JOANNA BETHUNE. By her Son, the Rev. GEO. W. BETHUNE, D.D. 12mo, Portrait, containing Extracts from the Writings of Mrs. Bethune, Cloth, $1 00.

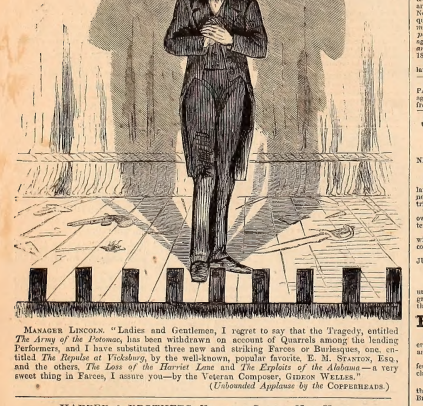


LINES LEFT OUT. By the Author of "Line upon Line," "Streaks of Light," "More about Jesus," "Rending Asunder Tears." With 25 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth gilt, 75 cents.

GENERAL BUTTERFIELD'S OUTPOST DUTY. Camp and Outpost Duty for Infantry. With Standing Orders, Extracts from Army Regulations, and Forms and Army Rules for Health, Maxims for Soldiers, and Duties of Officers. By DANIEL BUTTERFIELD, Major-Gen. Vols., U.S.A. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, 63 cents.

MISTRESS AND MAID. A HOUSEHOLD STORY. By DINAH MARIA MULOCK, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Olive," "The Ogilvies," "The Head of the Family," "Agatha's Husband," "A Life for a Life," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ORLEY FARM. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "North America," "Doctor Thorne," "Framley Parsonage," "The Bertrams," "Castle Richmond," "The West Indies and the Spanish Main," "The Three Clerks," &c., &c. Illustrated by J. E. MILLAIS. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 00.



☞ Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

RECEPTION OF THE COPPERHEADS AT RICHMOND.

COPPERHEAD SPOKESMAN. "Be so kind as to announce to PRESIDENT DAVIS that a few of his Northern Friends wish to see him."

POMPEY. "De PRESIDENT desire me to say dat you is mistaken, Gemmen. He haven't got no friends at de Norf; and when he wants any, he won't choose 'em among de Peace Smoke!" (Extract COPPERHEADS considerably shocked.)—(Vide DAVIS'S Message.)

MANAGER LINCOLN. "Ladies and Gentlemen, I regret to say that the Tragedy, entitled The Army of the Potomac, has been withdrawn on account of Quarrels among the leading Performers, and I have substituted three new and striking Farces or Burlesques, one, entitled The Repulse at Vicksburg, by the well-known, popular favorite, E. M. STANTON, ESQ., and the others, The Loss of the Harriet Lane and The Exploits of the Alabama—a very sweet thing in Farces, I assure you—by the Veteran Composer, GIDEON WELLES."
(Unbounded Applause by the COPPERHEADS.)

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

NO NAME.

A Novel.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF

"THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "QUEEN OF HEARTS," "ANTONINA," &c.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN MCLENAN.

8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 50.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON WORK, Wrought, Cast, and Wire. 259
IRON RAILINGS, VERANDAHS, BALCONIES, GUARDS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description. Illustrated Catalogue mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM, 259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to D. Adee, 381 Pearl St., N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

Lithography,
Engraving, and Printing, by LONG & COOPER, 117 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK. Transferring from Plate to Stone made equal to copper-plate printing at one half the cost. Country orders particularly attended to. Send for samples and prices.

Nervous Diseases and Physical Debility.—New and reliable remedy. Valuable Report sent free of charge, by Dr. J. SKILLIN HOUGHTON, No. 2 South Ninth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Agents. Soldiers

In camp or discharged, can make easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; containing All New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, (Ancestors of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp can act as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Fine Jewelry and Watches at low prices. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements.
S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

SOMETHING NEW FOR LADIES TO DO. WILL PAY SPLENDIDLY. Call on or address, enclosing Postage Stamp, Dr. E. B. FOOTE, 1130 Broadway, office hours from 1 to 5 P.M.

John Taylor & Sons,
Albany Brewers,
Have Removed to their
NEW WAREHOUSES, No. 334 GREENWICH STREET,
NOS. 33 and 35 JAY STREET,
AND 321 WASHINGTON STREET, NEW YORK.
Their brewing establishment at Albany is one of the largest in the country, in which are introduced all the new improvements in machinery in this and other countries.
Their Malting Houses, where they manufacture their own Malt, are all conducted under the personal superintendence of themselves.
They therefore feel confident in challenging comparison with any other brands of ale produced in this or any other country.
They guarantee their article to be made from the PURE JUICE of the

Barley Corn,

unadulterated by any WEST INDIA MALT, or other ingredients used to produce CHEAP Ale or Beer—which this country is flooded with.

For over Forty Years,

During which time this House has been in successful operation, it has been the chief aim of the Firm to produce an article of Ale equal to any Brewed in the World.
Their whole means and time have been expended in perfecting such improvement as would overcome the extreme changes of climate we are subjected to in this country.
THEY BEG LEAVE TO INFORM THE PUBLIC, that they feel the fullest confidence in recommending their Brands of ALBANY IMPERIAL CREAM XX ALES.

As equal in quality, purity, and excellence to any produced for Nachers, Southern, or the West India markets, to be had in New York, Albany, &c.
BREWERY No. 123 BROADWAY, COR. ARCH, ALBANY.
Depots 334 GREENWICH, cor. of JAY, NEW YORK.
" 117 COMMERCIAL, cor. of RICHMOND, BOSTON

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $21. $24 and $30 PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.
FRENCH FLANNEL ARMY SHIRTS, $24, $27, $30 and $33 per dozen.
S. W. H. WARD, from London, No. 387 Broadway

A REALLY VALUABLE MICROSCOPE, one that a child can use, sent by mail on receipt of 38 cents.
S. WOODWARD, P. O. Box 2373, Boston.

PHYSIOGNOMY, or Signs of Character, PHYSIOLOGY, and the Bodily Functions; PHRENOLOGY, or the Brain and Nervous System; PSYCHOLOGY, the Science of the Soul; ETHNOLOGY, or the Natural History of Man, with Instructions, in the Choice of Formula, Personal Improvement, etc., are some of the topics elucidated in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL AND LIFE ILLUSTRATED for 1863. No. 1 now ready. Only 21 a year. Address FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE,
MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 25c., COIN PREFERRED. Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 2373, Boston, Mass.

Buy your Skate Straps with the

Fogg's Lever Buckle,
Manufactured by F. STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK, }
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlement. Rich soil. Mild climate. See advertisement of Vineland, on previous page.

IMPORTANT TO AGENTS!!—We have reduced the wholesale prices of our GREAT STATIONERY PURPOSES PACKAGE. We also give better Watches to our Agents than any other firm. Send stamp for new circular. WEIR & CO., 34 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

GOLD PENS.
Retailed at wholesale prices. Goods warranted. Send for a circular, giving list of prices and engravings of Pens. Pens repointed on the receipt of 36 cents in P. O. Stamps.
E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office 15 Maiden Lane, New York City.

GREAT TRIUMPH.

STEINWAY & SONS, Nos. 82 and 84 Wicker Street, N. Y., were awarded a first prize medal at the late Great International Exhibition, London. There were two hundred and sixty-nine pianos from all parts of the world entered for competition.
The special correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway underscored by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

$5.—A BEAUTIFUL Engraved GOLD PLATED Watch, English Movement, perfect time-keeper. Sent to any address for $5. Fine Watches and Jewelry at low prices. CHAS. H. NORTON & CO., 49 Ann St., N. Y.

Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machines.
Highest Premium.
International Exhibition, London, 1862.
See the recent Improvements.
Office 505 Broadway, New York.

Confederate Money.
$20,000!—TWENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS in fac-simile Bank Notes of different denominations sent, prepaid, to any address, on receipt of $5, by B. C. UPHAM, 403 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Made of cast iron, in three sections. Packs with 6 ft. of pipe in the space of the lower section, 6x 10 inches. Will warm any tent in the service. Price, boxed complete, $5.
J. W. EVANS,
21 John St.,
New York.

The American Parlor or Floor Skate, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles.

Observe, each Skate is labeled with the trade mark.
Also, 10,000 pair of Ladies' and Gents' Ice Skates, comprising all the new and most improved patterns, made from refined steel and iron hoiloware; Skate Straps and Leather Goods of every description: Fogg's improved Lever Skate Buckle. Sole Agent for Holmes, Morse & Co.'s celebrated Skates,
FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK.
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

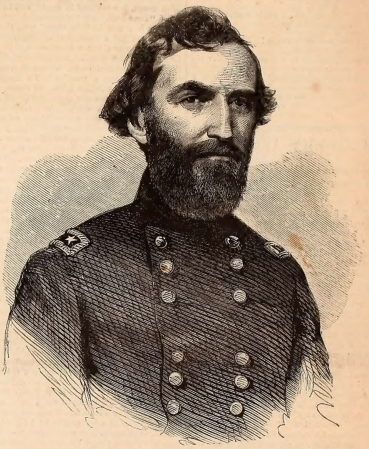
Lyon's Kathairon.
This delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is again put up by the original proprietor, and is now made with the same care, skill, and attention, which first created its immense and unprecedented sale of over one million bottles annually! It is still sold at 25 cents in large bottles. Two million bottles can easily be sold in a year when it is again known that the Kathairon is not only the most delightful hair dressing in the world, but that it cleanses the scalp of scurf and dandruff, gives the hair a lively, rich luxuriant growth, and prevents it from turning gray. These are considerations worth knowing. The Kathairon has been tested for over twelve years, and is warranted as described. Any lady who values a beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon. It is finely perfumed, cheap and valuable. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.
D. S. BARNES & CO.,
New York.

Send for Trade-List, revised Jan. 25, 1863.
PEERS & BANCHER,
WHOLESALE NEWS AGENTS, SUCCESSORS to J. F. PEERS & CO., 34 ANN STREET, New York. All orders for Books, Stationery, and Miscellaneous Articles promptly filled.

AGENTS WANTED for our Splendid New Mammoth Eureka Print Package. 200 per cent. profit. Send 25 Cents free to Agents. $10 per day made. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CATELY & CO., 40 Ann St., N.Y.

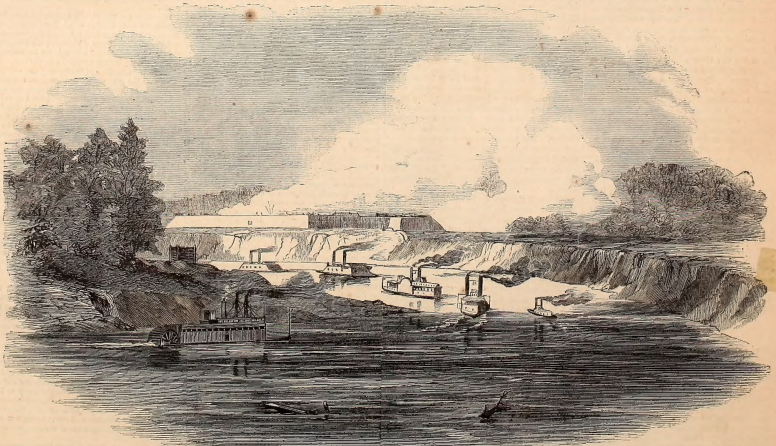
CONFEDERATE (REBEL) MONEY.
Fac-Simile Confederate Treasury Notes.
So nearly like the genuine that where one will pass current the other will go equally well. $500 in Confederate Notes sent, prepaid, to any address, on receipt of $5, by W. E. HILTON, 11 Spruce Street, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.



A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 319.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.



Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

REAR-ADMIRAL DAVID D. PORTER, COMMANDING MISSISSIPPI FLOTILLA.—[SEE PAGE 94.]

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN A. M'CLERNAND.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 94.]

BOMBARDMENT OF THE POST OF ARKANSAS, JANUARY 11, 1863.—SKETCHED ON THE SPOT.—[SEE PAGE 91.]

LINES TU JEFF DAVIS.

"Our trials have been converted into blessings."—JEFF DAVIS'S Message.

So you kaount your trials blessins? Why that's jest what we hev told you!
Every lickin gi'n a rebbel is a blessin in disguise.
Ye air not up as a sort ov mark for the wurld to behold yu,
And ponder the reward ov thoze who scorf et good advice.

When yu toss your starry banner from the flagstaff and the steeple,
And raised a pesky rebbel rag tu be a guide unto it,
Did yu think yu'd meet no warfare from the hands ov honest people?
Had yu put on the cloth ov yu, in short, unless yu change yure tune!

Yis, yure trials air a blessin! Yu was rite in that, Jeff Davis,
But 't strikes me as annaouncin it yu've bin amazin slow.—
See Freedom's soljers shout hurrar whereso a traitor grave is,
And yu'll find the North agreed with yu a long, long while ago!

CHARITY GRIMES.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1863.

WALL STREET.

THAT famous mystic spot, Wall Street, is going through one of those fevers which render it so terribly enchanting to persons of a speculative turn of mind. Stocks have risen enormously within a month, and fortunes have been made and lost as if by enchantment. Gold has advanced twenty per cent. in a few weeks or days, and the famous, long-bearded sojers-vladers in the commodity have swelled their leetle monials accordingly. Tis a period which occurs but once in a century—perhaps but once in a couple of centuries.

Alison tells us that when the Bank of England suspended specie payments at the close of the last century a speculation received a tremendous impetus. The business of the London Stock Exchange quadrupled in extent, and rendered it necessary for the members to secure additional accommodation. Fortunes were made by magic, and lands and stocks changed hands as universally as if the kingdom had passed through a revolution. The Norman swooping down on the fair fields of Kent and Devonshire, grasping whatever suited them best, and driving the Anglo-Saxon boors out to work or starve, did not cause more extensive mutations in the ownership of property. Creditors were cheated, debtors were relieved. Bankrupt corporations once more raised their head, and saw their stock at a premium. The battle raged fiercely, and, to superficial observers, with doubtful results; but in the end victory rested with the debtor class, and creditors went to the wall.

History does but repeat itself. What England experienced in 1797–1815 we are now going to attempt. There is this difference in our case. The Bank of England, under suspension, did not materially increase its paper issues. Our Bank—which is the United States Government—has already issued as much greenbacks there was afloat in the whole country in 1860, and is going to issue an indefinite number of hundreds of millions more.

We are witnessing the commencement of the new era. Gold has risen to 155. Stocks have risen 100 @ 200 per cent. The broker class has doubled in numbers. Instead of one board we have two, and each transacts far more business than was ever done in old times on the legitimate stock exchange. Speculators in stocks have increased in the ratio of the square of the brokers. If the latter have doubled, the former have quadrupled. In this era of newspapers, railroads, and electricity, intelligence is transmitted rapidly throughout the country: our stock exchange represents not this city alone but the whole country.

One of the largest operators of the day lives in Wisconsin, and operates by telegraph. We deem him to be a quiet, thoughtful man, who never reads any thing in the papers except the facts, and religiously declines to notice editorial comments and opinions. He is one of the few men of the present day who do their own thinking. He does not live in a city, and probably hears few opinions on current events. Hence his views are based on pure theory, and though the accomplishment of his predictions may be delayed, it arrives, sooner or later, with the unerring certainty of fate. He began business (in stocks) with a cargo of corn as his capital, he has already realized over a quarter of a million dollars. For, you see, he has this advantage over city operators—that he is not swayed by the temporary and deceptive currents of Wall Street, arrives at his conclusions on abiding principles of political economy, and steadily adheres to them until they are realized.

Very different has been the course of our smart friend Whiskerandos. His misfortune has been that he knew too much. He had private advices from Mr. Seward that the "coming rebellion" would collapse in a few weeks, and operated accordingly. He was confidentially told by General Halleck that a million bales of cotton would be liberated by New Year, 1863, and sold gold short at 133 in enormous amounts. He was, from private friendship, allowed to know that old Jeremiah—the leading director of the great Painted Post Railway—was going to sell his stock, and he hastened to improve the information by putting out short contracts in Painted Post stock. What is the consequence? Whiskerandos is a bankrupt. He placed his trust in Seward, in Halleck, in our pious old friend Jeremiah, and the consequence is that all the money he made by the large, and which led to his being so generally envied in Wall Street, has vanished in smoke, and he is left a "lame duck." O! si non novit!

There is a man in the street who, three months ago, had a horse, and horse, nothing more. Calumny alleges that the horse was spavined. One fellow limb that he was broken-winded likewise. Spavined or no, broken or sound winded, he proved a treasure to his master, who, desiring to purchase a hundred shares of Erie, put up the horse as margin, and deposited him at his broker's stable. The adventure proved profitable; was succeeded by others, equally successful. Margin after margin of means, ventures increased; and so, at last, the owner of the spavined horse found himself, for the first time in his life, in possession of $20,000. You see, he had no private sources of information, and no sympathies.

Nothing is more fatal in Wall Street than sympathies. Jones had a brother a Brigadier-General in the Army of the Potomac, and he consequently confident of victory because he wanted victory; operated on the confidence, and was so thoroughly used up after August, 1862, after the battles of the seven days—which were not such so brilliant things in victories as he expected—that he was glad to enter the office of Smith as book-keeper, at a salary of one half his former stamp. His father, his brothers, and his cousins were in the rebel army. He had a sister who was a rebel in New York, an aunt who was a rebel at Philadelphia, and a cousin who was a rebel at Baltimore. The uncle communicated, by rebel post, with a relative at Richmond—sent him letters, they were forwarded to Jonesville, and received intelligence in return—Smith paying the bills. This intelligence was quickly transmitted to the female rebel relative at Philadelphia, and by her to the rebel male rebel relative at New York, and so Smith had a monopoly, the possession whereof tempted him so to operate that in a few months he smashed to pieces. His sympathies and his private exclusive information always led him to expect that Stonewall Jackson would be in New York, or at least in Washington, by the 4th of March ensuing following; and, operating accordingly, he met his fate.

One remarkable fact about the late—or, perhaps, we should say the present—fever in Wall Street, is that the old experienced kings of that region have not profited by it. The patriarchs in Wall Street experience about the same fate in the deluge—have always seen a rise followed by a fall. When the December rise occurred, they said to each other confidentially—wagging their wise old heads—there will be a fall in January, and acted accordingly. January has passed, and prices are considerably higher than in December. They have not gone home any wiser and poorer; they had never set up any money-area before; and the fools—or, perhaps, we should say the new men who appreciated and realized the situation—have become mushroom millionaires.

How will this end? Echo answers—how? To make money by buying stocks and selling them at an advance corresponding to the depreciation of the currency is really not to make any money at all. Prices must eventually adjust themselves to the gold standard, and that "purchasing power" of $100 of paper-money with gold at par will ultimately prove the same as the purchasing power of $100 in gold at 150. The boy who thought he had made a sharp bargain by exchanging one $5 note for five $1 notes—his stock of paper having been quintupled—was not sillier than the Wall Street operators who fancy they are making money when they sell at 90 a stock they bought at 85, gold having, meantime, advanced ten per cent.

We must remember that the recent financial scheme of Congress will affect Wall Street. That measure was designed to check speculation in gold and stocks, and was calculated to produce that end by creating a temporary stringency in the money market. If it succeeds, not a few of the nouveaux riches will realize the poverty about riches having wings. If the ingenuity of Congress can evade the inexorable law of political economy which declares that issues of irredeemable paper must cause that paper to depreciate steadily, and prices to advance in a corresponding ratio, a triumph of no mean import will have been won.

THE LOUNGER.

RUSSELL'S DIARY.

THE Diary of Mr. Russell, "our own" correspondent of the London Times, which is just republished by the Harpers, is not a reprint of his letters written in this country, but literally his diary, his daily comments upon men, scenes, and affairs, as he moved rapidly through the country. His shrewd and observing eye, trained by many various experience, and a packydermatous organization, which is insensible to a special newspaper correspondent, because it enables him to hear and to repeat many things which a more sensitive nature could not, have given us a book full of value to the historian of the war. His Irish blood keeps him in the best humor possible under the circumstances. He sees fun himself, and although he is a product of the civilization of Ireland, he clearly despises the civilization of America; and although having seen the humanity and justice and national right of the British Government in India and the Crimea, he is profoundly convinced of the absurdity of the American Government's effort to maintain its supremacy over its own domain, yet his book is sure, although not so intended, to reveal the real character of the rebellion, and to so attract the sympathy of all friends of civilization and human liberty to the cause of the United States.

Mr. Russell was prepossessed in his first impressions of the country, and he never recovered from their influence. Upon his arrival in New York he fell into the hands of the persons who breakfasted him and dined him, who had wealth and a certain social position; some of whom were foreign born and others American "old families." In seeing these persons he had a right to suppose that he saw a fair representation of the general sentiment of substantial and respectable Americans in regard to the situation of their country. Had he come to London when the integrity of the British empire was threatened by a rebellion in Wales, which put forth no other manifest than that the right of hereditary freeboating was in danger of suppression by law, and he proceeded to society and civilization, and had been invited to breakfast and dine with the magnates of Lombard Street and Cheapside, he would naturally have been astounded to hear that the country was gone to the deuce—that Lombardy and Cheapside had not their money and their advocated their influence to the support of their party friends, who openly threatened to destroy the government if they lost the election. But it was not carried, and these friends began their war. In had not, when Mr. Russell arrived, yet come to actual battle. The heads of the Southern leaders and of their Northern friends was, as Mr. Hunter, Mr. Slidell, and Mr. Mason privately stated in Washington and publicly suggested by their organ in New York—that the revolution would be peaceably accomplished; that the Government could not possibly raise a force to subdue it, and that a new government would be constructed from the ruins which should secure a perpetual immunity for slavery. Even the New England colonies, and with her as a single State with two Senators. It was of the last importance that Europe should suppose that the Government was not united; that the revolution was already in fact, if not yet in form, accomplished. To that end rebel emissaries had already gained the British mind with fabulous; and the official representatives of the Government virtually renounced it, and proplesied the inevitable dissolution of the existing Union. To a point made was that the nature of the Federal bond, as it was called, did not allow the forcible coercion of a State. That theory and falsehood of the position were perceived by few Americans resident abroad, however patriotic; and the political arguments were left to the country, despite the able efforts of Mr. Motley in England and a few others. But that there might be found whatever remaining in foreign public opinion, it was essential that Mr. Russell, who was to speak to Europe through the London Times, should report that revolution was already virtually successful, and had the assent of the better population of the free States. To that end the conspiracy in which he hoped in this way to avoid two results—the appeal to force, in which case, as Mr. Barlow's letter to the Southern leaders plainly said, they knew, plainly shows, they were not so confident of the consent of the North to national ruin; and, secondly, the fact that such a policy would forever upset the real character of the Federal bond which they had so carefully misrepresented. These persons, therefore, took pains to impress Mr. Russell upon his arrival: reiterated the senseless doctrine of Mr. Buchanan's Message, that the Government had no right to save itself; and, says Mr. Russell, "although they admitted the Southern leaders had meditated 'the treason against the Union' years ago, they could not bring themselves to allow their old opponents, the Republicans, now in power, to dispose of the armed force of the Union against their brother Democrats in the Southern States."

These persons secured their point. Mr. Russell knows that the Union was virtually dissolved. Europe sneered "Told you so!" and arrayed herself more confidently and contemptuously than ever against this country. It is a result which the cunningest, even, in great part, to those who successfully labored to prove to a foreigner that their country had neither a decent perception of honor, nor manliness, nor common sense, nor knowledge of the nature of its own government. But certainly it is not surprising that those who worked with the Southern leaders, after their plans had succeeded during the canvass, should have both hoped and believed in the utter pusillanimity of their fellow-citizens. Nor is it wonderful that the same persons, whose idea of nationality was the support of an oligarchy, which then used them as tools, should now, under the plea of conservatism, counsel submission to that oligarchy in rebellion, which now spurns them as cowards.

The opening chapters of this book are thus full of humiliation and shame for every honorable and earnest American. Mr. Russell was compelled to accept the character and position of the person whose hands he fell as those of the Northern people. That there was a true-hearted, clear-headed, patriotic people in this country which would accept the war, endure all its necessary reverses in the beginning, lavish its blood and money, and wage the war until the aristocracy was crushed and the Constitution maintained and perpetuated in its original spirit—how could the bewildered Irishman suspect in the soft drawing-rooms where pretty ladies lisped disdain of the bowwild vulgar, wall-spitter, or in the profane drinking-saloons upon the very brink of a fearful civil war which must involve their lives and their fortunes, bankers and lawyers, "all men of position in New York society had the same dilettante tone, and were as little anxious for the future, or excited by the present, as a party of savans watching the movements of a magnetic storm." Taking them as the representatives of the American people, the correspondent of the Times justly inferred that the destruction of the Government was already accomplished, and that the great Republic was an ignominious and ferried failure.

From New York he moved southward to Washington, and pressed on to New Orleans. His description of the general condition of society in the States unhappily cursed by slavery agrees with that of every intelligent observer. He saw too many patriots and martyrs to regard the slave risings; he heard too many curfews to warn the slaves home; he heard too much of the "highest and most cultivated race in the world" to know the truth. His account of the extreme luxury of the life of the great planters, and the utter squalor, misery, and barbarism of the rest of the population, is not new, but it will help open the eyes of thoughtful Europeans to the necessary state of a society which rests upon the glorious "corner-stone" of slavery. The London Athenæum, in alluding to this part of the book, remarks: "Deep drinking, swearing, incessant duelling, and swaggering accusing ancient pedigrees, are the ordinary characteristics of the whole South." The growing disdain of England to romance about an the descendants of the old English cavaliers. * * * Of New Orleans," continues the Athenæum, which, by-the-way, seems to think us from the beginning, "Mr. Russell speaks in terms which lead us to believe that its present state is not unlike the iron-bound coast which must be an improvement on its former condition. * * * Well may Mr. Russell exclaim, 'Shame and horror to a Christian land!' Such is the special correspondent's picture of the South—such his description of the Southerners whom Mr. Spence, after manifold pains, was painting as refined and chivalric gentlemen, anxious to till their ancestral acres in pastoral simplicity and be at peace with all the world."

Of course the reader will understand that Mr. Russell cordially dislikes us all, North and South. He believes that the Union is hopelessly severed, and that the free States will be greatly the gainers by the dissolution. But it is for his observations of life, the social and political system, that his book is valuable. It is also very instructive. It reveals the true character of men and parties. It helps us to see who is and who is not national in this country; who had been and are Conservative. It shows the oligarchy at the South publically claiming the right to assist fighting for a foreign prince; and it exposes their allies at the North—with the affectations, but without the character of an aristocracy—also professing a fellow-democracy, and spurning the Irish "mob of the city," upon whose votes they rely for political power. The book shows very clearly, but quite unconsciously, that the war is truly a struggle of right against privilege—of free labor against slave labor—of men against men—of Liberty and the people against Slavery and an oligarchy.

THE NECESSITY OF SUCCESS.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—I have been pondering your last week's article upon 'Reaction.' I observe that you merely state facts, you do not express an opinion. Let me ask you, whether you doubt the issue? Do you think the reaction will prevail?"

Certainly not. For the war is controlled by dominant and pulsating chief of which is the character of the Saxon race. If that is modified by the large Celtic element, it is again reinforced by the German which, like the Saxon, is Teutonic. The tradition of that race is personal Liberty. It will have free tongues, free pens, and free hands, and it has submitted nothing else for ages. Thus in England, when Charles I., in 1638, began the invasion of those rights, the civil war began, and it lasted for sixty years, until, in 1688, the Bill of Rights settled the question and gave peace to England. Meanwhile there were the noblest and most stupid reactions; but the course of civilization could not be withstood, and every thing was uncertain until the guarantees of these rights were secured.

Now in our own war it is clear that, if the rebels will yield to reunion at all, it will be only upon condition of the amplest security for the slave system. It is equally clear that that system requires for its maintenance absolute silence. A free press, free discussion of the right and wrong, of the principle or the policy of slavery, is totally inconsistent with its existence. Free speech is to slavery what a spark is to gunpowder. Consequently the mouth, and, if possible, the mind must be muzzled in a society where the system prevails. The ready lynching, the mobbing, the hanging, and outlawing of anti-slavery men in the Southern States, is a logical necessity of the condition. The Southern Press, too, is a pretty palace over a vault of powder, and whoever scratches a match is a deadly enemy. If, then, we are to retain, it can only be upon condition that the discussion of this question shall be absolutely forbidden. But it is a question of personal Liberty—and its discussion, or the right of free speech, is the very fundamental right which is the security of peace in a political community of the Saxon race. You might as well hope to prevent the sun from rising as to deny the utmost freedom to the tongue of the free people of the free States of this Union. Nobody knows it better than Davis. He is perfectly honest in scorning Vallandigham's obsequious offers; for he is an older man and a wiser man than Vallandigham; and he is perfectly aware that, even if the attempt should be made to force a gag into the mouth of the people, the consequences would be annihilating to his cause.

Therefore faith in the national success is rooted inevitably in human nature. Human nature, however force or extent, are only ripples upon the surface of affairs. A necessity beyond its control urges the people of the Union to overcome at this month, indeed, not this year, necessarily, but none the less surely. Whatever means are essential to that end the people will surely accept. It is already as such fatigue of the stress of war, such mortification at apparent incompetency, such apprehension of enormous expense and possible permanency, should that for a time the basest demagogues, under a cry of peace and conciliation and conservatism, may influence and even lead some to certain acceptance. But it will constantly more plainly appear that what is called Conservatism by the most unprincipled men, is but a mask for a party purpose. The events as stated the meeting of the Pennsylvania and New York Legislatures will be understood by thousands who, from various reasons, were deluded into voting with men whose only hope of personal advantage lies in the common ruin. Those who voted for "Conservative" candidates did not mean to vote for anarchy; and they will learn that, as peace is first necessity of a truly conservative interest, whoever in war wishes for a speedy peace must use all warlike means to secure it or be destroyed.

A SIDE-LIGHT.

EVERY year there is published in Paris a work called "Annuaire des Deux Mondes," or a universal history of events for the past year. In the issue for the year 1861 the attentive reader will find an allusion to the visit of H. R. H. the French Minister, to Richmond. M. Mercier, it will be remembered, is not a friend of the United States Government, but is a particular friend of the chief rebels:

"The French Minister, M. Mercier, in a rapid visit to Richmond, had not concealed from Mr. Jefferson Davis that the evacuation of the town would inflict a most fatal blow on the cause of the South in the opinion of Europe, which would look upon such a measure as an avowal of impotence. The Confederate Government understood the necessity of saving its capital at any price; and while it gave up the defense of the coast, and called in all the troops which could be brought by rail to Richmond, and even part of Beauregard's forces, the Confederate army, stopping its retreat, began to dispute the ground foot by foot with M'Clellan."

Should this extraordinary statement—which is unfortunately the most probable—prove not to be true, it is not a pleasing revelation. It is not Louis Napoleon's fault that his Minister at Washington was a keen appreciator of things. He will certainly be the fault of our Government if a confidential adviser of the rebels is tolerated in an official position at the capital.

THE REBEL DISPATCHES.

THE intercepted correspondence of the rebel leaders with their commissioners in Europe, lately published, is very amusing, and shows a curious jumble.

First, that Louis Napoleon may have some design upon Mexico. But the French policy in regard to this continent is still merely subject of speculation.

Second, that the French policy in regard to this continent is directly opposed to that of the United States.

Third, the correspondence shows conclusively that the blockade is as effective as any blockade ever instituted. It takes the dispatches of the rebel agents seven or nine months to come to and from the rebel Secretary of State unlively mentions to one of his ministers that his No. 2 has arrived, and that his Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6 are in transitu. The postal arrangements of the new nation do not seem to be quite perfect.

Third, the correspondence reveals the fact that Earl Russell is cold to the "Honorable" Mr. Mason of Virginia—that is to the Senate of the United States pocketing the money of a Government against whose existence he was plotting. The Earl may be cold, indeed, that this "Honorable" Mr. Mason thought of withdrawing: but the confederates urge him to remain, and to continue to be useful in the hope of helping to lay the corner-stone of the new nation.

Fourth, the correspondence discloses the interesting fact that when the Confederate emissary left Madrid, he put his books and papers in charge of the agent of the Rothschilds, showing the position which the great bankers compel their agents in every country to hold in regard to the rebellion, and of course, indicating the kind of value which is to be placed upon any support given to treason by any such agents, whose birth, training, sympathies, and interests are entirely foreign.

Fifth, the correspondence informs us that Mr. James Spence, who has written a book in favor of the rebellion, which was for a long time the handbook of English information of American affairs, and who perpetually urges upon the British Government the recognition of the Confederacy, is a paid agent of the rebels.

Sixth, it shows that great efforts are making for the construction of a rebel fleet in English "neutral" ports.

There is also much highly-colored rhetoric from Mr. Benjamin about the success of the rebellion, and the sure overthrow of the Government, which is of equal value with the editorials in the rebel newspapers, all of which are supervised by trusty censors; and there is an extremely unpromising system of contraband correspondence by which Mr. Mennunger—a kind of painfully vague and operose promise to pay, as a basis for pecuniary loans. It is the latest effort to extract money from our customers.

Such a correspondence will not fail to make due impression upon the common-sense of the world. Read in the light of the acknowledged object of the rebellion, it can hardly give much comfort to the European friends of American slavery who are published with the addition of Mr. Davis's speech in the Southern Congress, in which he calls Mr. Lincoln a baboon, it would be a striking memorial of the veracity and dignity of the "gentlemanly" Government of the Confederacy.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE man who moved an amendment injured his spine by the operation.

Leaves that are lasts becoming to a warrior's brows—leaves of absence.

The child who cried for an hour didn't get it!

A great game in a small compass—cricket on the hearth.

EXQUISITE. "Ah, doctaw, does the cholewa aviaw the highaw ands?" asked an exquisite of a celebrated physician. "Why, sometimes," was the reply, "but it's generally death on foot, and you'd better leave the city immediately." "Do 'alkaw' dogs!

What would be the difference between "Uncle Ned" and Louis Napoleon, in the event of a French revolution?—the first had no hair on the top of his crown, the place where the hair is usually found; the latter has a crown of hair on the top of his hair, the place where the crown ought to be.

"Who goes there?" said an Irish sentry of the British Legion at St. Sebastian. "A friend," was the reply. "Then stand there, my friend, while I throw you're rifle five mat with in this murtherin' country."

It is a pleasant old custom in Holland for young men, having erected a bridge with a single arch, to send out from them in the shape of a kiss. Why are the girls not the same?

The order of the poor never enter into the sars of the covetous man; or, if they do, he has always one ear deafer to them than the other, in order to take them in.

What is the difference between a pretty impudent man and an easy bed?—One is lazed up, the other soft ones.

Debts are troublesome, but, as a general rule, they don't give half as much trouble to debtors as to creditors.

HOW TO MAKE AN AFFLE TART.—Soak it in vinegar.

WANTED TO KNOW.—If a god view is to be had from the top of a mountain? If the man who did not know what to do ever got a job?

A pill of milk often drinks as much water as a cow.

RIGHT HONESTY.—Patrick O'Brien was one day strolling with a friend through a grave-yard, when his eye was attracted by a splendid white marble tomb-stone of peculiarly elegant and costly workmanship. "Hi ran that!

"Bought it, sir, as you see, at a sacrifice dear!
I ran as fast, but sleeping here."

"Well," said O'Brien, "if I was dead, I would be honest enough to own it."

SIR THOMAS FITZGERALD was famous for forgiving, and had at most periods of parliamentary existence in the United Kingdom, which he called "Ancient Erin." He and his wife were always on the best terms. The latter was also boasted frequently of their bravery, and that no other troops were so fierce in the battle as the Irish. "I wonder," said one of his friends; "thanks to your fogging, they were unbeaten under their backs."

WITTY REPROOF.—A story is told of the revenge taken by a Nantucket ship-master upon the United States Consul who was very ready to be found in his office, although upon the wharves he was rarely to be seen. A vessel of the skipper's captain, after trying to find the consul several times unsuccessfully, entered the office and found him at his official's sign, so that it read, "You to one he is not in."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Wednesday, January 21, in the Senate, the credentials of Hon. Lyman Trumbull, elected Senator for a full term upon the death of the late John R. Thomson, were presented. Mr. Wall was qualified and took his seat. The credentials of Charles Sumner, re-elected from Massachusetts for six years from the fourth of March next, were also presented. The bill reorganizing the Court of Claims was taken up, and a long discussion ensued upon the question of the delay in the payment of the soldiers. Finally the provision for two additional Judges of the Court was struck out, some other amendments were agreed to, and the bill was then passed. The Senate then took up the bill to provide over, that Constellate Vanderbilt, Commodore Van Brunt, and Charles H. Haswell, with the rank of Commodore in the Banks expedition, are guilty of negligence in the discharge of their duties, and that the sentence of suspension entered by F. J. Boutwell was an express violation of the agreements made by him and Secretary Welles, and refused to the Government. The Senate then adjourned. In the House, Mr. Stevens, from the Committee of Ways and Means, offering Clement Vandever, of Iowa, not entitled to his seat, owing to his having accepted a commission subsequently reconsidered, and, after a long discussion, the subject was laid aside till the 3d of March next. The House concurred in the Senate's amendments to the West Point Academy appropriation bill. The remainder of the session was devoted to general debate on national topics.

On Thursday, 22d, in the Senate, the credentials of Hon. David Turpie, elected Senator from Indiana, were presented. Mr. Hollman from the Committee of Claims to Commodore Renshaw and Commander Wainwright reported, with a recommendation that the thanks of Congress for seven years unless sooner discharged. It also proposed the creation of a corps of examining surgeons to consist of three to select from. Without taking action on the subject the House adjourned.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

On 20th January Major-General Burnside turned over the command of the Army of the Potomac to Major-General Joe Hooker, who came to the head-quarters of the camp for that purpose. As soon as the change became known throughout the army's considerable number of the regular officers called on General Burnside and took their parting leave of him with many regrets.

It is understood that Major-General Sumner and Major-General Franklin have also been relieved of their commands—the first at his own request, and the second at that of the Potomac; but the names of their successors have not yet been divulged.

BURNSIDE'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The following is the address of General Burnside to the army:

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
CAMP WHITE OAK CHURCH, January 25, 1863.

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 9.

By direction of the President of the United States, the Commanding Officer of the Army of the Potomac is relieved from that command. Major-General Joseph Hooker,

The short time that he has held these two movements has not been fruitful of victory nor any considerable advancement of our lines, but has again developed the old material of courage, patience, and endurance that, under many favorable circumstances, would have accomplished the most results.

Continue to exercise these virtues, be true in your devotion to your country and the principles you have sworn to support, and you will receive and obtain victory. I have long been identified with your organization, and who it has been my pride to command, I shall need neither support nor co-operation, and you will deserve success.

Your General, in taking an affectionate leave of the army, from which he separates with so much regret, may have something of his last command to say to you. He entered associations of the Ninth corps. His prayers are that God may be with you and grant you success in the great result the rebellion is crushed. By command of

MAJOR-GENERAL AMBROSE E. BURNSIDE.

LEWIS RICHMOND, Acting Adjutant-General.

HOOKER'S ADDRESS TO THE ARMY.

The following is the address of General Hooker to the army:

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 1.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
CAMP WHITE OAK CHURCH, VA., January 26, 1863.

By direction of the President of the United States, the undersigned assumes command of the Army of the Potomac.

He enters upon the discharge of the duties imposed by the trust with a just appreciation of their responsibility.

Since the formation of this army he has been identified with its history. He has fully participated in its reverses and its reverses, with no other desire than that these relations might be reversed, and success might be permitted to be accomplished.

In the event of your achievements there is much to be proud of, and with the blessing of God we will constitute something for the future of which the nation is worthy of success.

To secure them each your commander will require the cheerful and zealous co-operation of every officer and soldier in this army.

In equipment, intelligence, and valor the enemy is our inferior. Let us show ourselves his superior in the endeavor we can find him.

The undersigned only gives expression to the feelings of this army when he conveys to our late commander, Major-General Burnside, the most cordial good wishes for his future.

My staff will be announced as soon as organized.

JOSEPH HOOKER,
Major-General, commanding the Army of the Potomac.

ROBE VICTORIES IN ARKANSAS.

The Union expedition on the White River has met with additional success. Colonel Clayton, of Powell Clayton's regiment, on the 20th inst. he had taken the three rebel boats, one loaded with cotton. The St. Louis Re says: "The light draughts are over three hundred miles above the mouth of the White River. The rebels, under General Commander Walker, captured at David's Bluffers block ade, and destroyed a considerable amount of valuable field stiffer, and three platform cars, and at Des Are we captured thirty-nine prisoners and a quantity of arms and ammunition."

REBEL PRISONERS CAPTURED.

Among the prisoners taken at Arkansas Post were one general, ten colonels, ten lieutenant-colonels, ten majors, one hundred and eighty captains, two hundred lieutenants, and a lot of adjutants, quartermasters, surgeons, and chaplains. Jeff Davis will probably have a hard time in exchanging, instead of putting in force the threats contained in his proclamation.

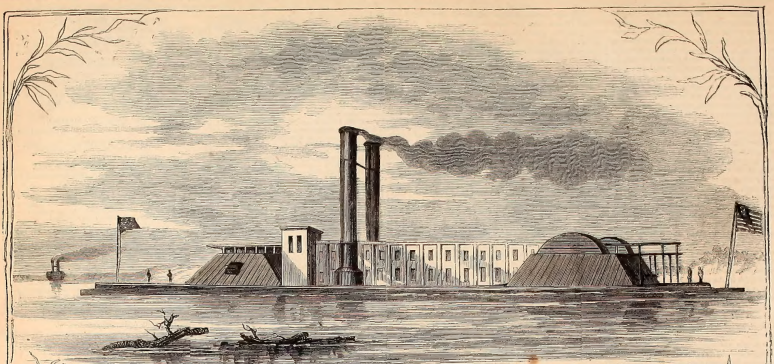
ORGANIZATION OF THE NEW YORK ASSEMBLY.

In the Assembly the long, angry, and tempestuous struggle for the Speakership was at last ended, and the session could commence, brought to a termination. On assembling a majority of the Democratic members nominated Mr. Fenton Speaker and a Clerk together, by nine votes; but after the Republicans had refused to proceed to organize and after the House proceeded to ballot for a Speaker, when Mr. Fenton, the nominee of the Republicans, received fifty-three votes, and Mr. Trimmer, Democrat, 50. Mr. Callicot was therefore declared by the Democratic majority the presiding Assembly. This was the ninety-third balloting in a session of three months and a half, and the first three weeks. Mr. Callicot was conducted to the chair, and made an address, thanking the members for the honor conferred.

POLITICAL COMPLICATIONS.

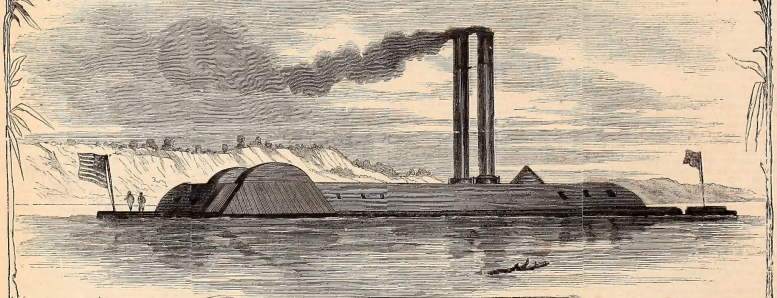
A rebel steamer, supposed to be the Alabama, the Oreto and the Florida of Earl Russell—which three it is hardly to be possible States gun-boat soliloquy in conversation with the United States gun-boat Hatteras, which attempted to run the blockade off Galveston, Texas, on the 11th—Brooklyn and Sciota, upon hearing the firing, went to the Hatteras's assistance, and the rebel ran on shore in a heavy sea, and the Hatteras was sunk in nine fathoms of water. The rebel commander found himself to be the British war steamer Jaguar, and while being boarded by the Hatteras proved a tremendous fire into her, which the fatal results above recorded.

THE CAPTURE OF "ORETO."



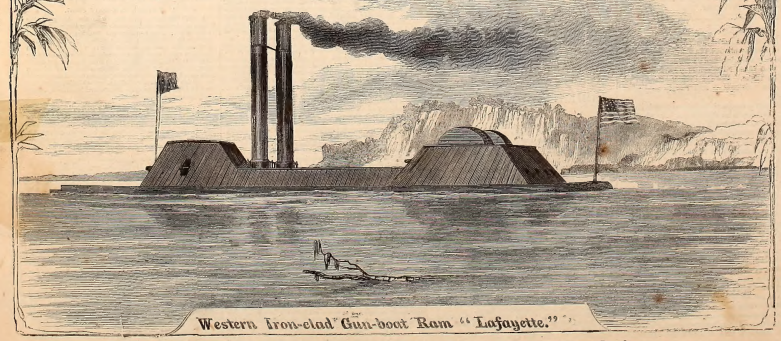
We learn of the escape of the rebel steamer Oreto from Mobile, notwithstanding the vigilance of the blockaders. She is supposed to have received a large number of a thousand bales of cotton on board, and having encountered and sunk a Boston brig, named Unknown, on the way.

FOREIGN NEWS.



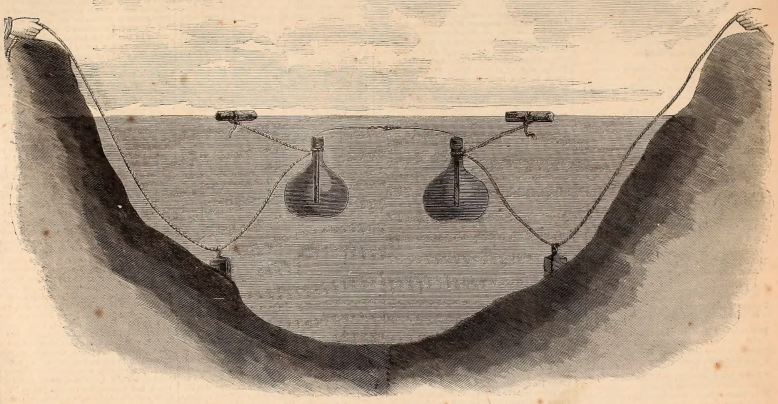
FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR'S SPEECH.



In the course of his speech to the Legislature the Emperor said that the foreign questions, the settlement of which estimates have been considerably diminished. The finding which had been anticipated, and the improvement in the conversion of the rentes a great step has been taken in the direction of reducing the public debt. The state of the direct revenues show a continual increase, from the simple fact that the taxes increase in proportion as the consumption of the empire would be flourishing if the war in America did not cause a crisis in the cotton trade and several of our industry. The forced stagnation of labor has caused in many districts an excess of destitution which deserves all our solicitude, and a grant will be asked from you for the support of those who with exemption submit to the effect of a misfortune which it is not in our power to put a stop to. Nevertheless, I have made the greatest to send beyond the Atlantic serious inquiry if by a sincere sympathy; but I have not succeeded in obtaining any thought to which I can as yet to act in concert with me; I have been old got to the end of the difficulties which have arisen from the blockade, the object of which was to stop the efforts of blood, and the consequences of which affect the future of which can not be looked upon with indifference."

Western Gun-boat Ram "Indianola."



Western Iron-clad Gun-boat Ram "Choctaw."

Western Iron-clad Gun-boat Ram "Lafayette."

OUR NEW WESTERN GUN-BOATS.—[FROM SKETCHES BY AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.—SEE NEXT PAGE.]

TORPEDO IN THE WESTERN RIVERS.—SKETCHED BY A NAVAL OFFICER.—[SEE PAGE 95.]

THE NEW WESTERN GUN-BOATS.

We publish on page 84 portraits of three of the NEW WESTERN GUN-BOATS, which will shortly be heard from. They will form part of Commodore Porter's flotilla. The following descriptions will explain the pictures:

"INDIANOLA."

The Indianola, Lieutenant Commander George Brown, is a vessel of the following dimensions: Length, 170 feet; beam, 60 feet; depth of hold, 7 feet; and will draw when ready for action about six feet of water. She is propelled by four independent engines, two attached to the wheels and two to the propellers. She has four high-pressure boilers, and, with this great steaming power, it is expected that she will run against the current about thirteen miles per hour. She is covered with two-inch rolled plates. She has one stationary turret with sloping sides. She carries two 11-inch Dahlgren guns in the turret, and several 24-pounder guns in broadside. She has also a powerful ram; and with her great power she will no doubt prove a very destructive boat among the rebel craft.

"CHOCTAW."

The Choctaw is another vessel of the ram class, with a turret on the bow, and a few broadside guns at the stern of the vessel. She is more extensively mailed than the Indianola, but in other respects she is not far from being identical with her.

"LAFAYETTE" OR "FORT HENRY."

The Fort Henry is a ram vessel without a turret, having instead a heavy casemate forward, in which are six 11-inch guns. She has great power and speed. She was built from plans furnished by Commodore W. D. Porter, United States Navy, and was known as the Fort Henry.

STOCKADE ON THE LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE RAILROAD.

On this page we reproduce a sketch sent us by our special artist in Tennessee, Mr. Frank Beard, representing one of the numerous STOCKADES erected on the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad for the protection of the track. Every bridge of consequence is guarded by one of these stockades, and most of the stations likewise. Garrisoned by a few disciplined troops, these stockades can resist the attack of a very large force indeed. What a picture of grim war these stockades conjure up!

STOCKADE ON THE LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE RAILROAD.—[SKETCHED BY MR. FRANK BEARD.]

AT FREDERICKSBURG.

It was just before the last fierce charge,
  When two soldiers drew their rein,
For a parting word and a touch of hands-
  They might never meet again.

One had blue eyes and clustering curls—
  Nineteen but a month ago—
Down on his chin, red on his cheek:
  He was only a boy, you know.

The other was dark, and stern, and proud;
  If his faith in the world was dim,
He only trusted the more in those
  Who were all the world to him.

They had ridden together in many a raid,
  They had marched for many a mile,
And ever till now they had met the foe
  With a calm and hopeful smile.

But now they looked in each other's eyes
  With an awful ghastly gloom,
And the tall dark man was the first to speak:
  "Charlie, my hour has come.

"We shall ride together up the hill,
  And you will ride back alone;
Promise a little trouble to take
  For me when I am gone.

"You will find a face upon my breast—
  I shall wear it into the fight—
With soft blue eyes, and sunny curls,
  And a smile like morning light.

"Like morning light was her love to me;
  It gladdened a lonely life,
And little I cared for the frowns of fate
  When she promised to be my wife.

"Write to her, Charlie, when I am gone,
  And send back the fair, fond face;
Tell her tenderly how I died,
  And where is my resting-place.

"Tell her my soul will wait for hers,
  In the border-land between
The earth and heaven, until she comes:
  It will not be long, I ween."

Tears dimmed the blue eyes of the boy—
  His voice was low with pain:
"I will do your bidding, comrade mine,
  If I ride back again.

"But if you come back, and I am dead,
  You must do as much for me:
My mother at home must hear the news—
  Oh, write to her tenderly.

"One after another those she loved
  She has buried, husband and son;
I was the last. When my country called,
  She kissed me and sent me on.

"She has prayed at home, like a waiting saint,
  With her fond face white with woe:
Her heart will be broken when I am gone:
  I shall see her soon, I know."

Just then the order came to charge—
  For an instant hand touched hand,
Eye answered eye; then on they rushed,
  That brave, devoted band.

Straight they went toward the crest of the hill,
  And the rebels with shot and shell
Plowed rifts of death through their toiling ranks,
  And jeered them as they fell.

They turned with a horrible dying yell
  From the heights they could not gain,
And the few whom death and doom had spared
  Went slowly back again.

But among the dead whom they left behind
  Was the boy with his curling hair,
And the stern dark man who marched by his side
  Lay dead beside him there.

There is no one to write to the blue-eyed girl
  The words that her lover said;
And the mother who waits for her boy at home
  Will but hear that he is dead,

And never can know the last fond thought
  That sought to soften her pain,
Until she crosses the River of Death,
  And stands by his side again.

L. C. M.

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK.

By the Author of "Mary Barton," etc.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER V.

A few days afterward Ellinor's father bethought himself that some further communication ought to take place between himself and his daughter's lover on the subject of the approval of the family of the latter to the young man's engagement, and he accordingly wrote a very gentlemanly letter, saying that of course he trusted that Ralph had informed his own father of his engagement; that Mr. Corbet was well known to Mr. Wilkins by reputation, holding the position he did in Shropshire, but that as Mr. Wilkins did not pretend to be in the same station of life, Mr. Corbet might possibly never even have heard of his name, although in his own county it was well known as having been for generations that of the principal conveyancer and land-agent of ——shire; that his wife had been a member of the old knightly family of Holsters, and that he himself was descended from a younger branch of the South Wales De Wintons or Wilkins; that Ellinor, as his only child, would naturally inherit all his property, but that in the mean time, of course, some settlement upon her would be made, the nature of which might be decided nearer the time of the marriage.

It was a very good straightforward letter, and well fitted for the purpose to which Mr. Wilkins knew it would be applied—of being forwarded to Mr. Ralph Corbet's father. One would have thought that it was not an engagement so disproportioned in equality of station as to cause any great opposition on that score; but, unluckily, Captain Corbet, the heir and eldest son, had just formed a similar engagement with Lady Maria Brabant, the daughter of one of the proudest earls in ——shire, one who had always resented Mr. Wilkins's appearance on the field as an insult to the county, and ignored his presence at every dinner-table where they met. Lady Maria was staying at the Corbets at the very time when Ralph's letter, inclosing Mr. Wilkins's, reached the paternal halls, and she merely repeated her father's opinions when Mrs. Corbet and her daughters naturally questioned her as to who these Wilkinses were; they remembered the name in Ralph's letters formerly; the father was some friend of Mr. Ness's, the clergyman with whom Ralph had read; they believed Ralph used to dine with these Wilkinses sometimes along with Mr. Ness.

Lady Maria was a good-natured girl, and meant no harm in repeating her father's words, touched up, it is true, by some of the dislike she herself felt to the intimate alliance proposed, which would make her sister-in-law to the daughter of an "upstart attorney," "not received in the county," "always trying to push his way into the set above him," "claiming connection with the De Wintons of —— Castle, who, as she well knew, only laughed when he was spoken of, and said they were more rich in relations than they were aware of"—"not people papa would ever like her to know, whatever might be the family connection."

These little speeches told in a way the girl who uttered them did not intend they should. Mrs. Corbet and her daughters set themselves violently against this foolish entanglement of Ralph's; they would not call it an engagement. They argued, and they urged, and they pleaded, till the squire, anxious for peace at any price, and always more under the sway of the people who were with him, however unreasonable they might be, rather than of the absent, even though the latter had the wisdom of Solomon or the prudence and sagacity of his son Ralph, wrote an angry letter, saying that, as Ralph was of age, of course he had a right to please himself, therefore all his father could say was that the engagement was not at all what either he or Ralph's mother had expected or hoped; that it was a degradation to the family just going to ally themselves with a peer of James the First's creation; that, of course, Ralph must do what he liked, but that if he married this girl he must never expect to have her received by the Corbets of Corbet Hall as a daughter. The squire was rather satisfied with his production, and took it to show it to his wife; but she did not think it was strong enough, and added a little postscript:

"Dear Ralph,—Though, as second son, you are entitled to Bromley at my death, yet I can do much to make the estate worthless. Hitherto regard for you has prevented my taking steps as to sale of timber, etc., which would materially increase your sister's portions; this just measure I shall infallibly take if I find you persevere in keeping to this silly engagement. Your father's disapproval is always a sufficient reason to allege."

Ralph was annoyed at the receipt of these letters, though he only smiled as he locked them up in his desk.

"Dear old father! how he blusters! As to my mother, she is reasonable when I talk to her. Once give her a definite idea of what Ellinor's fortune will be, and let her, if she chooses, cut down her timber—a threat she has held over me ever since I knew what a rocking-horse was, and which I have known to be illegal these ten years past—and she'll come round. I know better than they do how Reginald has run up post-obits, and as for that vulgar high-born Lady Maria they are all so full of, why she is a Flanders mare to my Ellinor, and has not a silver penny to cross herself with, besides! I bide my time, you dear good people!"

He did not think it necessary to reply to these letters immediately, nor did he even allude to their contents in his to Ellinor. Mr. Wilkins, who had been very well satisfied with his own letter to the young man, and had thought that it must be equally agreeable to every one, was not at all suspicious of any disapproval because the fact of a distinct sanction on the part of Mr. Ralph Corbet's friends to his engagement was not communicated to him.

As for Ellinor, she trembled all over with happiness. Such a summer for the blossoming of flowers and ripening of fruit had not been known for years: it seemed to her as if bountiful loving Nature wanted to fill the cup of Ellinor's joy to overflowing, and as if every thing, animate and inanimate, sympathized with her happiness. Her father was well, and apparently content. Miss Monro was very kind. Dixon's lameness was quite gone off. Only Mr. Dunster came creeping about the house, on pretense of business, seeking out her father, and disturbing all his leisure with his dust-colored parchment-skinned careworn face, and seeming to disturb the smooth current of her daily life whenever she saw him.

Ellinor made her appearance at the Hamley assemblies, but with less éclat than either her father or her lover expected. Her beauty and natural grace were admired by those who could discriminate; but to the greater number there was (what they called) "a want of style"—want of elegance there certainly was not, for her figure was perfect, and though she moved shyly, she moved well. Perhaps it was not a good place for a correct appreciation of Miss Wilkins; some of the old dowagers thought it a piece of presumption for her to be there at all; but the Lady Holster of the day (who remembered her husband's quarrel with Mr. Wilkins, and looked away whenever Ellinor came near) resented this opinion. "Miss Wilkins is descended from Sir Frank's family, one of the oldest in the county; the objection might have been made years ago to the father, but as he had been received she did not know why Miss Wilkins was to be alluded to as out of her place." Ellinor's greatest enjoyment in the evening was to hear her father say, after all was over, and they were driving home,

"Well, I thought my Nelly the prettiest girl there; and I think I know some other people who would have thought the same if they could have spoken out."

"Thank you, papa," said Ellinor, squeezing his hand, which she held. She thought he alluded to the absent Ralph as the person who would have agreed with him had he had the opportunity of seeing her; but no, he seldom thought much of the absent, but had been rather flattered by seeing Lord Hildebrand take up his glass for the apparent purpose of watching Ellinor.

"Your pearls, too, were as handsome as any in the room, child; but we must have them reset; the sprays are old-fashioned now. Let me have them to-morrow to send up to Hancock."

"Papa, please, I had rather keep them as they are—as mamma wore them."

He was touched in a minute.

"Very well, darling. God bless you for thinking of it."

But he ordered her a set of sapphires instead, for the next assembly.

These balls were not such as to intoxicate Ellinor with success, and make her in love with gayety. Large parties came from the different country-houses in the neighborhood and danced with each other. When they had exhausted the resources they brought with them they had generally a few dances to spare for the friends of the same standing with whom they were the most intimate. Ellinor, coming with her father, and joining an old card-playing dowager by way of a chaperon—the said dowager being under old business obligations to the firm of Wilkins and Son, and apologizing to all her acquaintances for her own weak condescension to Mr. Wilkins's foible in wishing to introduce his daughter into society above her natural sphere. It was upon this lady, after she had uttered some such speech as this I have just mentioned, that Lady Holster had come down with the pedigree of Ellinor's mother. But though the old dowager had drawn back, a little discomfited at my lady's reply, she was not more attentive to Ellinor in consequence. She allowed Mr. Wilkins to bring in his daughter and place her on the crimson sofa beside her; spoke to her occasionally in the interval that elapsed before the rubbers could be properly arranged in the card-room; invited the girl to accompany her to that sober amusement, and on Ellinor's declining, and preferring to remain with her father, the dowager left her with a sweet smile on her plump countenance, and an approving conscience somewhere within her portly frame, assuring her that she had done all that could possibly have been expected from her toward "that good Wilkins's daughter." Ellinor stood by her father watching the dances, and thankful for the occasional chance of a dance. While she had been sitting by her chaperon Mr. Wilkins had made the tour of the room, dropping out the little fact of his daughter's being present wherever he thought the seed likely to bring forth the fruit of partners. And some came because they liked Mr. Wilkins, and some asked Ellinor because they had done their duty dances to their own party, and might please themselves. So that Miss Wilkins usually had an average of one invitation to every three dances, and this principally toward the end of the evening.

But considering her real beauty, and the care which her father always took about her appearance, she met with far less than her due of admiration. Admiration she did not care for; partners she did; and sometimes felt mortified when she had to sit or stand quiet during all the first part of the evening. If it had not been for her father's wishes she would much rather have staid at home; but, nevertheless, she talked even to the irresponsive old dowager, and fairly chattered to her father when she got to him, because she did not like him to fancy that she was not enjoying herself.

And, indeed, she had so much happiness in the daily course of this part of her life, that, on looking back on it afterward, she could not imagine any thing brighter than it had been. The delight of receiving her lover's letters—the anxious happiness of replying to them (always a little bit fearful lest she should not express herself and her love in the precisely happy medium becoming a maiden)—the father's love and satisfaction in her—the calm prosperity of the whole household was delightful at the time, and, looking back upon it, it was dream-like.

Occasionally Mr. Corbet came down to see her. He always slept on these occasions at Mr. Ness's; but he was at Ford Bank the greater part of the one day between two nights that he allowed himself for the length of his visits. And even these short peeps were not frequently taken. He was working hard at law; fagging at it tooth and nail; arranging his whole life so as best to promote the ends of his ambition; feeling a delight in surpassing and mastering his fellows—those who started in the race at the same time. He read Ellinor's letters over and over again; nothing else besides law-books. He perceived the repressed love hidden away in subdued expressions in his mistress's communications, with an amused pleasure at the attempt at concealment. He was glad that her gayeties were not more gay; he was glad that she was not too much admired, although a little indignant at the want of taste on the part of the ——shire gentlemen. But if other admirers had come prominently forward he should have had to take some more decided steps to assert his rights than he had hitherto done; for he had caused Ellinor to express a wish to her father that her engagement might not be too much talked about until nearer the time when it would be prudent for him to marry her. He thought that the knowledge of this, the only imprudently hasty step he ever meant to take in his life, might go against his character for wisdom if the fact was known while he was as yet only a student. Mr. Wilkins wondered a little; but acceded, as he always did, to any of Ellinor's requests. Mr. Ness was a confidant, of course; and some of Lady Maria's connections heard of it, and forgot it again very soon, and, as it happened, no one else was sufficiently interested in Ellinor to care to ascertain the fact.

All this time Mr. Ralph Corbet maintained a very quietly decided attitude toward his own family. He was engaged to Miss Wilkins, and all he could say was that he was sorry that they disapproved of it. He was not able to marry just at present, and before the time for his marriage arrived he trusted that his own family would take a more reasonable view of things, and be willing to receive her as his wife with all becoming respect or affection. This was the substance of what he repeated in different forms in reply to his father's angry letters. At length his invariable determination made way with his father; the paternal thunderings were subdued to a distant rumbling in the sky; and presently the inquiry was broached as to how much fortune Miss Wilkins would have; how much down on her marriage; what were the eventual probabilities. Now this was a point on which Mr. Ralph Corbet wished himself to be informed upon. He had not thought much about it in making the engagement; he had been too young, or too much in love. But an only child of a wealthy attorney ought to have something considerable; and an allowance, so as to enable the young couple to start housekeeping in a moderately good part of town, would be an advantage to him in his profession. So he replied to his father, adroitly suggesting that a letter containing certain modifications of the inquiry, which had been rather roughly put in Mr. Corbet's last, should be sent to him, in order that he might himself ascertain from Mr. Wilkins what were Ellinor's prospects as regarded fortune.

The desired letter came, but not in such a form that he could pass it on to Mr. Wilkins; he preferred to make quotations, and even these quotations were a little altered and dressed before he sent them on. The gist of his letter to Mr. Wilkins was this: He stated that he hoped soon to be in a position to offer Ellinor a home; that he anticipated a steady progress in his profession, and consequently in his income; but that contingencies might arise, as his father suggested, which would deprive him of the power of earning a livelihood, perhaps when it might be more required than it would be at first; that it was true that, after his mother's death, a small estate in Shropshire would come to him as second son, and of course Ellinor would receive the benefit of this property, secured to her legally as Mr. Wilkins thought best—that being a matter for after-discussion—but that at present his father was anxious, as might be seen from the extract, to ascertain whether Mr. Wilkins could secure him from the contingency of having his son's widow and possible children thrown upon his hands by giving Ellinor a dowry; and if so, it was gently insinuated what would be the amount of the same.

When Mr. Wilkins received this letter it startled him out of a happy day-dream. He liked Ralph Corbet and the whole connection quite well enough to give his consent to an engagement; and sometimes even he was glad to think that Ellinor's future was assured, and that she would have a protector and friends after he was dead and gone. But he did not want them to assume their responsibilities so soon. He had not distinctly contemplated her marriage as an event likely to happen before his death. He could not understand how his own life would go on without her; or, indeed, why she and Ralph Corbet could not continue just as they were at present. He came down to breakfast with the letter in his hand. By Ellinor's blushes, as she glanced at the handwriting, he knew that she had heard from her lover by the same post; by her tender caresses—caresses given as if to make up for the pain which the prospect of her leaving him was sure to give him—he was certain that she was aware of the contents of the letter. Yet he put it in his pocket, and tried to forget it.

He did this not merely from his reluctance to complete any arrangements which might facilitate Ellinor's marriage. There was a further annoyance connected with the affair. His money matters had been for some time in an involved state; he had been living beyond his income, even reckoning that, as he always did, at the highest point at which it ever touched. He kept no regular accounts, reasoning with himself—or, perhaps, I should rather say persuading himself—that there was no great occasion for regular accounts, when he had a steady income coming in from his profession, as well as the interest of a good sum of money left him by his father; and when his expenditure, living in his own house near a country town where provisions were cheap, for his small family—only one child—could ever amount to any thing like his incomings from the above-mentioned sources. But servants and horses, and choice wines and rare fruit-trees, and a habit of purchasing any book or engraving he might take a fancy to, irrespective of the price, run away with the money, even though there be but one child. A year or two ago Mr. Wilkins had been startled into a system of exaggerated retrenchment—retrenchment which only lasted about six weeks—by the sudden bursting of a bubble speculation, in which he had invested a part of his father's savings. But as soon as the change in the bubble, necessary by his new economies, became irksome, he had comforted himself for his relapse into his former easy extravagance of living by remembering the fact that Ellinor was engaged to the son of a man of large property; and that though Ralph was still a very second son, yet that his mother's estate must come to him, as Mr. Hess had already informed Ellinor's father, when hearing of her engagement.

Mr. Wilkins did not doubt that he could easily make Ellinor a fitting allowance, or even pay down a considerable dowry; but the doing so would involve an examination into the real state of his affairs, and this involved distasteful trouble. He had no idea how much more than the interest of any annuance would arise out of the investigation. Until it was made he decided in his own mind that he would not speak to Ellinor on the subject of her lover's letter. So for the next few days she was kept in suspense, seeing little of her father; and during the short times that she was with him she was made aware that he was nervously anxious to keep the conversation engaged on general topics rather than on those which she had at heart. Mr. Corbet had written to her by the same post as that on which he sent the letter, of which I have already spoken, to her father, telling her of its contents, and begging her in all those sweet words which lovers know how to use to urge her father to the convenience for his sake—his, her lover's—who was pining and lonely in all the crowds of London, since her beautiful presence was not there. He did not care for money, says he for a means of hastening their marriage; indeed, if there were to be some income fixed, however small, some time for their marriage fixed, however distant, he could be patient. He did not want superfluities of wealth; his habits were simple, as she well knew; and money enough would be theirs in time, both from her share of contingencies and the certainty of his finally possessing Bromley.

Ellinor delayed replying to this letter until her father should have spoken to her on the subject. But as she perceived that he avoided all such conversation, the young girl's heart failed her. She began to blame herself for making so much of him, to consider herself for being accessory to any step which made him shun being alone with her, and look distressed and full of fear in the presence of the prescribed course of things; and, as usual, it was the poor girl who bore the suffering for no fault of her own. She blamed herself for being the cause of the disturbance in the previous order of affairs. Ellinor had no one to speak to confidentially of her father and her lover, and when they were at issue she could talk openly to neither, so she brooded over Mr. Corbet's unreasonable love and her father's silence, and became pale and dispirited. Once or twice she looked up suddenly, and caught her father's eye gazing at her with a certain wistful anxiety; but the instant she saw this he pulled himself up, as it were, and would go on talking gayly about the small topics of the day.

At length Mr. Corbet grew impatient at not hearing either from Mr. Wilkins or Ellinor, and wrote urgently to the former, making known to him a new proposal suggested to him by his father, which was, that a certain sum should be paid down by Mr. Wilkins, which should be applied, under the management of trustees, to the improvement of the Bromley property, for the profits of which, or other sources in the elder Mr. Corbet's hands, a steady rate of interest should be paid on the money, which would make a fair income to the young couple immediately, and considerably increase the value of the estate upon which Ellinor's settlement was to be made. The terms offered for this laying down of ready money were so advantageous that Mr. Wilkins was strongly tempted to accede to them at once. But Ellinor's pale cheek and want of appetite had taken such a powerful hold upon him—not only that very morning smout upon his conscience, and this immediate transfer of ready money was, as a sacrifice, a soothing balm to his self-reproof, and himself and his dislike to immediate unpleasantness of action had its counterbalancing weakness in imprudence. Mr. Wilkins made some rough calculations on a piece of paper—decided, and all such tests of accuracy being down at the office—discovered that he could pay down the sum required; wrote a letter to that effect to the proposal, and before he sealed it called Ellinor into his study, and bade her read what he had been writing, and tell him what she thought of it. He watched the color come rushing into her white face, her lips quiver and tremble, and even before he had done reading she was in his arms, kissing him, and thanking him with blushing caresses rather than words.

"That, there!" said he, patting and sighing; "that will do. Why, I do believe you took me for a hard-hearted father, just like a heroine's father in a book. You're bound to imagine this week past as Othello. One can't make up one's mind in a day about such sums of money as this, little woman; and you should have let your old father have time to consider."

"Oh, papa! I was only afraid you were angry."

"Well, if I was a bit perplexed, seeing you look so ill and pining was not the way to bring me round. Old Corbet, I must say, is trying to make a good bargain for his son. It is well for me that I have never been an extravagant man.

"But, papa, we don't want all this much."

"Yes; yes; it is all right. You shall go into their family as a well-portioned girl, if you can't go as a Lady Maria. Come, don't trouble your little head any more about it. Give me another kiss, and then we'll go and order the horses, and have a ride together, by way of keeping holiday. I deserve a holiday, don't I, Nell?"

Some country people at work at the roadside, as the father and daughter passed along, stopped to admire their bright, happy looks, and one spoke of the hereditary handsomeness of the Wilkins's family (for the old man, Mr. Wilkins's father, had been fine-looking in his drab breeches and gaiters, and usual assumption of a yeoman's dress), and the other of the large fee for rich to be handsome; they had always plenty to eat, and could ride when they were tired of walking, and had no cares for the volunteer service was banned. He does not hesitate to say that the formation of the volunteer corps was because the rebels believed it to be the body of Colonel Sloman, against whom they were plotting for revenge. He played so much courage and chivalry in forcing his regiment forward and leading them on.

HORRIBLE TREATMENT OF THE WOUNDED.

A dispatch from Murfreesboro, dated December 31, says:

The enemy during yesterday harassed our rear with their cavalry, and captured some of our wounded men near Murfreesboro. The rebels commenced firing upon our army wagons, ambulances, etc., and acted most outrageously, stripping the wounded and killing those unable to die.

Major Stenner and Captain King, who were being conveyed away wounded from the battle-field in an ambulance, were captured by the rebels, robbed of their miles away, and then paraded and thrown out on the road.

The Medical Director of General Grant's army, in an official report dated at Holly Springs on 20th December, says:

I received the assurance by General Van Dorn's adjutant that the hospitals and the wounded should be protected, but that it should be protected by a guard. Satisfied with this, I returned to my command, but had not been there an hour when I was informed that the building was in flames; and from this fire numerous of the wounded burned to death, in numerous set of drugs and surgical apparatus, thousands of blankets, stores, clothing, etc., was over destroyed.

This proceeding, in violation of an express promise, and in all rules of civilized warfare, is the evidence of the barbarity and want of principles in the Confederate officers, and this is not all. The building was scarcely burned to the ground, when I was informed that the main square, and which at the time contained a number of sick and wounded, and a large quantity of ordnance stores had been deposited in a building on the next block fully prepared by the officer who had charge of General Van Dorn's personal effects, and without the knowledge of the matter, the barrels of powder were cut and piled up nearly in front of the hospital and set fire to.

Two hundred rounds of artillery exploded with caution set, but their requests were treated with contempt. The fire soon reached the store-house on the side walls and windows of the hospital were riddled with flying balls and shells, and finally a terrific explosion took place which shook the entire building, destroying almost every window and door in the building, and scattering the wounded right and left, creating a scene of the wildest confusion.

Every effort made by the medical officers who assisted me in caring for the sick and wounded on that trying day, I thought that the fire was the work of accident, but since my own observation, and from the testimony of others, I am forced to believe that it was the work of incendiaries. Surgeon Samuel Brewster, who stated to had been detailed by General Van Dorn to remain with the sick and wounded, and who had been paroled, collected together, pistol in hand, about 150 sick soldiers, who were able to walk, formed into body and fall in line, threatening to shoot the medical officer who expostulated with him, and marched off, leaving the poor fellows, suffering from typhoid fever, pneumonia, and diarrhea, stark with him on the floor. The rebels took pity on the sick, and had to rise again for fear of being shot, when they were no worse off than before nothing but the knowledge of being imprisoned if there was any thing in the name of humanity that could be expected from the rebel authorities, he finally consented to let them alone on receiving a paper, signed by all the citizens present, stating that the men were too sick to walk, and their removal was an impossibility.

A newspaper correspondent writes:

One of the enemy's cavalry rode up to a wagon containing a wounded soldier belonging to the Fifty-fourth Pennsylvania Company, Second Wisconsin regiment, and, dragging him out by the hair of the head, commenced beating him about with his sword, yelling, "I'll teach you d—d Black abolitionists to come down here." Another of the troopers then mounted upon the driver of the wagon, and, with a back cut of his sabre, severed the poor man's head from his body, and he fell lifeless among his horses.

At the battle of Bull Run, an Ohio surgeon detailed for duty in the hospitals, was taken prisoner, and was ludicrously shelled by the rebels while the wounded of both armies were being cared for in it.

The Philadelphia Press contained the following, shortly after the battle:

A lieutenant of an Ohio regiment, now in this city, and who was at the battle of Bull Run, relates that he saw several of our wounded tarvened and having their throats cut by the secession soldiers, who were passing over them. The poor fellows begged for their lives, but their pleadings were disregarded, and with an oath the wounded was inflicted.

MURDERS OF DESERTERS.

The following is one of the murder of General Robert M'Cook is in point:

On Tuesday last General Robert L. M'Cook, who was at the time very ill, was, with his staff, escorting some ladies to camp, on his way to his lodgings. The ambulance was travelling over the same road where, about ten o'clock in the morning it arrived at a plantation where there was an abundance of fruit, and four refreshing themselves they passed on with the wounded General. Intelligence of his wheelbarrow, and the ambulance was stopped. It is supposed, for before the ambulance had proceeded three miles the officer commanding the guard was arrested by guerrillas.

It was impossible to think of flight, and Gen. M'Cook's wounding prohibited the thought of resistance. The guerrillas leader ordered the ambulance to stop, the occupants of the officer commanding the guard, who had arrested him, were set, and the sick officer turned into the road. While on his knees, General M'Cook was shot in the left side of the head and shot through the side.

The wounded officers, General M'Cook surviving it but a few hours. He bore his sufferings heroically, and to the last manifested an undaunted spirit. His last words were: "Tell Alex (alluding to his brother, General Alexander McCook) that I die like a man, and tell him that I have tried to live like a man and do my duty."

Commissary Packham, of Platt's Zouaves, communicates the following narrative of the murder of two members of that regiment by rebel guerrillas in Western Virginia:

A few days ago John Cottello and John Cerbe, Company D, with a loyal Virginian named Collins, attached to Company G as guides, were sent after a detachment of the Second loyal Virginia Cavalry, whom our colonel desired to be nearer our lines. When about 16 miles from camp they suddenly came upon a party of rebel militia, who fired, wounding the Virginia guide. Cottello and Cerbe instantly returned the fire, but before they could reload they were overpowered and taken to a Mrs. Gilkinson's. Next morning the rebels consulted upon the disposal of the prisoners. Some were for sending them to Richmond, some to their own headquarters at Lewisburg, and others, some for killing them, and Mrs. Gilkinson, to the eternal disgrace of female character, pleaded hard that one be killed on her porch, so that she could dance in his blood.

The killing party, with the two prisoners, were commanded to me by R. Mays, in our hospitals, a short time before he died, from a wound he had received while attempting to escape from the guard-house.

Mrs. Gilkinson's wish was granted.

In the morning we took one up the run, a quarter of a mile from the house, and shot him. Cerbe fell dead, and then to a tree. Bill Pritchet, Lee Pritchet, Isom Miller, and Stevens, were all in a place, and shot at him that fell killed him. Question, Did you shoot a horse? No; I shot at the man. Cerbe fell dead, and we took to him to Logan; but they fixed him to a tree, and shot him. Then some one said, Let us go and see if he is dead. They had shoot three shots apiece at him. Q. Did most of the shots hit him? A. Yes; all but two or three. Q. Was after he was dead? A. No. Q. What became of Collins, the Virginian? Q. Any body else? A. Yes; Mrs. Gilkinson's till near noon; then took him away up the run, and killed him. I did not hear more; all the killing was done by the two Pritchets, Miller, and Stevens. Pritchet said they were the men who killed Cerbe because he bore without killing him. Q. How many times do you think the boys were hit? A. I don't know; I counted four the first every time. My name is Mays. I live on the Beech Fork.

The wretch was dead. Since writing the above additional information has been received. Cottello is a prisoner, and got 13 prisoners, among whom we are in hopes to find all the absentees of the above hundred men.

Yours respectfully,

THOMAS BURHAM, Platt's Zouaves,
Commissary Thirty-fourth Regiment O. V.

OUR DEAD SCALPED.

A correspondent from the West says:

The Commissioner of the Department of Injury are respecting testimony from Fox Ridge, showing incontrovertible that these men have been scalped by the rebel Indian allies, but in other respects outraged.

Another writes:

You will of course have heard of the fact that the rebels have scalped some of the dead Indians under the command of Albert Pike. Also that some twenty of our men who fell in the engagement at Prairie Grove, near Fox Ridge, and under General Davie on Saturday, and had the misfortune to be in the field, were found shockingly mutilated, scalped, murdered, and robbed by these red-skinned wretches.

CONTRABANDS DRIVEN SOUTH OR SHOT.

A correspondent from Murfreesboro writes:

All "contrabands" captured by the rebels on the Federal wagon-trains are driven South. Twenty thus killed are lying on the Murfreesboro Pike.

The Times correspondent says:

While making a call on Colonel Lee, ten citizens, named Moore and Ball, came within our lines and were detained by the pickets. They were all in search of the whereabouts of Moore's four-mills, at Aldie, on a branch of Goose Creek. The rebels had burned his mills, and he was ruined. They had "done nothing," so they said, and were neither fruit-growers nor farmers. Moore's sons were captured by the rebels within our lines when no near their homes, from which they had been driven by the rebels. They were forcibly conscripted closely they admitted that they had just come from the Shenandoah Valley, where the great battle had been running off "niggers," having just taken a large gang, belonging to Moore, to Richmond, and were on their way to Aldie, to avoid being thrown under the emancipation proclamation. It understood, from the testimony of these men and of the species of property, throughout this section of the State, that all the able-bodied negroes have been or are to be separated from the plantations, and the slaveholders boast that they will not have a single rebel in all this part of the State by the 1st of January next.

Another correspondent says:

The rebels in Secessia are busily engaged just now in impressing negroes, and the poor wretches, beyond regret and description. A Union man, just from below Columbia, tells me that in the brush, and thickly scattered, are the dead bodies of negroes killed at, all strongly guarded. He does not exactly know what they were killed for, but thinks it a mere matter of whim on the part of the rebels.

MISCELLANEOUS BARBARITIES.

The following are a few extracts culled from army letters:

Every day new barbarities perpetrated by the rebels come to light. The week two soldiers who had straggled from the ranks on the march from Corinth to Iuka, were reported as missing, subsequently, by the roadside with their throats cut from ear to ear.

Here the rebels were guilty of barbarous atrocities. Many of the dead were found with their throats cut from ear to ear. One man was brought in who had had his eyes gouged out by their bayonets. This was one of the most unrelenting fury on finding this way of retreat cut off.

Numbers of our men were found with their throats cut, and some had their eyes picked out. One was found tied to a tree. But enough of these horrors—I must conclude.

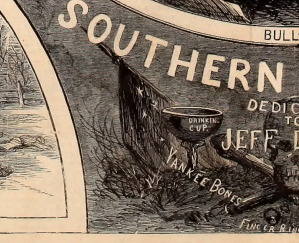
To what depths of inhuman wickedness men, or devils, can descend, is illustrated by the fact that the rebel wizard Beelzebub murdered, and the fingers of our dead cut off to secure rings. We have proof of this.

One man says: They kept harrowing me until I re-covered from the swoon. Then one left me, the other remaining over me, when I heard a shot. I lay on the ground until ten o'clock next day.

The fellow at first made no reply, but, stooping down, put his hand to the side of the head of the wounded man, and cut off his grave, in order to get at the buttons on his clothes for trophies.

Another saw the brains of the wo—d being beaten out by clubs, thus confirming the previous wapaper reports.

There is enough in these extracts to —ar out the pictures on pages 88 and 89, hereafter to be given. We refer to and to serve as a complete refutation of Jeff Davis's claim to superior chivalry. Will the foreign journals, who have made such an outcry about Butler and M'Neil, be so good as to let their readers hear of a few of these cases?



THROWING SICK AND WOUNDED U.S. SOLDIERS IN THE ROAD TO DIE.

BY THOMAS NAST—DEDICATED TO JEFF DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 87.]

THREE CHRISTMAS DAYS.

I.

"I MET young Weymer down town this morning, and invited him to eat his Christmas dinner with us, Alice."

"Weymer?"

"Robert Weymer's son; have you forgotten him? He went to Europe directly after his father's death, and arrived in New York yesterday. He has no near relatives in the city, you know, and I thought he might find our home pleasanter to-day than his hotel."

"Yes, certainly, I am glad you invited him; he must feel lonely:" and then Alice Rosemere, after giving a servant an order to lay another plate, dismissed "young Weymer" from her mind, until—

"My daughter, Mr. Weymer."

Alice was standing in the midst of uncles, aunts, and cousins, dispensing her graciousness with that pretty stateliness which became her as sole mistress of the house; for Mr. Rosemere had never given her a step-mother, since her own mother died, ten years ago.

Standing in the midst of uncles, aunts, and cousins, she looked up to greet "Mr. Weymer," hardly noticing his personnel in the merry confusion about her, but saying politely, with a sense of his being a stranger,

"We are very glad to have you with us to-day, Mr. Weymer."

"And I am very glad to be here. It is a pleasanter 'coming home' than I anticipated, Miss Rosemere."

"He has a fine voice," thought Alice, in whose ear her cousin Frank was rattling his good-natured nonsense in those immature tones of his; and then they went in to dinner, and she thought only of her duties of hostess, unconsciously shining as she never shone at ball or party, as she sat there at the head of her father's table, her usually brilliant face subdued by its rather unusual expression of kindly care for all these young cousins, with their evident expectation of being "looked out for" by such a splendid "Cousin Alice."

Cold and haughty and self-absorbed as most people, specially her own sex, thought Alice Rosemere, to her credit be it said, that she never shirked these small requirements of her, which many persons of far more amiable reputation make a point of doing. Perhaps her accusers might have said that it was a mere matter of pride that she didn't. That she smiled upon you, or any other young fool if you came in her way, in that courteous manner, simply because she had set herself above all evasions of social grace, as a lesson of lofty pride.

The Rosemeres were ladies and gentlemen through a long line of gracious lineage, and it was said that this last representative of the name had higher notions than any of her predecessors concerning that title of "a lady." Be this as it may, we will not find fault with the quality of pride when it produces such results as in the present instance, that of fitting herself to the pleasures of these "younger folk" who look up at her so admiringly.

But at last the complex wheels are moving smoothly. Shy Lucy has found her voice under the gay patronage of that rattling Frank. Awkward Tom has forgotten his huge hands and feet in telling his college stories to sympathetic little Jenny, and the elders are safely launched in old-time talk.

So Alice once more retires into herself for a little rest and quiet.

She was absently crushing the soft almond shells in her white fingers, gazing the while into her glass of "rare old wine," with a gaze that told of dreams and fancies far outside of the scene before her. As she looked into the purple-tinted wine glowing and sparkling with its "——beaded bubbles winking at the brim," was she thinking of the "——lands where the olives grew,

Where the sun with a golden mouth can blow
Blue bubbles of grapes down a vineyard row?"

If she was, somebody spoke just then who carried on the fancy.

"I had come straight through from Italy—from Rome, where the winter is so kind that people are more out of doors than in; and a month ago, only a month—it seems odd now when I glance out of these windows upon the ice and snow—a month ago I came up from Malta, where the grapes were hanging in the sun, and the olives lay yellow on the walls, and the air was heavy with the odors of each. I have shut my eyes since then many times, and fancied I could scent the fragrance."

What voice was this so full of Italy? She lifted her head.

It was Mr. Weymer, talking to her cousin John. John Maynard, who hated college because he wanted to be an artist and go to Italy. The younger man's face was charmed from its commonly petulant expression as he listened. It took but a few eager questions of his to lead Mr. Weymer on to further talk of artists and pictures there, for Robert Weymer, Jun., loved Italy too, as the very tones of his voice lingering over her sweet, lingering names testified.

And while he talked on, he had another hearer than he was aware of; Alice sitting there, crushing the almond shells between her fingers, and for the first time since he had entered, seeing "young Weymer."

She found a man who matched the voice. A great shouldered, well-made fellow, with a head of dark hair not cut too closely, and falling a little over a bronzed forehead whose color spoke eloquently of Campagna wanderings. And there was rest in the brown eyes as if they had been lately looking at

"The champaign, with its endless fleece
Of feathery grasses every where!
Silence and passion, joy and peace,
An everlasting wash of air—
Rome's ghost since her decease."

And between the full flowing beard of warmer brown than the hair and eyes, the red mouth stirred with a slow serenity of movement, as if it were keeping time to the soft oar-dips in the canals of Venice.

Alice was pleased. She liked enthusiasm, earnestness, and it was agreeable to meet a person who had forgot to "hurry," and who had delivered himself over to such artistic influences.

When they had entered the drawing-room again, and while the others were engaged in their Christmas merriment, Alice crossed over to her guest, who was standing quite alone by the great wood-fire that crackled and blazed on the hearth—crossed over, her mind tinged with the tone she had caught at the table. But the elegant air which met her struck back her genial impulse. It smacked of Paris salons and New York drawing-rooms, not of Italy. Where was the dreamy youth she had seen bending over his glass and discoursing eloquently of

"——the lands where the olives grow?"

Perhaps, if she had glanced at herself in the mirror as she crossed the room, she would have been aware that the fashionable-looking young lady, in her stiff purple silk, her ruffles of lace, and her glittering jewels, was not the object to suggest

"——the lands where the olives grow."

If Robert Weymer had looked into her eyes, he might have seen possibly where her dreams had been; but he did not look into her eyes, only down that trailing splendor of silk which swayed gracefully to the proud step. So he made his best Paris bow, and began talking to the splendid young lady about what he thought she would like to hear. The French theatre, the French soirées, and her neighbor, Charley Goodwyn, whom he had met there, and who spoke of her several times he was sure.

To all this Alice bent her head graciously, inwardly bored to death. She didn't care a sou for French theatres, French soirées, or Charley Goodwyn; and what ailed this fine fellow to talk to her in this way? Her quick perception got at the reason at last, or at least a glimpse of it. He was flying on over a batch of brilliant gossip, when she brought him up standing, as the phrase is, by:

"Mr. Weymer, forget I am a New York girl, with sixteen yards of silk to my gown, and corresponding follies of chains and ornaments, to declare me non compos mentis, and talk as you talked to my cousin John, over your wine."

Here was something new and strange—originality and independence, with nothing "fast" about it. A lady speaking freely, quite as she meant, and losing none of her reticence in the speaking.

He started at first, then a little delicate laugh of appreciation broke heartily through the brown beard.

"I like this," he thought, and he almost said so; and from that they fell into conversation of an entirely different description from what he had at first essayed, though certainly not such as he had carried on with her cousin. It was an odd, what most of her contemporaries would have called an out-of-the-way talk; but in it, Robert Weymer, who knew something of men and women, found that he had met a new specimen of her sex; at least new to his experience. He had been making himself agreeable as she wished, by falling into a natural, simple expression of his thought and travel to her, and there had come a brief pause; when she broke it by saying abruptly, evidently in response to some inward reflection on what had passed:

"If only a woman could feel, when she meets a man who is companionable and interesting, that she might be free and cordial as her nature should dictate, without provoking the thought, as Charles Reade, I believe it is, says, that she is 'after him,' how much finer it would all be! Ah," with an absent, weary air; "one gets tired and humiliated by the false positions which society's corruptions place one in. But it can't be helped, I suppose. I believe that even the simplest and most modest of your sex would think that a girl was 'after him,' should she treat him with the frank and innocent cordiality which she extends to a woman like herself, and with precisely the same innocent cordiality which she feels for the woman; and that from no fault of his, but from the accepted state of things. The root of the mischief lies far below the present; but still women are much to blame now for carrying on this folly by all sorts of artifices. If men could only believe that there are women like her who said:

"If Shakspeare loved me, and I didn't love him, how could I marry him?"

And here this "out-of-the-way" conversation was brought to an end. Cousin Frank came running up with a petition that Alice would sing; and Alice, breaking off her thread of talk, moved, smiling, away, convoyed by that marplot of a Frank, with no expression in her face to betray that she was not having her own highest pleasure in her compliance; though Robert Weymer could have sworn that she liked their talking ten times better: and yet she gave no sign.

He could not make her out. Was she serene and calm because of some chill currents in her blood? How clearly and coolly she had spoken to him, a stranger! Undeniable truths, and he admired her for the speaking; but from what experience had she arrived at these conclusions? Had more love been poured out at her shrine than she could understand? Had it become distasteful to her from that prodigality? and more the artist than the woman in her nature, did she desire only man's friendship? It looked like this, for how coldly, though intensely, had she spoken! On the other hand, perhaps she had yearned for the strength and support of manly sympathy, but knowledge of life had held her back; too proud to risk misunderstanding, she had intrenched herself in this glacial dignity. He doubted if there was much warmth either way. That calm, clear face, that passionless manner! But how she had said those words:

"If Shakspeare loved me, and I didn't love him, how could I marry him?"

He had arrived at this point in his speculations, when the gay songs that Frank had been calling for, with their brilliant accompaniments, suddenly gave place to a soft but happy strain, and a voice, the same, yet not the same, came gushing and fervent down that Irish "Welcome."

"Come in the evening, or come in the morning,
Come when you're looked for, or come without warning;
Kisses and welcome you'll find here before you,
And the oftener you come the more I'll adore you."

Weymer slipped round into a curtained niche where he could see the singer as this first verse reached him. And he saw a face full of tender meaning. Was it merely the artist's rendering of the song, or was it—? But wait—the tune changes. There is a cluster of slow-woven chords, a braiding of major and minor tones, which he wonders where he has heard before, and then he would fancy himself back in some Roman palazzo, listening to a dark-eyed Signorina, were it not that, often as he had heard this passionate heart-break of Torquato Tasso sung by Italian women as they can sing, ever had he felt its intense pathos, its repressed yet overwhelming ardor, so surely rendered until this moment.

He leaned forward, and caught the lustre and hue of her eyes as she sang. The icy mask was down, the lights shining clearly out. What a fool he had been—he who believed his intellect and intuition infallible in reading human character. She, with those "golden eyes," those thrilling tones, that vainly-tried control; cold, wanting in warmth!

She sang on, and he forgot the place and the hour.

Still looking into those "golden eyes," he recalled an olden dream. Vague and impossible, a little time since, seemed that vision of his youth. And here just a breathing space, and he finds the phantom, the impossible no longer, but possible. He realizes—

"No, I can not sing any more now, Frank; my throat—" A quick disdain of her subterfuge; then clearer toned: "This song exhausts me, that is all." But she can not lose the glance that struck into her soul just now. She can not escape that haunting look, and she knows all subterfuge with him who gave that glance is vain.

But still gay Frank rattles on,

"Oh, come, Alice, give us a bright little thing now, to carry off that Italian affair."

Weymer walked out from his nook.

"Talking of bright things," he said, "you should hear the Roman boys whistle and sing their scraps of songs, as they saunter the streets."

Frank turned, interested, and asked a hundred questions; and Alice left the piano and went down the room, quite conscious of the consideration that gave her such respite.

Half an hour later her strange guest came to bid her good-night.

He thanked her in some simple, sincere phrase, though conventional, for the pleasure of the evening. Their cheerful Christmas cheer had robbed his lonely coming home of half its sadness, etc. She put out her hand at this; and it was then, as he clasped it, that he said, after a brief hesitation, and a little lower of tone:

"Will you let me come and talk to you about Italy sometimes? I think you would love Italy."

She looked up into his waiting face. Golden eyes; but the lights were lowered now; he could not get beyond that outer radiance; yet very gently she answered him, giving graceful assurance of welcome.

Then her father approached—that gracious gentleman, who had been his own father's closest friend in times past. His cordial words, his hearty hand-pressure, were pleasant things for Robert Weymer, returning to a desolate home after four years of wandering; but there was still another pleasure—the mystery of those "golden eyes."

II.

IT was a pleasant picture. That old dining-hall at Holly Hill, with its quaint dark wainscoting, its floor of French tiles, and narrow oval windows, now curtained with bright damask, and the whole room shining with the Christmas preparations. Wreaths and festoons of December greenery, hanging all about over door and window, and the full blaze of a chandelier lighting up the table and the guests. A pleasant picture enough to warm any lonely man's heart, and Robert Weymer, who was a lonely man enough, Heaven knows, realized all that this pleasant picture meant; but as he lifts his glass of sherry to his lips there escapes a low but deep sigh through the brown beard, and he turns a wistful gaze toward the windows, all softly shrouded against the dark and stormy night. It was just here that pretty Kate who sits beside him asks, in a very soft tone,

"Cousin Robert, why did you say when you came to-night that you thought it soon enough for such a blue old fellow as you? and why were you so reluctant any way when I first invited you?"

He still held the glass of sherry in his hand, and gazing into its amber depths, said, slowly,

"Kate, a year ago to-day I met, to lose, the dearest friend I ever had. And when I sit at feasts now, I think of another feast whose flowers will never bloom again. And I had said to myself: 'This year I will keep the day in solemn remembrance, as we keep all remembrances of the dead.'"

The tears were in Kate's dark eyes as she listened to these sad and simple words.

"Oh, Robert," she cried, softly, "how good you were to me; how unselfish to come!"

"No, not good, nor unselfish, but merely not quite so self-indulgent as I meant to be. Let it pass, dear. I am glad if my coming gave you pleasure—it gives me pleasure too, Kate; believe that."

Kate Marsden, notwithstanding her gay and willful temper, was full of tender tact; and though her heart was full, she let it pass, and left him to the silence she knew he coveted; turning aside from him all necessity for talk by some adroit appropriation; repaid by the single glance of confidence which he gave her, as he led her from the table to the drawing-room.

But back in the drawing-room, standing by the blazing yule-log, and watching its brilliant flames with that same absent anxious look, he hears words which move him to the very core of his heart. Plunged in his absent reverie a voice breaks through with that magic name:

"Rosemere? Where is Rosemere now?"

"That is what many people ask, and no one can answer. He disappeared after the failure, and not even his own, or his wife's family—he is the last of the Rosemeres, I believe—know any thing of him. It was a perfect crash, you see—utter ruin; and he, the proudest man alive."

"But why, in the name of sense, didn't he begin again—get some office or something? He had friends enough surely for any influence."

"Well, this is the saddest part of it. A stroke of paralysis deprived him of the use of his right arm. What could he do? Then, if you had known Henry Rosemere, you'd see at once how difficult it would be for him to accept favors. I think he'd rather die."

"And his daughter, that Lady Alice as we used to call her, what became of her?"

"Oh, she went with him. By-the-way that reminds me of something my Harry spoke of the other day. He said he was passing down Broadway, just at nightfall about a month ago, and he could have sworn that he saw Alice Rosemere go by, leaning on her father's arm. He thought she looked changed, and Rosemere, he said, was a mere wreck of what he was. However, he might have been mistaken. Harry is a little near-sighted, and doesn't always get things right."

The flame that suddenly burst red and glowing from the heart of the yule-log was not more fiery than the red glow the passionate heart of Robert Weymer sent burning to his cheek at this moment.

"My God!" he murmured beneath his breath. "Have I searched all these weary months for her in vain while she may have been passing my very door."

But again his attention is arrested.

"And this house, you say, once belonged to him?"

"Yes," answered Mr. Marsden: "the old Rosemere homestead. It passed into the creditors' hands, and I bought it. It was for sale just as I got back from Europe. An odd old place it is, and full of interest. They say that he never came here much, and rarely spoke of it, for his wife died in one of the rooms, and was buried from the house. Rowly, who had the settling of affairs, declared that the only time he saw Alice Rosemere break down, or evince in fact any emotion, was when she found this place must go."

"Sad! sad!" muttered the other, shaking his head, regretfully.

Sad! It was wasting desolation and despair. It was constant corroding anxiety, and hungry sorrow to more than those two of whom they speak. Even to him—to that gallant fellow, who leans against the oaken mantle with all the absent wistfulness in his expression changed to fresh determination.

Long after the guests had retired Robert Weymer kept troubled vigil. Again his mind went back to last year's Christmas-tide, when he had left that fair presence with the germ of a feeling which ere long blossomed into perfect flower. And she—he was sure she loved him as he loved her.

Ah, why had he not spoken?

Three months—only three months, and in that time the dreams of his youth were being realized. Three months, and at the end—ruin and desolation indeed.

He recalled the last time he had seen her. It was at a brilliant ball. He had danced with her; and down the floating measures, to the entrancing sweetness of divine music, he had led her into the fairer, dimmer regions of flower and shrub, in the deserted conservatory. And in that softer light how surely he felt that their spirits stood confessed to each. But why had he not spoken? Why? It was one of those moments that seem fit only for silence. Her presence, the glance of her eyes, her hand upon his arm, rapt him in a trance for the time. Then the breaking of alien voices approaches from without, and—"the good minute goes." He had said to himself: I will see her to-morrow.

That night the breaking of a trace, as he was whirling home to his hotel in a hackney-coach, broke up all his plans for "to-morrow." For two weeks he was a prisoner to his room. At the first moment of release, still lame and weak from bruise and sprain, he sought her presence. But instead of finding Alice Rosemere he found the house closed and deserted. What did it mean?

Coming down the stately steps he met young Sayle—her cousin Frank.

"Where are the Rosemeres?" he asked.

"Haven't you heard?" in an amazed tone.

"Heard? No! What is it? I have been ill—thrown from a carriage. I know nothing. For God's sake, what is it?" he exclaimed, in his feverish impatience.

"Oh, it's horrid!—not so much the failure; but to lose Alice, to have her father's pride sever every thing—" began Frank, in a horror-struck, irrelevant way.

"Lose Alice!" repeated his companion. "Frank, stop! Tell me the plain facts."

And Frank told him.

"The day after the Bowdoins' ball the crash had come. The greatest failure for years. Rosemere gave up every thing; refused all offers of assistance; and went away, no one knows where, with his daughter. Only once had he been heard from. An old acquaintance, out of the fullness of his pity, made some communication through the columns of a paper, where a post of book-keeper was offered in one of those blind ways to H. R., etc., by D. M. With his unerring sagacity Mr. Rosemere discovered his correspondent, and a swift reply was sent back. A reply written in Alice Rosemere's graceful chirography, but in her father's clear and cold phrase—thanking the donor, but refusing the offer with the simple intelligence of its uselessness to one who had but just found his right arm paralyzed for work; courteously intimating, with that unbending pride, that from the present, at least, Mr. Rosemere and his daughter preferred to remain in utter seclusion.

"Those who knew Henry Rosemere did not dream of disregarding this hint. A simple phrase enough; but from him it said: 'I have shut my door against friend or foe; let none dare enter.'

"As proud and invincible in his defeat as in his triumphs, there was none hardy enough to intrude after this decree. And now neither friend nor foe could tell of his whereabouts."

There were the facts which Frank Sayle gave him, in his own indignant, boyish phrase.

From that day Robert Wegmer commenced his search. A patient, sorrowful investigation, which he felt sure in the end would be successful. In the first pang of grief at Frank's revelation he bitterly deplored the fate that kept him silent on the last night that they had met. Through hope or despair he never lost this bitterness; and pacing his room there at Holly Hill, as he waited all the weary past—these eight months and more—of vain watching and waiting, he exclaims, hoarsely, "If I had but spoken!" And again he blamed his proud spirit stung by his absence, by his silence, in that fearful time when he lay stricken and helpless, and denying himself with his characteristic reserve from any chance visitor, who would have given him earlier information, perhaps, which might—Ah, might!" He struck his forehead with his clenched hand as he walked there, with this ever-recurring thought for maddening company.

And this was the termination.

No! He rose up with new energy again, as he strode the room that night at Holly Hill. What he had heard hours ago in that evening gossip had only quickened in the never-dying fire.

And pacing the floor he muttered: "I will never give up my search until I find her, and may God help me!" And then again:

"Her home too. How strange that I should find myself within its walls so unwittingly! And this night of all others. There is some link in it. I'll take it for an omen. Another year and she shall reign here."

A restless smile lightened the gloom of his face. He had uttered these words with more passion than thought, but as they left his lips he thrilled; they sounded like a prophecy, and under their new influence he flung himself upon the bed, dressed as he was, and slept.

The next day was wild and stormy. Why should he return to the city? "Stay and I will show you the house from top to toe. Strangers say it is worth seeing, though I think it a dreadfully dreary old granny."

Thus pleaded Kate.

He who had been so unwilling to come but yesterday now yielded readily to this proposition. This house had once been Alice's home. It was the closest association he could form with her. And he determined, what you will see.

Kate had shown him the house from top to toe, and he had found it worth the seeing. Its antiquity belonged to a past age, and revealed quaint wainscoting, and specimens of architecture which the old Dutch builder had brought over years ago from his native land, but because it had once been HER home.

"Kate, I like this house," he said; "I have never seen one that I like better. Is your father much attached to it, do you think?"

"He hates it, I know; but we have only lived here for a few months. There are no associations connected with it to make him specially attached. Why?"

"Kate, I want it; I want to buy it."

"You!" and Kate opened wide her eyes. "Are you going to be married, Robert?"

His lips trembled; his cheek flushed with emotion. Then he answered,

"I told you, Kate, last night that I had lost the dearest friend I ever had. I should never marry any other."

Again Kate evinced her wisdom by keeping silence. She asked him no questions.

After dinner that day Mr. Marston sat smoking with his wife and nephew in the little left-hand parlor. They had been talking about the place, its advantages and disadvantages, when Mr. Wegmer suddenly astonished his uncle with the words,

"I wish you would sell to me."

"To you! This place! What can you want of it?"

"It suits me. I want to live here."

The other bent forward. "You are not going to be—"

"No, no," the younger man interrupted quickly. "I have taken a fancy to this house, and am tired of hotel life. I met Mrs. Kinly, my father's old housekeeper, the other day, and she is ready to take me in charge again. It would seem like home once more."

"But why not go back to Fernden? The distance from the city is the same, the surrounding country more agreeable, and the house not only handsomer but more commodious. You have there the benefit of all modern improvements. I should much prefer it."

"Should you? Then let us make an exchange, uncle."

"Yes; that would be a good joke," Mr. Marston laughed.

"No; I am in earnest, Uncle Ben."

His host dropped his cigar.

"In earnest! You don't mean to say, Robert, that you are in earnest when you suggest exchanging Fernden, with all its natural and artificial advantages, for this out-of-the-way neglected estate of Holly Hill?"

"I do mean to say that I never was more in earnest in my life. Look here, Uncle Ben. Appreciate in Holly Hill just what you don't care for. Its oddity, its possible romantic history, and especially its age, which suggests a long line of hereditary descent, wherever you laugh. What is Fernden to me, new and splendid—two things which I don't care for."

"But, Robert—"

"I know all you would say, Sir; that, if you should entertain the idea of this exchange, it seems like unfair advantage, etc., of my romantic folly. My dear uncle, it is a folly I have had all my life, and which I call a taste. I have never desired to possess a home like Fernden because it was modern and fine. I have always desired to possess just such a queer old ancestral affair as this. It is a mere difference in taste between us. Come, what do you say?"

Mr. Marston had very little to say. He looked upon Fernden as the most desirable place he knew. It was in every way more advantageous to him than Holly Hill, and he would be loth to part any available residence then in the market, on his return from abroad.

So the thing was decided, and Robert went up to town, much happier than he went down, caring very little that the matter-of-fact Mr. Marsden thought him a romantic fool.

Yes, happier than he had been for a long time. One step seemed taken toward his object. Why, he could scarcely have told; but to live in the house she had once lived in, to tread the floors she had once trod, seemed a link between her and him.

III.

IT was early morning; bright and clear the sun shone on the snow-covered roofs, the wide, lonely street, and the tall, ice-glittering masts down the bay. In this wide, lonely street, in one of the most out-lkirts of the city, where it was neither fashionable nor mean, but simply respectable—there stood an old dome-roofed house, which had once been more than that in looked now, plain and unpretending. The faded paint, the rusty blinds, the sunken gate at the gravel-walk, proclaimed the fact that days of decay which touched it with a dignity it had never worn in its green and white freshness.

In this old mourning hour a lady stand at one of the windows gazing down upon the still street with a pensive, abstracted air.

The face is young enough and full of subtle beauty, but there are marks of trial and experience in it. Yet hope and courage still shine from her eyes, though obscured, her spirit is brave, and her imagination fresh and ardent.

The room wherein she stands is very plain and simple, almost shabby. It has but the ordinary necessaries furnish it—a worn and faded carpet, three chairs, a table, and a stove. The table is spread for breakfast. Some coarse, but white and the few dishes are of delicate old china. But it would not need this to tell any one that the occupant of the room was a woman born to better fortune than surrounds her now. Her very presence makes the carpet look less faded, the furniture less shabby, and lends a finer aspect, which is almost grace, to the poor apartment.

Presently her head turns from the window, and she leaves it in the direction of the door, as two others—a man, slender and pale, with a figure once erect, now somewhat bent and twisted by disease, limps the few steps that separate it. It was enforced by pain, and care, and disappointment; by loss and desolation, and bitterness; but over it all was flung a shifting mask of cheerfulness. The blue eyes were undaunted at 'ill fortune, at physical suffering. The firm mouth held a serenity which you felt was habitual. It was the face, despite all pride and lonely courage, the serenity of disdain, which said, "Though defeated, I scorn to complain."

There was a morning greeting, simple enough, yet tinctured with the flavor of a courtesy which would have graced a palace as it did that poor room.

And then a little maid entered with a steaming tray, and Alice Rosemere poured her father's coffee, while he talked to her of the events in a gracious a manner as he had ever done in the old brilliant times. But in their conversation there never mingled allusions to the past present, or the future. Tacitly, by that mutual understanding which finer sympathy gives, they avoided all painful topics, yet with no appearance of avoidance. In the inexhaustible subjects of books, of art, and even science—for Alice Rosemere had been associated with her father too closely not to have caught something of the spirit of his favorite study—these subjects were empty of pain. In these days, and to-day was less congenial. And this first picture of their every life was the picture of every day. They rose early, sometimes breakfasted, sometimes at a later hour; and afterward, while Alice attended to household cares, assisted by this one little maid-of-all-work, he had some of her life by half a score—her father read and looked over piles of papers. Then, while it was yet too early for any possible meeting of acquaintances, they took their daily walk. And returning, as invariably, a small desk was wheeled out from an inner room, and the day's occupation begun—that of author and amanuensis.

Sitting there by the window which looked into the obscene side-street, with its dreary walls, its parallized right hand and arm lying helpless upon an arm of the chair, with his other, Mr. Rosemere now and then, by eloquent gestures, kept pace with the brilliant and startling thoughts that flowed from his lips in a low but untiring voice. Opposite him, Alice rapidly transferred these thoughts in phonographic characters to paper, her own face lightening as his lightened, with pride, or earnestness, or application.

But one day the work was finished. Alice looked up with the words

"When will it be out, father?"

"On Christmas-day."

A shade flitted momentarily across her face, and she shrank a little as if something had hurt her. Then immediately:

"I am glad it is so soon."

He smiled, a musing, triumphant smile, and said, absently:

"Yes; I think it must succeed."

Succeed! She smiled too.

"It must succeed with such heralding. Read this, father," and as she spoke she handed him a newspaper and pointed to a paragraph.

It was one of those paragraphs that say so little and imply so much.

"We understand from the publisher of the so and so magazine, that he has in press a work from the pen of the author of those brilliant papers which have from time to time appeared under the titles, etc., etc."

Then followed a darkly hinted at the probable authorship hidden under the modest nom de plume. A hint of course widely astray.

Mr. Rosemere read it with satisfaction, but at the same time a sarcasm was on his lip as he read.

And Christmas-day came round again. It was ushered in with bright skies and life-giving airs, but to Robert Wegmer, sitting at his lonely fireside in the dark-as-night room at Holly Hill that morning, there was little of brightness.

Where were his prophecies, his plans of last year? Alas, "Man proposeth, but God disposeth." And he muttered this half aloud, as he looked out with that old wistful gaze upon the ice-bound country. "And it seems very cold; but where he lives, He had spent time and energy, and used every means in his power, and to no purpose. Where was she, in this same she? While he dwelt under her roof amidst luxury and ease, she might be suffering poverty's sharpest stings. How often had he thought of this as he had sat in these rooms for the past year. But this day at least he would keep fully the faith that he would sit at no feast; only slenderest fare and loneliness should be his portion.

Mrs. Kinly in vain tried to rebel. She would have had him dine sumptuously. But no. "Have what you like for yourself, Mrs. Kinly, but I wish to be alone, that day."

Mrs. Kinly was anxious.

"Whatever could all the young gentleman ? But you know best, Sir," she had answered. One of his friends had come to see him, and she ushered him into the presence of her master with a secret delight.

Robert Weymer was not specially glad to see this visitor—his good-natured cousin, Harry Marsden; and his asked,

"What brings you here to-day, Harry?"

"Oh, I was riding up from the valley, and thought I'd look in upon you. It's rather shabby of you, Bob, not to come over to us for dinner. Kate 'll be with us, you know. Hullo! So you've got this number, too. Have you read the notices their heads over?" taking up a book that lay upon the table.

Robert looked up in some surprise at his cousin, who cared little for such literature as this—a strange new book of philosophical and scientific essays.

But Harry explained.

"Dickey Lane was over last night. Dickey's uncle is the author of this, you know, and he told us what a time they've had over the mystery of the affair."

"Mystery?"

"What! You know nobody can find out who the author is even now, don't you?"

No; he had not known. Robert set little himself warily to hear a story about which he felt no interest, yearning for silence, for solitude, to shut out those bitter, light-hearted tones, which brought no answering light-heartedness to him.

"Well, it's the oddest thing," Harry went on. "The whole correspondence conducted through the post, up to this time, under the name of Ross; but nobody believes it's Ross, you know. And then the handwriting is a woman's! Dickey gave me a scrap of a letter his uncle let him have. See. It's graceful, but bold enough. I say it's a man's. What do you think?"

Weymer took the slip of paper carelessly; but as his eyes fell upon the characters he was suddenly transformed. He was no longer the cold, then sudden puller succeeded. He rose, went to the window, stood with his back toward his cousin for a few moments in the morning, and, in his ordinary tones, with no trace of his strange emotion:

"Will you lend me this, Harry?"

"I'll give it to you. I don't care for it. Dickey seemed to think he was offering me 'great things,' as I took it. But I've seen answers to inquiries."

"But, bless my soul! is your clock right? I must be off in a hurry." So you won't come with us, and eat of the Christmas turkey, Robert?"

"Not to-day. Good-by!" And Robert Weymer closed the door after his guest with a deep breath of relief. And then turned to the window again with that scrap of paper.

That handwriting! Well he knew that in his dark there lay a strange, graceful history. Biography could match this, line by line. The mystery so dark to others was clear to him. He knew Mr. Rosemere's style. He knew something of his deep yet brilliant mind. And plainly rose before his inward vision those two working together. The father with his fine, subtle sight into the human fiance to poverty and misfortune in the presence of such true and tender aid.

And now the author would make himself known. He would come forth from his obscurity to receive the praise which awaited him!

Then Robert Weymer's heart stood still. No, no, he must find her before this acknowledgment of the world had found them, else he might be misjudged. He must see nothing of his long search.

He must find her! When? "Now! This very day! This very hour! There was no time to lose."

As he said this, all the passion, all the fervor, all the power of the last two years seemed to pass into his soul. It mounted to his brain. A dizziness overcame him, and for momentary relief he flung himself down upon the couch.

Softly as night falls over the weary day did sleep descend upon him then. Brief slumber, but a lifetime seemed compressed within its limits. He awoke with the sense of having lived through a next minute, cool and clear, recollection came.

Down the mystic reaches of slumber where had his soul wandered? What had he seen?

He had seen a wide and lonely street, and overlooking it a lonely house, old, and faded, and shabby. He had seen himself walking along the deserted pavement. He had seen at the window of this lonely house a face look out and smile upon him. HER face!

Where was this lonely street? Where this lonely house? Did it exist only in the strange phantasy of a dream? But no, he had surely beheld that true point of shore to which his soul had surely observed that view of the bay, the masts, the spars and rigging, lying dimly outlined against the sky!

Suddenly he flashed upon Robert Weymer the last unfrequented portion of the city, where the wide, lonely and blank, were winding off to shore. He remembered the desolate appearance of its dwellings. And perhaps this lonely house was in this neighborhood. Perhaps that face sat in the window—he sprang up. The old clock over the mantle struck the half hour. He had yet time to gain the station, to take the train for town.

Alice had just read the letter from the publisher her father had brought in to her late last night. It was cordial and flattering, but it was curious.

It pressed politely yet pointedly the mutual benefit of personal acquaintance.

She looked up, smiling. "Well, will you—"

"Not yet, not yet," he interrupted, musing her thought.

"No"—and he bent musing over the fire, a smile of soft scorn wreathing his firm lips—"no, I am not ready to meet them—yet."

As he mused the soft scorn melted away, and the expression his face wore when lost in contemplation resumed its place. Once more he glanced about the room with a look which seemed to say, "This life, so solitary and so simple, has its charms for me, it is the life I have chosen, and I am reaping its results."

Alice herself paused to reflect something of this feeling as she slowly turned the leaves of that beloved book with which she had become so identified. But those many times which her wistful pain came into those golden eyes, and the proud lips curved to passionate regret. It came now as the far sound of Christmas chimes floated to her ears during the nook she turned her face away from her father's possible observation; but it was unnecessary. In a few moments he was once more at his solitary walk below the bend of the hill, where the shoreward path led over deserted plains and trackless snows. But they were familiar and well beaten foot. And left alone she gave herself up to the memories those chiming bells suggest. Memories that a few moments later, deeply, dropped half unconsciously through quivering lips:

"That he should have failed me!" And as she spoke the bell clanged mournfully in tones of Cross and Passion.

Lost in these reveries she does not hear that unusual outdoor bustle with the coming of whose amazed voice denies the existence of any Miss Rosemere within those walls.

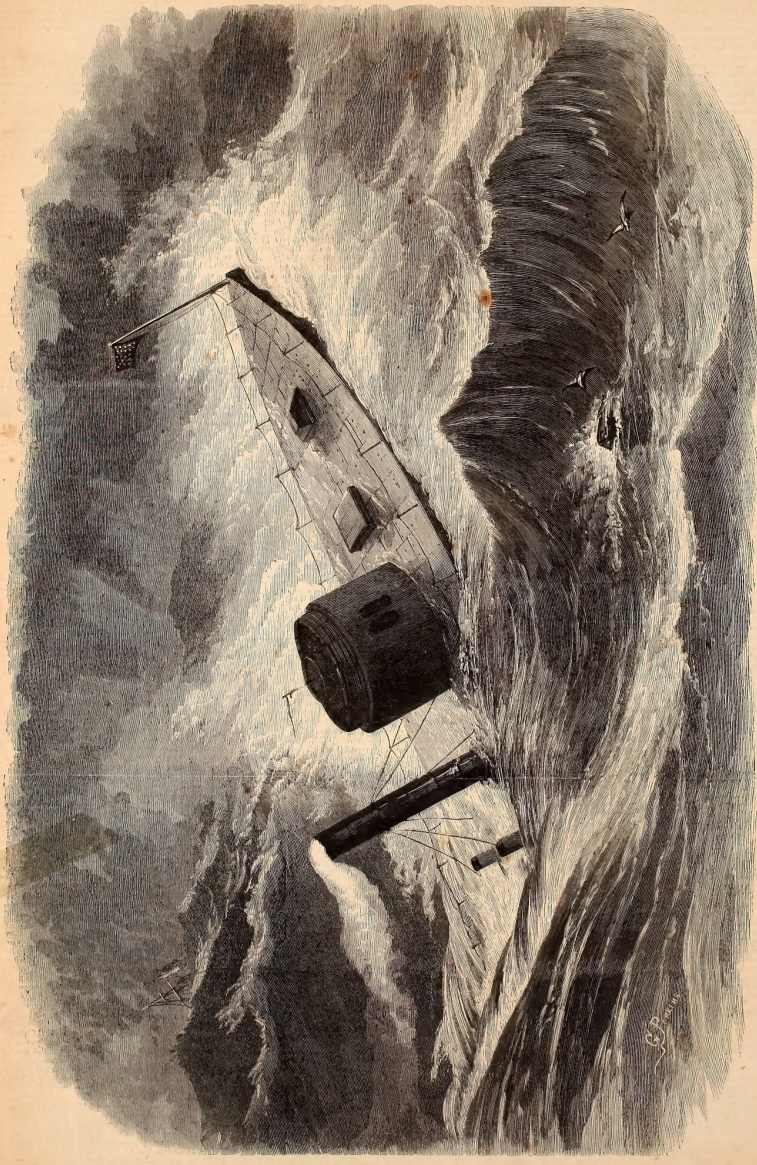
"My mistress name is Ross, Sir—Miss Ross."

But the visitor pushes past her.

And Alice does not hear the opening door, nor note her guest, until, through the last clanging bells, the tide of memory, that voice—the voice of him she thought had failed her—meets her ear. In what torturing words does he speak of the past, does he tell the eloquent tale of his devotion? By what tender phrase has he soothed her pain, her weariness, has he so suddenly summoned back the mystic light within those golden eyes? Oh, spirit of Love, make answer! She only knows the earth and sky, that faith and hope have given her once throughout the world, and Heaven is very near.

When Mr. Rosemere returns even his impassible face shows evidence of the emotions of his generous thus unbidden guest. Then he listens to a story which awakens still deeper wonder: a story told in few words, but in a few manly words, of this long love and unwavering search.

Beneath the cold and proud exterior of Henry Rosemere, for nearly all his years, a tender and enduring unbelief, there lurked a passionate heart and a vivid imagination. And as he listened to this tale of everlasting constancy, as one sentence broke to another, in brief and calm phrases, his heart was touched and his imagination fired. He felt all the pain and fervor which was left unspoken—all the enduring devotion, the steadfast will. And shaking from his face the cloak of reserve:



"Here is a nature that is both steady an' ardent, a soul undaunted and faithful." Heroic elements which he knew how to appreciate. "Robert," he said, as soon as the other had concluded, "I loved your father. He was my closest friend. You shall be my son, and bless you!"

And turning, he left the room.

This instant appreciation and fine comprehension were the only answer to the outpouring of surprise to Robert Weymer on this strange day. If the Rosemeres were proud it was the pride of lofty natures. And Robert Weymer felt no surprise at this. And giving largely, it accepts as largely. Thus it was that when their guest spoke of his new home that Mr. Rosemere, doubly subdued by his delicate proof of unvarying intensity of feeling, overcoming the old pain of association, himself suggested what the other could not.

And so it came to pass that on that Christmas-day, as her lover had wildly and passionately vowed, Alice reigned at Holly Hill. But long before another Christmas came round—ay, long before the spring-buds of that year had bloomed in the garden and the wood—she reigned there indeed, not temporarily, as on that single day, but for all days of every year.

And Henry Rosemere? Again he was quits with the world. No longer prostrate, suffering defeat, and at the mercy of her pity; but crowned with success and triumphant, an honorable and prosperous future before him. Hand to hand now, face to face, he would meet her. His pride was appeased.

THE UNITED STATES IRON-CLAD MONITOR "WEEHAWKEN" IN THE STORM OF 29TH JANUARY.—[SEE PAGE 85.]

MAJOR-GENERAL HOOKER.

WE publish herewith a portrait of MAJOR-GENERAL JOSEPH HOOKER, who has just been appointed to the command of the Army of the Potomac, in lieu of General Burnside.

Major-General Joseph Hooker was born in Massachusetts about the year 1817, and is consequently about 45 years of age. He entered West Point in 1833, and graduated in 1837, standing No. 28 in a class which included Generals Bernard, Williams, Sedgwick, etc., of the Union army, and Generals Bragg, Mackall, and Early of the rebel forces. At the outbreak of the war with Mexico he accompanied Brigadier-General Hamer as Aid-de-camp, and was brevetted Captain for gallant conduct in several conflicts at Monterey. In March, 1847, he was appointed Assistant Adjutant-General, with the rank of Captain. At the National Bridge he distinguished himself, and was brevetted Major; and at Chapultepec he again attracted attention by his gallant and meritorious conduct, and was brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel.

At the close of the war with Mexico he withdrew from the service, and soon afterward emigrated to California. The outbreak of the rebellion found him there, and he was one of the first of the old West Pointers who offered his services to the Government. He was one of the first batch of Brigadier-Generals of Volunteers appointed by President Lincoln on 17th May, 1861; and was, on his arrival, placed in command of a brigade of the army of the Potomac, and subsequently of a division. From July, 1861, to February, 1862, he was stationed in Southern Maryland, on the north shore of the Potomac, his duty being to prevent the rebels crossing the river, and to annoy them with their river blockade while McClellan was getting his army into trim. This difficult duty he performed admirably.

When the army of the Potomac moved to the Peninsula, Hooker accompanied them in charge of a division. In the contest at Williamsburg his division bravely stood the brunt of the battle, the men of the Excelsior Brigade actually being mowed down as they stood up in line. At Fair Oaks the men again showed their valor, and the General his fighting qualities. In the various minor contests Hooker took his part and bravely went through with his share of the seven days' fights. When McClellan's army was placed under the command of General Pope, we find the names of "Fighting Joe Hooker" and the late General Kearney mentioned together in the thickest of the struggle; and again at South Mountain and Sharpsburg he seems to have been second to no one. At the latter fight he was shot through the foot and obliged to leave the field; but for this accident, he thinks he would have driven the rebels into the Potomac.

After the battle he sent the following report to General McClellan:

CENTREVILLE, MD., Sept. 17, 1862.

Major-General McClellan:

A great battle has been fought, and we are victorious. I had the honor to open it yesterday afternoon, and it continued until ten o'clock this morning, when I was wounded and compelled to quit the field. The battle was fought with great violence on both sides. The carnage has been awful. I only regret that I was not permitted to take part in the operations until they were concluded, for I had counted on either capturing their army or driving them into the Potomac. My wound has been painful, but is not one that will be likely to lay me up. I was shot through the foot.

J. HOOKER, Brigadier-General.

On the reorganization of the army under General Burnside, General Hooker was given the command of one of the three grand Divisions into which it was distributed. He commanded his Division at Fredericksburg, but took no active part in the fight.

The Herald gives the following memoranda of him:

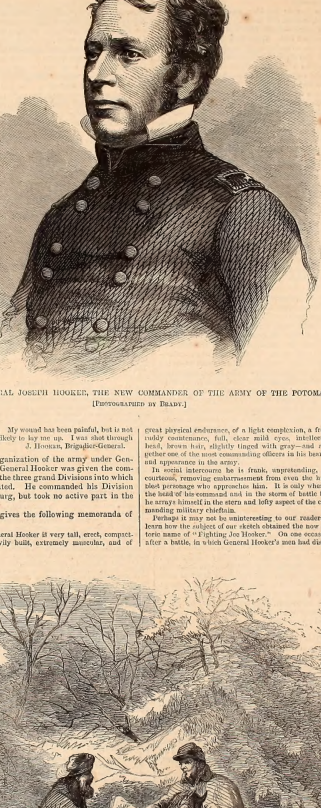
In person General Hooker if very tall, erect, compactly, but not heavily built, extremely muscular, and of great physical endurance, of a light complexion, a fresh, ruddy countenance, full, clear mild eyes, intellectual head, brown hair, slightly tinged with gray—and altogether one of the most commanding officers in his bearing and appearance in the army.

In social intercourse he is frank, unpretending, and courteous, removing embarrassment from even the humblest personage who approaches him. It is only when at the head of his command and in the storm of battle that he arrays himself in the stern and lofty aspect of the commanding military chieftain.



Perhaps it may not be uninteresting to our readers to learn how the subject of our sketch obtained the now historic name of "Fighting Joe Hooker." On one occasion, after a battle, in which General Hooker's men had distinguished themselves for their fighting qualities, thus adding to the fame of their commander, a dispatch to the New York Associated Press was received at the office of one of the principal agencies announcing the fact. One of the copyists, wishing to show in an emphatic manner that this commander was really a fighting man, placed over the head of the manifold copies of the dispatch the words "Fighting Joe Hooker." Of course this heading went to nearly every newspaper office of the country, through the various agencies, and was readily adopted by the editors and printed in their journals. The sobriquet was also adopted by the army and by the press, and is now well known all over the world. Thus an unpretending, innocent copyist, unaware that he was making history, prefixed to this General's name a title that will live forever in the annals of the country.

But it appears that General Hooker does not like his title; for, on one occasion, when called so by a friend, he is reported to have said, "Don't call me Fighting Joe, for that term has done and is doing me incalculable injury. It makes a portion of the public think that I am a bat-headed, furious young fellow, accustomed to making furious and needless dashes at the enemy." By this remark it would appear that, although he has the characteristic of undoubted bravery and boldness, he still possesses some of that prudence and caution without which no general can be great.

General Hooker's friends in California have prepared a handsome testimonial in remembrance of his past services. It is a sword of the finest steel, with belt thickly studded with diamonds, a scabbard of solid silver, heavily and richly mounted with gold. The cost of this magnificent sword will be between $4000 and $5000. The inscriptions are as follows:

MAJOR-GENERAL JOSEPH HOOKER,
FROM HIS FELLOW-CITIZENS OF SAN FRANCISCO,
December 20, 1862.

Williamsburg—Fair Oaks—Glendale—Malvern Hill—
Bull Run—Germantown—South Mountain—
Antietam.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOSEPH HOOKER, THE NEW COMMANDER OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

ONE of our correspondents, Mr. Oertel, has illustrated one of the few amenities of war, the INTERCHANGE OF CIVILITIES BETWEEN TWO MOUNTED PICKETS on the Upper Rappahannock. When the war first broke out the pickets on either side used to fire at each other on sight, and it gave our officers a good deal of trouble to check the murderous practice. The rule is now the other way. The pickets no sooner find themselves within hailing distance than they begin to converse; and the chat generally ends in an interchange of rations, liquor, and newspapers. This custom is severely reprobated by most of our Generals, but is very common nevertheless. Mr. Oertel writes: "During the recent engagement at Fredericksburg it was a most essential precaution to guard against a flank movement by the enemy, and the fords above on the river were vigilantly watched. This important duty was assigned to the Sixth New York Cavalry, who by former experience knew all the fords and roads thereabout well, and they were there by special order of General Burnside, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel M'Vicar. They are at the post still. The duty is arduous, and one of danger, being at the extreme right, and in sight and within easy reach of the enemy. The pickets sometimes meet, by special agreement, in the middle of the river, first laying down their arms at their respective shores, and in this wise they friendly converse, and exchange such commodities as tobacco and newspapers."

MEETING OF UNION AND REBEL PICKETS IN THE RAPPAHANNOCK.—[SKETCHED BY MR. OERTEL.]

OUR HISTORY.

AMOAD in the breeze waves our starry flag,
Beneath its folds toil we.
We make their nations their harvests reap,
And some are at play, and some asleep,
We are writing our history.

We write—not one to labor alone,
But thousands hold the pen.
Delicate youth and hoary age
Leave a record upon the page,
Fair women and stalwart men.

What does our history speak about,
What story does it tell?
It tells of struggles, of hopes, and fears,
Of hearty foes, and bitter tears
(The world knows the lesson well!)

Of gallant deeds to make one thrill,
And perils by land and sea;
Of children leaving their mother's side
To strike one blow, in their childish pride,
For the country of the free.

Oh! scornful world, watching without,
"Stricken of God?" ye say?
Nay, through the cloud as our fathers trod,
We are marching onward to meet our God,
His promise our only stay.

What though the sword from its scabbard leap,
And cannon echoes wake!
Though thousands are falling beside us— Still
We follow boldly, for 'tis His will
That we suffer for Freedom's sake!

O not one star from our flag shall fade!
There our Father bade them be,
And said if we kept them free from stain
They should form forever a golden chain
To bind us to Liberty.

And so, though foreign foes would beguile,
And traitorous voices call;
Though anarchy's waves would rise at every turn,
On bended knees an oath we have sworn,
That our banner shall never fall!

There is hardly a house where every chair
Is filled as it might have been,
Were there no blank sheets in our history,
To be filled ere another year we see—
And faster travels the pen.

It matters not, O doubting world!
That our labor be hard or long,
For never by man was a good work wrought
But angels were with the devil fought,
Yet Heaven was the strong.

Float on the breeze, thou flag of hope!
Bravely beneath roll we!
While other nations their harvests reap,
With glorious deeds for memory's keep,
We are writing our history.

POOR PHIL!

IT was a mystery to me; why Bob Lyons should fight so shy of Nellie Waterman, the prettiest girl in the place, I couldn't for my life imagine! He had been badly hit at Fredericksburg, and was borne on sick-leave; and every day her carriage stopped at Mr. Wood's door (by-the-way, it was worth the waiting to see the fine fort and saddle that she shoved in getting out) with a basket of hot-house fruit, or flowers that she had arranged herself (and she did those things like a French woman), or the last feuilleton, for Lieutenant Lyons. But though Bob had a hearty laugh and a shake of the little roan at the head of the stairs that his callers use, he never took the smallest notice, except a grateful acknowledgment very like an oath, from under his mustache, or, if in the parlors, to bobble away as fast as possible, for fear of meeting her. The flowers he wouldn't let into his room, but left them to wither in the outer hall; the fruit he gave the children; the books he tossed over to his sisters without cutting open—in short, if Nellie Waterman had been the cholera, instead of a handsome, stylish girl, he could hardly have avoided her more persistently; churlishly refusing to give any other reason for his unaccountable conduct than that it was his whim.

Nothing like it, by-the-way, so hard to prison secrets. Relax your vigilance ever so little, and the things will be on the house-top in spite of you. And so one day out popped Bob's confession, like a Jack-in-the-box, and he told me all that was in his heart.

It was in answer to some remark of mine about Nellie Waterman, who had just passed. Bob turned his back quickly to the window, and sent his cigar savagely into the fire.

"I had as lief see a toad," he said—"rather, for it wouldn't be necessary to be civil to the spotted animal. Do you remember what Jule was reading the other night—something of Ruskin's, I think, about girls with spots of blood on their ball-dresses, and grave-weeds twined in their wreaths? Well, I swear I never see this one without thinking that her dainty hands are red with blood, and that her beautiful bright hair is thick-twisted with the yellow that shades Phil Seldon's grave. Poor dear old Phil! he were her false face over his heart when he went down. Worthless as he had proved her to be, he could never quite give her up. I had known her from a child, and warned him of his danger, and the ugly shadow that ever fell on our friendship came between us then. There never was a man more thoroughly infatuated. He thought her pink and white face the incarnation of purity; her downcast looks he took for modesty; and it was useless to tell him that, besides her pretty face, she was simply full of coquetry, bonnets, and French novels.

"She was, in his idea, womanly perfection—physical, mental, and moral. And she threw him over, of course—flirted with him till she was tired, then dropped him. When he insisted on making reason for this wrecking of his hopes, closed her doors against him by way of answer. He came back fuming like a pilot-boat in a hurricane. Indeed, you could scarcely have dreamed that this was our old sunshiny Phil.

"I hate women when I think of it. Leave out my mother and sisters, and all the crinoline and grimacing in the world are not worth his dear old face, though he never looked worth-all after that, unless he was on some specially dangerous service —some risky reconnoitring or picket duty, affording him an extra chance of being killed. Then he used to light up with a sort of grim satisfaction, because, he told me once, the excitement left him no time to think; adding, mournfully, that he should be dubbed the greatest coward in the regiment could it but be known with what dread he looked forward to his long, sleepless nights, and those listless days when only the ordinary routine was going on.

"We were before Fredericksburg—or rather, the river that separated it from us. Phil had just come back from——, where he had been sent on a secret mission, and had returned only short time enough to come on here, and get himself stabbed to the heart afresh. He had seen Nellie; she had received him as only she can receive anybody she has in feet; but relenting by degrees, suffered him to plead his cause again, and raised his hopes only to dash them most fatally to the ground.

"He came back utterly desperate. We were getting ready for the bombardment, and he threw himself into the preparations in the very wildest spirit of twenty men. Every thing was as peaceful as if Nature was holding her breath to watch us. In the early hush of the Sunday morning, though I don't know what ever put it in my head at such a time, I could think of nothing but that other winter's day when I was in church quietly praising God, and proclaiming peace on earth. The water seemed to hush itself, as if afraid to ripple. In the stillness a wreath of mist lifted itself from the dogs and the melancholy chiming of the town-clock sounding out the hour; while on our side the only stir was the preparations we were making to get the batteries into position, and the heavy roll of the pontoon trains going down to the river-bank. It sounded like thunder in our ears; but they are as dead silence as if they were all in an enchanted sleep till our men had pushed off and fairly gotten the bridge across the river.

"I don't know whether they suspected what we were up to or not, or whether it was a part of their cursed strategy to let us get right under a possible under fire; but when they did at last commence they made things lively for us, as you may imagine. We comfortably stowed away in cellars and houses on the bank, they had only to cut us down at their leisure. Shell and shot came in showers—round, unavailing; the city indeed was fired, but the forces were not unearthed, and three times our brave fellows were driven back, and brought their dead and wounded up the bank to fill the floors of the Lacy House.

"By this time it was morning, and we had procured a train with solid shot from Aquia; the rebels, who had stopped firing, commenced again, and the fight was renewed with terrible fury. A splendurous fog cleared away, Fredericksburg burning like a second Moscow. The solid shot plunged through brick and stone, and the pontoons had a fresh effort to lay the bridge proved also unavailing, the rebel sharp-shooters dropping our men like so many rotten apples.

"Then it was that Burnside called for volunteers, and that the Seventh Michigan and our regiment (the Nineteenth Massachusetts) answered the call. As we marched out, Phil came quickly up to Mark Gifford, his brother-in-law, who was at my side.

"'You are to take care of Nellie, if need be,' he said. 'I have none, and never shall. Let me go in your place; wait (as Mark was going to refuse) and hear me. I am not a coward, you know that; I swear it, even if I swim after the boats; so there will be simply two to mourn for in the homesteads of your people.'

"He was in such desperate earnest, and the time was so short, for the regiment was already moving on, and Mark, never to swallow a lump of Phil, was so taken by surprise that he stepped back, and Phil took the place by my side and rushed on with us. Our boat was the fifth that left the bank, when we went down that bank I no more dreamed of ever coming alive out of that ruin of fire than of going to heaven in a chariot of flame. Indeed, as we crouched behind the boats and the piles of lumber the bank came in among us like hailstones. Phil got a slight scratch, and a ball carried off his cap as if it had come expressly for it. Not that we left all the fighting to the rebels. We did a little sharp-shooting on our own account, right and left, while in its way, and keeping them about as busy as they knew how, the cannon began to speak again; then we pushed for the bank, got into them pell-mell, and made off. Such a crossing! It wasn't exactly a sail by moonlight, I can tell you. I never imagined such a din possible, unless at the day of judgment. Crack! crack! from those deadly rifles, and our poor fellows dropping at every shot, though lying low as possible in the boats. Our batteries thundering away, waking up the echoes, that rolled back on us as if they were having a battle of their own. I don't believe I ever shall again experience such an intoxicating excitement as I felt on landing with my head still on my shoulders.

"I panted out something of this sort to Phil, who answered with a stern smile and something about the ides of March, only half heard, as we rushed up the bank and after the rebels scampering out of every ridge, and from behind every wall and shrub, springing up as if they had been a sort of fungus growth of legs warranted to make good time before Yankee bayonets.

"Most of them escaped, but some either couldn't or wouldn't run. One of these fellows Phil started. A surly fellow, grim and gaunt, who had taken out a cellar door, and evidently meaning to die game. I called out as I saw the man taking deliberate aim at Phil, coming down the street; but he kept turning his head in answer, and showing me the same obtuse, reckless look that he had worn all that day, went on one step further—got the ball in his heart; for he was dead when I reached him.

"I was on his murderer before he had time to load again, and I think I should have beaten him to death as I did then had he been Samson; rage and grief were terrible powers in me. But, after all, what was his worthless life? It can never comfort me, or help weep for Phil in the old homestead, where he lies buried, dear fellow! dead—poor, loving, generous heart!—by that woman, whom I long, every time I meet her, to call Murderess!"

CAPTURE OF THE POST OF ARKANSAS.

WE publish on page 81 an illustration of the BOMBARDMENT OF THE POST OF ARKANSAS on the Arkansas River, by Admiral Porter's fleet, on January 11. Our picture is from a sketch transmitted by the correspondent of the Herald, and kindly placed at our disposal by Mr. Bonner. We give portraits of ADMIRAL PORTER and GENERAL M'CLERNAND, the heroes of the affair.

The 10th January, with land forces, under the command of General M'Clernand, and the flotilla, under Admiral Porter, ascended the river, and the latter immediately opened a view of surrounding the work. During the night the gun-boats fired a few shots at the work, and next morning, the troops being in position, the attack commenced in earnest. The Herald correspondent says:

THE BOMBARDMENT.

It was five minutes past one when the gun-boats Baron De Kalb, Commander Walker, ironclad, all iron-clad, steamed up to within about three hundred yards of the fort, and opened fire upon it. At the same moment above here in sight, and before they fired a shot, the fort opened on them. The first shot struck over the bend in the river, the rebels had exerted several targets, which were to assist them in firing at the gun-boats. Another shot was soon placed in the river opposite the fort; but the high-water mark was reached, and the shot struck on the inland open. The bombardment increased in rapidity as other vessels of the squadron came into action. It took some time to get good range of the cannonade guns and the barbette guns in the fort, but after a few shots had been fired the Admiral's fire at the right hand easemate, the Louisville at the middle one, and the gun-boats at the left, the Baron De Kalb and the Lexington, the latter commanded by Lieutenant-Commander Woodworth, and the Cincinnati, commanded by Commander Stemble, the gun it was instructed to fire at about the same time. At twenty minutes past two the fire was very severe, and the rifled guns in the fort were most effectually silenced. The De Kalb, Commander Walker, the Louisville, Captain Phelps, and Admiral's flag-ship, steamed up and took part in the fight. The Admiral's flag-ship, his secretary, Dr. Heap, was in the little tug which was all the time steaming and dancing about among the gun-boats, directing and superintending the fight.

THE LAND ATTACK.

The first gun from the fleet was the signal for the soldiers to move. Generals Morgan and Burnside immediately pushed forward their men, and were met by a fierce fire from the rebel works. The Herald correspondent thus describes the crisis and end of the fight:

"The troops in front were now sharply engaging the rebels in the rifle-pits, and their fight was the hottest. Just behind the breastwork near the fort, were blazing away the rebel guns, and the rebel gunners, as they fired, and the rebels galloped the horses up to the parapet with a gun, and then wheeled them around with it, in order that it might be placed in position, our infantry fire killed all the men who attempted to run the guns around, and for an instant and left their gun. At a shot from one of our Parrott guns, Lieutenant Dunnington, of the fourteenth battalion, at least a hundred rebels ran away from behind the intrenchments into the open field, and fled in confusion, and now coming from the front for ammunition. At ten minutes past three most of Morgan's men were in. Burnside's corps now were forming in columns in the rear. In five minutes more they were all in position, and a sharp musketry and artillery firing was kept up all the time. At twenty minutes past three a heavy column of Morgan's men moved up to the left of the fort, and near the river bank. It was at first supposed that it was the intention of Morgan's corps to go in the rear by a double-quick, for it is well known that when Morgan gets in the rear of a fort, he is sure to leave the fort abandoning columns, enveloped in clouds of smoke, had left the fort, and were retreating. It was at this time that was moving quickly to the front to extend the attacking line.

The time now was fifteen minutes past three. Every thing was now coming from the front for ammunition. At ten minutes past three most of Morgan's men were in. Burnside's corps now were forming in columns in the rear. In five minutes more they were all in position, and a sharp musketry and artillery firing was kept up all the time. At twenty minutes past three a heavy column of Morgan's men moved up to the left of the fort, and near the river bank. It was at first supposed that it was the intention of Morgan's corps to go in the rear by a double-quick, for it is well known that when Morgan gets in the rear of a fort, he is sure to leave the fort abandoning columns, enveloped in clouds of smoke, had left the fort, and were retreating. It was at this time that was moving quickly to the front to extend the attacking line.

The time now was fifteen minutes past three. Every thing was coming close to the bank, and, with the other gunboats, was pouring shot into the fort; Lindsay's brigade, across the river, was also firing into the works, while Morgan's and Sherman's men were advancing fast in front. The white flag was seen in several places on the parapet; individuals were seen running from troops to troops, waving conseil; the rebels ran from behind the breastworks; and still Morgan's and Sherman's men pushed on, and still the rebels could not rally, and still they could not rebuild the rebel flag. The fort had surrendered.

TAKING POSSESSION.

He adds:

The moment the lieutenant in the trees had reported the cheering along the line and had concluded with "I believe the fort has surrendered," General M'Clernand and staff dashed off, and were soon in the enemy's intrenchments, surrounded by thousands of the men. When the flag was shown on the river side the jolly Jack Tars had jumped ashore and were soon in the fort, followed by Admiral Porter and a number of his officers. Colonel Dunnington, commander of the fort, surrendered his sword to the Admiral in person. General Churchill, commander of the fort, was captured with all his staff, and surrendered himself and his troops to General M'Clernand. "I am sorry I have been under such circumstances," said General M'Clernand; "what your men fought bravely to-day in defending the fort." General Churchill replied, that himself he had not intended to surrender; that there was no other alternative as the fleet was in the rear, also in the left with his staff, and on hearing the cheering supposed it was the capturing of his men, but on riding back into the fort had found our troops just taking possession. He said that he had issued orders to the troops that they must die in the ditches in preference to surrendering the Post. It is certain that the enemy could no longer successfully resist, and also that white flags were shown in the parapets of the fort on the river side. Some of the soldiers told me that General Churchill had ordered the surrender. General Churchill told me that he did not; but, on the contrary, that the place was surrendered in his absence. It may be that the officers, seeing that further resistance was useless, declined to shoulder the defense. One thing is certain, there was great unanimity among the rebels in the surrender.

POST OF ARKANSAS.

He thus describes the place:

Post of Arkansas is the oldest settlement in the State. Seventy two centuries ago there was a Spanish town in the vicinity of the present city, and I believe a small Spanish fort. It is situated on the right bank as you ascend the Arkansas River, about fifty miles from the mouth, and one hundred and seventeen miles from Napoleon, at the head of the State. It was settled in 1685 by the Arkansas French, as they are called, who live in the surrounding country. From the high point on which the fort is constructed, to the Mississippi River on the land along the course of the Arkansas overflows during the winter and the spring. The river is the property of the Arkansas, only a few steps, and then at intervals for a few miles along the river bank are cultivated fields.

The fort is a regular, square-bastioned work, one hundred yards on exterior side, with a ditch twenty-five feet wide, and a parapet eighteen feet high. A number of blind mud redoubts were lying in the ditches when we entered, and many sick soldiers in the hospital. All the heavy guns were on the river face, and had been thrown about in fragments on the ground. Ammunition captured by the rebels in the Arkansas Blue Wing was a large amount of war materials and supplies of various kinds, and about one thousand prisoners have been taken into our hands by this brilliant achievement of our arms.

ADMIRAL PORTER.

The following sketch of Admiral Porter, who commanded the gun-boat attack, will remind the reader who he is:

ADMIRAL DAVID D. PORTER, the Commander of the Mississippi Flotilla, is the son of the famous Commodore David Porter, of the War of 1812, who died about the year 1814. In 1829 he entered the navy as midshipman on board the Essex, commanded by his father, and was in that ship and the United States. In 1841 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant, and was attached to the Observatory at Washington he was placed on active duty in the Gulf of Mexico, where he remained, and served with that rank on board the Constellation for four years. After a brief period on the Coast Survey, he was appointed to the command of the Pacific Mail Company's steamer, and remained several years in the service of that company. When he commanded one of the California steam-ships—the Crescent City—he made a voyage which attracted much public attention at the time. In consequence of the Black Warrior affair Spain had demanded and refused to grant satisfaction, and the United States would be entirely justified in declaring war against that power. Such was the opinion of the officers of the Crescent City, when she left Havana, and had she been overhauled on the high seas, and, by force, detained, he would go in; and he did, the Habaneros fearing to do so upon him. He was afterward, on board the Saranac flag ship stationed at that time, in defiance, after which he was ordered to the Pacific.

At the beginning of the year 1861 he was under orders to join the Gulf squadron; on the 19th of April, however, had not left when the rebellion broke out. His name at that time stood number 4 on the list of lieutenants. The resignation of several naval traitors left room for his advancement, and in the "Naval Register" for August 1, 1861, places him number seventy-seven on the list of commanders. He was placed in command of the steam ship of war Powhatan, a vessel of about twenty-five hundred tons, and was ordered to the Gulf coast. After blockading duty for some time, he left that ship to take special charge of the mortar vessels. The mortar vessels just took part in the reduction of the forts below New Orleans will make his name as familiar to the people of the nation with that of "bombers," as the sailors term them. After the capture of New Orleans, he left the Gulf for the Mississippi River, and was engaged in several affairs on that river, including that at Vicksburg. From there he was ordered to the Yazoo River, and returned to the Ozborean, from which flag ship he left for the Red River expedition, he fell in with and captured the Anglo-rebel steamer Rebel Queen. He was highly applauded for the conduct of all the naval forces on the Mississippi River, with the rank of acting Rear-Admiral, which rank he now holds, and proceeds, guns, and men, is larger than has ever heretofore been under the command of any United States naval officer. His squadron is distinct in every way from that of Admiral Farragut, and is now operating on the Yazoo and Blockading Squadron.

The Post of Arkansas is the first exploit performed by the Admiral in his new command. We may expect to hear of the reduction of many others.

Admiral Porter is a man of wiry, muscular frame, hardened by long years of exposure, height, 5 feet 9 inches, and is now about forty-seven years of age. He married a lady from Massachusetts, January 1, 1832. The last-named lady resides with her children on the Tennessee River, and fought the rebel ram Arkansas on the Mississippi River. Mrs. Admiral Porter-John Brown of Tennessee.

MAJOR-GENERAL M'CLERNAND.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN A. M'CLERNAND is a lawyer by profession, and has figured prominently as a leading Democratic politician from Illinois. He was a leader of the Douglas Democrats, and did battle for them valiantly at Charleston. At the outbreak of the war he took close military rank in the Cullom, and shortly afterward was nominated by Governor Yates Brigadier General of Volunteers. In the Belmont fight he manifested that he possessed very good military capacity, and during his administration of military affairs at Cairo he secured the good-will of the men under his command. He was subsequently, in the year of his command, the advance upon Fort Henry, and at the grand battle before Fort Donelson, General M'Clernand made fested superior military ability. For his gallantry on these occasions he was, on the 31st of March, made by Congress a Major-General of Volunteers, and accompanied the advance up the Tennessee River toward Savannah. At the battle at Pittsburg Landing he distinguished himself exceedingly. On 3d January he superseded General Sherman in command of the army which was repulsed at Vicksburg, and proceeded immediately to attack the Post of Arkansas as narrated above.

TORPEDOES IN THE WESTERN RIVERS.

THROUGH the politeness of an officer in the navy we are enabled to lay before our readers, on page 85, the picture of a REBEL TORPEDO in one of the Western Rivers. All the tributaries of the Mississippi are filled with these destructive implements of warfare, and the rebels seem to be improving in their manufacture. A year ago our sailors used to laugh at them, and the harmlessness of torpedoes became proverbial. Since the destruction of the ships in the YAZOO RIVER they have been fewer jests on the subject. These torpedoes are fired off in various ways—some by electricity, from a concealed station on shore—but more of them by friction, as in the sketch. A vessel passing over the torpedo we have illustrated, and scraping one of the floats with her bottom would ignite the two demijohns of powder, and knock a hole in her hull which would cause her to sink in ten minutes. The means of sending the torpedoes and fishing them up is one of the most exciting and perilous duties of our Western sailors.

THE "WEEHAWKEN" IN THE GALE.

We illustrate, on page 92, the Monitor "WEEHAWKEN" in the gale of 30th. Her performance in this encounter was admirable, and set at rest the apprehensions which had been raised by the loss of the original Monitor. She proved that she was a seaworthy vessel, and actually behaved better than the tug which had been taken to take care of her. Her captain, John Rodgers, late of the Golora, sent the following telegram to Captain Ericsson on his arrival at Fortress Monroe:

FORTRESS MONROE, January 19, 1863.

We have arrived safely, and all well. Monday, about two P.M., had to cast off from the Seneca on account of heavy weather and freshening. She ran back toward the Delaware Breakwater. Had a hard storm from the northeast on Sunday night; were about thirty feet high. Vessel made excellent weather and very little motion. When the Seneca left I refused a line from her to the Ironsides—I am now sure wisely. Yesterday, when the gale had abated, took a tow-line from the Seneca. Arranged her machinery, cast off and came in alone. The Iroquois came in under steam, and is now here.

JOHN RODGERS,
Captain Iron-clad Weehawken.

HOMELESS.

JESSIE, as I came home to-day, I saw
That crippled man upon the flags, we have
So often seen, with crutches our pity to.
I watched him crawl along the sunny street
Through heedless crowds, until he reached the place
Where evening shades, and there he lay down.
His strong companions, those two crutches were,
And sat him down upon the stones and slept—
And gazed and gazed. Then, Jessie, all my tears
Rose to my eyes, and in the street I wept
So, I could hardly speak for weeping; but
I came close up to him and paused and said:
"Oh! I could break my heart against these stones
To see you thus. I'd give my limbs to be Utterly sick and sore, if only by
My breaking I could give you perfectness!"
His smile of thanks started with eyes—but not
Like eyes that I care see, whose grief had plucked
Majesty from despair—his had a strange
Unmanly stare, more like of peace than pain.
Jessie, he is not sorry to be there:
He never wept as I wept for him then!
He finds contentment in the gaudy street;
Finds in carriage wheels a ceaseless home
Among the people; rest in their unrest.
I turned away; but, looking once again,
Saw how he raised for upon his head.
The wan face dropped on the half-covered breath—
His eyelids closed. I thought that he was dead.
He was but sleeping—velvet-footed Sleep,
Treading her way amid the crowds and din,
Had taken him tenderly and laid him in
The cradle quietness. Stretched on the ground
I left him sleeping, who had found
Infinite pity above him and around.

BURTON ON DU CHAILLU AND GORILLAS.

CAPTAIN BURTON has written a letter, as follows, which we find in the London Critic:

SIR,—Arriving—sadness, not sickness—in this unpleasant land by the West African mail, I was astonished to find in your columns my name cited by a private correspondent, and a passage from one of my letters quoted to the detriment of M. Paul du Chaillu. As this is hardly fair to myself, perhaps you will allow me room for a few lines of explanation.

M. du Chaillu and I differ upon many points. He may be right, or we may be wrong, but that is still a question. I am willing, however, to trouble your readers with a discussion touching particulars. I will briefly state that, after a residence of about three weeks in the Gaboon country, during which I travelled to Cape Lopez, and explored the northeastern fork of the river beyond any former traveler, my opinion of M. du Chaillu's book is lighter than it was before visiting the land of the gorilla.

The Mpongue natives give "Mpulo"—i. e., the "demon," the equivalent of M. Du'l'ne meaning—a peculiar character as a chaunter. So soon, the native Jealous Empire, despite his having taken the great stronghold round, I modestly disbelieve in the danger, and nursery it is sense. Hiding for this opportunism to have succeeded when three Englishmen—Mr. Lertzen, Mr. Winwood Reade, and myself—have failed.

And with thanks for your kindness, and with a colored promise, under any and all circumstances, to be deaf and dumb upon the "gorilla controversy" until I do buy a gorilla or two, I subscribe myself, Sir, your obedient servant,

RICHARD F. BURTON, F.R.G.S.

14 MONTAGU PLACE, MONTAGU SQUARE, Jan. 10.

POPULAR NEW BOOKS

Just Published by

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, Postage free, on receipt of Price.

WILKIE COLLINS'S NO NAME. NO NAME. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Queen of Hearts," "Antonina," &c., &c. Illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN. 8vo, Cloth, $1 50; Paper, $1 25.

BRADDON'S AURORA FLOYD. AURORA FLOYD. A Novel. By M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Lady Audley's Secret." 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

RUSSELL'S AMERICAN DIARY. MY DIARY NORTH AND SOUTH. By WILLIAM HOWARD RUSSELL, LL.D. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

MISS MULOCK'S MISTRESS AND MAID. MISTRESS AND MAID. A Household Story. By DINAH MARIA MULOCK, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Life for a Life," "Olive," "The Ogilvies," "Agatha's Husband," "The Head of the Family," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TROLLOPE'S ORLEY FARM. ORLEY FARM. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Doctor Thorne," "Framley Parsonage," "The Bertrams," "Castle Richmond," "The Three Clerks," "The West Indies and the Spanish Main," &c. Illustrated by J. E. MILLAIS. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 50.

THACKERAY'S PHILIP. THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP ON HIS WAY THROUGH THE WORLD: Showing who robbed Him, who helped Him, and who passed Him by. By W. M. THACKERAY, Author of "Vanity Fair," "The Newcomes," "The Virginians," "Pendennis," "The English Humorists of the Eighteenth Century," "The Four Georges," &c., &c., &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

MODERN WAR: ITS THEORY AND PRACTICE. Illustrated from celebrated Campaigns and Battles. With Maps and Diagrams. By ERNEST SZABAD, Captain U.S.A. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

SPRINGS OF ACTION. By MRS. C. H. B. RICHARDS. 12mo, printed on Tinted Paper, Cloth, $1 00; Cloth, Gilt Edges, $1 25.

MEMOIRS OF MRS. JOANNA BETHUNE. By her Son, the Rev. GEO. W. BETHUNE, D.D. With an Appendix, containing Extracts from the Writings of Mrs. Bethune. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

LINES LEFT OUT. By the Author of "Line upon Line," "Streaks of Light," "More about Jesus," "Reading without Tears." With 28 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth gilt, 75 cents.

GENERAL BUTTERFIELD'S OUTPOST DUTY. CAMP AND OUTPOST DUTY FOR INFANTRY. With Standing Orders, Extracts from the Revised Regulations for the Army, Rules for Health, Maxims for Soldiers, and Duties of Officers. By DANIEL BUTTERFIELD, Brig.-Gen. Vols., U.S.A. 18mo, Flexible Cloth, 63 cents.

INDIA RUBBER GLOVES

Should be used by every person who is troubled with Salt Sheum or Chapped Hands, rendering them soft and white as alabaster. They are impervious to hot or cold water, and for house work and gardening are invaluable.

Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of $1 00 for Ladies' Sizes, $1 25 for Gents. O. B. GRAY, 203 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ HARPER JEWELRY &c. Rubber Goods in great variety. Wholesale and Retail.

PRICE'S PATENTS
THE SERGEANT'S
BOLL-DOOR FOR THE COMPANY,
DETAIL AND SQUAD.

A neat pocket-book, bound in a waterproof flap cover, with pencil and calendars for 1862-3, complete. Size 4½ cap, 6½ by 4 inches. Containing blanks which will last for thirty-one days, and one hundred names for six months. Mailed free on receipt of $1 00.

J. W. FURTHMAN, 19 Chatham St., N. Y.

A Liberal Discount to Jobbers and Dealers.

A TALK WITH MY PUPILS.

By MRS. CHARLES BUTLER, Author of "Woman's Counsel," "Life's Preparatory Period. Daughters and Sisters. Relations with the Poor and Friendless. Relations with Servants. Manners. Habits of Nature. Traveling. Teaching. School Government. Marriage. Maternity. Parental Wisdom and Folly. The Shame of Society et al., seven Truth. Days of Mourning. Prejudice and Harsh Judgment. Duties. Courtesy. Extinction. Sent by mail, post paid, on receipt of $1 00.

Address, 19 Broadway, New York.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, and all Army and Navy Claims, promptly collected. Reliable information furnished, rules of claim negotiated legal advice given. Soldiers entitled to a pamphlet of Laws and Instructions sent by enclosing a one-cent stamp to

SOMES & BROWN, 2 Park Place, N. Y.

WEDDING CARDS

Three Colored Engraved Cards sent only at 1 RUSSELL'S Old Establishment, 29 Broadway, cor. Cedar St., N. Y.
☞ Established 1845. Open to Specimen by Mail, and Low Charge.

INVENTORS SHOULD PROCURE A Copy of "HOW TO GET A PATENT." Send a 2 cent stamp to FOWLER AND WELLS, New York.

To the Nervous.

Dr. Adam Laurie's Life Pills,

The great Nervous Remedy, are for sale at the Sole Agency, 4 Union Square, New York.

Price One Dollar per box, with full directions.

All letters with enclosures must be addressed as above.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every County to sell my new Patent Rotary Shuttle Sewing Machine. Address, MACHINE, Box 3, MADISON, Maine.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newborn, and all places occupied by Union Troops, should be sent, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS. No 74 Broadway. Bulters charged low rates.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to be seen—only 30 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate—10 acre tracts of from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good schools and society. Houndreds are settling. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P. M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rural real free. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position, and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies."

"MOUSTACHES AND WHISKERS IN 42 DAYS."

Hunting, Fishing, and many other Books published in the Turf, Field and Farm. 800 cuts. 9th Ed. Price only 20c. Sent Sl. Mailed free. Address C. E. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
WORTH $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	50 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	15 00 each.
1000 Gold and Nork Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Do Do	3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gents' Studs, and Scarf Ring Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
5100 Gents' Breast Pins	2 50 to 3 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 3 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sets of Sleeve Buttons	2 00 to 3 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Mosaic Rings	2 00 to 6 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Lockets	2 00 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Mounted	2 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension and Gold Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All Gold Pens 14 Carats and Warranted.

All of the above will be sold for One Dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one has, will be put into sealed envelopes, well mixed, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; and one hundred for $10.

Agents to those setting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificates ordered by them, provided their business amounts to one dollar. Those who remit us the cents for every Certificate, and remit 18 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County and State.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
295 Broadway, New York.

CATARRH!—Dr. Goodale's CATARRH REMEDY penetrates the very seat of the terrible disease, and exterminates it, root and branch. Price $1.00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. Depot 616 Broadway.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.

NATURE IS BEST IN THE WORLD.
Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.

Cristadoro's Hair Preparations for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

MAJ. GEN. BURNSIDE says: "Its adaptation to Army life and warmth is complete."

Head-Quarters Army of the Potomac, Jan. 9, 1863.

JAMES W. EVANS, Esq., New York:—SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of Dec. 29th, and one of the box containing the "Tent Stove," addressed to Major-Gen'l A. E. BURNSIDE, and to inform you that I have no express his thanks for the Stove, and to say, that he considers it a perfect success; its adaptation to Army life and comfort is complete, as it is sufficiently large to warm an ordinary sized tent, and is very easily transported. Very Resp'y, D. RANNEY, Private Secretary. Major General A. E. BURNSIDE.

Made of cast iron, in 3 pieces; sections. Packs with 6 ft. of pipe in the space of the lower section, for 12 inches. Will be sent by express to any part of the country, boxed complete, $8.

J. W. EVANS,
21 John St.,
New York.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The papers of permanent value which have been published in HARPER'S MAGAZINE form a complete set of HARPER'S MAGAZINE a desirable acquisition to any public or private library. The work is issued in quarterly volumes, each number commencing with the June number. For Twenty-five Cents they will send any Number by mail, post-paid. Any Number, including the Number for June, and in Muslin, will be mailed, post-paid, to any place in the United States within One Dollar of New York, for Four Dollars and Fifty Cents. Complete sets, now comprising Twenty-five Volumes, elegantly bound, will be sent by express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, for One Dollar and Eighty-five Cents per volume.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for one Year 5 00
Three Copies for one Year, for every Club of Two Subscribers, at $2 50 each, in addition to the Club, . . . 7 50
Four Copies for one Year, for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $2 50 each, in addition to the Club, . . . 10 00

Postage to Subscribers in the United States, prepaid by the Publishers.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.

Postage to Subscribers in the United States, prepaid, one year, $0 60.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.

Vols. I., II., III., IV., V., and VI., for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, 1861, and 1862, of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth cases, Price $3 75 each, are now ready.

☞ The Publishers employ no TRAVELING AGENTS. Parties who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly and better remit Direct to the Publishers, or pay their subscription to some Postmaster or General Agent with whom they are associated, and of whose responsibility they are assured.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, &c.

Sloven and Burnish Stude made of the finest Ivory, brought to a high polish, of all colors, and engraved with Initial Letter, Old English, &c. Monograms to order. Free by mail on receipt of price. Sets, $1 50. Trade supplied.
JOHN F. PHELPS, 429 Broadway, N. Y.

COLD PENS retailing at wholesale prices. Send for circular. GEORGE F. HAWKES, 64 Nassau St., N. Y.

GREAT NEWS.

FIRST CITIZEN. "So the Army of the Potomac has crossed the Rappahannock again!"
SECOND CITIZEN. "Ah! indeed! which way?"

ONE OF THE EFFECTS OF THE WAR.

ARMY CONTRACTOR'S WIFE. "And say, Young Man, put me up a Diamond Necklass and a couple of Gold Watches along of them other things!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NEW DIME BOOKS.

Beadle's Dime Book of Verses,

Comprising Rhymes, Lines, and Mottoes: also

Valentines, Album Pieces,

Gift Verses, Birthday Lines, Epitaphs, &c.

Tax Law Decisions (Complete).

Alphabetically arranged—a requisite for every Taxpayer and Collector.

Ten Cents each. Single copies sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. For sale by all Booksellers and News Dealers. Address

BEADLE & CO., 118 William Street, New York.

Barnum's American Museum.

MISS LAVINIA WARREN,

THE LITTLE QUEEN OF BEAUTY,

will positively be

Married to General Tom Thumb,

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 10,

and certainly closes her public exhibition on Saturday, February 7th.

This is the last chance of seeing her. She is on exhibition every day, from 10 A.M. till 10 P.M., till then. Admission 25 cents; Children under 10, 15 cents.

TRUSSES. Dr. Rupp' Hard Rubber Truss challenges the severest criticisms. Warrs-proof, cleanly, and comfortable. This truss and a Varicocele Instrument may be seen at Dr. Rupp' Office, No. 2 Barclay St., N. Y.

$5.—A BEAUTIFUL Engraved GOLD PLATED WATCH, English Movement, perfect Time-keeper. Sent to any address for $5. Fine Watches and Jewelry at low prices. CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., 80 Ann St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED for our Splendid New Mammoth Lincoln Prize Package. 100 per cent. profit. Sells forth with for Agents. $15 per day made. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CAPRON & CO., 9 Ann St., N. Y.

HEIMSTREET'S

Inimitable Hair Restorative.

IT IS NOT A DYE,

But restores grey hair to its original color, by supplying the capillary tubes with natural nutriment, impaired by age or disease. All imitations since are composed of lunar caustic, destroying the vitality and beauty of the hair, and afford of themselves no dressing. Heimstreet's Inimitable Coating not only restores hair to its natural color by an easy process, but gives the hair a

Luxuriant Beauty,

promotes its growth, prevents its falling off, eradicates dandruff, and imparts health and pleasantness to the head. It has stood the test of time, being the original Hair Coloring, and is constantly increasing in favor. Used by both gentlemen and ladies. It is sold by all respectable druggists, or can be procured by them of the commercial agent, H. S. Horner, 22 Broadway, N. Y. Two sizes, 50c. and $1.

Agents. Soldiers

In camp or discharged, can make easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp can act as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Package in endless variety and at all prices. Fine Jewelry and Watches at low prices. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements.

S. C. HICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of Birnie and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at as low a price as is asked for the trashy Anchre and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

102 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Valentine Packages

And Valentines for Soldiers,

New and Very Attractive

Prize Packages.

Many Varieties Adapted for the Army.

Send for NEW Circular.

G. S. HASKINS & Co, No. 36 Beekman St., N. Y.

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlement. Rich soil. Mild climate. See advertisement of Vineland, on previous page.

THE "CRAIG MICROSCOPE,"

Of which over 80 dozen, and 250 dozen mounted objects have been sold since the 1st of Oct. in the city of Boston alone, will be sent, postage paid, with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $3. Liberal discount to dealers. Address HENRY CRAIG, 383 Centre Street, New York.

Portable Printing Offices,

For the use of Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to do their own Printing. Circular sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., on receipt of two 3 ct. stamps.

ADAMS PRESS CO., 21 Park Row, N. Y.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON 259
WORK, Wrought, Cast, and Wire.
IRON RAILINGS, VERANDAHS, BALCONIES, GUARDS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description. Illustrated Catalogue mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM,
259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

Rheumatism—Who has it?

It has been confessedly acknowledged by thousands who have used them, that the Galvano Electro Metallic Insoles are the only preventive and cure. Sold by all druggists and shoe dealers generally. Price $1; sent by mail for $1 25. Secured by English and American Patents. Send for a circular. METTAM & CO., 420 Broadway.

Lithography,

Engraving, and Printing, by LONG & COOPER, 117 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK. Transferring from Plate to Stone made equal to copper-plate printing at one half the cost. Country orders particularly attended to. Send for samples and prices.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $24, $30 and $33
PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

FRENCH FLANNEL ARMY SHIRTS, $24, $27, $30 and $33 per dozen.

S. W. H. WARD, from London, No. 387 Broadway

A REALLY VALUABLE MICROSCOPE, one that a child can use, sent by mail on receipt of 38 cents.

S. WOODWARD, P. O. Box 5173, Boston.

PHYSIOGNOMY, or Signs of Character, as PHYSIOLOGY, and the Bodily Functions; PHRENOLOGY, or the Brain and Nervous System; PSYCHOLOGY, the Science of the Soul; ETHNOLOGY, or the Natural History of Man, with Instructions, in the Choice of Pursuits, Personal Improvement, etc., are some of the topics elucidated in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL AND LIFE ILLUSTRATED for 1863. No. 1 now ready. Only $1 a year. Address FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Buy your Skate Straps with

Fogg's Lever Buckle,

Manufactured by F. STEVENS,

215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK,

And 68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to D. Aden, 381 Pearl St., N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

To Color Photographs

Elegantly and rapidly, you have only to use NEWTON'S IMPROVED COLORING BOOK. It contains the genuine Oil Paint and bottle has the name of the sole agent for the United States affixed. J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston. For sale in New York by WALTER LOW, 812 Broadway. Price $3 48 per box, and with a large bottle of Reducing Liquid, $5 25.

CONFEDERATE (REBEL) MONEY.

Fac-Simile Confederate Treasury Notes.

So exactly like the genuine that where one will pass current the other will go equally well. $500 in Confederate Notes of all denominations, sent free by mail on receipt of $5, by W. E. HILTON, 71 Spruce Street, New York.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE!

MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 38c. COIN PREPAID. Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free. Address F. C. DOWEN, Box 720, Boston, Mass.

By the Author of Aurora Floyd.

LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET.

BY MISS M. E. BRADDON.

Authorof "AURORA FLOYD," "JOHN MARCHMONT'S LEGACY," "THE LADY LISLE," &c.

Cloth, 75 Cents. Paper, 50 Cents.

This Novel has caused an immense excitement in London, and will have an enormous sale here. The English press pronounce it to be far superior to the "WOMAN IN WHITE" or "LADY LISLE." Published by DICK & FITZGERALD, No 18 Ann Street, N. Y.

Copies of the above book sent by mail, to any address, free of postage, on receipt of the price.

10,000 Agents Wanted.

Business permanent, respectable, and very profitable Enclose stamp for full particulars. Address

JONES & CLARK, 60 Nassau Street, New York.

Send for Trade-List, revised Jan. 25, 1863.

FEEKS & BANCKER,

WHOLESALE NEWS AGENTS, Successors to J. F. FEEKS & Co., 24 Ann Street, New York. All orders for Books, Stationery, and Miscellaneous Articles promptly filled.

The American Parlor
Or Floor Skate,
Hard Rubber Rollers,
Anti-friction Axles.

Observe, each Skate is labeled with the trade mark

Also, 50,000 pair of Ladies' and Gents' Ice Skates, comprising all the new and most improved patterns, made from welded steel and iron hardened; Skate Straps and Leather Goods of every description; Fogg's improved Lever Skate Buckle. Sole Agent for Williams, Morse & Co.'s celebrated Skates.

FREDERICK STEVENS,

215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK.
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

IMPORTANT TO AGENTS!!—We have reduced the wholesale price of our GREAT STATIONERY PORTFOLIO PACKAGE. We also give better Watches to our Agents than any other firm. Send stamp for new circular. WEIR & CO., 94 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

GOLD PENS

Retailed at wholesale prices. Goods warranted. Send for a circular, giving list of prices and engravings of Pens. Pens equivalent on the receipt of 38 cents in P. O. Stamps.

E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office 15 Maiden Lane, New York City.

Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machines.

Highest Premium.

International Exhibition, London, 1862.

See the newest Improvement.

Office 505 Broadway, New York.

Confederate Money.

$20.000!—TWENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS IN Fac-similes Notes of different denominations and, postpaid, to any address, on receipt of $5, by S. C. UPHAM, 403 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

HARPER & BROTHERS

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have Just Ready:

BARRINGTON. A Novel. By CHAS. LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Harry Lorrequer," "Arthur O'Leary," "Martins of Cro' Martin," "Maurice Tiernay," "The Dodd Family Abroad," "One of Them," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHRONICLES OF CARLINGFORD. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "The Life of Edward Irving," "The Last of the Mortimers," "The Days of My Life," "The Laird of Norlaw," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00; Paper, 75 cents.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF FRANCE. A History of France from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Second Empire in 1852. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. Large Duo (Uniform with "The Student's Home," "The Student's Gibbon," "Student's Greece," "Liddell's Rome," &c.). Cloth, $1 75.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 320.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3,00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

"Who goes there?"—"Friends."—"Dismount, one friend advance, and give the countersign."

THE PICKET GUARD IN THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. A. R. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 103.]

ONLY ONE MAN KILLED-TO-DAY.

TURNS are tears and sobs in the little brown house
On the hill-side slops so-fay:
Though the sunlight gleams on the outer world
There the clouds drift cold and gray.
"Only one man killed," so the tidings read—
"Our loss was trifling:' we triumphed," twas said—
And only here in the home on the hill
Did the words breathe aught but of triumph still.

They had watched and waited, had prayed and wept,
Those hearts by the cabin hearth,
And the hope was strong that their darling would walk
Unscathed where'er bold the battle's wrath.
They would gladly have shielded his life from ill,
But their trust was all in their Father's will;
They had left the dear life here world-ward now
The pride of their hearts from a soldier's grave.

Now His wisdom had ordered what most they feared,
And their arms were crossed by the stern decree.
"Only one man killed"—so the telegram read—
But for them life's beauty has passed away;
And all the glory and triumph gained
Seems a matter small to the woe bleed-stained,
That has rent and riven like a rushing tide,
Throbs "Only one man killed," as a funeral knell.

"Only one man killed"—so we read full oft,
And replace that the on our side was small;
Forgetting meanwhile that some loving heart
Felt all the force of this murderous hill.
"Only one man killed," comes again and again:
One here more 'mong the martyred slain.
"Only one man killed," carries sorrow for life
To those whose darlings fall in the strife.

A. M. L.

STILL RIVER, MASS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1863.

CHARLESTON.

BY the time this paper reaches its readers Fort Sumter may, perhaps, attract more attention than any other point—except, perhaps, Vicksburg. For it is suspected that the rebels of South Carolina are going to have another opportunity to display their devotion to the cause which has plunged this continent into the present bloody war.

At the time we write the great Southern expedition which has been assembling at Beaufort, North Carolina, must have started, and an army of 83,000 or 40,000 men, with a fleet of thirty to forty iron-clads, must be approaching—if they have not already reached—their destination. Of course no one knows whither they are bound. It may be Wilmington, or it may be Savannah, and it may be Charleston. Among the "sporting fraternity" odds are offered on Charleston; perhaps because there prevails so universally as it did when secret city published for the woes it has brought upon the country. The possession of Charleston would not only gratify a very general and natural desire on the part of the North, but the moral effect of its capture would be immense, and in a material point of view it would be important, as it would put an end to most of the contraband trade which is now carried on between the South and Nassau.

Charleston certainly seems anxious to invite attack. Its rebel city, as is stated in dispatches published on next page, the rebels, under Ingraham, made a very vigorous sortie from the port, and, if their accounts are to be believed, sunk one of the gun-boats—the Mercedita—and drove off the others. The rebel reporters and officers commanding assert that the blockade of the port was actually raised; though on the following day "at least twenty blockaders were off the bar again." Whether, in view of this latter fact, Charleston will gain much by the official proclamation of the reopening of the ports seems at least doubtful. But there can be no doubt but the occurrence of the 31st, however the results may have been exaggerated or misrepresented by the rebels, will convince Admiral Dupont and General Hunter of the necessity of no longer delaying the long-threatened attack on the hotbed of treason. It is in their power to take and destroy Charleston: we hope to be able to announce, before the end of the month, that we have done so.

THE FRENCH EMPEROR'S POLICY IN AMERICA.

A DISPATCH from the Emperor Napoleon to General Forey, commanding the French troops in Mexico, has revived the alarms of those well-meaning but ignorant people who have all along expected France to interfere in our civil war, has prompted a Senator to move resolutions of inquiry into the purposes of the French, and has furnished the secession sympathizers of the North with fresh capital wherewith to distract the Northern mind and shake Northern credit. The papers are full of diatribes against Louis Napoleon, who is represented as being on the point of recognizing a confederacy based on the corner-stone of African slavery—an institution execrated by the French, and of menacing the North, the hereditary friend of France, her best customer, and her most reliable ally in the event of trouble between France and England.

We trust that the subscribers and readers of Harper's Weekly need no instruction from us to enable them to form a correct judgment on the subject.

The people of France, whose organ and executive is the Emperor Napoleon, are very different in temper and disposition from the English. Frenchmen, as a rule, never barter principle for gain. An Englishman will sell his most cherished dogma for an advance of one per cent. on his goods; they are, as Napoleon truly said, a nation of shop-keepers. Frenchmen, on the contrary, though flighty and idealists, are never sordid. History exhibits them constantly as sacrificing material gain for moral or political notions. They will spend a thousand millions to free Italy, or establish liberal principles in France or Germany. But there is no instance on record where they have sacrificed a principle of French policy was sacrificed, or even suspended for a time, for the sake of benefiting the operatives of Lyons, Rouen, the Maine, or Paris. This distinction between them and their British neighbors must ever be borne in mind by students of modern French policy.

Every one who knows England, afterits emancipating experience in the British West Indies, and claiming the first rank among opponents of human slavery throughout the world, no sooner saw a prospect of a fine market for British manufactures in the Southern Slave States than she shifted her ground on the slave question, and the leading organs of British opinion devoted almost their entire columns to justification of the system of slavery. Not so France. French writers have criticised our military operations with a severity which perhaps was not undeserved; but no Frenchman, be he Republican, Roman of character or influence in Parisian society, has been base enough to depart from the traditionary anti-slavery principles of French policy, for the sake of securing the prospect of a market for French silks, wines, gloves, and jewelry in the kingdom of Jefferson Davis.

Vigorous efforts have been made by the British press to represent the Emperor Napoleon as the chief enemy of the restoration of the Union. These efforts have been seconded by correspondents of Democratic and Anti-American journals, who had doubtless excellent reasons for espousing the Anglo-Rebel view of the subject. Letter-writers from Paris for British and American journals, have repeated at weekly or monthly intervals stereotyped lies about the Emperor's hostility to the United States; his more than usual attachment to Mexico, and more they have persisted in them. The agent of the Associated Press of New York has done this best to give circulation to these British inventions upon almost every week in the year, in the face of all this lying, what are the facts?

For twelve months after the outbreak of the war the Emperor was never even suspected of being unfriendly to us. He was praised by the English—as we learn from the published volume of diplomatic correspondence—to concede to the rebels belligerent rights before the proclamation the construction which we placed upon the act, he caused Mr. Dayton to be told that he would have recalled it, but for his conviction that it would operate to the disadvantage of the insurgents and to our gain. A few months ago, he was informed by the individual who unfortunately represents him at Washington, that he were ready for a compromise—foreign intervention, and, with prompt candor, he tendered it. Accident prevented the measure from being consummated; but the Emperor and the whole French Government has stated distinctly that it was not designed to operate against the United States in any way, or in favor of the rebels, and the highest French authority has given the public testimony to the Emperor's desire that the Republic should be reunited under one Government.

By a trick similar to that which led the Emperor to concede belligerent rights to the rebels, the British Government beguiled him into the Mexican fiasco. Relying on Lord Cowley's word, Napoleon was led to believe that the Mexicans would gladly welcome his troops as deliverers and restorers of peace and order. The British and Spanish troops, however, made their exit before the dramà began. The French, less tricky and more consistent, having commenced the campaign, persevered in it. It was a mistake, a blunder. The Mexicans have forgotten their internal feuds to unite against the common enemy; and it will need great outlay of money, men, and skill to extricate General Forey's army from its present perplexing predicament. From first to last the Emperor has been endeavoring to disabuse the British mind, and because he does their national enmity; and in his last letter to General Forey he endeavors to rouse their pride as a race, by talking about preserving the equilibrium between the Latin and the Anglo-Saxon races on this continent. Every one sees easily that this is mere clap-trap, and that the real object of the Emperor is not conquest, or annexation to the United States, but simply the conclusion of such a treaty with Mexico as may restore the old friendly relations between that republic and the French empire, and enable the French to withdraw from Mexico without sacrifice of honor.

In one word, the Emperor has said and done nothing as yet which fairly justifies the imputation that he is hostile to us or to the Union. On the contrary, he has done and said much which implies a friendly feeling and a desire to see the Union re-established. He has the misfortune of being represented as Washington by a man who is an ardent secessionist, and takes no pains to conceal it. And, like all powerful monarchs, he has at his court at the Tuileries men of base origin and corrupt instincts, who have proved readily accessible to the rebel emissaries, and have earned their hire by abusing us in semi-official journals. But no man, with all the facts before him, can honestly declare that the Emperor has been our enemy.

THE LOUNGER.

FOOTING UP AN ACCOUNT.

WHAT is the net result of the "Conservative" movement thus far? Its programme was a more constitutional method of suppressing the rebellion than that of the Administration. Are not tae following points already established?

That the rebels hailed the movement with delight, reprinting the "Conservative" speeches, as indicative of a supine reaction on the part of the Yankees? What do they mean by "returning reason?"

That the rebels delighted in the "Conservative" triumphs at the polls?

That the election of "Conservative" Senators in Illinois, Indiana, and Pennsylvania is greeted by the Richmond Examiner as proof that the "Lincoln tyranny"—by which is meant the United States Government—is losing its support in the war with the support of a unanimous sentiment?

That the scenes in the Pennsylvania Legislature and still in that of Ohio, which point alternately at anarchy, are the action of the party professedly "Conservative?"

That the tone of the "Conservative" papers, in speaking of the duty of the soldiers in regard to the war order of the President concerning slavery, tends directly, and is intended, to excite mutiny and disaffection, and consequent disaster?

That, in fine, the "Conservative" reaction has organized an opposition to the Government, which takes the ground that its policy in the war is unconstitutional, and that good citizens ought not to support it; that it has for its ground at least drawn party lines, so that at this moment the Government has lost much of that unity of sentiment without which success is impossible and endurance is suicide.

These things are known. There is but one answer. It is that the Government is no longer waging the war for the restoration of the Union, but for what is called Abolition. But the answer says what is not true. The President, as Commander-in-Chief, has, under the liberation of slaves, by the same power and for the same purpose that he decrees the movement of the army, employed slaves as soldiers. It is a source of peculiar strength to them. By the plain command of common sense the Commander-in-chief is bound to withdraw from the same rebel use of his slave. And, in aiming to do this, he must do it in the way most certain to secure the object. He need not, in any sense, abolish slavery. The President must assume their assent to his exercising a necessary and lawful power according to his discretion.

To say, therefore, that because of the proclamation the war is diverted from its object, is as foolish and untrue as to say that it is diverted because of the desolation of Virginia. The object of the war is the maintenance of the Government—and the desolation and conflagration are inevitable accidents of thorough warlike operations. The object of the "conservative reaction" is the restoration of a system which has for its effect that object it exposes the Government to destruction.

If a man likes the supremacy of that party more than the supremacy of the Government—or if he hates the Republicans more than he hates the rebels, then under the name of "conservatism" he will continue to follow the course which Vallandigham, Fernando Wood, and Jefferson Davis applaud. But if he loves his country more than a party, or more than anything peace more than war, he will support a Government which does not believe any thing to be unconstitutional which is necessary to save the Constitution; nor any thing truly dangerous to the liberty of any citizen which is essential to the guarantee of the liberty of all the people.

MR. WEED'S RETIREMENT.

MR. THURLOW WEED has retired from active public life. By his withdrawal one of the shrewdest political managers of the day thus disappears. His valedictory address to his friends in the columns of the Evening Journal, which he has edited for thirty-two years, is simple, genial, and pathetic. He retires at a moment of the greatest public peril, because he no longer agrees with the party which he has so long led, and because he does not wish to embarrass by constant opposition the policy of an Administration which he helped to bring into power. He has a new party ties, nor is it likely he ever will. His old political friends are still "my party;" and while he can no longer think them wise, he wishes them God-speed as he says farewell.

The simplicity and frankness of his valedictory disarm criticism. His retirement establishes at least the earnest sincerity of his later course. That that course has had the very result which he so stringently deprecated seems clear enough to us, but does not affect our estimate of his honest conviction. Party vehemence has pursued him with bitter calumny. But he will doubtless see in that very vehemence a tribute to the power he was felt to wield. When the threat of rebellion ripened into war, it was not strange that men of the same general political sympathy differed upon points of policy. The same principles of human nature that create parties divide them; and each division believes that its own policy is essential to success. It is a pity, but it is unavoidable, that personal accusation and acerbity should mingle in discussions which might be entirely impersonal. Mr. Weed has not been spared, neither has he spared, in such acrimonious contests. His retirement is therefore the more magnanimous.

With winning personal traits that no party asperity denies—with comfort secured by long service in his profession—with the agreeable consciousness, to a man ambitious of the substance rather than the show of power, that he has played a more influential part in the political history of this State during the last dozen years than any other man—with the kindest regard of his associates and friends at the West—he turns away from the great arena of public affairs. But, like Sir William Temple, who retired to his garden and library in the dark days of the revolutionary period in England, but came forth again when summoned by his country, so Mr. Weed holds himself ready to serve, when he can, his country and his friends, while, so far as all things personal are concerned, "his work is done.

THE INEVITABLE QUESTION.

THE question that every body has seen from the beginning of the war must be answered has at last been asked. Shall there be colored soldiers? It is a question upon which there are two lots of temper. If a man says that he is willing to see the Government lost rather than maintained by such allies, he must answer the question whether, then, he cares enough for the Government to fight for it. He must then answer the other question, Why it is not as shameful to serve the Government by bribing men by enormous bounties to be soldiers, while men who have the most vital interest in the success of the war are ready to fight. If saving the Government is a matter of pride and not of principle, and the most earnest conviction of the necessity of its salvation, that pride must be gratified in any whimsical way. It may be more agreeable to it to have the work done by grenadiers six feet high, with long regulation whiskers and a hundred and ninety pounds. Or it may gratify pride to have it accomplished only by men whose ancestors came over in any generation since A.D. 1066 by the Anglo-Saxon blood merely; or by the Celtic, or by the Teutonic, or by volunteers who fight for the love of it, and only scorn bounty.

Indeed, if you make your point of honor any thing short of the salvation of the Government, and the union by all the warlike means and at all costs, you have already virtually relinquished the contest.

The Government is waging a fierce war with a wicked rebellion. It wants all the soldiers it can muster. If it rejects a good fighting man because he is a Negro instead of a Scotchman, or a Frenchman, or an Irishman, it is guilty of utter folly. If it rejects a good fighter because he has every reason to fight for the Government that any man can have, because victory is a palpable, tangible, incalculable advantage to him—because he is native to the soil and accustomed to the rigors of the war, and because he has proved himself the most faithful ally, and is by no means claiming the most docile of soldiers, then the Government is mad.

Now the people are really the Government, and, right or wrong, they say that they are entirely prejudiced against the colored ally. Yes; but suppose that party-leaders stopped appealing to that prejudice, and that a colored regiment should march in the field a South Carolina regiment—just by way of poetic justice. Do you think that, if the people in that regiment fought as bravely and obeyed as the best, its prejudice would stand against that? Not unless patriotism and honor are extinct in its heart.

The common sense of the matter is very simple. For many years it has been considered an unanswerable argument in the great question to say: "It may be unjust and cruel to deprive these men of personal liberty for no crime but color, but we must take things as they are. What can we do with them if they are emancipated?" Passion is a stronger impulse with a slaveholder than interest; and as he now gratifies his anger by maiming his property, he would then gratify his fury by enslaving rather than turning to hire his late slave. What will you do with the facts of the case?

Granting that the facts are as stated, we have reached a point in the rebellion when, as an expedient of war, that is made possible which was not so in peace. Emancipation is forced by the exigencies demands and therefore justifies it. The late slaves know that our lines are the lines of liberty. The hundreds and thousands of able-bodied men are made dependent upon the guidance of the Government, which requires, and will long require, a large military force. The men are dependents are trained to obedience. They are by nature docile and brave. They have every thing to fight for, and they know it. The war has the same desperate earnestness to them that it has to their late masters. One side fights for property: the other for life and liberty.

Is not the solution providential? Do we absolutely insist upon rejecting such soldiers because of some abstract theory of equality and rights? They are not of the same race. True; and neither are the French and the Irish; but we do not reject them; we are heartily grateful to get them. Here is a letter, lately in our possession, from one of the privates in the first South Carolina Volunteers. He was lately a slave. The letter is written in a shapely hand. Scarcely a word is misspelled. It is an intelligent and self-respecting man who writes, and he says that of course he and his friends must fight, because there is no hope for them if taken.

Let it be left to men like Vallandigham and Cox and Wood to do reverence to a prejudice that a nation may be destroyed.

"A TALK WITH MY PUPILS."

IN many a happy household all over the land one of the clearest and pleasantest points of memory is the quiet little town of Lenox among the solemn Berkshire hills. It was there for many years that Mrs. Charles Sedgwick had her school for girls; and now that she has relinquished its charge her heart yearns toward all her scholars, both maid and matron, and she has written, under the name of "A Talk with my Pupils," a truly admirable volume of simple, sensible, thoughtful, and friendly suggestions for the life of women.

Mrs. Sedgwick's great experience and practical wisdom enable her to appreciate perfectly the proper scope of such a work, and she has made herself, in her book, the friend of many more than her pupils. In fact, she keeps in its pages the most delightful school for all of us, old grizzled Loungers of both sexes, as well as the tender and the gay round us. The book is a charming Family Manual. It understands the value of the little things which make the great difference in life, and is a home philosophy of good morals and manners. It is as gently didactic as such a work can be, and its discourse is as enlivened by anecdotes drawn from experience that it runs no risk of rejection as a dry ethical essay; while it is as penetrated with human sympathy as the true secret of really fine manners that it will not be mistaken for a treatise upon etiquette.

Doubtless, as its pages are read in those many happy homes by the husband and father, he will no longer wonder why the solemn Berkshire hills are so pleasantly remembered, while he will gladly acknowledge, what is so often forgotten, the tender, inspiring, thoughtful influence which, in moulding the girl, modeled the future woman.

A SHORT LETTER TO JOHN.

MY DEAR JOHN,—As we parted you said that if any more military arrests were made in the State of New York would be redder with blood than ever Virginia was. Now you are a sensible man, and we can talk this talk together as patriots could not.

By arbitrary arrests you mean the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. That the power of suspension is granted by the Constitution you will not deny. That, in the absence of Congress, it may be necessary to exercise it, in certain cases, you will agree. That the proper person to do it is the President you will allow. That, if Congress justifies him in the suspension, the only powers that hold the right are satisfied you must concede. You will say that the State of New York is not in rebellion, nor is it invaded, and therefore the writ can not be suspended here. The reply is, that the writ is not suspended anywhere in the State, but that the privilege of certain citizens of the United States resident here, to the writ, is suspended on the just ground of national necessity.

Neither you nor any man who is anxious that the Government of the United States shall prevail at every hazard, can deny the right to the exercise of any arbitrary exercise of power. That that exercise has been always discreet no man will affirm but that such power must exist for the right deny. Nor will he contend that the complaint of its exercise during this war has been founded upon an honest fear of the overthrow of the guaranties of liberty; for we all know that the complaint has been merely a party cry.

When Second sent Jeffreys butchering through the west of England the English people justly complained of the peril of their rights. But when William Third suspended the writ of habeas corpus, in the recess of Parliament, the same people thanked him for defending their liberties. No English lawyer denies that the Parliament in the struggle with Charles First exceeded the constitutional limits of its power. The Parliament itself did not deny it, but for the question of rebellion was whether the King should destroy the Constitution, or whether the Parliament should assume powers to save the Constitution. The point was not that the British Constitution was unconstitutionally exercised, but that the Parliament was obliged to transcend its constitutional powers to save the Government, and he has not transcended them. And he has, and the people approve it, and the step was honestly taken and meant to save the nation, they would not fail to applaud and indemnify him.

This rebellion is an effort to overthrow by force the Government of the United States. That Government is constitutional, under the war power which would be implied if it were not expressed in the Constitution, ¶ does not use every means, including suspension of habeas, to conquer the rebels. No Government can not take any course which the people do not approve. If, therefore, the people do not approve the emancipation and confiscation of the privilege of the writ in any case, or they are not willing to take those steps to secure victory, and if, therefore, our destruction is always the earnest national purpose of success, they directly conspire for national ruin. In other words, they are resigned to their own destruction. When you and other grave, moderate men see that the party's malignity which calls itself "conservation" has brought you to the brink of the dishonor of defeat, or the faithful support of the most radical war measures for the national existence and civil order, you will regret that you had not earlier cast off your inactive. Let us hope, dear John, that it will not then be too late. Your dutiful

LOUNGER.

BURNSIDE.

From the first appearance of General Burnside in this war as Colonel of the First Rhode Island Regiment and Acting Brigadier at Bull Run, through the brilliant Carolina campaign, to his arrival here from the Army of the Potomac, his career has been so manly, so simple, and so heroic, that General has awakened a more affectionate regard in the popular heart. He has held himself aloof from all cliques of designing men speculating upon the possibility of using him as a Presidential candidate. There has been no question of his bravery, his energy, and his celerity in the field, qualities essential to an invading army. Upon the loftiness, purity, and earnestness of purpose no suspicion has been breathed. He has issued an foolish address. In the hour of reverse he has neither thrown the blame upon the Government nor suffered others to do so, but cheerfully assumed all the responsibility that must necessarily belong to the General in command; in every position bearing himself as the most modest and loyal citizen, the daring and skilful soldier, and the frank and generous man.

In the wild vortex of contemporary events it is impossible to know the exact or even relative truth. We are compelled to see much that we can not explain, and which vehement partisan speculations do not help to elucidate. yet it is, however, an accepted fact that the Army of the Potomac is not judged by his success. For the want of that success, although it may show no want of energy and fidelity, but the most disastrous consequence of uncontrollable circumstances, FRÉMONT, McClellan, M'Dowell, Pope, and Burnside have disappeared from the stage of war. Political intrigues keep McClellan in a publicity which it would be unkind to suppose him to desire. Fortunately for their usefulness no such intrigues have been at any time formed about the other Generals.

Whether or not General Burnside takes another command or resigns withdrawn for the present from the public eye, the public heart will follow him with admiration, sympathy, and gratitude. His are the qualities of which the noblest citizens and the purest men are made: which, if shared by every General and Soldier, would unite order and distinction, intrigue, and jealousy, and give us the victory.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A MAN being asked, as he lay sunning himself on the grass, what was the height of his ambition, replied, "To marry a rich widow with a bad cough."

"When the sky falls we shall catch larks," said an old gentleman, quoting a well-known proverb. "Certainly," said a wag beside him; "but in my opinion our young folks have no call to wait for that event; they have too many 'larks' already."

AND SO FORTH.—There is a young man in the United States Army who was born July 4, at 4 o'clock P.M., in No. 44, in a street in Boston, 1844, a 4th child, has 4 names, enlisted into the Seventeenth Company, which has joined the 4th battalion, 4th regiment, 4th company, and on the 4th of September will be promoted 4th corporal, and is now gone forth to defend his country.

If all the world were pudding,
And all the seas were ink,
And all the trees were sinoonds, stuck
Around it and across!

If such a change should happen,
Why—then beyond all question—
Oh! what a deal of writing just would be
A lot of indigestion!

When a man is indisposed with the gout, it makes him indisposed to go-out.

Your wife can not have been too dearly won, if you and she are dearly one.

Parties fit a dead look should extricate themselves with a broken key.

Dryden says, that, "If a straw can tickle a man, it is to him an instrument of happiness." Tickle his nose with it and see.

The man who was hemmed in by a crowd the been troubled with a stitch in his side ever since.

The man who took every body's eye must have a lot of lids.

In navigating the sea of life, carefully avoid the breakers—"especially the beam-breakers," says old Growler.

AT a woman's convention, a gentleman remarked that a woman was the most wicked thing in creation. "Sir," said a lady, indignantly, "you are a fool. A woman is made from man, and if one rib is so wicked, what must the whole body be?"

SCARED INDIVIDUAL, BORDING INFURIATED BULL BEHIND A TREE. "You ungrateful beast, you! You wouldn't toss me over a fence, would you? Why, I've been at bed in his life, would you? Is that the return you make?"

DEAR SIRS,—I am a poor apothecary, that has business was to pound and sell. Which has kneed but little, and by which, which he knew less.

To keep water from coming in—Don't pay the waterrate.

The first ingredient in conversation is truth, the next good sense, the third good-humour, and the fourth wit.

INTERESTING TO "PARTIES IN DIFFICULTIES."—Every six hours out of the twenty-four is quarter days.

The earth is exceedingly dirty, but the sea is very tidy.

A MORMON DEFINITION.—A spare rib—A second wife.

The best adhesive label you can put on luggage is to stick to it yourself.

When is a vessel smaller than a bonnet?—When she's cap-sized. (The author has since had his head shaved.)

IRON-CLAD MEN.—An "old flint" is preferable to an "old screw."

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Why would a tailor rather be a poet than a tailor?
Because it would be a nuisance (nay sense).

It's pretty, it's useful in various ways,
Though by 3 men after 6 it never stays;
Take one letter from it, and then 'twill appear
What young men are fond of every day in the year;
Take two letters from it, and then without doubt
You will be wise enough if you can find it out.
Glass—lass—ass.

Why is a nail for in like an old man?
Because it is inferior (in form).
What regiment was Adam in?
The Buffs.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

CONGRESS.

On Wednesday, January 28, in the Senate, the Post-Office Committee reported back the bill establishing a line of steamers to Europe, with a recommendation that it do not pass. Senator Clark, of New Hampshire, offered a resolution requiring the tributaries and debtor States, of Delaware, on 27th, and a resolution that he be expelled from the Senate. The resolution was laid over under the rules. A resolution was adopted instructing the Military Committee to inquire into the propriety of extending such relief as circumstances may require, and inquire into the case of Mr. Thomas, known as "Zarvona the French lady," of Maryland, now a prisoner of war at Fort Lafayette, and who, as represented, has been confined in a dungeon since that fortress since June last, and is now hopelessly insane by reason of his confinement. The President was requested to transmit to the Senate, if consistent issued by the Secretary of War and Treasury in relation to the payment of commutation money to drafted citizens from the United States to the Mexican Republic, any orders modifying the proportion of citizens to each band of war for the use of the French army. The Senate proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of soldiers and sailors, and after debate the bill was passed. The Army Appropriation bill was also passed. The Conference Committee on Appropriation bills was created, and after an executive session the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the Committee of Ways and Means was brought up on a motion to refer the bills authorizing the suspension of habeas corpus to the Committee on Military Affairs. The opposition attempted to defeat the bill, but through a connected series of parliamentary manœuvres the main object was secured, until two o'clock this morning, without any result as regards the legislation of the House.

On Thursday, 29th, in the Senate, Senator Sumbuley, of Delaware, made a speech on the recent vacation and disorderly conduct, and the resolution expelling him from the Senate was for the present disposed of. The resolution concerning Commodore Vanderbilt, Commodore Van Brunt, and others, for their services in reference to the sale of the Brooks exposition was discussed, but no vote taken. The bill amendatory of the act for the compensation of the slaves in Missouri was taken up, and debated at length by Senators Wilson and Howe, in relation to detaining the bill for arming negroes.

On Friday, 30th, in the Senate, a communication from the President, recommending a vote of thanks to Commodore David D. Porter, for his gallantry in the affair at Arkansas Post, was referred to the Naval Committee. The resolution concerning Commodore Wilkes, in fitting out the vessels of the Burnside expedition was discussed for some time, and finally laid over. The new Senator from Illinois, Hon. W. A. Richardson, was qualified and took his seat. The debate on the bill to prevent the pecuniary aid for the emancipation of slaves in Missouri was then resumed, and finally, on motion of Senator Harris, the bill was recommitted to the Judiciary Committee. After an executive session the Senate adjourned to Monday.

In the House, on Thursday, the Naval Committee reported back the joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Commander John P. Worden for services in the conflict between the Monitor and the Merrimac. The resolution was passed. The same committee reported back the joint resolutions tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore Charles H. Porelease, U.S.N., to Davis, J. H. Dahlgren, Stephen C. Rowan, David D. Porter, and S. F. Du Pont, for services in the late naval battles, but the name of Commodore Lardner, not for any thing derogatory to him, but because he had not been present, except to see in command of an expedition or having a separate command. The resolution was agreed to, and the resolution adopted. The bill to encourage enlistments, when regularly drafted, was also drafted by the same and reported back by the Military Committee. The resolution to amend the Constitution so that no person naturalized, &c., to Mexico for the use of the French was adopted. The Committee on Public Expenditures, Committee on Naval Affairs, The Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Appropriation bill was then taken up, and discussed during the afternoon session. The session of the House was taken up with debate on the bill to increase the compensation of soldiers and soldiers.

On Monday, February 2, in the Senate, a communication was received from the President of the Southwestern Railroad Company, signed by George E. Badger, of North Carolina, ought no longer to be a member of the Board of Directors, by reason of his adhesion to the cause of the South and war, moreover, in the rebel army. The petition of William C. Jennings, setting forth that while in Texas he was arrested in August last by order of the Secretary of War, and imprisoned for nine months in Fort Lafayette, that no reason was ever assigned for the arrest or discharge, and praying for compensation for a wrongful arrest. An inquiry into the facts, but the petition was laid on the table by a vote of 22 against 16. The Judiciary Committee reported back the bill to prohibit peddling in the Missouri in emancipating slaves. The Paymaster General was directed to report the number of persons to whom payments were made to the army up to the 31st of August, and, if not paid, the reasons why payments have not been made at present. The bill making appropriation for executive, legislative, and judicial purposes was then taken up, and after debate adjourned. In the House, the Senate's amendments to the Army Appropriation bill with the exception of those for the survey of the Minnesota River and the Red River of the North, were concurred in. The Senate's amendments to the Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill were also concurred in. The Senate bill amendatory of the act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts was passed by a vote of 78 to 64. It authorizes the President to employ negroes as soldiers was then resumed. After the previous question had been sustained by a vote of 85 against 66, and the House adjourned.

On Tuesday, February 3, in the Senate, a bill to Hon. Beverly Johnson, Senator-elect from Maryland, were presented from the Legislature. Appropriation bill was passed. The bill to establish a national currency secured by United States stocks was then taken up for the day. A bill authorizing the pay of unemployed army officers was introduced and referred to the Military Committee. Senator Wilkinson moved to take up his resolutions relative to the French invasion of Mexico, and the subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, opposed the proposition; but the Senate decided to take up by a vote of 26 against 19. Senator M'Dougall then addressed the Senate at considerable length on the subject of Mexican affairs, and concluded his remarks by moving to lay the resolutions on the table. The motion to lay on the table was carried into executive session, and subsequently adjourned.

In the House, the Committee of Elections reported favorably on the credentials of Messrs. Flanders and Helm, members from the Parish and Second Districts of Louisiana. The bankrupt bill was then taken up, and, after some explanations, Mr. Kellogg, of Illinois, moved to lay it on the table, which was agreed to by a vote of 69 against 58. The Military Committee reported back the bill providing for the enlargement of the New York and Michigan and Illinois canals, with amendments, and the subject was referred to the Committee of the Whole. A bill was reported authorizing the construction of a continuous telegraph line from M'Henry to Galveston, touching at various points on the coast. A motion to lay the bill on the table was lost by a vote of 49 against 68, and pending the question on its passage the House adjourned.

A SALLY FROM CHARLESTON.

A dispatch to the Richmond Inquirer, dated Charleston, January 31, says:

This morning the gun-boats Palmetto State, Captain Rutledge, and Chicora, Captain Tucker, accompanied by three small steamers—the General Clinch, Stinson, and Chesterfield—all under the command of Commander Ingraham, made an attack on the blockaders, and succeeded in sinking two and crippling a third.

The engagement commenced at 4 o'clock.

The Palmetto State, with Commander Ingraham on board, opened fire upon the Federal gun-boat Mercedita, carrying 11 guns and 165 men, which was soon sunk in five fathoms of water. Her commander, Captain Stellwagen, with his officers, escaped in a boat and surrendered. One shot pierced her boiler, going clear through. Eighteen Bellringer and crew were paroled by Commodore Ingraham.

Captain Tucker, of the Chicora, reports sinking another Federal gun-boat and the disabling of the steamship Quaker City. The latter was set on fire by the Chicora, and hauled down her flag to surrender, but afterward managed to escape, using only one wheel. She was very seriously damaged.

The number of the blockading fleet outside at the time of the attack was thirteen, with two first-class frigates, and the transports and Commodore.

The Federal loss was very severe. It was a complete rout. Our loss was very slight, not a man.

Our gun-boats were not even struck.

All the blockaders have disappeared. There is not one to be seen within five miles with the strongest kind of glasses. Our forts are now completely clear.

The following is the official despatch:

CHARLESTON, February 1.—"PALMETTO STATE."

I went out last night. The steamer Mercedita, the Admiral's ship, was sunk at boat and brought to. The officers and crew were paroled. Captain Tucker thinks he sunk another steamer and another as they were under our flag. The blockading fleet had gone to southward and eastward out of sight.

Flag-Officer Commanding.

REOPENING OF THE PORT OF CHARLESTON.

The following proclamation was forthwith published:

OFFICIAL PROCLAMATION.

HEAD-QUARTERS, LAND AND NAVY FORCES,
CHARLESTON, February 1, 1863.

At about five o'clock this morning the Confederate States naval force on this station attacked the United States blockading fleet off the harbor of the city of Charleston, and sunk, disperse, or drove all and out of sight for the time the entire hostile fleet.

Therefore we, the undersigned, commanders respectively of the Confederate States naval and land forces in this quarter, do hereby declare that the blockade kept by the United States of the said city of Charleston, South Carolina, to be raised by a superior force, and that vessels may pass from and after this 31st day of January, A.D., 1863.

G. T. BEAUREGARD,
General Commanding.
D. N. INGRAHAM,
Flag-Officer commanding Naval Forces in South Carolina.

Official: THOMAS JORDAN, Assistant Adjutant-General.

A Charleston dispatch, dated 1st February, says:

Yesterday afternoon General Beauregard placed a steamer in the channel for the foreign vessels in the fleet to relieve that no blockade existed.

The French steamer Gassendi, accompanied by General Ripley, accepted the invitation. The British Consul, with the consent of Admiral Dahlgren, also entered. Several previously gone five miles beyond the usual anchorage of the blockaders, but found no vessels there within glance.

Late in the evening four blockaders reappeared, keeping far out. This evening a large number of blockaders are in sight, but keep about five miles from the port.

THE PROSPECT AT VICKSBURG.

A special dispatch from Cairo says that information has been received from Vicksburg. Deserters have been landed on the Louisiana side of the Mississippi River, five miles below the city of Vicksburg, and in the rear of the city on Vicksburg. Two brigades were encamped when the information left, under the command of the 3d of General William, which is to make Vicksburg no longer a fever city. General Sherman had left Memphis for where with one division. The river was quite full at Vicksburg at last accounts. The rebels are evidently about to make movements, for the Yesterday Express of the 26th, says, in a dispatch from Vicksburg: "We have received by intelligence from above that the great Yankee flotilla, consisting of ironclads and transports, has passed Greenville, Mississippi, coming down. We are ready."

THE "MONTAUK" AT WORK.

The ironclad Montauk has had a brilliant fight with the rebel battery M'Allister, in the Ogeechee River, under cover of which she is trying to get up. The particulars of the affair have come to hand. The Richmond and Savannah papers tell us that the Montauk came up to the fire in fine style, and that she was the only boat engaged. These shot and shell struck the water and flying struck her sides, but her turret was so badly injured that she had to haul off. The rebel fire in the main was remarked below a head of the river, entirely out of the action. On the other hand, the rebel Department says the ironclad ran 33 feet Fortress Mokree, stating that there is no truth in the statement that the Montauk was sunk by the rebel Commander Worden lay under the enemy's guns for four hours, and that their shot had no more effect upon his vessel than bullets.

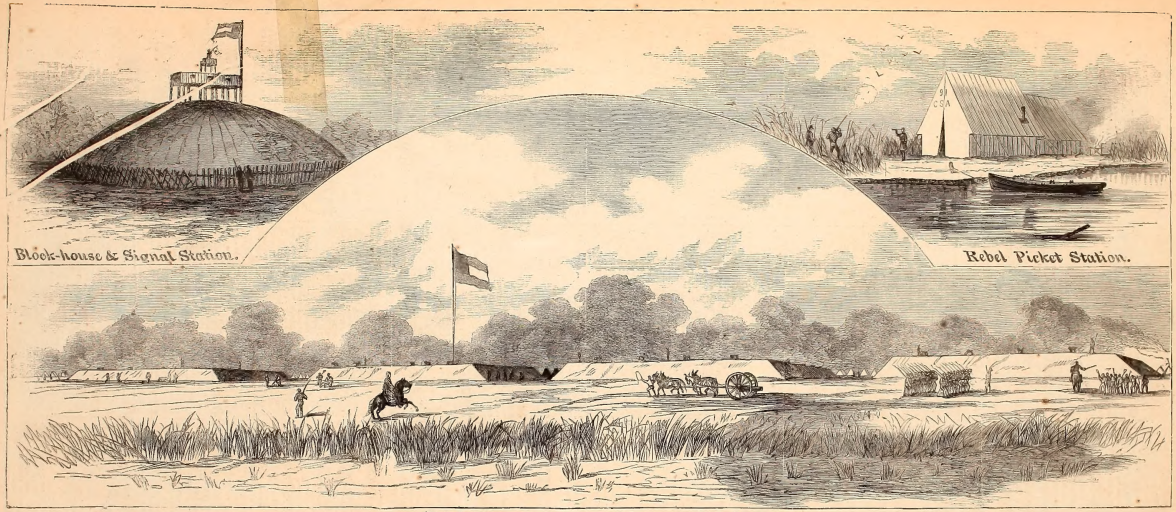
A FIGHT ON THE BLACKWATER.

General Corcoran has had a brilliant fight with the rebel chief, Roger A. Pryor, on the night of the 25th, and completely defeated him. The fight took place at a point ten miles from Suffolk, and the battle opened by an artillery duel between the rebel battery and the two rebel artillery began to slacken, when General Corcoran ordered a charge of his infantry and cavalry. The rebels fell back before our troops for two miles, and there made another stand, and for a short time the fight was a severe one, General Corcoran had a narrow escape from a shell which burst directly in front of him. Our loss was about one hundred and four.

CAPTURE OF AN ANGLO-REBEL STEAMER.

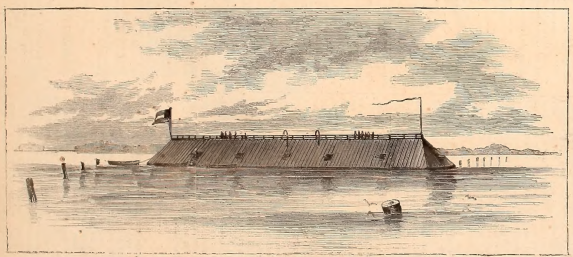
It is stated, upon the authority of the Liverpool Mail, that the British steamer Princess Royal was surrounded and captured by the Federal gun-boat Iroquois, belonging to ten the blockade into Charleston, on Thursday, with 1,400 bales of cotton, 1,000 boxes of tea, and 600 barrels of powder, 8 Armstrong guns, a large lot of muskets, and 1,000 rounds of shot and shell. The bales are 5 feet of bandware, 35 cases of boots, 500 bags of coffee, 600 boxes of tea, and other valuables. A party of English workmen skilled in the manufacture of Armstrong guns was captured with the vessel.

GENERAL BANKS AT NEW ORLEANS.



Major-General Banks is still in New Orleans. He has published General Butler's order issued upon his assuming to ten the blockade into Charleston, on Thursday, with 1,400 bales of cotton, 1,000 boxes of tea, and 600 barrels of powder, 8 Armstrong guns, a large lot of muskets, and 1,000 rounds of shot and shell. The bales are 5 feet of bandware, 35 cases of boots, 500 bags of coffee, 600 boxes of tea, and other valuables. A party of English workmen skilled in the manufacture of Armstrong guns was captured with the vessel.

FOREIGN NEWS.



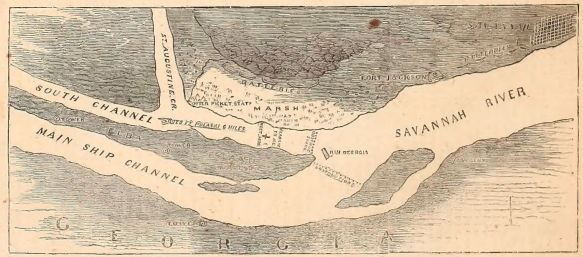
FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR'S VIEWS OF THE MEXICAN QUESTION.

A LETTER has been transmitted by the Emperor Napoleon to General Forey, Commander-in-Chief of the French army in Mexico, in which he says: "Providence has favored us by the glory of the expedition to that country, both present and prospective. This most significant document has been officially submitted to the French Legislature. In it the Emperor says: "It is the present state of the civilization of the world the prosperity of America is not a matter of indifference to Europe, for it is she who feeds our manufactures and gives life to our commerce. We have an interest in this—that the republic of the United States be powerful and prosperous; but we have upon its integrity and its moral influence—not all the glorious Gulf, dominate from thence the Antilles, and carry to Europe the products of the New World."

Rebel Batteries near St. Augustine Creek.

The Rebel Iron-clad "Georgia."



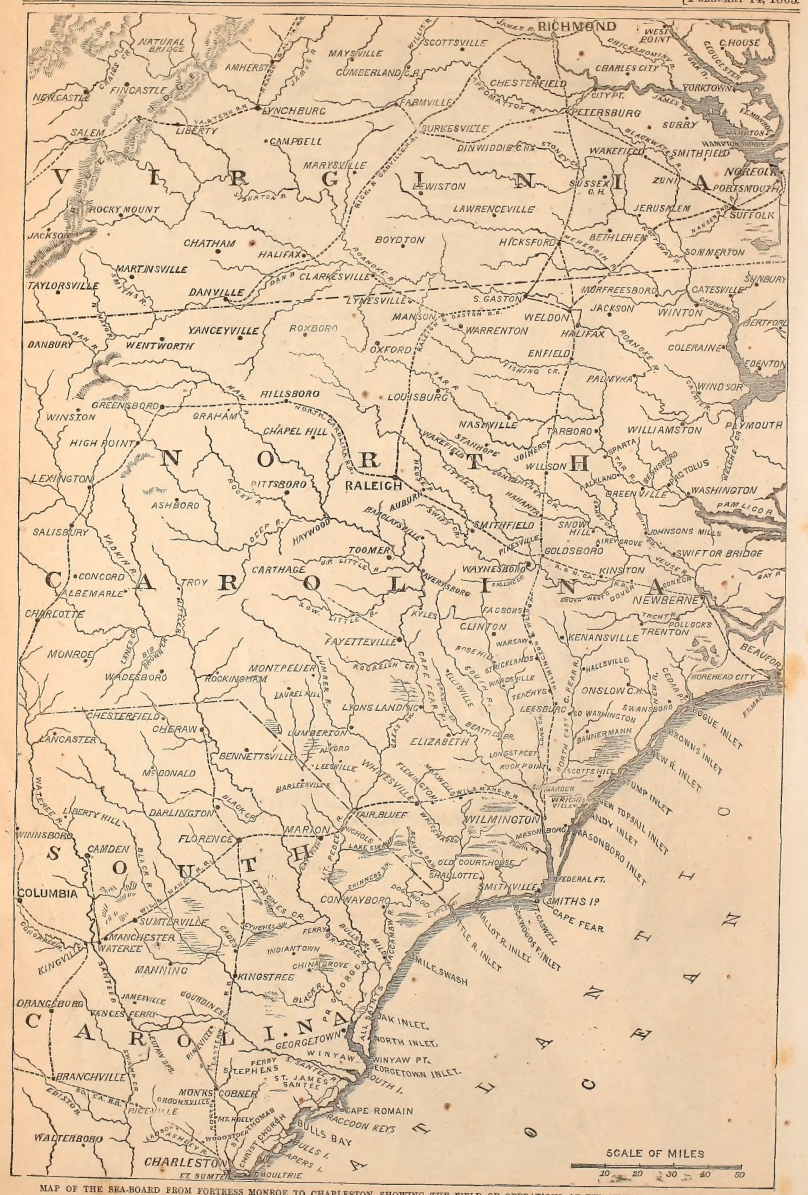


Chart of the Approaches to Savannah, Georgia.

SAVANNAH, GEORGIA, AND ITS APPROACHES.—From Sketches by Mr. Loomis.—[See Page 103.]

THE FIGHT AT CORNEY'S BRIDGE, BAYOU TECHE, LOUISIANA, AND DESTRUCTION OF THE REBEL GUN-BOAT "COTTON," JANUARY 14, 1863.—Sketched by our Special Artist.—[See Page 101.]

MAP OF THE SEA-BOARD FROM FORTRESS MONROE TO CHARLESTON, SHOWING THE FIELD OF OPERATIONS OF THE NEW SOUTHERN EXPEDITION.

THE BATTLE OF MURFREESBORO.

An occasional correspondent, Mr. Hübner, of the Third Ohio Volunteers, has sent us the picture of the Battle of Murfreesboro, which we reproduce on page 108. It represents the situation of affairs on the third day of the battle, and we give Mr. Hübner's description in his own words:

"The accompanying sketch represents the position of the centre of the army on the third day of the battle. The batteries were situated on commanding ground; across the plain ran a rifle-pit. The slightest elevation of the ground was used to protect our boys from the heavy fire out of the woods. The rebels made several fierce attacks, but were repulsed with heavy loss.

"Colonel Loomis's battery and Captain Terrill's United States battery opened a cross-fire on them, and the enemy soon retreated back into the woods, where they had strong intrenchments, leaving behind a good number killed and wounded.

"The Nineteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers made a rush upon the Twenty-sixth rebel Regiment of Tennessee, drove them back with great loss, and captured their flag, on which was the motto, 'Death before Subjugation!' The gallant Captain Taylor, a member of Major-General Rousseau's staff, bore it away amidst the cheers of thousands and thousands of brave men.

"The boys suffered terribly on account of the inclemency of the weather. A cold rain fell, and when not in action we had to lie down, often in the mud, in order to be concealed from the rebel batteries. The boys built small fires and crowded around them, not minding the cannon-balls or bursting shells which came in volleys from the rebel batteries. A favorite stratagem of our gallant and beloved commander, Major-General Rosecrans, is to make us lie down under the crest of an elevation of the ground, and await the arrival of the enemy until they come within a short distance, then jump up, give them a volley and charge with the bayonet; and 'tis true enough, if carried out with precision and boldness, it leads to victory.

"Our rations run short too, and there was no chance of a fresh supply. So many of our soldier boys attacked the fresh-killed horses which lay around. A thin slice of horse roasted on a stick, with pepper and salt on it, is a delicious meal when nothing else is to be had."

RECAPTURED.

A STORY OF ST. VALENTINE'S DAY.

A summer twilight under the green awning of low-branched linden-trees—clove-pinks blossoming in the garden borders, like chalices of spice—and stars just trembling into the warm violet sky—if Clinton Audley had lived to be a hundred years old, he never would have forgotten the dim, indistinct beauty of the dusky landscape. Nor all that happened on that summer night was branded upon his heart in lines that Death itself had no power to efface!

"Not yet, Clara; do not speak so firmly! Remember that it is my life's doom you are pronouncing. Oh, Clara! think again."

He had led his men up to the very cannon's mouth without a thought of fear, yet now he was a coward in the presence of that slender blue-eyed girl!

"It is useless," said Clara Mervyn, with cheek whose color never varied, and firm, pitying eyes; "my answer would be the same did I take a whole year for deliberation. I am very sorry, Clinton; but—"

"Nay," interposed Audley, with a cold, constrained voice that scarce hid the angry emotions in his heart, "do not waste your pity on me. The matter is unfortunate as far as I am concerned; but I can not see why you should grieve. I have been a mad fool, that is all. Good-evening, Clara!"

He lifted his light military cap and was gone; and Clara Mervyn sat down on the rustic garden seat and had a good cry! Surely it was not her fault that Clinton Audley was so foolish—he might have known she didn't care for him.

While the young officer, restlessly pacing to and fro, thought of the dark-eyed soldier whose head he had supported at Manassas while the life bubbled from his breast in red surging drops—thought of his last words, "It isn't for myself; but Mary's heart will break when she hears of it!"—oh why could he not have died in that boy's stead? There was no heart to break for him!

"The idle dream is ended!" he said, aloud; "and now for the realities of life. We shall never meet again."

Could he but have looked forward to the time when they two should meet again!

"Only my right hand, doctor? Pooh! never mind; there's many a poor fellow worse off than I am!"

"A very philosophical view to take of matters," said the surgeon, half smiling, "but at the same time an unusual one. Hold still half a minute, can't you?"

"Well, what does it matter after all? I've neither wife nor sweet-heart to fret about my disfigurements."

"But I suppose you expect to come into possession of one or both of those articles some day?"

"Can't say that I do. There, I'm comfortable enough now. I say, though, doctor!"

"Well?"

"Could you persuade that fat old nurse to get a pair of shoes that squeak in a minor key? Every sick man has his trials, and mine are those calf-skin shoes. Possibly I'm nervous, but I can't help it!"

The surgeon laughed good-humoredly.

"Don't annoy yourself on that score; there will be a change of nurses to-night, and I do not think the shoe-question will trouble you further. Try to sleep a while now!"

Clinton Audley closed his eyes, and strove to forget the sharp spasms of pain that racked his poor wounded frame, while the fire shone ruddily on the walls, faintly illumining the long rows of narrow white beds on either side, and the gray dusk blackened into night, and—

"I must have been asleep!" he thought, with a sudden start, as the little clock chimed eleven. "Yes, I must; but who on earth is that? Oh, the new nurse, I suppose. She don't wear calf-skin shoes, at all events—moves like a shadow!"

For like a shadow she had glided to his bedside.

"I think your draught was to be taken at eleven, Sir!" and she glanced at her written directions.

And as Clinton Audley silently extended his left hand for the slender vial, he knew that the "new nurse" was Clara Mervyn. She recognized him at the same instant—there was a slight start, but neither spoke.

Fate had brought them together once again!

The January snows melted away from the purple Maryland hills, and February's blue heaven smiled overhead. Spring was nigh at hand, yet the lost roses had not blossomed again on Clara Mervyn's cheek.

"Don't overwork yourself, Miss Mervyn," said the kindly surgeon; "there's no earthly occasion for it. They are all doing well, except that young Audley!"

The color rushed in a scarlet torrent to Clara's cheek, then receded, leaving it cold as marble.

"Will he die, Sir?"

"Die? oh no! not the least danger of his dying. What I meant to say was, that his recovery is slow. Never knew such a lagging convalescence. A fine young fellow that—very. We surgeons are commonly supposed to have no feelings, Miss Clara; but I can tell you it went to my heart to take that boy's hand off. However—but bless me, it's nearly noon. Be sure you take care of yourself, Miss Mervyn!" and away hurried Dr. Wilde, who never knew what it was to have a moment's leisure!

Clara was left alone, her head drooping on her breast. The next instant she rose up and looked at her own slender right hand with a shuddering, sobbing sigh.

"Oh, if I could have given my useless hand to save his!" she moaned. "If I had but the right to cheer and comfort him! Ah me! what can a woman do but endure!"

Clara was learning a hard lesson in life's saddest school—to suffer and be silent.

"Miss Mervyn!"

She started at the words. He had never called her "Clara" since their parting under the linden-trees.

"Are you very busy to-night?"

"Not particularly so; why do you ask?"

"Then come and sit beside my pillow for a little while. I feel conversational just now."

She obeyed silently.

"Are you better this evening, Lieutenant Audley?"

"I think so. The red, glorious sunset has done me good. Did you know that this was St. Valentine's Eve?"

"The 13th of February—so it is!"

"Do you believe in the goodly offices of St. Valentine, Miss Mervyn? I assure you my faith is limitless in the patron saint of lovers!"

Clara smiled as she remembered all the time-worn "valentines" she kept under lock and key at home.

"I confess to a little superstition on the subject," she said, coloring, for she felt that Clinton's eyes were fixed on her downcast lashes.

"Very well, then; you won't consider me mawkishly sentimental if I ask you to be so kind as to act as my right hand for once."

"I should be so glad. But how—"

"Will you write a St. Valentine's love-letter for me?"

"Certainly."

"Stop, though! Answer me one question first, frankly and fully. Do you think it would be a piece of presumptuous folly in me to ask a woman's love to bless a maimed, useless wretch like me? Nay, do not spare my feelings. I wish to hear the truth."

Clara Mervyn was silent for a moment; and when she spoke it was in a distinct, though very low tone.

"If the woman you love be worthy of the name, you will be far dearer to her now than ever you were in the prime of health and strength."

"You have taken a great weight from my heart, Miss Mervyn; and now will you assume the rôle of amanuensis?"

Writing a love-letter for Clinton Audley to another woman—it was a strange duty—yet Clara Mervyn went through with it with a sort of mechanical calmness, heedless of the sore heart that ached so bitterly in her breast, while every word seemed the knell of a death-warrant. It was the bitterest cup she had drunk yet—a cup that must be swallowed to the dregs!

"Thank you, Miss Mervyn. I won't trouble you to direct it. Ah, if I were but certain that St. Valentine would speed my suit!"

He smiled; but it would have been difficult to tell which was paler—the cheek that lay against the pillows of the hospital pallet, or that shadowed by Clara Mervyn's brown tresses!

She gave him the folded letter, with its earnest words of pleading, and then went away to her own room; for, fortunately, the "night-watch," as it was called, had been confided to another. And only the quiet stars saw the convulsive bursts of grief that shook her frame ere at last she sobbed herself to sleep, her flushed cheek lying on her drenched hair, and the lips quivering even in her dreams!

How gloriously the crimson banners of St. Valentine's dawn were draped along the sky when at length she opened her eyes—how radiantly the morning lighted up those blue, far-off hills! Unconsciously her lips formed themselves into a smile, and then—ah, then the old pangs of heartache came back to her!

She was nearly dressed before her eyes fell upon a tiny bunch of violets, dew-sprinkled and fragrant, that lay on her toilet-table—she caught it up with an exclamation of delight, and a note fell from its blue heart—a note directed in a strange, straggling hand.

"Some hospital directions," she murmured, and, smiling at Dr. Wilde's eccentricities, she unfolded the paper.

"Great Heaven! can it be possible?" she faltered, as she recognized her own handwriting. "Did he mean to ask me to become his wife? Oh, it is too much, too much happiness!"

She clasped her hands over her eyes for a moment, then sank to her knees beside the little white bed, half uncertain whether it were not all a dream.

Five minutes later Clinton Audley held out his left hand to the blushing little nurse who had stolen softly to his bedside.

"Well?" he asked, scanning her face smilingly.

"Oh, Clinton, I am so happy!"

And then she burst into tears: it was well that there were not many patients in the convalescent ward!

"Are you really captured, my little, shy, tremulous bird?" he whispered.

"Nay," said Clara, shaking back her curls with a spice of the old mischief, "it is you who are recaptured, brave soldier though you deem yourself!"

"And had you no suspicion of the destination of that valentine?"

"If I had known it would have spared me a great many tears. But oh, Clinton, I think I shall never shed any but happy tears again!"

With the radiant dawn of St. Valentine's Day had risen the morning-star of Clara Mervyn's life and love!

SAVANNAH.

One of our special artists, Mr. Loomis, has sent us the sketches of the Approaches to Savannah, Georgia, which we reproduce on page 100. It seems that our forces in Fort Pulaski have taken pains to inform themselves pretty thoroughly of the nature of the rebel defenses, so that when the time comes for an assault there shall be no more Big Bethel blunders. We hold the mouth of the river, Fort Pulaski, the two channels on either side of Elba Island, and St. Augustine Creek. The rebel advance is at the junction of that creek with the river. There they have erected some pretty substantial earth-works, mounted with heavy guns in barbette. And on a line with these, in the river, is a row of obstructions consisting of piles firmly driven into the bed of the river, and secured together with chains. Behind these floats the iron-clad Georgia, formerly the British steamer Fingal, a vessel of no mean power, though not very well adapted, we should judge, to cope with our Monitors. It will be seen that the rebels have not been idle in taking measures for their protection. There will be all the more glory for our brave soldiers and sailors when they take the place.

THE BATTLE IN BAYOU TECHE.

Our attentive New Orleans correspondent sends us a sketch—which we reproduce on page 101—of the Battle of Corney's Bridge, in Bayou Teche, Louisiana, fought by General Weitzel on 14th January. He had gone up the bayou to destroy a rebel boat called the Cotton. The Times correspondent thus describes the affair:

Early on Wednesday morning, at 6 A.M., the Diana, Captain Goodwin, was ordered to go down the bayou to Lynch's Point, to take the Eighth Vermont across to the left or northern bank, in order for a flank movement on the enemy. At 7 the Calhoun, Commodore Buchanan, Kinsman, Captain Wiggin, and Estrella, Captain Cook, commenced moving slowly up the bayou, and at 8 o'clock reached the formidable obstruction. This was at a place called Corney's Bridge, from a man of that name owning a plantation there. Nothing but the piles of the old bridge remain, protruding about three or four feet above water, and against these the rebels had sunk an old steamer, filled with brick, and placed all manner of rubbish—making it impossible at that time either for the Cotton to come down to us or for us to get at her.

At this time, about 8.45, an artillery duel commenced between our gun-boats and the gun-boat Cotton and the rebel batteries. The firing continued for some time without any manifest difference to either party. A few desultory rifle-shots had been fired at us from the shore.

Suddenly the Kinsman felt something explode under her; it was a torpedo, and her stern was violently lifted in the air, but fortunately with no damage, as was afterward found. An aid of General Weitzel came galloping up to tell the Kinsman of another torpedo being planted right ahead, a contraband, escaped from the Cotton, having brought the intelligence. Owing to this, and one of her guns being disabled—so the Kinsman's officers all assured me—she was cautiously dropping back, after warning both the Estrella and Calhoun of what had been told her.

Commodore Buchanan, either not hearing or not heeding the information, at once steamed up right ahead of both the Estrella and the Kinsman, and personally seized the post of danger. It was now about 10 o'clock, when the rebels, from behind their concealed rifle-pits, poured forth a most murderous volley upon our men; and the Cotton coming down to attack our batteries, the fight became severe and general.

The gallant Buchanan was one of the first to fall. He was standing forward, spy-glass in hand, a motionless target for the deadly missiles of the hidden enemy. W. D. Brown, Acting Chief Engineer, who was near him at the time, having received a spent ball in the thigh, the Commodore said: "Ah! you've got it." The very next moment a ball struck Buchanan in the right cheek, immediately below the temple, passing through to the opposite side. He exclaimed, "My God!" and fell back dead. Some say this gallant officer was rash on this occasion, and threw away his loved and valued life; perhaps so, but it was a rashness which will endear his heroic name forever.

To show how terribly murderous was the position in which our boats were placed, it is only necessary to state that at this point the bayou was so narrow that the Calhoun in turning had her bow and stern aground.

While this was going on our land-forces were by no means idle. The Eighth Vermont, as soon as they had been brought across from Lynch's Point in the Diana, at once attacked the rebels in the rear of their rifle-pits; and during a brisk and sharp engagement killed several, took forty prisoners, and put the rest to flight, their cannon leading the way. But for this sudden and gallant assistance from the Eighth Vermont, there can be little doubt that the Calhoun would have been lost, from the impetuosity with which the rebels were firing upon her.

In the mean time, no less efficient aid was being given by other portions of our troops. Three batteries—the First Maine, Lieutenant Bradbury; one section of the Fourth Massachusetts, under Lieutenant Briggs, and Captain W. W. Carruth's Sixth Massachusetts—had gone round by the woods, from Patersonville to a point above the Cotton, where they could successfully play upon her; and in this they were assisted by some of the One Hundred and Sixtieth New York, and 60 sharp-shooters of the Seventy-fifth New York, who played havoc among the crew of the rebel gun-boat, which was one of those enormous Mississippi steamers, protected by cotton wherever possible, and clad in iron.

Thrice did this ungainly monster retire up the bayou, from the effect of the deadly iron hail poured into her, and thrice did she desperately come up to renew the contest. She came once too often, however; for, after having had her men nearly cleaned out of her, the last time she made her appearance—which was at 2 o'clock next morning—she was floating in solitary glory down the bayou, one sheet of flame.

The game being over, and the ostensible object of the expedition accomplished, our gun-boats and land-forces returned in perfect order and good spirits.

STONEWALL JACKSON'S CAMP.

We publish on page 109 a picture of Stonewall Jackson in Camp, from a sketch by Mr. Vizetelly, the artist of the London Illustrated News, who has cast his lot among the rebels. This sketch was made some weeks since, and was sent from Secessia in the vessel which was lately captured off Charleston. All the documents found on board were transmitted to Admiral Dupont. Some of them, such as the correspondence between Benjamin and the rebel agents in Europe, have been published in the papers. What became of Mr. Vizetelly's drawings we can not tell; but the one we reproduce was kindly traced for us, by permission of the Admiral, and thus sees the light—rather unexpectedly to its author—in our columns.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We reproduce on pages 97, 104, and 105, two of Mr. Waud's sketches. One of them illustrates the fruitless attempt of the Army of the Potomac to move toward the Rappahannock on 20th January—or, in the coarser language of the rebels, "Burnside's Army stuck in the Mud;" and the other, the Night-Patrol making his Rounds. The latter picture explains itself, and needs no description. By way of explanation of the former we append the following graphic account from the correspondence of the Times:

It was a wild Walpurgus night, such as Goethe paints in the "Faust" while the demons held revel in the forest of the Brocken. All hopes that it would be a "mere shower" were presently blasted. It was evident we were in for a regular northeaster, and among the roughest of that rough type. Yet was there hard work done that fearful night. One hundred and fifty pieces of artillery were to be planted in the position selected for them by General Hunt, Chief of Artillery—a man of rare energy and of a high order of professional skill. The pontoons, also, were drawn down nearer toward the river, but it was dreadful work; the roads under the influence of the rain were becoming shocking; and by daylight, when the boats should all have been on the banks, ready to slide down into the water, but fifteen had been gotten up—not enough for one bridge, and five were wanted!

The night operations had not escaped the attention of the wary rebels. Early in the morning a signal-gun was fired opposite the ford, reminding one of that other signal-gun fired by them on the morning of Thursday the 11th December, when we began laying the pontoon opposite Fredericksburg, and which was the token for the concentration of the whole force at that point. It was indispensable that we should secure all the advantages of a surprise; and though our intention was thus blown to their ears early on Wednesday morning, we were, nevertheless, forty-eight hours ahead of them, and with favorable conditions should have been able to carry our position before they could possibly concentrate.

Accordingly a desperate effort was made by the Commanding General to get ready the bridges. It was obvious, however, that, even if completed, it would be impossible for us, in the then condition of the ground, to get a single piece of artillery up the opposite declivity. It would be necessary to rely wholly upon the infantry—indeed, wholly on the bayonet. Happily, if the rebels should prove to be in strong force, the country is too thickly wooded to admit of much generalship, and it was hoped that our superior weight of metal would carry the day.

Early in the forenoon I rode up to the head-quarters of Generals Hooker and Franklin, about two miles from Banks's Ford. The night's rain had made deplorable havoc with the roads. The nature of the upper geologic deposits of this region affords unequaled elements for bad roads. The sand makes the soil pliable, the clay makes it sticky, and the two together form a road out of which, when it rains, the bottom drops, but which is at the same time so tenacious that extrication from its clutch is all but impossible.

The utmost effort was put forth to get pontoons enough into position to construct a bridge or two. Double and triple teams of horses and mules were harnessed to each pontoon-boat. It was in vain. Long, powerful ropes were then attached to the teams, and a hundred and fifty men were put to the task on each boat. The effort was but little more successful. They would flounder through the mire for a few feet—the gang of Liliputians with their huge-ribbed Gulliver—and then give up breathless. Night arrived, but the pontoons could not be got up. The rebels had discovered what was up, and the pickets on the opposite bank called over to ours that they "would come over to-morrow and help us build the bridge."

That night the troops again bivouacked in the same position in the woods they had held the night before. You can imagine it must have been a desperate experience—and yet not by any means as bad as might be supposed. The men were in the woods, which afforded them some shelter from the wind and rain, and gave them a comparatively dry bottom to sleep on. Many had brought their shelter-tents; and making a flooring of spruce, hemlock or cedar boughs, and lighting huge camp fires, they enjoyed themselves as well as the circumstances would permit. On the following morning a whisky ration, provided by the judicious forethought of General Burnside, was on hand for them.

Thursday morning saw the light struggling through an opaque envelop of mist, and dawned upon another day of storm and rain. It was a curious sight presented by the army as we rode over the ground, miles in extent, occupied by it. One might fancy some new geologic cataclysm had o'ertaken the world; and that he saw around him the elemental wrecks left by another Deluge. An indescribable chaos of pontoons, wagons, and artillery encumbered the road down to the river—supply-wagons upset by the road-side—artillery "stalled" in the mud—ammunition trains mired by the way. Horses and mules dropped down dead, exhausted with the effort to move their loads through the hideous medium. A hundred and fifty dead animals, many of them buried in the liquid muck, were counted in the course of a morning's ride. And the muddle was still further increased by the bad arrangements—or rather the failure to execute the arrangements that had been made. It was designed that Franklin's column should advance by one road and Hooker's by another. But, by mistake a portion of the troops of the Left Grand Division debouched into the road assigned to the centre, and cutting in between two divisions of one of Hooker's corps, threw everything into confusion. In consequence, the woods and roads have for the past two days been filled with stragglers, though very many of them were involuntary stragglers, and were evidently honestly seeking to rejoin their regiments. It was now no longer a question of how to go on; it was a question of how to get back.

FRUITLESS ATTEMPT OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC TO MOVE TOWARD THE

APPAHANNOCK ON 20TH JANUARY, 1863.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 103.]

COUNTERPARTS.

FROM THE GERMAN OF HEINE.

A FIRST-TREE standeth lonely,
In the North, on mountain cold.
He sleeps; the ice and snow-wreaths
White draperies round him fold.

He dreameth of a palm-tree,
Which, in the far East, doth look
Toward him, as she mourneth lonely
On burning shelf of rock.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS. L. H.

THE  IN THE CLOSET.

PASSAGES EXTRACTED FROM THE JOURNAL OF THE BARON DELAUNAY.

3d June, 1770: Paris.—The Vicomte de Grandchamps called this morning—splendid as usual, with buttons of Bowman mosaic on his velvet vest, and his point-lace jabot the true coffee-color now in vogue. What an age of pretension it is! The dandy conceals his own dear heart behind a hideous crop of the barber's invention. The ladies cover their fair skins with rouge and little patches of black; the graceful play of their limbs is thwarted by some artificial device to swell out their petticoats and nip in their waists—even the pearly whiteness of their teeth is dyed in coffee to give it a look of age! How preposterous shall we appear to future ages, when a more enlightened education and a higher tone of morality will allow the society to return to nature, consequently to beauty! I can fancy how the students of the next century will contrast the costume of our ladies—their petticoats tucked up to display their legs, attractively set off by red and embroidered stockings; their little feet distorted by high-heeled shoes; their painted cheeks, their false hair, their little staghelen hats—with the long flowing robes indicating the graceful limbs without displaying them, the chaste wimple, the modest veil of the middle ages. I can foresee what lesson they will deduct from these outward signs, and how they will understand only from pictures the reverential devotion of the Knights of Saint Louis's time for their noble ladies, and the familiar, lewd gallantry of the reign of Louis XV. To return to the Vicomte who suggested this digression. He entered, and threw himself indolently down on the easiest of my armchairs, stretching out his legs the better to admire their exquisite proportions.

"Is it true," he asked, "that you are on the eve of giving up your liberty?"

"My liberty! What is that?"

"Ah!" he replied, with a little laugh, stroking his calves the while, "very good; what is his liberty?—certainly, he has not yet reached the bachelors' come and go at will, order our own dinner, pursue our own pleasure, form our own little acquaintances, not to be done with tenderer name, invite our own friends to our own banquets? Once married, mon cher, some one else rules all that; you may pay the bill—but what is your share of the fun. It is true you may have separate establishments, but that is expensive, and no particular good."

"All that may be the case in your ménage, Vicomte," I replied, "but I assure you it will not be so in mine. I hope only to prove how much marriage may increase or diminish my happiness; but, decidedly, I shall remain master of my own house."

"Then you will be the first perpetual widower, and we shall soon see the marks of nails on your grave, sober face. That is a worse condition than the other."

"Neither one nor the other is necessary, I assure you."

"Ah, poor Delaunay, what an infatuation! I had hoped it might not be true, when the fellows at the fencing-school told me, and asked the hand of Gabrielle de Vigny of her parents."

"It is true that I have made proposals to the parents of Mademoiselle de Vigny," I replied with a stress on the mademoiselle he had so rudely omitted; "but I am not so sure of obtaining it."

"You don't mean to say De Vigny hesitated?—the hypocrite!"

"Not at all, but the young lady herself has not seen me; she will see me for the first time."

"And you think she will be consulted?"

"I am sure she will; I will not force myself upon any one."

"Ah, well, girls are all alike! she will say yes, glad enough to leave school and be Madame la Baronne Delaunay with a handsome husband, a handsome house, and a handsome fortune. And then she will amuse herself. Poor things, they are so cozied up in their nothing but convent ideas, whereas we men, by marrying, either lose our liberty, or—"

"Valuable liberty, truly! We do as we like, because no one cares what we do; stop out late, because no one at home is longing for us; forsworn friendships because there is no one to fill up the blank in our heart."

"Ow! ow! Really, Delaunay, your conversation with you is like reposing in a shady arbor! I am a man of the court of his Most Christian Majesty Louis XV. talking about our hearts! Ah, here is François with chocolate; I drink in that most innocent beverage to the success of your Arcadian dream. May your choice be as sweet as your chocolate!"

And so he ran on, and I reasoned with him no longer. Au fond he was not worth the trouble. But am I so sure of the wisdom of my plans? I have seen her portrait; it is charming. Her parents are worthy people, and she is only fifteen: surely, at that age, she can have acquired no taint of the vices of the day; no taste for its artificial pleasures. She will yield to my superior experience. I will be so gentle with her; I will so truly make her feel the identity of our interests—but softly, this is not yet mine, she may never bear my name, for her wishes shall never be forced for me.

5th June.—Waited betimes on Madame de Vigny, for she had, I know, fixed on the 4th for her daughter's arrival in Paris, and I could not rest till I had seen her and learned my fate. There is a certain air of poverty about the apartments, in spite of the gentility of the lady's manners, which makes me fear that my fortune may be an acceptable prospect to the De Vigny's, and I more than ever determine to ascertain for myself if the parents dictate to the poor girl her choice. After a brief apology for presenting myself so early in the day, "I is she arrived?" I asked, eagerly.

"Yes, indeed."

"And she was quite willing to come?"

"What a question! Gabrielle has never disobeyed her parents."

"But was she glad, happy, or did she weep?"

"Nay, I must admit she shed many tears; but what would you expect? She has been with the good nuns seven years, and she loves them dearly. She is so young she had never thought of changing her condition; and she is so timid too. There were girls there no older than herself who cast such looks of envy upon her as she bade them farewell! 'Ah, how happy you will be!' they exclaimed. 'Come and see us when you are a great lady, and tell us all about court when you are presented.' But my poor Gabrielle only kissed them, and wept without speaking. They were all still standing behind the grille when we drove away. But she is quite happy this morning; listen, is not that merry song?"

She paused, and opened the window; from the little square garden below the sound came clear and like the matins of a bird. How my heart beat as I caught the vague outline of a female dress among the lilac-bushes!

"Ah, Madame, let me go down to her. I must see her. I can wait no longer now I have heard her voice."

"What are you thinking of, Baron? She has no proper attire; she still wears her poor little convent frock. I have ordered a dress from the first maker. In a few days she shall be presented to you; but to see her alone before marriage, at any rate before signing the contract, is a custom that is never done. Monsieur le Baron must be aware of it?"

"I am, dear Madame; but I am not bound by any of our absurd formalities myself, and I entreat you to set them aside in my favor. Good Heavens, Madame! think what I have at stake in the future son, that you are afraid to trust him to speak to your daughter?"

As I grew warm the lady was obviously embarrassed between her strong sense of the proprieties and her desire not to offend me. "I wish my husband were at home," she said.

"Listen, dear Madame; you must allow me to see mademoiselle, for I have vowed never to marry a girl who can not assure me that she voluntarily becomes my wife."

The lady looked still more uncomfortable. She is to timid she would not dare to refuse me so much.

"Well, at any rate you must let me try. Do you not see that I am only consulting her interest? You cannot refuse me. I shall be almost in your presence in that arbor."

The lady fairly cried as she again muttered something about her poor child's fright in the room. The more she desired the match the more determined I became to ascertain if the daughter was averse to it; for I was resolved not to enter into the garden. Gabrielle was standing under a lilac-tree—the sun glancing in checkered rays through the boughs upon her brilliant hair and white throat, her simple dress. Ah, I see that dear little frock now—a white chintz strewed with rosebuds! Her face was bent down, and as I left the-valley she was smelling, but the profile was exquisite; the little hands which held the flower were so delicate! My heart beat with a sudden check; it was for me to feel timid, uncertain. What if that lovely flower were not for me? what if that rose-face were to turn away from me with aversion? All my thoughts were confused; words failed me. Now that I had seen her, how could I bear to risk a refusal? I felt a strong impulse to return to her mother, and beg her to plead my cause; but I could not utter a single figure, that elegant form, that beautiful head, entranced me quite. Suddenly she turned round and perceived me; a deep blush overspread her face and neck, and she was bounding away like a startled fawn, when I boldly caught her hand, and, greatly alarmed, she paused to listen. I was, indeed, but her mother had allowed me to visit her in the arbor.

Poor little thing! how frightened, how agitated she looked! For seven years she had seen no man but the old priest; and her dress fluttered visibly with the beating of her heart. "I am going to spoil me how to reassure her. I had determined to be as correct, as respectfully ceremonious as her mother's, considering that was overpowering but with dear darling, trembling child by my side, how could I? I seated her on a little bench, on which there was barely room for us two, and still retaining her hand, I said, simply,

"Gabrielle, your parents have allowed me to ask you to be mine—will they speak to you also on the subject?"

"Yes, Sir."

"And the thought grieves you?"

There was a pause: I could see that she dared not answer openly.

"Do not be afraid; you are entirely your own mistress; no one will control your inclinations; no one will even persuade you in the matter. I will never see you again if you tell me to go. If it does not make you unhappy I will remain with you a little while; may I?"

"Yes, Sir," she whispered.

"Then don't tremble so; have confidence in me, for I seek only to make you happy. Look at me, and tell me if I am so very formidable."

She raised her eyes as if from a habit of o. dience, and fixed them again; then looked at me again, voluntarily and steadily. The truthful, beautiful eyes! how I did love their lustrous depths! That look sealed my fate. Gabrielle ceased to tremble. She said little, but she listened willingly; and before I quitted her side she had given me the lily-of-the-valley she had been smelling when I first saw her (I have it still). Ah! what a change had taken place in my sensations since I first saw her mother! I actually embraced the good lady.

"Well?" she said.

"She is an angel. I have not deserved such happiness. And she will love me soon—I know she will. Ah, Madame, how can I thank you enough for such a treasure? And her dress is charming. Pray do not alter it; do not spoil her lovely simplicity; do not make her look ever so little like the ladies of the court."

The good mother was immensely relieved by my enthusiastic admiration, but she said her daughter must have the trousseau of a lady; and so I came home to my solitary house in a state of elysium.

8th June.—My suit prospers; each day my Gabrielle (dear) grows more familiar, more charming; but I feels sort of panic when I consider her extreme youth and inexperience. She has seen nothing, knows nothing; she does not dislike me; but with whom could she compare me? How mother takes her from house to house to pay the customary calls for the first days before marriage; but I know too well how such visits are endured. A kiss on the forehead, with kind congratulations from the elders, is how from the young creatures the distribution of a little box of bonbons, which all and young are expected to handle round, and the ceremony is ended, without my timid little Gabrielle having raised her eyes.

A laudable sometimes as I think of the wretched marriages I have known, and fancy that perhaps the poor young bride was taken from her convent to be the slave, perhaps the innocent ex pe nothed, and that, when it was too late, her eyes were opened, and her affections engaged when her vow it found that it was irrevocable!

It was my wish to retire to my château of St. Vermont, and there to lead with her such a life as was not exist in Paris—the capital; but her mother, I see, expects her to be presented at court, and I myself feel scruples as to the kindness of secluding her from her ere she has experience to judge of it for herself.

"Yes, she must first see a little more of life, and here, à propos, I must introduce to you the Comte's father, the Marquis de Grandchamps, to a fête champêtre at his superb house at St. Maur. He is a friend of both Madame de Vigny and her lovely daughter, in whose honor the fête is given. Ah! I have hardly patience to think of the old libertine's face for—about, and interlocuing her to his friends, male and female. Inconsistent that I am, it is not that I was just relishing was the prospect of the two?"

11*th June.*—The most lovely day favored the Marquis's fête, which was certainly a grand success. Madame de Vigny arrived in a plain coach; it is a most antiquated vehicle, and so heavy that her four fat Norman horses could barely drag it along at the pace of four miles an hour. But what mattered the slowness of their pace to me, with Gabrielle, seated opposite to me, with her head drooping down, listening to my account of every thing the journey suggested, particularly the donjon of Vincennes? Ah! I could not resist the temptation of showing those eyes dilate with real terror as I related to her, as graphically as I could, some of the horrible adventures of prisoners immured forever in those dark cells.

"And are there prisoners there now?" she asked, looking sadly at the fortified walls.

"Yes, many."

"So you said when we passed the Bastile," she answered. "Two prisons in one drive, and on such a brilliant summer's day. The good God comfort the poor captives!"

I regretted of the picturesqueness of my description—that I had exaggerated—when I found that I could not win another smile from her till we came suddenly at a turn of the road upon the Bastile, which, gilded by the merry bright in the sunshine, there blue and cool beneath the willows which overhang it. The grounds of the Marquis look gayer, the water's edge, brilliant with gay-painted kiosques and Chinese summer-houses, was supported on banks of flowers, festooned, marked the approach to the house; and almost ere we had passed the gates a group of would-be shepherdesses, adorned with pink and blue knots, stepped up with roses, and with blue ribbons fleating from their crooks, advanced to welcome us and conduct us to the scene of the revels. Poor little Gabrielle's dress was the prettiest of the whole; but she looked unpretending, and abstracted, as if her book is unsophisticated, not a gesture is natural."

The fête, as might be expected, was splendid, and very magnificent; but it seemed to regret, to me, except when her modesty suffered as she was brought too prominently forward to public notice. I think I had a pleasure in seeing a delightful specimen in which the Vicomte had pronounced the perfection a selection from Piccini's 'Dido.'

"Ah," I thought, as I was enjoying, observing her delight, "you young people find pleasure in all that wandering up and down, which, to me, is little better than tuning the instruments. If you had heard Lulli play the violin, so tender, so simple, yet so wonderful! This is my way to like to wild after the music, he ordered the concert. He takes his part with such vehemence that he has written at least twenty-four pages of music; and at that famous battle at the Palais Royal he is believed to have knocked down about a dozen Gluckites with the feather out of his hat, which was the only weapon he had at command."

"All which," I observed, "does not hinder Gluck from being the greatest composer we have ever had, as I hope to prove to Mademoiselle de Vigny to-morrow at the representation of his 'Orfeo.'"

The old Marquis smiled. "I should have guessed you were a Glückite, always of the same opinion. Ah! Mademoiselle, you must enliven your future husband; make him one of us. Do not allow him to frown down upon our innocent frivolity, like a Puritan Cato. Time is so short, why not improve it by gliding its wings, since we can not clip them, and crowning it with flowers, since we can not conceal its old bald head."

The Marquis then begged me to lead out Mademoiselle de Vigny for a minuet; but though her mother looked approbation at the proposal, Gabrielle herself grew pale with timidity. She dared neither refuse nor accept; and most gratefully she thanked me when I assured her that she was there only for her own pleasure, and need do nothing that was painful to herself.

On our return home, as the moon was at the full, Madame de Vigny had caused no footman to attend us with torches—the way, too, being so long; but the moon was often obscured by clouds, or concealed by the tops of the trees. In passing along the Bois de Vincennes we were for nearly half an hour in total darkness. Madame slept profoundly. Never before had I had my betrothed so entirely to myself; and from low whispers of affection we broke into a sweet and more eloquent still of love. I took her hand, and it returned the pressure of mine; I could not see her face, but I drew her nearer—nearer to me, and on to her forehead I imprinted the first kiss I had ever dared to take, half fearing the while lest she should resent it; but my lips still lingered on her cheek when I felt her dear arms cast around me—her heart was beating against mine. We had not sought mine. O joy! all that I felt for her she felt for me; it was no quiet acquiescence in an inevitable doom; her being had caught the flame with which it filled mine. I was said, but from that moment I felt she was my wife. All scruples ceased; it mattered not where she dwelt, or where she saw, she was mine as voluntarily as I was hers.

12th June.—Conducted Gabrielle and her mother to the representation of Gluck's 'Orfeo.' Poor Gabrielle, how delighted she was moved—it was all real to her; her eyes never wandered a moment from the stage, and flashed with hope or filled with tears as the story changed; but when at last she saw Orpheus about to turn round, unable to bear the agonizing doubt of Eurydice, she clasped her hands passionately, and exclaimed aloud, "Why do you not trust him when he loves you so much!" instantly Eurydice looked up to her husband, and so did many others. Poor Gabrielle, covered with confusion, sat as far back as she could, and the curtain had not faded from her neck when De Grandchamps entered.

"I have come to felicitate you," he exclaimed. "What would I not give to have such a beauty in a play! I can only just remember the sensation, but it was very delightful. Now, you see, I'm only wondering whether Orpheus will turn or will he true. Gluck never before received such praise as yours. I had intended to ask you if you did not think it would be worthy of the Opera; but when I saw your face, I knew it was useless to try and get any consure from you. Ton have espoused Delaunay's taste bodily, have you not, himself?"

He spoke in a bantering way, as usual, but I could see that he was unusually charmed by the honest girlish beauty of Gabrielle; he looked at her continually, and chatted to her with so much fun, and such a candid confession of all behind, that she soon seem very much entertained with him, and gave him some of those silvery peals of girlish laughter, which he told me were as delightful to the ear of Eurydice. Returning home, I asked her how she liked De Grandchamps.

"I think him very amusing; of course, I do not believe in all the wickedness he pretends to boast of. I suppose, on the contrary, he is very good."

"And why so?"

"He could not be so gay if he were guilty—remorse would poison his life. He could not make a jest of sin."

Poor innocent Gabrielle! I thought, Is that all thy penetration? then art thou safer with a protector less guileless than thyself.

I have confided to Gabrielle my first design of living with her at St. Vermont, for I think her convent education seems to have fitted her specially for the life I have most at heart. Yes, she will prove like a good angel among my people, healing their bodily sicknesses with medicines and restoratives, and pouring into their moral wounds the balm and oil of Christian faith and touching sympathy. I told her I feared her mother would not be satisfied—her dreams for the future had been more ambitious.

"Nay," she answered, with her usual frankness, "mamma is too well pleased with our engagement to feel disappointed at any thing you propose, and papa would quite agree with your views of happiness."

Three days more, and she is mine! Ah! how can I ever make her sufficiently happy? the darkness and disquietude of my unfledged love can never be forgotten.

St. Vermont, 24th June.—Mid-summer in all its bloom, and we here in the beautiful country to enjoy it. What peace, what serenity, after the excitement of our marriage! The checkered emotion of separation from Gabrielle's parents—the journey here—the enthusiastic reception of our good people! Gabrielle is delighted; she says it is a new world, much larger and grander than the Paris world of fashion, of which she merely took a peep.

Ah! Mademoiselle, you must enliven your future husband; make him one of us. Do not allow him to frown down upon our innocent frivolity, like a Puritan Cato. Time is so short, why not improve it by gliding its wings, since we can not clip them, and crowning it with flowers, since we can not conceal its old bald head."

The Marquis then begged me to lead out Mademoiselle de Vigny for a minuet; but though her mother looked approbation at the proposal, Gabrielle herself grew pale with timidity. She dared neither refuse nor accept; and most gratefully she thanked me when I assured her that she was there only for her own pleasure, and need do nothing that was painful to herself.

On our return home, as the moon was at the full, Madame de Vigny had caused no footman to attend us with torches—the way, too, being so long; but the moon was often obscured by clouds, or concealed by the tops of the trees. In passing along the Bois de Vincennes we were for nearly half an hour in total darkness. Madame slept profoundly. Never before had I had my betrothed so entirely to myself; and from low whispers of affection we broke into a sweet and more eloquent still of love. I took her hand, and it returned the pressure of mine; I could not see her face, but I drew her nearer—nearer to me, and on to her forehead I imprinted the first kiss I had ever dared to take, half fearing the while lest she should resent it; but my lips still lingered on her cheek when I felt her dear arms cast around me—her heart was beating against mine. We had not sought mine. O joy! all that I felt for her she felt for me; it was no quiet acquiescence in an inevitable doom; her being had caught the flame with which it filled mine. I was said, but from that moment I felt she was my wife. All scruples ceased; it mattered not where she dwelt, or where she saw, she was mine as voluntarily as I was hers.

12th June.—Conducted Gabrielle and her mother to the representation of Gluck's 'Orfeo.' Poor Gabrielle, how delighted she was moved—it was all real to her; her eyes never wandered a moment from the stage, and flashed with hope or filled with tears as the story changed; but when at last she saw Orpheus about to turn round, unable to bear the agonizing doubt of Eurydice, she clasped her hands passionately, and exclaimed aloud, "Why do you not trust him when he loves you so much!" instantly Eurydice looked up to her husband, and so did many others. Poor Gabrielle, covered with confusion, sat as far back as she could, and the curtain had not faded from her neck when De Grandchamps entered.

"I have come to felicitate you," he exclaimed. "What would I not give to have such a beauty in a play! I can only just remember the sensation, but it was very delightful. Now, you see, I'm only wondering whether Orpheus will turn or will he true. Gluck never before received such praise as yours. I had intended to ask you if you did not think it would be worthy of the Opera; but when I saw your face, I knew it was useless to try and get any consure from you. Ton have espoused Delaunay's taste bodily, have you not, himself?"

He spoke in a bantering way, as usual, but I could see that he was unusually charmed by the honest girlish beauty of Gabrielle; he looked at her continually, and chatted to her with so much fun, and such a candid confession of all behind, that she soon seem very much entertained with him, and gave him some of those silvery peals of girlish laughter, which he told me were as delightful to the ear of Eurydice. Returning home, I asked her how she liked De Grandchamps.

"I think him very amusing; of course, I do not believe in all the wickedness he pretends to boast of. I suppose, on the contrary, he is very good."

"And why so?"

"He could not be so gay if he were guilty—remorse would poison his life. He could not make a jest of sin."

Poor innocent Gabrielle! I thought, Is that all thy penetration? then art thou safer with a protector less guileless than thyself.

I have confided to Gabrielle my first design of living with her at St. Vermont, for I think her convent education seems to have fitted her specially for the life I have most at heart. Yes, she will prove like a good angel among my people, healing their bodily sicknesses with medicines and restoratives, and pouring into their moral wounds the balm and oil of Christian faith and touching sympathy. I told her I feared her mother would not be satisfied—her dreams for the future had been more ambitious.

"Nay," she answered, with her usual frankness, "mamma is too well pleased with our engagement to feel disappointed at any thing you propose, and papa would quite agree with your views of happiness."

Three days more, and she is mine! Ah! how can I ever make her sufficiently happy? the darkness and disquietude of my unfledged love can never be forgotten.

St. Vermont, 24th June.—Mid-summer in all its bloom, and we here in the beautiful country to enjoy it. What peace, what serenity, after the excitement of our marriage! The checkered emotion of separation from Gabrielle's parents—the journey here—the enthusiastic reception of our good people! Gabrielle is delighted; she says it is a new world, much larger and grander than the Paris world of fashion, of which she merely took a peep.

She thanks God her lot is placed here. Sweet child! she came to me this morning early, her hands and dress laden with roses still gemmed with dew. "Come with me," she said; "I have gathered these for the altar of our kind Lord: it is the day of St. John: we will go to church together, and thank him—oh! for so much happiness!" and tears purer than the dew on the roses stood in her dark eyes, and a flush of joy more brilliant than their lovely color heightened the beauty of her girlish face. I could only look at her; my heart was too full for words: surely my cup of contentment runs over.

30th.—Our sweet retirement ends to-day. De Grandchamps joins us. He has not been well, he says, and begs us to give him a change of air and a little quiet. He is welcome, and we will nurse him well; but we are so happy I can not look upon any change with pleasure.

1st July.—Certainly the Vicomte is much altered, and my wife sees it as much as I do. I questioned him as to his dejection, but can not find that he has been playing deeper than usual, and I can think of no other loss that would affect him. A good dose of fresh air, he says, will set him up again. "Yes," I added, "if you do not die of ennui during the process."

3d.—Gabrielle looked sad to-day—perhaps I should rather say very serious—for the first time since our marriage. When we were alone at night, "Gabrielle," I said, "there is not to be the faintest cloud between us two: tell me what saddens you."

Her old timidity returned, and her color, which varies so perpetually, went and came. I saw she was struggling with her natural shyness, and I waited patiently, holding her hands in mine to encourage her with my love and tenderness.

"Monsieur de Grandchamps tells me you are so very learned, and I am so ignorant. He said—no, he did not say so, but he—at least I understood him to mean that you would soon be tired of me, that you cared for nothing but science, literature, and —and—all that I don't understand. I saw that he was much surprised that you should ever have thought of me, and so am I now I reflect upon it."

"Dear Gabrielle! thank you for telling me. But I had imagined De Grandchamps far too much of a flatterer for such a speech."

"Oh, he interlarded it with compliments, and said he preferred me as I am, but I did not heed all that, because I was struck with the truth of what he first said—that you were so learned, and I so ignorant."

"I am twelve years older than you, Gabrielle, and certainly not twelve years wiser. But I own to a great respect for learning, though not learned myself. Shall we study together? Here, in this quiet place, we shall have leisure for reading."

"Any thing with you."

4th.—Study with Gabrielle is not a brilliant success as yet; it is difficult to manage. Those stupid old nuns have left untaught the very first laws of every thing but embroidery and confectionery, and it is really puzzling to know where to begin, so that Gabrielle may understand me. But if I am obliged to own that my wife has no book-learning, I must say that every fresh test proves her more and more intelligent and really wise. She has always done the right thing with the most perfect grace, while I have been considering what was expected of me; but as for books, the poor child yawns; it can not be dissembled, she positively yawns.

I shall be glad when De Grandchamps returns to Paris. He seems quite well now, and is enjoying himself immensely. Strange that he should, so quiet as is our life. * * *

A box from Paris has quite restored my wife's gay smiles. I suppose because it was a remembrance of her mother; for the box seemed to contain nothing but old school-books, working materials, etc.

12th.—De Grandchamps gone to a friend a few leagues off. I am afraid I am wanting in hospitality, but I really was not sorry to see him ride off, though he may return a day hence.

14th.—What is the meaning of this? When I went to my wife's boudoir this morning—always as much mine as hers—I found the door locked; and when, after some delay, it was opened, her manner was confused, her face averted from mine. What does it mean? I had vowed to hear of, to practice, no concealment, and yet somehow I could not explain myself—could ask nothing about the hurried manner, the locked door.

15th.—I fancied, after our little discomfort of yesterday, that Gabrielle might be embarrassed, colder, perhaps, but she is not. I never saw her more gay, more playfully kind. And yet she has said nothing satisfactory; she has not even reproached me with not demanding the explanation we had agreed to have on every subject of difference, be it ever so slight. And yet she hides—Nonsense, her face is candor itself; she hides nothing. It was a chance, and she has attached no importance to it, has not thought of it again. But why lock the door when she heard me?

16th.—O misery! she conceals something. I saw her to-day hastily snatch some article from her work-basket and thrust it into her pocket. And yet she carries it off bravely! she is gay, and I—I am wretched—tormented with doubts. To-morrow I will know all—at any price I will—I know not why I am silent so long; is it fear?

17th.—I feigned to go out fishing this morning and returned almost immediately. I went straight up to Gabrielle's room, but as I approached the door I heard her step within fly across the room and hastily draw the bolt. All calm forsook me—

"Open the door, Gabrielle!"

"Yes, dear, in one moment."

"Instantly, Madame!"

The bolt was withdrawn immediately, and Gabrielle stood there with such a look of fearful perplexity in her large eyes; I had called her Madame!

"Why did you lock your door?" No answer.

"Why did you lock your door?" I repeated, more angrily. Still no answer.

Gabrielle could not prevaricate, but I saw that her frightened looks turned ever to the door of a large closet near the window.

"Give me the key of that closet."

She obeyed tremblingly, but as I put the key in the lock she rushed forward, and, with a look of most miserable confusion, put her little hands against the door.

"I pray you not to open it!"

For all answer I took both her hands in one of mine (they were such baby hands!), and with a jerk of successful rage burst open the door—as I did so, there came tumbling against me the figure of a large waxen doll! My rival—my skeleton in the closet! It had been sent in that box which had given her so much pleasure—her old convent doll—her playmate for many years! And I had been jealous of that doll, with which my poor little wife of fifteen played on the sly! As I beheld her round, vacant, rosy face, her staring glass eyes, my first impulse was a burst of laughter, quenched almost immediately in a feeling of such remorseful shame as I hope never to feel again. I had so erred against my most innocent wife that I was ashamed to ask her forgiveness; every attempt, even at apology, would be an insult to a spirit so pure—so incapable of a thought even of evil. What was I to do? A stifled sob from Gabrielle met my ear. I knelt down and asked her pardon with most sincere humiliation.

"Forgive you," she sobbed, "for what?—will you not despise me forever?"

Her guileless mind had not even understood my insane suspicions; she thought only of her detected childishness. Glad was I to avail myself of her innocence.

"I have been so rude to you, dearest; I have given you pain," I stammered out.

Ah! how much more ashamed was I of my jealousy than she could be of her doll, and how much more ridiculous was I! Dear, dear little Gabrielle!

* * * * * * *

1st December.—Gabrielle called me this morning to show me the waxen dolly carefully packed up in a box.

"Do you know for whom I am saving dear old waxy?" she asked, with a smile; a smile which has much, much more in it than the old sunbeam of the childish face six months back.

"And yet, Gabrielle," I answered, pointing to some Liliputian needle-work, "yet you are still making doll's clothes?"

"For all your learning you are only a goose!" was the reply.

Fancy Gabrielle laughing at me in the presence of that doll of which she has been so dreadfully ashamed. Certainly something or other has greatly raised her sense of self-importance.

WHITE ELEPHANTS.

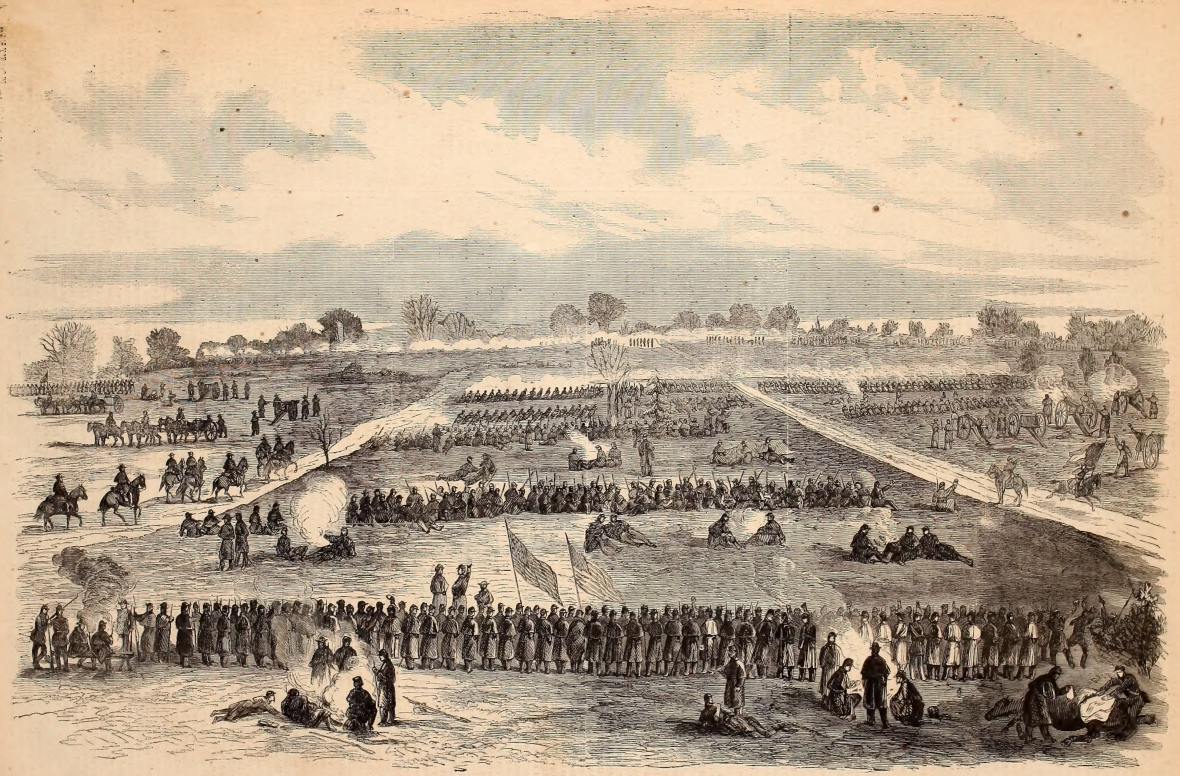
WHEN the King of Siam has an enemy among his lords whom he detests, but whom it would not be polite to destroy publicly—one who must be dispatched without long delay, but whose poison must be sweetened, and for whom the edge of the axe must be gilded—he sends him a white elephant. Not that the gift is one of either profit or pleasure, for the brute must not be shot, nor given away, nor put to mean uses of hire or labor; he must not carry a howdah nor drag a plow, but must be cared for, and fed, and pampered, and adulated, and kept, like a tough-skinned Apis as he is, in the splendid idleness of a four-footed god. He must have his body-guard and his palace, his attendants and his flatterers; his huge feet may trample down crops and vineyards if it pleases him to walk that way; and his capacious trunk may draw up the last drop of water in the well for his morning bath, while human souls are perishing from drought. All is permitted to him, and he must be cared for and indulged first of all the world; for he is the white elephant of royal favoring, to be received with gratitude and maintained with cost. In the end, the cost is so great that the receiver is ruined and commits suicide—the white elephant having proved as efficacious for punishment as a bow-string or a bowl of poison. All the better, indeed, because the deadlier design was masked beneath the appearance of consummate favor.

Neither is the kingdom of Siam the only place where one receives white elephants, to the destruction of happiness and life; and that intelligent pachiderm, with his waving trunk and flapping ears, his caution, his cunning, and his "fidgetiness," is not the only form in which favors are received. Friends and fortune often play the part of Siamese royalty, and offer us gifts of honor quite as ruinous and inconvenient. What is it but a white elephant gift when your brother abroad sends you a huge case of foreign rarities, which you are by no means to part with to dealers or discriminating friends, but must house with reverence—first paying the cost of transit and custom-house dues? You are a poor man, with narrow boundary lines set against your orchard; your life's acre grows only just enough potatoes for your pigs and children, leaving no surplus borders for green-house flowers; nevertheless you are obliged to root up half a dozen rows of that useful, if vulgar esculent, to plant in their place geraniums and fuschias, which give neither swill for the swine nor bread for the children. You have to go without essentials for the next six months, that you may load your chimney-pieces with carved ivory baskets holding nothing, and squat deities in filigree silver, not always impeccable with regard to delicacy, and utterly wrong-sided with regard to beauty. And not one of which you would value a farthing, or would regret to see consigned to the dust-heap this very day. But your friends congratulate you on the generosity of your brother abroad; and the virtuosi among them envy you, or tempt you with fiendish offers of fabulous wealth, if you will part with your book of Japanese costumes, or your Ganesa in jade-stone, with Confucius in Chinese silver, or Isis in verdigrised bronze; offers of fabulous wealth impossible to be accepted, yet for the half of which you would transfer to them the whole consignment, satisfied if you could get back your original outlay at the custom-house, not to speak of the running account at the framemaker's and the decorator's, not yet brought to a stand-still. Your brother abroad did not think of all this. He meant only to do you honor, and to give you a white elephant that would exalt your fame far above that of your friends and neighbors.

Your father-in-law did the same when he presented you with a new carpet for your drawing-room, on the tenth anniversary of your wedding-day. It was a bran-new Brussels, all red and green and white and yellow; a gorgeous Brussels, worth four times as much as that modest moss-colored Kidderminster which you were ogling at Shoolbred's. It killed all the shabby furniture of ten years' standing, and reduced to instant and unutterable ruin what had formerly been nothing more than permissible decadence. It made your curtains and your furniture, your paint and your paper, your frames and your chandeliers, simply impossible; and you found yourself some eighty pounds the worse—your experience of a white elephant.

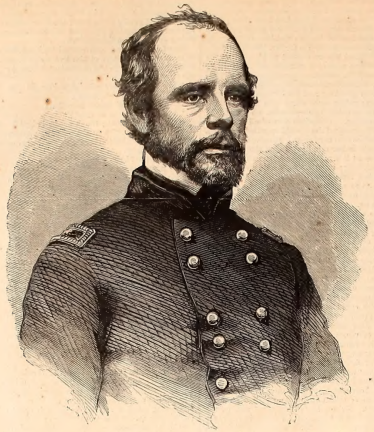
My dear wife had a white elephant given her, when her mother presented her with that magnificent brocaded silk, which was as stiff as a board and as bright as the sunlight. She could not forbear having it "made up," you know; that was absolutely necessary; but, of course, she would not have it "made up" by little Miss Twopenny, who did her common things well enough, but who was by no means equal to brocaded silk that would "stand by itself." She must go to Madame Grandechose, who had such a "fit" and such taste, and do dear mamma's present justice. So she went to Madame Grandechose; and Madame Grandechose undertook her brocade, and furthermore enlightened her on the contingent necessities of the situation—on the lace, and the flowers, and the feathers, and the thousand-and-one costly trimmings which must be added to do dear mamma's handsome present justice. My wife found, or rather I did for her, when the bill came in, that the trappings of her white elephant had cost more than our whole year's clothes of ordinary wear—that mamma's one brocade came to as much as her entire wardrobe, summer and winter included. Besides, as she very acutely argued, what was the good of a brocade like that if no one saw it? It was a pity to have spent so much money only to lay the brocade by in cedar shavings. As she had a white elephant, it was as well to parade it through the streets; as she had a brocaded silk dress with Madame Grandechose's taste superadded, it was a social duty to wear it. So we gave a few dinners and a few evening parties, and went out as often as we were asked that season; and by the end of it, I had overdrawn my banker's account several hundred pounds, and Johnny was taken from school and put to business a year and a half too soon. His mother's brocaded silk stunted my boy's career for life; which was paying rather dearly for a white elephant.

I once knew a man who had set his heart on a certain very personable white elephant of his acquaintance; an elephant of power and presence, on whose majestic back he thought he could rear a howdah of surpassing grandeur which would shelter his life from the fierce heats of summer and the chill blasts of winter alike, and carry him safely and nobly to his goal. He was a poor man, a man without friends or fortune, who aspired to be the husband of a nobleman's dowerless daughter, by whose grand connections he expected to rise to eminence in his profession, and whose powerful influence he thought would pull him through any difficulties that might beset him. That was his chart of calculation, his Mercator's Projection of the Universe of the future. Hers was the natural desire of the female elephant, whether white or black, for a home paddock and a gallant mate, for a troop of little baby elephants, with their trunks in the air and their knees deep in sweet vernal grass, and for the broad roof-tree, broad enough to shelter love and happiness and grandeur all together; so she responded to the call, and walked bravely through the gate of the paddock left open for her. But it did not answer. That paddock was too small for her ample creamy limbs; the roof-tree too narrow to harbor love and happiness and grandeur in a row; her baby elephants tossed up their trunks indeed, but it was in disdain at the coarse poor halm which barely covered their baby toes in place of the sweet vernal grass which should have grown above their knees; and when, in disgust at the poverty of the provisions offered, she broke down the paddock-gate and marched out into the open, she led her owner into a morass whence he never shook himself free until he crawled under the harrow of the Insolvent's Court, and emerged with scratches on his back that bled and festered always. His white elephant did for him what all white elephants do for their owners; and when the end of time came, he lay on the road of life a mangled wreck, with the print of an elephant's foot on his head.



Another white elephant that I know of brought her own trappings and provision with her. She was a rich wife, with a dowry that would have satisfied the most exacting. Surely there was no ruin looming in the distance here! If a creature brings its own corn, may it not eat safely in your manger? If it supplies its own silk and satin, can you not stitch up its howdah without pricking your fingers to the bone? The fortunate possessor of this special white elephant brought her to his home which her gold had gilded, and led her into the park which her acorns had planted; and he gave her full permission to walk beneath her own avenues, and eat the topmost branches of her own seedlings; to strengthen her manger with golden plates if she liked, provided she hammered them herself out of the nuggets of her own gold mines. So she did. But she ate so ma[ny] seedlings than her own acorns had planted, and she strengthened her manger with golden plates so outrageously thick, that in time she exhausted her supplies. Then she fed out of her owner's manger until she ate him up, body and bones. The wife was rich, but the woman was extravagant; and this special white elephant turned out in the end one of the most destructive of the tribe.

And among the biggest and whitest of the herd are and have been royal visits to favored noblemen. Very much flattered and honored was courtly Leicester when the high-starched ruff of the Leonine Virgin quivered beneath the lights of Kenilworth. Here was a white elephant whose sleek sides were worthy to be regarded and envied of all mankind! Here was a quadruped of strength, with dim forecastings of possible howdahs, and a swift and steady bearing to the highest point of the hill of fortune! But poor Leicester was no better off than the Siamese nobleman whom his king delights to favor left-handedly. His queen's grace was the white elephant of his life—mowing down irresistibly all the virtues and noblenesses of soul that might have borne goodly crops. If he had never been so gifted, he might have lived a happy man and have died an honest one, and the shade of poor pale Amy would not have haunted his waking hours, and crime and dishonor would not have howled from the depths of the troubled past. But he kow-towed to his white elephant, and fell down and worshiped it, and kissed the dust from its feet, and spread out the tender branches of love and honor in its way, and the big feet trampled them down step by step, and tossed them like refuse: and then he died, and he, too, was counted but as refuse among men. Essex did the same; but he crawled about the white elephant's feet with such abased hardihood, that at last he got kicked heavily out of the way, with his life torn right asunder, and the manhood trampled out of him. All for the sake of kow-towing to a queen, and bartering truth and life for a crowned old coquette's false smiles.



I remember how mightily I was enchanted and honored when my Lady Fairstar did me the unfathomable honor of asking me to dine at her splendid mansion in a glorified region of Belgravia! It seemed to me, then a poor struggling barrister on a mythical yearly allowance, that I was on the high-road to fortune at once, and that I had only to follow my Lady Fairstar's cavalcade to be landed safe in the very heart of the gardens of Aidann without delay. I went. I made no manner of doubt that I went to fascinate and to subdue, and that I should make such deep dints on the heart of our delightful hostess as not even the incessant rubbing of high life would be able to efface. And certainly my lady was gracious to me. But I found in the end that all I had made by the white elephant of her countenance was a portentous bill at my tailor's, another portentous bill at my boot-maker's, an unnecessary supply of embroidered shirt-fronts and French cambric handkerchiefs, and my laundress left unpaid owing to the transfer of her funds to the pockets of the cabmen. That was what I found when I took the two columns and added up the cost and the gain of my Lady Fairstar's Russian dinners, with scented ringlets laughingly shaken and bewildering smiles prodigally bestowed. It was a white elephant—nothing but a white elephant; and I ran away from it. Those grand visits are terrible matters generally. You are asked to a country-house. You are acknowledged to be a crack shot, and a first-rate rider; you tell a story capitally, and pocket every ball on the board; but at what a cost do you thus administer to the white elephant of your pride? At the cost of a year's income compressed into the six weeks of your stay. Butlers and footmen and pages and grooms and gillies and coachmen and the odd men about the place, and the odd women too—all to fee, all to pay—and the little wife left at home to fight with an unruly butcher who has undisciplined notions of trade, and to tell taradiddles to the landlord, who finds himself under the necessity of "looking you up." That is your white elephant when you get Lord Darkstar's invitation to his country seat in the hunting season.

There are all sorts of white elephants in our path! big and little, wild and tamed, tushers and toothless, of all heights, of all weights, of all hues. A patent of nobility to a poor gentleman with a miniature rent-roll bound in duodecimo, is a white elephant of tremendous appetite; so is knighthood to the honest leather-dresser made mayor of the town by the inadvertence of fortune, who offers the keys of the ancient city to her Majesty, and receives them back with the label of Sir.

What is it but a white elephant when that artist friend of yours generously presents you with a proof before letters of his own engraving? You don't want his proof before letters; you have quite as many pictures on your walls and brackets, and nick-knacks and ornaments, as you care for, and you really can not afford a frame of sufficient quality to match the excellence of the engraving, according to your friend's arithmetic. Yet, it will not do to dishonor his white elephant. You must frame your engravings in gilded carving, and study which is the best light as religiously as you would study the Koran if you were a Mussulman, or the Shasters if you were a Brahmin. Your grandmother, in a blue sash and mushroom hat, is made to turn her back on your grandfather in a full bottomed periwig and snuff-colored coat, that your friend's proof may have the post of honor on the wall; your favorite Clyte is dismounted from the bracket that your friend's proof may not be overshadowed in the extreme left-hand corner just before sunset; and when you have done all this, you find that the new gilding makes the old look deplorably shabby, and that you must have your whole wall-decoration retouched, because of this new bright bit of gold-leaf. Is not this a white elephant? I often wish that there were no such thing as a white elephant, and that when people make presents or bestow honors, they would give what was useful, and not a great glaring magnificence which makes every thing else look mean. White elephants do not do in donkey stalls: which is a great fact too often overlooked.

THE BATTLE OF MURFREESBORO, TENNESSEE—CENTRE OF THE ARMY ON 2D JANUARY, 1863.—SKETCHED BY MR. HENRY R. HÜBNER.—[SEE PAGE 109.]

MAJOR-GENERAL DARIUS N. COUCH, COMMANDING THE RIGHT GRAND DIVISION OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

MAJOR-GENERAL DANIEL BUTTERFIELD, CHIEF OF STAFF TO GENERAL HOOKER.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

GENERALS COUCH AND BUTTERFIELD.

We publish herewith, from photographs by Brady, portraits of GENERAL DARIUS N. COUCH, General Sumner's successor in command of the Right Grand Division of the Army of the Potomac, and of GENERAL DANIEL BUTTERFIELD, Chief of Staff to General Hooker. Both are fine-looking military men, and will make themselves heard of. We subjoin the following sketches of their lives:

GENERAL COUCH.

General Darius N. Couch was born in New York about the year 1826, entered West Point in 1842, graduated in the artillery in 1846, and went with his regiment (the Second Artillery) to Mexico. At the battle of Buena Vista he was brevetted First Lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct. At the close of the war Lieutenant Couch resigned his rank in the army and settled in Massachusetts. At the outbreak of the rebellion he joined the Volunteers, and left Boston at the head of a well-appointed regiment. In May, 1861, he was appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers. In all the battles on the Peninsula General Couch proved himself a gallant and able soldier; and when General Sumner resigned there was little hesitating in appointing him to the vacancy.

GENERAL BUTTERFIELD.

In the dark days of April, 1861, when the capital was in danger and the existence of the Government doubtful, one of the earliest, if not the first, to hasten to Washington with a tender of his services was Daniel Butterfield, commanding the Twelfth Regiment New York Militia. He found an attack momentarily expected, and an organization of visitors and citizens hastily formed, known as the Clay Guard, for the protection of the city from the hard-riding and hard-drinking cavaliers premiered for its "subjugation" by "Wise the Wilious." Colonel Butterfield enrolled himself at once, and many senators, judges, lawyers, and distinguished citizens who served as privates in the ranks of the Clay Guard on the memorable nights of the 17th and 18th of April will remember him in the young orderly-sergeant who drilled them, and watch his career with additional interest as a commander on a larger field. While engaged in this sacred duty Colonel Butterfield had obtained the permission of the Secretary of War to reorganize, fill up, and report his regiment at Washington on the 20th, prepared for duty. With this order Colonel Butterfield made his way through Baltimore, wet with the gore of Northern citizens shed by "plug uglyism" turned "secesh" in its mad frenzy, and over broken bridges and torn up tracks arrived in New York on Thursday night of the 20th, filled up his regiment (like most of our militia organizations then merely a skeleton) from some 500 to 1000 men, and left with them on Sunday afternoon in the Baltic, bound for Washington, by the way of Fortress Monroe, looking to a passage up the Potomac; and then, by information there obtained, to Annapolis.

GENERAL STONEWALL JACKSON IN CAMP.—FROM A DRAWING BY MR. VIEWELLY, INTERCEPTED BY OUR BLOCKADING FLEET OFF CHARLESTON.—[SEE PAGE 103.]

Adopted to the army corps of Patterson, the Twelfth saw their hopes of active service disappear in the marches and countermarches over the "sacred soil," while Bull Run was being fought and the vanity of the South in arms supplied with material for boasting. In Patterson's division General Butterfield (then Lieutenant-Colonel of the Twelfth United States Infantry by a recent appointment) commanded a brigade, and sought for permission to lead it into action. Soon afterward he received the full appointment of Brigadier in an unsolicited and gratifying manner. During the autumn and winter General Butterfield was profoundly occupied in drilling and disciplining his brigade and converting them into those "solid manhill veterans" as they are known for the South.

In the movement before Yorktown General Butterfield's brigade was constantly engaged, and gained credit by advance. They made the first reconnaissance to Big Bethel and literally fell, and mingled with Porter when he led his first approaches and attack on Yorktown. On the 17th of April a portion of the brigade repulsed a sortie of the enemy, receiving high encomiums from General Porter. At the battle of Hanover, on the first week of May, General Butterfield left his sick-bed for the saddle, and fought admirably. Again at the battle of Machanicsville and Gaines's Mills he won glory by his skill and bravery. The Prince de Joinville was struck by his gallantry and presented him with a horse in token of his regard. In the reorganization of the Army of the Potomac he assumed the division, which he has just relinquished to assume the responsible position of chief of General Hooker's staff—a most ordinary honor for a soldier who was not educated at West Point.

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK.

By the Author of "Mary Barton," etc.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER VI.

AT Easter—just when the heavens and earth were looking their dreariest, for Easter fell very early this year—Mr. Corbet came down. Mr. Wilkins was anxious to see much of him, and were together even less than usual, although not less friendly when they did meet. But to Ellinor the visit was a mixed happiness. Philip Egerton she had always had a little fear mingled up with her love of Mr. Corbet; but his manners were softened by his attentions and his evident respect, and his whole treatment of her showed such tenderness that the young girl basked and revelled in it. Then the two of their conversations had reference to their future married life in London; and she then perceived, although it did not jar upon her, that her lover had quite forgotten his ambition in his love. He tried to inoculate her with something of his own craving for success in life; but it was all in vain. She nestled to him and told him she did not care to be the Lord Chancellor's wife—wigs and woolsacks seemed to her to be unlike; only if he wished it, she would wish it.

The last two days of his stay the weather changed. Spring burst forth, as it will so occasionally for a few hours even in our chilly English spring. The gray-brown bushes and trees showed a faint but visible green, and even the tender green shade which is the forerunner of the bursting leaves. The sky was of full cloudless blue. Mr. Wilkins was so completely pretty early from the office to ride out with his daughter and her lover; but after writing some time for letters, he was too late, and found himself obliged to give up the project. Nothing would serve Ellinor, then, but that she must carry out a table and have tea in the garden, on the south side of the tree, among the roots of which she used to play when a child. Miss Monro objected a little to the proposal on Ellinor's account, as it was too early for out-of-door meals; but Mr. Corbet overruled all objections, and helped Ellinor in her preparations. She always looked to the early hours of her childhood, although she, as then, regularly sat with her father at his late dinner, and in much afternoon, was by no reality to her and Miss Monro. There was a place arranged for her father, and she seized upon him as he was coming from the stable-yard, by the shrubbery path, to his study, and with merry playfulness kept him a prisoner, accusing him of disquieting them of their revels, and of having him, more than half unwilling, to his chair by the table. He was not so silent, and almost said; his presence damped them all, they could hardly tell why, for he did not object to any thing, though he seemed to enjoy nothing, and only to force a smile at Ellinor's occasional allusions. These became more and more rare, as she perceived her father's depression. She watched him anxiously. He perceived it, and said—shivering in that strange unaccountable manner which is generally explained by the supposition that some one is passing over the earth that will one day form your grave—

"Ellinor! I must set a day for out-of-door tea. I never felt so chilly a spot in my life. I can not keep from shaking where I sit. I must have this place, my dear, in spite of all your good tea."

"Oh, papa! I am so sorry! but look how full these tea-cups are come on this tray. I thought I had chosen such a capital spot!"

But he got up and persisted in leaving the table, although he was evidently sorry to spoil the little party. He walked up and down the gravel walk, close by them, talking to them as he kept pushing and trying to forward their mirth.

"Are you warmer now, papa?" asked Ellinor.

"Oh yes! all right. It is only that place that seems so chilly and damp. I am as warm as toast now."

The next morning Mr. Corbet left them. The unseasonably fine weather passed away too, and all things went back to their rather gray and dreary aspect; but Ellinor was too happy to feel this much, knowing what absent love existed for her alone, and from this knowledge unconsciously trusting in the sun behind the clouds.

I have said that few or none in the immediate neighborhood of Hamley, besides their own household and Mr. Ness, knew of Ellinor's engagement. At one of the rare dinner-parties which Mr. Wilkins was not quite aware of the reason for such late visits, and had never put together the two facts (as cause and consequence) that on such occasions her father had been absent from the office all day, and that there might be necessary business for him to transact, the urgency of which was the motive for Mr. Dunster's visits. Mr. Wilkins always seemed to be annoyed by his coming at so late an hour, and spoke of it, resenting the intrusion upon his leisure; and Ellinor, without observation, adopted her father's mode of speaking and thinking on the subject, and was rather more angry than he was when-the more ebullitions of wrath rose on business in the evening. This night was of all nights the most ill-purposed time (so Ellinor thought) for a tête-à-tête with her father. However, there was no doubt in her mind as to what she had to do. So late as it was, the unwelcome visitor could not stop long; and then she would go down and have her little confidence with her father, and beg him to see Mr. Livingstone when he came the next morning, and dismiss him as gently as might be.

She sat on in the window-seat, dreaming waking dreams of future happiness. She kept losing herself in such thoughts, and became almost afraid of forgetting why she sat there. Presently she got up and got up to fetch a shawl, in which she muffled herself and resumed her place. It seemed to her growing very late; the moonlight was getting paler and fuller into the garden, and the blackness of the shadow was more concentrated and stronger. Surely Mr. Dunster could not have gone away along the dark shrubery-path so noiselessly but what she must have heard him? No! there was the swell of voices coming up through the window from her father's study: angry voices they were; and her anger rose sympathetically, as she knew that her father was easily irritated. There was a sudden movement, as of chairs pushed hastily aside, and then a mysterious, unaccountable noise, heavy, sudden, rather a slight movement as of chairs again; and then a profound stillness. Ellinor, her face turned against the side of the window, to listen more intently, for some mysterious instinct made her sick and faint, felt a cold breeze. Only by-and-by she heard, what we have all heard at such times of intent listening, the beating of the pulses of our heart, and then the rustling rush of blood through her head. How long did this last? She never knew. By-and-by she heard her father's hurried footing in his bedroom, next to hers; but when she ran thither to speak to him, and ask him what was amiss—if any thing had been—if she could help him—he was gone Mr. Livingstone's letter, she found that he had gone down again to his study, and almost at the same moment she heard the little private street-door of that room open; some one went out, and then there were hurried footsteps along the shrubery path. She ran down the stone, that is to say, Mr. Dunster leaving the house, and went back for Mr. Livingstone's letter. Having found it, she passed through the room to the private staircase, thinking that if she went by the more regular way she would have run the risk of disturbing Miss Monro, who might be still sitting stoned in the morning. Even in passing down this remote staircase she trod softly for fear of being overheard. When she entered the room the full light of the candles dazzled her for an instant, coming out of the darkness. They were flaring still in the draught from the window through the open door, by which the outer air was admitted; for a moment there seemed to be no one in the room. Then she saw, with strange sick horror, the legs of some one lying on the carpet behind the table. As if compelled, even while she shrieked out doing it, she went round to see who it was that lay there, so still and motionless as never to stir as her sudden coming. At the sight of his head propped on chair-cushions, his eyes open, staring, distended. There was a strong smell of brandy and smelling-salts in the room, as well as powerful as not to be neutralized by the free current of night air that blew through the two open doors. Ellinor could not tell if it was an exact instinct that made her act as she did during this awful night. In thinking of it afterward, with shuddering recollection, in haunting memory that would come and overshadow her during many, many years of her life, she grew to believe that the overpowering smell of the spirits had by absolutely intoxicated her—an unconscious Rechabite in presence. But something gave her a presence of mind and a courage not her own. And though she learned to think afterward that she had fallen down and kissed her father's cold wickedly, yet she marveled, in recalling that time, how she could have then behaved as she did. Filling a wine-glass herself up from her fascinated gaze at the dead man and went to the staircase door, by which she had entered the night, and called to the first maid she met—who—looked again; took the brandy bottle, and knelt down, and tried to pour some into the mouth; but the teeth she found not could not do. Then she wetted her handkerchief with the spirit and moistened the lips, all to no purpose; for as Ellinor said to herself, she knew he was dead—by a rupture of a vessel of the brain; how occasioned, I must tell by-and-by. Of course, all Ellinor's little attempts were only professed effect; her father had tried them before—vain endeavors all to bring back the precious breath of life! They only could not hear the sound of those open eyes, and softly, tenderly, tried to close them, although unconscious that in so doing, she was rendering the pious offices of some beloved hand to a dead man. She was sitting by the body on the floor when she heard steps coming, with rushing and yet cautious tread, through the shrubery; she had no fear, although it might be the tread of robbers and murderers. The awfulness of the hour raised her above common fears; though she did not go through the usual process of reasoning, and by it feel assured that the feet which were coming, so softly and swiftly along, were the same which she had heard leaving the room in like manner only a quarter of an hour before.

Her father entered, and started back, almost upsetting some one behind him by his recoil, on seeing his daughter in her motionless attitude by the dead man.

"My God, Ellinor! what brought you here?" he said, almost fiercely.

But she answered, as one stupefied:

"I don't know. Is he dead?"

"Hush, hush, child; it can not be helped."

She raised her eyes to the solemn, pitying, white-face behind her father's—the countenance of Dixon.

"Is he dead?" she asked of him.

The man stepped forward, respectfully pushing his master on one side as he did so. He bent down over the corpse, and looked, and listened, and felt, touching a candle on the table, he signed Mr. Wilkins to close the door. And Mr. Wilkins obeyed, and looked with an interesting of eagerness almost amounting to fierceness on the experiment, and yet he could not hope. The flame was steady—steady and pitilessly unstirred, even when it was shaded from the warmth and nostril; the heat was raised up by one of Dixon's stalwart arms, while he held the candle in the other hand. Ellinor looked from Dixon to some trembling on Dixon's part, and grasped his wrist tightly in order to give it the requisite motionless firmness.

All in vain. The head was placed again on the cushions, the servant rose and stood by his master, looking sadly on the dead man. Dixon, living, none of them had liked or cared for, and Ellinor sat on, quiet and tearless, as one in a trance.

"How was it, father?" at length she asked.

He would fain have had her ignorant of all, but so cornered by her light questions, by her eyes, in the very presence of death, he could not choose but speak the truth; he spoke it in confusion and in such sentence—in effort:

"He taunted me—he was insolent, beyond my patience—I could not bear it. I struck him—I can't tell how it was. He must have hit his head in falling. Oh, my God! one little hour ago I was thinking of the man's blood!" He covered his face with his hands.

Ellinor took the candle again, kneeling behind Mr. Dunster's head, she tried the futile experiment once more.

"Could not a doctor do some good?" she asked of Dixon, in a low, piteous tone.

"No!" said he, shaking his head, and looking with a sidelong glance at his master, who seemed to be striving in vain to shrink away from the suggestion. "Doctors can do naught, I'm afeared. All that a doctor could do, I take it, would be to open a vein, and see if could do any thing for the best of them, if I had but my fleam here." He fumbled in his pockets as he spoke, and, as chance would have it, the fleam (a blood-letting lancet) was somewhere about his dress. He drew it out, smoothed and tried it on his finger. Ellinor tried to look away, but could not avoid it, as she did so. Her father started eagerly forward, and did what was necessary with hurried, trembling hands. If he had cared less about the result, they might have been more afraid of the consequences of the operation in the hands of one so ignorant as Dixon. But, with an artery, it signified little; no living blood gushed out; only a little watery moisture followed the cut of the fleam. Dixon shook his head, in his strange, sad death-couch. Dixon spoke next.

"Master Ned," said he—for he had known Mr. Wilkins when he was full of bright, careless boyhood, and almost was carried back to them by the sense of charge and protection which the servant's presence in the room and sharpened sense gave him over his master on this dreary night—"Master Ned, we must do summut."

"Do you think so, what will you do?"

"Did any folk see him come here?" Dixon asked, after a time. Ellinor looked up to hear her father's answer. She felt if it was across her mind that all might be concealed somehow; she did not know how, nor did she think of any consequences except of saving her father from the vague dread trouble and punishment that she was aware would await him if all were known.

Mr. Wilkins did not seem to hear the fact, he did not hear any thing but the unspoken echo of his own last words that went booming through his heart:

"An hour ago I was innocent of this man's blood! Only an hour ago!"

Dixon got up and poured out half a tumbler-full of raw spirit from the brandy-bottle that stood on the table.

"Drink this, Master Ned," putting it to his master's lips. "Nay"—to Ellinor—"it will do him no harm to drink; bring back his senses, which, poor gentleman! are scared away. We shall need all our wits. Now, Sir, please to answer my question. Did any one see Measter Dunster come here?"

"I don't know," said Mr. Wilkins, recovering his dignity. "If all servants be quiet. He offered to walk home with me; I did not want him. I was almost rude to him to keep him off. I did not want to talk of business. I had taken too much wine to be very clear, and some things at the office were not quite in order, and he had found it out. If any one heard our conversation they must know I did not want him to come with me. Oh! why would he come? He was as obstinate—he would come—and here it has been his death!"

"Nay, Sir, what's done can't be undone, and I'm sure we'd any of us bring him back to life if we could, even by cutting off our hands, though he was a mighty plaguy chap while he'd breath in him. But what I'm thinking is this: it will, maybe, go awkward with you, Sir, if he is found here. One can't say. But don't you think, miss, that, as he's neither kith nor kin to mine him, we might just bury him away before morning somewhere? There's better nor four hours of dark. I wish we could put him in the church-yard, but that can't be; but to my mind the sooner we set about digging a place for him to lie in, poor fellow! the better it will be for us all in the end. I can pare a piece of turf up where it will never be missed, and if master will take the spade, and I another, why, we'll lay him softly down, and cover him up, and no one will be the wiser."

There was no reply from either for a minute or so. Then Mr. Wilkins said:

"If my father could have known of my living to this! Why, he will say me as a cruising and you, Ellinor! Dixon, you are right. We must conceal it, or I must cut my throat, for I never could live through it. One minute of passion, and my life blasted!"

"Come along, Sir," said Dixon; "there's no time to lose." And they went out in search of tools—Ellinor following them, shivering all over, but begging that she might be with them, and not have to remain in the study with—

She would not be bidden into her own room, she dreaded inaction and solitude. She would herself busy with carrying heavy baskets of turf, and straining her strength to the utmost; fetching all that was wanted, with soft swift steps.

Once, as she passed near the open study door, she thought that she heard a rustling, and a flash of hope came across her. Could he be reviving? It was brief, but a moment was enough to undeceive her; it had only been a night rustle among the trees. Of hope, life, there was none.

They dug the hole deep and well, working with fierce energy to quench thought and remorse. Once or twice her father asked for brandy, which Ellinor, reassured by the apparently good effect of the first dose, brought to him with a word and once, at her father's suggestion, she brought food, such as she could find in the dining-room, without alarming the household, for Dixon.

When all was ready for the reception of the body in its unblessed grave, Mr. Wilkins bade Ellinor go to her own room, she had done all she could to help them; the rest must be done by them alone. She felt that it must; and indeed both her nerves and her bodily strength were giving way. She could have kissed her father as he sat wearily at the head of the grave—Dixon had gone in to make some arrangements for carrying the corpse—but he pushed her away quietly but resolutely

"No, Nell, you must never kiss me again; I am a murderer."

"But I will, my own darling papa," said she, throwing her arms passionately round his neck, and covering his face with kisses. "I love you, and I don't care what you are, if you were twenty times a murderer, which you are not; I am sure it was only an accident."

"Go in, my child, go in, and try to get some rest. But after we must finish—as fast as we can. The moon is down; it will soon be daylight. What a blessing there are no rooms on one side of the house. Go, Nell, go! And she went; straining herself up to move noiselessly, with eyes averted, through the room which she shuddered to see in the place of her usual unhallowed death.

Once in her own room, she bolted the door on the inside, and then stole to the window, as if some fascination impelled her to watch all the proceedings to the end. But her aching eyes could hardly penetrate through the thick darkness which, at the time of the year of which I am speaking, still precedes the early dawn. She could discern the tops of the trees against the sky, and could single out the well-known one, at a little distance from the stem of which the grave was made, in the very piece of turf over which so lately she and Ralph had had their merry little tea-drinking; and where her father, as she now remembered, had shuddered and shivered as if the ground on which his seat had then been was less fateful and ominous to him.

Those below moved softly and quietly in all they did; but every sound had a significant and terrible distinctness to Ellinor's ears. Before they had ended the little birds had begun to pipe out their gay revelde to the dawn. Then doors closed, and all was profoundly still.

Ellinor threw herself, in her clothes, on the bed; and was thankful for the intense, weary, physical pain which had come to relieve of the anguish of thought, anguish that she fancied from time to time was leading to insanity.

By-and-by the morning cold made her instinctively creep between the blankets, and, once there, she fell into a dead, heavy sleep.

A SOLDIER'S VALENTINE.

JUST from the sentry's tramp
(I must take it again at ten),
I have laid my musket down,
And seized instead my pen;
For, pacing lonely round
In the chilly twilight gray,
The thought, dear Mary, came
That this is St. Valentine's Day.

And with the thought there came
A glimpse of the happy time,
When a school-boy's first attempt
I sent you, in borrowed rhyme,
On a gilt-edged sheet, embossed
With many a quaint design,
And signed, in school-boy hand,
"Your loving Valentine."

The years have come and gone—
Have flown I know not where—
And the school-boy's merry face
Is grave with manhood's care;
But the heart of the man still beats
At the well-remembered name,
And on this St. Valentine's Day
His choice is still the same.

There was a time—ah! well:
Think not that I repine—
When I dreamed this happy day
Would smile on me as mine;
But I heard my country's call;
I knew her need was sore:
Thank God, no selfish thought
Withheld me from the war.

But when the clear old Flag
Shall float in its ancient pride—
When the twain shall be made one,
And feuds no more divide—
I will lay my musket down,
My martial garb resign,
And turn my joyous feet
Toward home and valentine.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Attention Agents. Soldiers, and Masons.

Any one wishing to purchase FIFTEEN HUNDRED Pocket Knives, to be sold together with my wholesale Circular, either a Gold Masonic Pin or Ring, or a Gold Chaser for his watch, will be furnished, or a neat gilt Eye Vest Chain, or Neck Chain, or a splendid Gold Pen and Pencil, or a beautiful Engraved Bracelet, or Locket, or a California Diamond Ring or Pin.

B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
198 Broadway, N. Y.

Milligan's Patent Mess Kettle.

Complete for four officers. Price $5.

MILLIGAN BROS.

Milligan's Army Tent Stove.

The most portable stove in existence. When packed measures 5 inches high by 12½ inches in diameter. Weight 15 pounds. Price $10.

Sold by all dealers in Army Equipments. Wholesale Depot, No. 9 Platt Street, N. Y.

Send for circular.

MILLIGAN BROS.

New Military Books.

ELEMENTS of MILITARY ART and HISTORY. By Lieut. H. du Pin Dufour, Professor of Military Art, Geo. W. Cullum, U.S.A. 8vo, Cloth, $4.

HINTS TO VOLUNTEER OFFICERS on their Military Duties. By Lieut.-Col. C. C. Andrews, U.S.A. 18mo, Cloth, 50 cents.

SIEGE AND REDUCTION OF FORT PULASKI. By Brig.-Gen. Q. A. Gillmore, U.S.A. 8vo, Cloth, $2.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, 192 Broadway, N. Y.

Copies sent Post Paid by mail on receipt of price.

How to get a Furlough!!

HOW TO GET A DISCHARGE!!

HOW TO PRESERVE YOUR HEALTH!

With much other information of especial interest and value to the Army and Navy. Price 25 cents. Address, by mail, Furloughs and Discharges are always worth a hundred fold the cost of a Book! Send for a copy.

Price 10 Cents. Finer Edition, 25 Cents.

Agents Wanted. Address the Publisher,

G. G. EVANS, Philadelphia, Pa.

MAJ. GEN. BURNSIDE SAYS: "its vitalizing action is very life and comfort is complete."

Head-Quarters Army of the Potomac, Jan. 9, 1863.

James W. Evans, Esq., New York:—Sir,—I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of Dec. 30th, and also of the box containing the "Evans Stove," addressed to Major-Gen'l A. E. Burnside. The latter desires me to express his thanks for the Stove, and to say, that he considers it a perfect success; its adaptation to camp life and comfort is complete, as it is admirably large to warm an ordinary tent, and is very easily managed. Very Respy'd'y, D. Ralston, Private Secretary. Major General A. E. Burnside.

Made of cast iron, in 15 pieces, with Forks with 6 ft. of pipe in the space of the lower section. 6 ft. of pipe with every tent in the service. Price, boxed complete, $25.

J. W. EVANS,
21 John St.,
New York.

RAILWAY TIME KEEPERS

For Army Speculators. The Army and Navy Gazette, of Philadelphia, in its February Number, says: "The importation of the Railway Time Keepers, by Geo. Shirley, fills a long-felt want, being a handsome and serviceable Watch at an extremely moderate price. Superior in style and finish! Decidedly the most taking novelties out! Should retail at prices from $20 to $30. Good imitations of both gold and silver, with fancy colored hands and handsomely engraved dials. They are standing in my list." Sold only by the case of six of assorted designs. Engraved and superior elegant cases, with gold, also heavy silver plated, per case of six, $30; large size, $42.

Terms Cash. Will be sent to any part of the loyal states by express, with bill for collection. Buyers ordering in this manner must depend on the honor of the express agent where they receive the goods, or remit us two dollars on account that the bill will be paid. Soldiers must send payment in advance. Address,

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Agents,
Cor. John and Nassau Sts., New York.

SOMETHING NEW.

NATIONAL AMERICAN AMUSEMENT CARDS.

Colored for King, Goddess of Liberty, Flags, and Major for Jack. 52 assorted cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and run of all the usual games. These packs mailed free on receipt of One Dollar. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN PUBLISHING AGENCY,
14 Chambers Street, New York.

Do you want luxuriant whiskers or mustaches?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. E. G. Graham, No. 509 Nassau Street, N. Y.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE-BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC., ETC., ETC.,

Worth $500,000,

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 208 Broadway, New York.

INDIA RUBBER GLOVES

Should be used by every person who is troubled with Salt Rheum or Chilblains, thereby rendering them soft and white as alabaster. They are impervious to hot or cold water, and for housework and gardening are invaluable.

Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of $1 00 for Ladies' Size, $1 12 for Gents'. C. B. RAY, 191 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Burnet Jewelry, &c. Rubber Goods in great variety, Wholesale and Retail.

CATARRH!—Dr. Goodale's Catarrh Remedy penetrates to the very seat of this terrible disease, and exterminates it from the system. Price $1.00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. Depot 612 Broadway.

Rheumatism—Who has it?

It has been confessedly acknowledged by thousands who have used Dr. Scott's Electric Pain Saloeso Electric Health Insoles are the only preventive and cure for Rheumatism, Chilblains, Cold Feet, Foot-Sores, Fresh Air, Sold by all druggists and shoe dealers generally. Price $1; sent by mail for $1.20. Sample by English and American letters. Send for a circular. METTAM & CO., 629 Broadway.

RICHARDSON'S

New Method for the Pianoforte.

UNIVERSALLY ACKNOWLEDGED TO BE THE BEST, and recommended by leading Pianists and Teachers as so without a rival. Thousands of copies have been distributed from Maine to California, and yet the demand is unabated—the strongest proof of its merit, and a very strong evidence that no other book for the Pianoforte can be obtained that will give as much real value. Mailed, postage paid, on receipt of its price, Three Dollars.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

GOLD PENS retailing at wholesale prices. Send for circular. GEORGE F. HAWKES, 64 Nassau St., N.Y.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, or allow a large commission, to sell our Envelopes, Writing Oriental Burners, and 13 other new articles. 16 circulars (3c.). H. STINSON & CO., 84 Clark, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS!—A New Article! Something worthy of your attention! Full particulars free, or sample (worth $1) sent for 25 cents. Don't be imposed upon by so-called Agents. Address Inventor. P. O. Box 19, Hawley, Pa.

PRICE 75 CENTS
THE SERGEANT'S
ROLL-BOOK FOR THE COMPANY,
By Lieut. WM. H. ALBY, U.S.A.

A neat pocket-book, bound in a waterproof flap cover, with ruled blanks, size 7½×5 inches, complete. Size du cup, 6½ by 4 inches. Containing blanks with printed dates for the Company Roll, Descriptive List, and Record of Events, for a company of 100 men for six months. Mailed free on receipt of the price.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Chatham St., N. Y.

A Liberal Discount to Sutlers and Dealers.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, and all Army and Navy Claims, promptly collected. Soldiers' Pensions furnished, rules of Court negotiated upon the best terms, and accounts audited. A pamphlet of full instructions sent by enclosing a six-cent stamp to pay postage.

SOMES & BROWN, 2 Park Place, N. Y.

WEDDING CARDS

These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Old Establishment, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane St., N. Y.

Specimens sent by mail. Send for Circular. Established 1840 years ago.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machine. Address,
S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Reduced Prices. Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops. Send for Price List, rules, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to be seen,—only 20 miles from Philadelphia. Beautiful climate—for many years. Send for a circular, containing a map of the State, and other information, to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Vineland Fifty Miles from Philadelphia and Twenty-five from Camden and Amboy Railroad. Depot.

It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position, and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies.

To the Nervous.

Dr. Adam Laurie's Life Pills,

The great Nervous Remedy, are for sale at the Sole Agency, 4 Union Square, New York.

Price One Dollar per box, with full directions.

All letters with enclosures must be addressed as above.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

Have Just Published:

CHRONICLES OF CARLINGFORD. By Mrs. Oliphant. Author of "Salem Chapel," "Lizzie's Love Trial," "Lost of the Mortimers," "The Days of My Life," "The Quilt of Norlaw," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $1; Paper, 75 cents.

NO NAME. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins, Author of "The Woman in White," "Queen of Hearts," "Armadale," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $1 50; Paper, $1.

Eighth Thousand.

MY DIARY NORTH AND SOUTH. By William Howard Russell. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Ninth Thousand.

AURORA FLOYD. A Novel. By M. E. Braddon, Author of "Lady Audley's Secret." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S

Illuminated and Pictorial

BIBLE

Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely engraved by Adams after Designs by Chapman, exclusive of a Series of Rich Illuminations by Colbert, comprising Frontispiece, Presentation Plate, Family Record, Title-pages, &c. The whole forming a magnificent Family Volume.

Pages.—Morocco, gilt edges, beveled and panelled sides, $25 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $28 00. Full Calf, marbled edges, blank stamped, $18 00; Full Roan, marbled edges, $12 00.

Harper's Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard copy of the American Bible Society, and contains Marginal References, the Readings of the Latest Copyists, Tables of Weights and Measures, Concordance, Table of Proper Names, General Index, Table of Weights, &c., &c., &c. Also, the Apocryphal Books, with Illustrations. Together with the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, Tinted Paper throughout, Ornamental Borders, &c., &c., from original designs made expressly for this work by F. O. Chapman, Esq., of New York. In addition to which, there are numerous large Engravings, from designs by distinguished modern artists in France and England; to which is full Index.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. Williams & Co., Boston; Sartr, Eccleme & Co., Philadelphia; Cushings & Bailey, Baltimore; Frank Taylor, Washington; Robert Clarke & Co., Cincinnati; Keith & Woods, St. Louis; S. C. Griggs & Co., Cincinnati; Dawson & Bronsons, Montreal.

Lever's Last and Best.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Franklin Square, New York.

Publish this Day:

I.

BARRINGTON.

BARRINGTON. A Novel. By Charles Lever, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Harold Fitzgerald," "One of Them," "Dr. Hose about Jesus," "Strokes of Light," "Martin Darcy," "The Dodd Family Abroad," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

II.

Lines Left Out.

LINES LEFT OUT; or, Some of the Histories Left Out in "Line upon Line." This First Part relates Events in the Times of Patriarchs and Prophets. By the Author of "Line upon Line." "Reading without Tears," "More about Jesus," "Strokes of Light," &c. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

The authoress, several years ago, prepared a little work about the Bible, to be read by mothers to children. This work was called "Line upon Line." It was followed "Line upon Line" and next came "More about Jesus" and "Strokes of Light" and now we have additional historical matter from the Bible not included in the others, under the title of "Lines Left Out."

The book is an admirable one. We speak from experience, for it was read to us, and indeed among the young.—Presbyterian Standard (Phila.).

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Have just Published:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR FEBRUARY. 25 cents.

MODERN WAR: Its Theory and Practice. Illustrated from Continental Campaigns. By Lieut.-Col. Hamley, Royal Engineers. By Emerg Staaud, Captain U. S. A. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SPRINGS OF ACTION. By Mrs. C. H. B. Richards. 12mo, printed on Tinted Paper, Cloth, $1 00; Cloth, Gilt Edges, $1 25.

GENERAL BUTTERFIELD'S OUTPOST DUTY. Camp and Outpost Duty for Infantry. With Standing Orders, Extracts from the Revised Regulations for the Army, Rules for Health, Maxims for Soldiers, and Duties of Officers. By Major Gen. Butterfield, Brig.-Gen. Veho, U. S. A. 18mo, Flexible Cloth, 63 cents.

MISTRESS AND MAID. A HOUSEHOLD STORY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Agatha's Husband," "Olive," "The Ogilvies," "The Head of the Family," "Agatha's Husband," "A Life for a Life," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Any of the above Works sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The papers of permanent value which have been published in almost every Number render a complete set of Harper's Magazine a desirable acquisition to any public or private library. Such subscribers may now complete sets, or any Number from the commencement. For Twenty-five cents they will be supplied for the small, post-paid. Any Volume, containing six Numbers, bound in Cloth, will be sent, post-paid, to any part of the United States within 1500 miles of New York, for Two Dollars and Fifty Cents. Subscribers may have remaining Twenty-five Volumes, uniformly bound, will be sent by express, at the charge of the subscriber, for One Dollar and Eighty-eight Cents per volume.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Two Subscribers, at $2.50 each, or Five Copies for $12.50.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Two Subscribers, at $2 each, or 11 Copies for $20.

Harper's Magazine and Weekly, together, one year, $5 00.

Harper's Weekly is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can at any time be supplied.

Vols. I., II., III., IV., V., and VI., for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, 1861, and 1862, of "Harper's Weekly," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $4.17 each, are now ready.

☞ The Publishers employ no Traveling Agents. Persons who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly had better remit direct to the Publishers, or pay their subscription to some Postmaster of General Agent with whom they are acquainted, and of whose responsibility they are assured.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

JIM CROW JUMPING ABOUT SO.

"On to Richmond! The Rebel Congress must not be allowed to meet there in July."—(See N. Y. Tribune, May and June, 1861.)

"Let us bow to our destiny, and make the best allowable peace."—(See N. Y. Tribune, Jan., 1863.)

PAPA. "Well, my Dear, did you tell Mamma that Miss MYRTLE was waiting to see her?"
CHILD. "Yes, Pa!"
PAPA. "And what did she say?"
CHILD. "She said what a Bother!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON WORK Wrought, Cast, and Wire. IRON-RAILINGS, VERANDAHS, BALCONIES, GUARDS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description. Illustrated Catalogues mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM, 259 259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

THE NEPLUS ULTRA. No Chimney Adjustment. The best and most perfect all over lavented article of the ordinary burners, of various sizes, now in use. It costs only a trifle more than a single glass chimney. Gives a clear light without the usual smoke, and can be turned in the strongest draft without going out, therefore being indispensable for parlor or hall use. Agents wanted. Good pay guaranteed. Send for circular. JOS. TIDDEN, Manufacturer, 413 Broadway, N. Y.

PHYSIOGNOMY;
Or, "Signs of Character, and How to Read them"—Phrenology; or, the Roots of Men—Physiology, Phrenology, and Psychology—are given, in volumes, in THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 1863. $1 a year. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

India-Rubber Gloves cure Chapped Hands, Sore Breasts, &c., making them smooth and white, and are suitable for house-work. For sale by the trade. Sent by mail on receipt of price and 4 stamps for postage. Ladies' sizes 6½ c. per pair; Gents sizes, $1 00. GOODYEAR, L. I. R. GLOVE M'F'G CO., 205 Broadway, N. Y.

Rubber Goods of all kinds Wholesale and Retail.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE! MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 28c. COIN FREE-FEDERAL. Five of different powers, $2. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

A SPECULATION.

Agents and Soldiers, in camp or discharged, can make easily $50 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALLED, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality Writing Material, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c.; altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp can act as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all agents. Packages in endless variety sent at all prices. Fine Jewelry and Watches at low prices. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 NASSAU STREET, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS

Made to Measure at $24, $30 and $33 PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and samples of different styles of shirting, collars and cuffs free everywhere.
FRENCH FLANNEL ARMY SHIRTS, $24, $27, $30 and $33 per dozen.
S. W. H. WARD, from London, No. 387 Broadway

A REALLY VALUABLE MICROSCOPE, one that a child can use, sent by mail on receipt of 33 cents.
S. WOODWARD, P. O. Box 5073, Boston.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to D. Adee, 481 Pearl St., N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

$30 Watches. $30
I will sell genuine English Lever Watches, in Silver Hunting Cases, for $30. Worth $45. Watches of every description at equally low figure. Send for a Circular. All Watches warranted.
J. L. FERGUSON, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Lithography,
Engraving, and Printing, by LANG & COOPER, 117 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK. Transferring from Copper and Steel Plate to Stone made equal to copper-plate printing at one half the cost. Country orders particularly attended to. Send for samples and prices.

Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machines.
Highest Premium.
International Exhibition, London, 1862.
See the recent Improvements.
Office 505 Broadway, New York.

Portable Printing Offices,
For the use of Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to do their own Printing. Circular sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., on receipt of two 3 ct. stamps.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, N. Y.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.
American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for packeting and swindling purposes.
We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most substantial manufacture, an accurate and durable time-keeper, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at as low a price as is asked for the trashy Americ and Lepine of foreign make, already referred to.
We have issued the fine series of Watches, Wm. Ellery, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.
Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to
ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents of the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlement. Rich soil. Mild climate. See advertisement of Vinalhaf, on previous page.

Buy your Skate Straps with
Fogg's Lever Buckle,
Manufactured by F. STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK;
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

CONFEDERATE (REBEL) MONEY.
Fac-Simile Confederate Treasury Notes.
So exactly like the genuine that where one will pass current the other will go equally well. $200 in Confederate Notes of all denominations, sent free by mail on receipt of $5, by W. E. HILTON, 11 Spruce Street, New York.

IMPORTANT TO AGENTS!!—We have reduced the wholesale price of our GREAT STATIONERY PORTFOLIO PACKAGES. We also give better Watches to our Agents than any other firm. Send stamp for new circular. WEIR & CO., 84 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

THE "CRAIG MICROSCOPE,"
Of which over 80 dozen, and 250 dozen mounted objects have been sold since the 1st of Oct. in the city of Boston alone, will be sent, postage paid, with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $2. Liberal discount to dealers. Address HENRY CRAIG, 183 Centre Street, New York.

ATTENTION, LADIES!
The Lilliputian Wedding.
By special arrangement, we will publish on the 16th February, immediately after their marriage, the Card Photograph of
GEN. TOM THUMB
AND HIS FAIRY BRIDE,
IN THEIR WEDDING DRESS,
with their autographs. No album will be complete without this interesting picture. Price 25 cents. Can be sent by mail. All orders must be sent to
E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
501 Broadway, New York,
Manufacturers of Photographic Albums, and Publishers of Card Photographs of Celebrities.

The Parlor Gardener.
A complete illustrated guide to the cultivation of House Plants, care of Green-House, Aquarium, and instructions in many new and beautiful methods of growing Plants, of Grafting, Budding, &c., &c. Price 50 cents; postpaid, 70 cents.
J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston.

Darley's New Picture.
Morning, Noon and Night.
An elegant Photographic copy of this beautiful work of Art may be now obtained at all principal print and book stores.

$25. A BEAUTIFUL Engraved Gold Plated Watch, Duplex Movement, perfect time-keeper. Sent to any address for $5. Fine Watches and Jewelry at low prices. CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., 40 Ann St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED for our Splendid New Mammoth Eureka Prize Package. 200 per cent. profit. Sargent's Watch free to Agents. $75 per day made. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CATELY & CO., 46 Ann St., N.Y.

Inquire of your Grocer for
MORGAN'S SONS
PEARL
MOTTLED
The Best and Cheapest Soap in use, manufactured from the best materials, and warranted entirely free from all injurious substances. Unrivalled for washing Flannels and Fine Goods, or for FAMILY USE of any kind.
KNOLL MORGAN'S SONS,
211 Washington Street, New York.

GREAT TRIUMPH.
STEDMAN & SONS, Nos. 82 and 84 Wilder Street, N. Y., were awarded a first prize medal at the late Great International Exhibition, London. There were two hundred and sixty-nine pianos from all parts of the world entered for competition.
The special correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinways' endorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

TRUSSES. Dr. Hoyt's Hard Rubber Truss challenges the severest criticisms. Water-proof, cleanly, and indestructible. This truss and a Varicocele Instrument may be seen at Dr. Hoyt's office, No. 2 Barclay St., N. Y.

Send for Trade-List, revised Jan. 25, 1863.
PEERS & BANCKER,
Wholesale Dealers in Ladies', Gentlemen's & J. F. Peers & Co., 24 Ann Street, New York. All orders for Books, Stationery, and Miscellaneous Articles promptly filled.

The American Parlor
Or Floor Skate,
Hard Rubber Rollers,
Anti-friction Axles.
Of neat, cash Skate is labeled with the trade mark.
Also, all the new and popular styles of Rink Skates, comprising all the new and most improved patterns, made of the welded steel and iron hammered. Skate straps and Leather Goods of every description; Fogg's improved Lever Buckle. Sole Agents for Williams, Morse & Co.'s celebrated Skates.
FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK.
68 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

Lyon's Kathairon.
This delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is equal put up by the original proprietor, and is now, as it has been for the past 40 years, the purest, most effectual and unprecedented relief of our race millions testify, and to be had at 25 cents in large bottles. Two million bottles sold yearly in the U. S. Let no one be deceived by the Kathairon sold in a poor watery fluid, which is worse than nothing. The Kathairon is not only the most delightful hair dressing in the world, but that it cleanses the scalp of scurf and dandruff, gives the hair a lively, rich luxuriant growth, and prevents it from changing. These great considerations worth knowing. The Kathairon has been for many years counterfeited, and the genuine is now rarely to be found. Any lady who values a beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon, as its daily perfume. Sold by druggists generally. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.
D. S. BARNES & CO.,
New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have Just Ready:
MEMOIRS OF MRS. JOANNA BETHUNE. By her Son, the Rev. Geo. W. Bethune, D.D. With an Appendix, containing Extracts from the Writings of Mrs. Bethune. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VII.—No. 321.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MR. AND MRS. CHARLES S. STRATTON (GENERAL TOM THUMB AND WIFE).—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

TOM THUMB AND HIS WIFE.

We publish on the preceding page portraits of the two dwarfs—CHARLES S. STRATTON, better known as Tom Thumb, and Miss LAVINIA WARREN—in their wedding dress.

Tom Thumb's name and pigmy form are well known to every body. Fifteen years ago he was quite the rage, and boasted—probably with truth —that he had kissed millions of fair faces. He has since made his fortune, and has lived in quasi retirement at his place in Connecticut.

Miss Lavinia Warren was born in Middlebro, Massachusetts, in 1842, and is consequently twenty years of age. She measures 32 inches in height and weighs 29 pounds. Some months since Mr. Barnum engaged her as to exhibit herself at his Museum, in this city, and shortly afterward it was announced that she was to be married to Tom Thumb. Since then the rage to see her has been well among the ladies, and Mr. Barnum has been enabled to fill his Museum and his pockets with unusual rapidity.

The wedding took place at Grace Church on Tuesday, 10th February. We extract the following very graphic description of the affair from the New York Herald:

We entered the sacred edifice. Grand, solemn, and silent then aisles—"storied windows richly dight," etc.—are here, indeed, we thought, if we had thought at all. Decisive men outside, what shall we say of it within? Here, indeed, was the true "vision of fair women." Here was the carnival of crinoline, the apotheosis of purple and fine linen. Here, indeed, was the secret body soon to take advantage. Babylon was a rag fair to it.

All the magnates of the city we had passed us by: the here! the feathers! the gems—and "the shining eyes like antique jewels in a barbaric dream."

There were silks of every possible hue, and thus a rich variety of color, and plenty of room. There was, every possible species of toilet — dainty hand-dresses, delicious bonnets, and the most delicate veils to set beautiful and loud ever body else into temptation.

But bonnets! Ah, we must say there were not dwarfs. How many wished they were! How many regretted their "no girl abandon!"

Around the chancel, up and down the aisles, here, there, and every where, were groups of ladies, chatting with gentlemen, with their caps on, and order reigned in the matrimonial Wyvern.

So we quietly took our comfortable seat, and listened to the magnificent voices of the choir singing, between times, gave the overture to "William Tell," and "Oberon," "—as from "Midsummer," and from "Robert le Diable" the air "Robert Toi que Jaime."

As it became dark in the church it became every minute more and more like a fairy festival. The music "grounding in" with the light of the whole body of the church filled with beautifully-dressed women, and shed over all a silvery mist or light streaming in through the windows "diamonded with panes of quaint device." All these made a picture like a matter of everyday occurrence, then like the action of some old romantic story.

There were a few minutes of silence before the bridal party arrived. Then in came the great Phineas and several of the ushers—and the music, which had sunk into a lull in a few moments more the stir and the buzz of voices near to the door said the bridal party arrived.

Commodore Nutt and Minnie Warren (the bride's sister) led the way, and took their places in the chancel, and seated their very slow progress up the aisle, until they reached the open space in front of the altar, the steps of the dais prepared for them in front of the chancel rail.

Then the crowd closed in behind them, and by the opposite aisle, Thumb and the bride stepped between, and there was the bridal party.

NOW NUTT, for size, is such a man as might be made after supper of the cheese parings. He is a full inch shorter than Tom Thumb, but is self-possessed and airy to the most perfect extent. Tom Thumb is also wonderfully shorter than NUTT. He, a veteran in the show business, knew, and the time, Mr. WELLS, to come forward and read the marriage rite. Thumb and LAVINIA responded shortly and affirmatively at proper places, and it was done in a very full and very slim gentleman in very black clothes—the very utmost of respectability, attended the steps of the dais with the manner of a Lord Chamberlain to "Miss Jones," though he did not make so much noise about it, and gave the bride away.

Then they knelt for prayer, and the rich sunlight fell through the high windows upon their group—

And there warm gules upon the bride's fair breast,
And there the lark flew singing gree and loud;
Here bloom fell on her hands together prest,
And on her silver sandals sweetlyest,
And on her hair a glory like a saint.

Upon the conclusion of the ceremony Dr. Taylor, the Rector of Grace Church, pronounced the benediction, Bishop Potter was not present. The Potter PRESS afraid to herald into such a scene two little bits of the "—one pone loin of human clay.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1863.

SLAVES IN LOUISIANA.

MAJOR-GENERAL BANKS is beginning to realize some of the practical difficulties which beset emancipation. In all those portions of the State of Louisiana which are held by the national forces slavery is practically abolished, and the slaves are actually as well as legally free. As might have been expected from suddenly freed slaves, they evince a remarkable disinclination to work. Hence, on the one hand, there is great danger that the bulk of the sugar crop will be lost for want of labor, while, on the other, the Government is put to an enormous expense to feed thousands of colored refugees. To remedy these evils General Banks has issued an order compelling the negroes to work for a fair remuneration. This order has drawn down upon the General the thunders of some of the extreme anti-slavery leaders of the North, who complain that our armies are being used as slave-drivers for the sugar lords of Louisiana.

Again, General Butler commenced, and General Banks is continuing, the work of enrolling negroes as soldiers, and forming them into companies, regiments, and brigades. This operation provokes the hostility of a large number of our Northern troops, in whom aversion to the negro is deeply ingrained. Something very like a mutiny broke out lately at Baton Rouge in consequence of the encampment of a negro battalion in proximity to certain New York regiments. A colonel of one of the Louisiana colored regiments—himself a Northern white man—declar... that he could actually buy himself a fat Sa. Captain Brown, while being insulted. As at Port Royal, the white troops refuse to be brigaded with negroes, and many of their officers also refuse to serve over men in their regiments—lose no opportunity of showing their contempt for colored soldiers, and for the white men who are appointed to command them.

These are some of the practical difficulties with which General Banks has to contend. We are satisfied that he is the man to grapple with them. Reflection will by-and-by satisfy every one that emancipation must not be construed as securing to the negro a life of sloth at our expense. We have always held that the right to do so would eat, must work. Emerging from hereditary slavery, he can not be expected to understand at once his responsibilities as a free man, and it is our duty, for the present time, by salutary and humane laws, to compel him to lead such a life as he would lead without coercion had he been born free and among whites. An equal guilt divided each of the three classes.

These notions were exemplified in their local institutions. Hostility to freedom of the press, of speech, and of the assemblage, was a marked characteristic of Southern municipal law. Not only could no newspaper or book be published at the South which contravened the views of the people of that section, but it was a matter of life and death to own or to read a Northern publication which the populace deemed heretical. To speak against slavery was to insure lashing or feathering, or hanging by some Vigilance Committee. Half a dozen negroes could not meet to change work without being separated by the police and taken home to be flogged. Law and order—which are the first fruits of democratic institutions—were unknown in the Southern States. When a man was shot in open day-light in Jackson, Mississippi, according to Governor Pettus. in New Orleans the average executed number was four. Assassination of the envied pistols of large bore in his pocket ready for work. No one respected the law, or troubled himself about it. As among the Choctaws and the Camanches, every man was the keeper of his own vengeance, the executioner of the penalty he chose to inflict.

If we add that this race—so boasted with insane notions of its own superiority, and so brutified by hostility to all restraining laws and habits of lawlessness and violence—was still further degraded by the unrestrained licentiousness which has ever been the product of slavery, we shall have said enough to show that there had grown up, under the ægis of the national Government, a race of people as diametrically opposite, in every possible characteristic, to that of the North, as can be readily imagined, and between whom and us there could be no possible community of feeling or harmony of action.

This war, in fact, was a necessity, an inevitable necessity, and its prosecution, to the utter overthrow of one of the belligerents, is equally inevitable. The South has accepted the issue. Freedom Compromise there would have been a brief period of peace, but Mr. Lincoln would hardly have been re-elected to the Presidency. Were the North now to offer terms which the South would condescend to accept, it would merely secure a brief truce. Two radically different and essentially hostile forms of society are arrayed against one another, in sight of each other and interlocked with each other at every turn. You can not compromise them by a territorial division, nor can you devise any compromise between them. The struggle between them is a death-grapple, and only one of the two will rise from the contest.

THE LOUNGER.

DR. NÉLATON.

M. NÉLATON is a French surgeon. He was summoned from Paris to attend Garibaldi, and discovered that the bullet was in the foot. Upon his return to Caprera, enthusiastic for Garibaldi, and grateful to him whom they regarded as his preserver, expressed his gratification in the only practicable way. They were not rich enough to give him a medal, a vase, a golden table service, not even a complete set of surgical instruments mounted in silver and pearl. They could not pay, but they could vote. They therefore proposed to vote for him as a Deputy to the Italian Parliament.

But it seems that Dr. NÉLATON is purely professional. "A ball in the foot!" exclaims the Doctor; "well, it's my business to find it. It's nothing to me to whom the foot belongs. You say it belongs to what you call the friend of the people, Garibaldi; à la bonne heure, that is his affair. To me it is a ball and a foot, nothing more. My interest does not reach above the knee. The interest of the case in the wound, which is the man." It is hinted also that the shrewd Dr. NÉLATON had an eye to the social consequences of being thought a personal friend or political ally of Garibaldi's.

Now what do the ministers seen at Albany and in Washington suppose his reply was to the offer of the nomination? It was this: "I do not well see how my knowledge of surgery could aid me, or how I should suddenly have become a political economist, a financier, and a legislator, because I have discovered the presence of a ball in the foot of a wounded man. I am even convinced that the affairs of my country would not go on better, and that my patients, being neglected, would fare the worse." DR. NÉLATON is evidently a man from whom Louis Napoleon has nothing to fear. "I mind my surgery," says the good Doctor, "and I leave those whose business it is to attend to the Government." "Excellent," replies the Emperor; "and you, my good brother, please mind your own business; and you, good merchants, and lawyers, and men of letters, and clergy, and tailors, shoemakers, farmers, carpenters, mason-ery, all of you, of whatever profession or employment, listen to this wise Dr. NÉLATON: mind your own business, don't neglect your customers, and leave governing to those whose business it is!"

The country, the great body of the workmen of Paris have, however, been at peace all the last seventy years, that the Government is the business of nobody or man in the main and for the most part it is as true of France as of every country in the world, that no Government in which the mass of the people are not represented can ever rest on a firm foundation, or be long secure. For no man, no class, no oligarchy nor aristocracy will, in the long run, govern justly. Government exists to protect the natural rights of every man, and when those are permanently disregarded, they will heave society from its foundations, just as surely as the upheavings of the frozen Arctic sea have still tear a passage to the light. A man may wear a smooth shirt-front over a cancer, and he may twist his cuticle with a grin, and call himself respectable well. But the cancer is eating his heart out for all that, and some day the excitedly will man will fall dying in the city. And in this country been convinced from the beginning that justice in the best policy, we should have had no civil war. If the wise counsels of that national statesman, long cut upon a permanent disregard of natural rights, is as worthless as an enormous fortune in counterfeit Philadelphia, the war will have been a cheap lesson to the nation.

STRAWS.

MR. THOMAS C. FIELDS, the leader of the "Conservatives" in the Legislature of this State, who during the confusion of the organization informed the clerk that "a portion of order is the best coat," and whose patriotic devotion no one who believes in Vallandigham can doubt, has, it is said, suggested in the Assembly the presentation of a sword to General Meagher, and of a silver medal to each soldier of the Irish Brigade. What the other Generals and brigades from the State have done, that they should not have swords and silver medals, the ministers "Conservatives" does not say.

On the same day that MR. FIELDS made his suggestion in the Legislature the Committee on Donations and Charities of the Common Council of New York reported in favor of "donating" the sum of ninety-six dollars to MARY KAVANAGH to pay the physician's expenses of her husband, who died from wounds received at Antietam. Councilman Gross said that the subject was "a very delicate one," and his motives might be misconstrued, but he felt obliged to oppose the passage of "any such a resolution." The President, also, warned the board against the passage of any such resolution. He said that if it were passed there would be plenty of people going down to Virginia and bringing bodies North, and then claiming the same compensation from the city. He said also that there would be "repeaters" who would bring in half a dozen bills for carrying one body. The proposition was lost by a vote of 15 to 9. It was then reconsidered and referred to the Committee on Ordnance! Affirm.

Nobody has reason to doubt that Francis KAVANAGH was a brave soldier. Every body knows that he died bravely for a dashing cause, and that the Irish Brigade fights well. But why do not the "Conservatives" of the Legislature and Council teach their subordinates more directly? Why not persuade the Legislature and the Council to "donate" fifty dollars annually to every body who will vote the "right" "Conservative" ticket?

DR. WHATELY AND MRS. STOWE.

THE letter of the Archbishop of Dublin to MRS. STOWE is interesting as his estimate of the current public sentiment around him in regard to our war. There are but two points of importance in that opinion, and they are the old ones.

First, he says, those who are opposed to the cause of the Government reject any appeal for their sympathy on the ground of justice or humanity; for, they say, the American Government insists that the war is not an anti-slavery war, and that the Proclamation "does not waver much of zeal for abolition," for it protects the slaves of loyalists who live in States that still adhere to the Government. In regard to this point Dr. Whately knows, if he knows any thing at all of the matter, that while the South took and takes the form of a rebellion against the lawful authority of the Government, and is therefore upon the part of the nation a simple attempt to maintain the Government; yet that the object of seeking the overthrow of the Government is the protection of slavery. In the course of the present effort to secure its authority in a struggle which has the form and proportions of a great international war, the Government strikes at slavery, precisely as by the blockade it strikes at the trade, and by its armed ships, forts, and artillery, at the lives of the rebels, as a means of establishing its authority. It does not proclaim the freedom of slaves because slavery is unjust, but because it is a cardinal support of the rebellion. Thus, while the object of the rebellion is to overthrow the Government in order to perpetuate slavery, the object of the Government is to maintain its authority, and as an aid in that work it frees the slaves. If, therefore, the sentiment of which Dr. Whately speaks favors the form more than the substance, it will continue to quarrel with us because we did not emancipate, because slavery is wrong. But if it cares more for liberty and the peace which comes from justice, it will not repine, nor accuse us, because justice was done merely as a stroke of military policy and not in deference to a moral principle. The history of emancipation any where will not show that it was solely the result of moral conviction. Certainly it does not become John Bull to scrutinize censoriously the motive of emancipation.

Second, the next point made by the Archbishop is that the rebels have as good a right to their revolution as our fathers had to theirs.

What then does Dr. Whately or any other Englishman understand by the right of revolution? If he takes the old high Tory ground that there is no such right—then, of course, he will not excuse the revolt of the rebels against an established Government. But if he asserts that right in any form, he must ground it upon oppression for which legal redress is hopeless. That is the only right of revolution acknowledged by any English or American authority. Very well, our fathers' grievance as British subjects was that they were taxed without representation, and redress was refused them. Therefore they rebelled. But our rebels do not set forth any oppression of the Government to justify their resistance. They do not even acknowledge their rebellion as a revolution. They claim that secession is a lawful act under the Government and within the laws. The right of revolution as we all understand it, therefore, has nothing to do with the rebellion. For how could they pretend to any oppression under a Government which they had themselves always controlled?

There may be people in England who have no very clear idea of the right of revolution, and who suppose that the insurrection of the slaveholders in this country has some resemblance to the resistance of our fathers to Great Britain; and there may be others who reject liberty for the slaves when it does not come as a moral impulse but as a military discretion. But the British feeling against us is a mingled product of ignorance, sophistry, and the steady jealousy of the governing class in England of a political system whose success imperils their monopoly of privilege and power. The letter of Dr. Whately shows that there has been no considerable change in general sentiment within his observation. But across the channel in England the question begins to be better understood. While Westminster boggles about forms, and says that it is a war for dominion or for the restoration of the Union, Lancashire sees that it is a contest for principles, and that its own future is blended with the success of the American republic.

PATRIOTISM AND PARTISANSHIP.

"MADISON," in Wisconsin, writes to call the Lounger to account for saying that the Weekly had not been partisan. "Madison" says that he believes firmly in the principles of the Democratic party, and that this paper did not hesitate to oppose the election of Mr. Seymour. How then, he asks, have you the face to say that you are not partisan when you supported the candidate for whom the Times, and Tribune, and Independent labored?

The answer is very short and simple. General Wadsworth was nominated upon a Union war platform, and his companion upon the ticket was Lyman Tremaine, certainly as good a Democrat as Mr. Seymour or "Madison." There was no party issue in the canvass. The platform of the Union party was a vigorous prosecution of the war by every just means. This paper stands and has always stood upon that platform, and the Union and country can be saved upon no other. It is the point of meeting of men of all parties. The President, Mr. Everett, and Mr. Dickinson are all there. The debate upon what measures are most vigorous can not be made a party issue. Men may differ; but they do not differ as partisans, but as patriots.

If, however, a general opposition to the war policy of the Government should be maintained by any party and called Democratic, and every old adherent of that party should be summoned to that platform, and we, because we may believe in the fundamental principles known as Democratic, should therefore desert the position of support of the Government in suppressing the rebellion, then we should be truly liable to the charge of "Madison" that we had deserted patriotism for party. If he has done that, if he obeys a mere party call, which ought not to be raised, and can not loyally be raised during a war for national existence, he is a convicted partisan, because he is more strenuous for his party than for his country. If, however, he obeys that call because he thinks it promises a speedier triumph for the country, he does it, not as a Democrat or a partisan, but as an American citizen and patriot. And if we or any other think that another policy is surer of success, we adhere to it in the same way, not as Democrats, but as patriots.

We support the policy of the Government not because the Republican papers approve it, nor because many Democratic papers approve it, but because we believe it to be a sound and effective policy for the restoration of the Union and the speedier return of peace and prosperity. And when Mr. Seymour, or Mr. Vallandigham, or Mr. Saulsbury show themselves as heartily and singly in earnest for the maintenance of the supreme authority of the Government of the United States as President Lincoln, we shall just as warmly support them as we do the President. "Neutrality" between parties, Mr. "Madison," does not mean saying that every body is equally right and equally wrong, but in pursuing the patriotic purpose whatever either party says or does. If that course leads us to travel much the same road as one of the parties, so much the better for the patriotism of that party.

THE SOLDIER'S FAREWELL.

FOR so many years "the glory of France" has been such a purely military glory—the greatest of modern Frenchmen was so entirely a great soldier, that in any French song-book the most melodious and touching songs are generally of the camp. The "t'en souviens-tu?" of the two French veterans of the Guard, sung to the German melody of "Denkst Du daran?" is familiar to all lovers of that kind of song. And here a friend sends a pleasant and skillful rendering of Le Dernier adieu du soldat, a military ballad, which is introduced in Charles Lever's "Jack Hinton." The mingling of jest and pathos is entirely characteristic.

The original begins:

"Rose! l'intention d'la présente,
Est de t'informer d'ma santé,
L'armée Française est triomphante
Et moi, j'ai l'bras gauche emposté."

THE SOLDIER'S FAREWELL.

Dear Rose, to you I send this present writing
To let you know how goes the world with me;
Our gallant boys have done some glorious fighting,
A left arm lost, alas! has done for me.
We've great successes on our track advancing,
The cruel grape has taken my poor bones;
We've sacked whole cities, but a spent ball glancing
Pays me my share of booty in my groans.

From an old hospital this word I'm sending,
To leave it soon at Death's call for the grave;
I send ten francs from him who does my mending,
For them I've sold the body he can't save.
I send the pieces, for I'm just now thinking
That if to-night must see me in the earth,
I can't do less for one whom love's been linking
So close to me than give her all I'm worth.

My poor old mother, when I left her crying,
Was nearly gone and looking close on death,
I've writ a line to tell her I am dying;
But I do hope she's taken her last breath.
For if the dear old woman still is living,
Her heart's so soft that if she hears I'm gone
She can not stay, and I shall death be giving
To her who gave me life, now left alone.

My little Rose, there's one old friend I cherish
You won't desert—my good old dog I mean;
He mustn't know I'm dead—for sure he'd perish
If he but thought of me the last he'd seen.
He's looking now to see me home returning,
At least a Corporal, if not something more;
Then guard him well, and keep the dog from learning
I died, a private, on this earthen floor.

It cuts me to the heart to think of dying
Far from the village and from you, my Rose;
No chance to say good-night to friends, or, sighing,
To press your hand before my eyelids close.
At home they'd soon my shattered bones be laying
Hard by the church—a cross above my head,
And there my Rose would sometimes come, and, praying,
Ask God to keep him whom she loved though dead.

Then good-by, Rose, good-by, and don't be weeping;
Farewell, farewell! I'll see you, dear, no more;
For in the company I'll soon be keeping
They give no furloughs, though you beg them sore.
All's turning round—I feel I'm just departing,
I've got my orders and must leave you here;
Good-night, good-night!—One last word before starting;
God bless you, Rose, and don't forget me, dear!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"WHAT is the matter, Sir?" said a surgeon to his patient.

"Well, I have eaten some oysters, and I suppose they have disagreed with me."

"Have you eaten any thing else?"

"Well, no—why, yes, I did, too; that is, I took for my tea a mince-pie, four bottles of ale, and two glasses of gin, and I have eaten the oysters since, and I really believe the oysters were not good for me!"

A gentleman, who had a very blundering servant, put down in writing every thing he wished him to do. Going to the country one day, the master fell into a ditch. He called the lad, who, instead of hastening to his assistance, exclaimed, "Stop, let me see if it's down in my memorandum-book." Great presence of mind that, wasn't it?

"My affairs tend downward," as the oyster said when about to be swallowed.

During Lord Holland's last illness George Selwyn called and left his card. Selwyn had a fondness for seeing dead bodies, and the dying lord, fully comprehending his feeling, is said to have remarked, "If Mr. Selwyn calls again, show him up; if I am alive, I shall be delighted to see him, and if I am dead, he will like to see me."

Why is a windy orator like a whale?—Because he often rises to spout.

TOO CANDID BY HALF.

As Tom and his wife were disputing one day
Of their personal traits, in a bantering way,
Quoth she, "Though my wit you disparage,
I'm certain, dear husband, our friends will attest
That, compared with your own, my judgment is best!"
Quoth Tom, "So they said at our marriage!"

"I'll bring a suit for my bill!" said an enraged tailor to a dandy who refused to pay him. "Do, my dear fellow," replied the imperturbable swell, pointing to his threadbare clothes, "that's just what I want."

The other day a young man, decidedly inebriated, walked into the executive chamber and asked for the Governor. "What do you want with him?" inquired the secretary. "Oh, I want an office with a good salary—a sinecure." "Well," replied the secretary, "I can tell you something better for you than a sinecure—you had better try a water cure." A new idea seemed to strike the young inebriate, and he vanished.

WANTED.

A coffin to bury the Dead Sea.
The saucer into which the cup of misery overflowed.
A night-cap to fit the head of a river.
The match which kindled the fire of love.
A pair of spectacles to suit the eyes of Justice.
A remedy to cure the deafness in the ears of corn.
The broom with which the storm swept over the sea.

"I go through my work," as the needle said to the idle boy. "But not till you are hard pushed," as the idle boy said to the needle.

Why is the letter l in the word "military" like the nose?—Because it stands between two i's.

"What's that ar a picture on?" asked a countryman in a print store the other day of the proprietor, who was turning over some engravings. "That, Sir, is Joshua commanding the sun to stand still." "Du tell! Which is Josh, and which is his son?"

The wife of an Irish gentleman being suddenly taken ill, the husband ordered a servant to get a horse ready to go for the doctor. By the time, however, that the horse was ready, and the note to the doctor written, the lady had recovered; on which he added the following postscript, and sent the servant off: "My wife having recovered, you need not come."

"I haven't another word to say, Sir; I never dispute with fools." "No," was the reply, "you are very sure to agree with them."

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

When is a bonnet not a bonnet?
When it becomes a pretty woman.

Why is an Israelite named William Solomon similar to a public festival?
Because he is a jubilee (Jew Billy).

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Wednesday, February 4, in the Senate, the credentials of Senator Doolittle, re-elected Senator from Wisconsin for six years from the 4th of March next, were presented. The bill to prevent correspondence with rebels was reported back. A bill authorizing the President to make qualified pardons, so as to remit fines, relieve from imprisonment, etc., was passed. The resolutions relative to French intervention in Mexico were laid on the table by a vote of 34 against 9. The resolution directing the Secretary of the Navy not to accept the title of League Island until further order of Congress, was referred to the Naval Committee. The bill for the encouragement of re-enlistments and the enrolling and drafting of the militia was taken up, and several amendments adopted. A motion to strike out the second section, giving the President power to make all rules and regulations for enrolling and drafting the militia, was disagreed to. Pending a motion to strike out the fourth section, the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Committee on Elections reported adversely on the claims of J. B. M'Loud, and his contestant, W. W. Wing, to represent the second district of Virginia. The bill providing for a submarine telegraph from Fortress Monroe to Galveston, communicating with intermediate points on the coast, was passed. The bill providing for the codification of the laws of the United States was rejected. The bill relative to the enlargement of the canals so as to admit of the passage of gun-boats, was discussed at some length, and then laid aside. Bills appropriating $30,000 for the protection of overland emigrants; for the organization of an ambulance corps of twenty thousand men; and authorizing the employment of additional clerks, copyists, and laborers in the Quarter-master-General's office, were passed. The Senate bill for the more efficient administration of the Subsistence Department was also passed. The Senate bill authorizing twenty thousand men to be raised for the defense of Kentucky was likewise passed, and the House adjourned.

On Thursday, 5th, in the Senate, a bill to aid the construction of railroads and telegraphs in Kansas was introduced. A resolution directing inquiry into the case of Captain John Wethers, of the Fourth New Jersey Regiment, who has been confined at Fort Delaware for several months, was laid over. The consideration of the bill to encourage re-enlistments, and providing for the enrollment and drafting of the militia, was resumed, and, after considerable discussion, the subject was recommitted to the Military Committee. A resolution requesting the President to communicate the number of volunteer and drafted men actually raised and mustered into service by the several States, and the time when their terms of service will expire, was adopted, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Ways and Means Committee reported back the Senate's amendments to the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Appropriation bill. Several amendments were disposed of, and finally the bill was committed to a conference committee. A joint resolution to revise and codify the naval laws was adopted. The Naval Appropriation bill, involving expenditures to the amount of $68,000,000, was then taken up. A proviso was added to the appropriation of $12,000,000 for iron-clads that no contracts shall be entered into for this class of vessels until proposals have been solicited from the principal iron-ship builders. The appropriation for the Brooklyn Navy Yard was increased.

On Friday, 6th, in the Senate, a resolution instructing the Finance Committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing the duty on paper was adopted. A motion to postpone all prior orders and take up the Bankrupt bill was disagreed to—14 against 24.——In the House, the Senate's amendment to the Post-office Appropriation bill, authorizing a contract for carrying the mails in steamers between San Francisco and the several ports in Oregon, at a sum not exceeding $24,000 per annum, was concurred in. The debate on the Illinois and New York Ship Canal bill was resumed, and continued till the adjournment.

On Saturday, 7th, in the Senate, a bill for the construction of a military and postal railroad from Washington to New York was introduced and referred. Senator Sumner offered a resolution, that the Committee on the Conduct of the War be directed to inquire into the condition of the Army of the Potomac, both officers and men; and to consider what measures are necessary in order to promote its efficiency, increase the mutual confidence of the officers and men, and to secure from all an unwavering and soldier-like devotion to the declared policy of the Government, with power to send for persons and papers. This was laid over. The remainder of the session was occupied in debate on the Missouri Emancipation bill.——In the House, the Illinois and New York Ship Canal bill was under consideration.

On Monday, 9th, in the Senate, a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to the Senate the amount of Government cotton sold in New York since the blockade of the Southern ports, the amount of commissions and storage, and the names of all persons interested in such sales, was adopted. A bill to enroll and equip three hundred thousand negro soldiers was introduced by Senator Sumner. A resolution was adopted requesting the President to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, the character of the suggestions made by the Secretary of State of the United States to M. Mercier, the representative of the French Government, as related by him to M. Thouvenel, which induced M. Mercier to undertake a mission to Richmond, and what representations he was authorized to make from the Government or from the Secretary of State to the rebel authorities. Several bills relating to the District of Columbia were passed. The bill to provide a national currency, secured by the pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, was then taken up. An amendment increasing the amount of circulating currency from two hundred millions to three hundred millions was adopted. An amendment was offered requiring each banking association organized under the act to keep in its vaults gold and silver coin to the amount of one-fourth of the amount of notes it is authorized to issue, and pending the question on this proposition the Senate went into executive session, and afterward adjourned.——In the House, the Indian and Civil Appropriation bills were reported by the Ways and Means Committee. The consideration of the bill to enlarge the Illinois and New York canals was then resumed, and after some discussion the bill was defeated by a vote of 61 yeas against 71 nays. The Committee on Elections reported against the credentials of John B. Rogers and Lewis M'Kenzie, the former claiming a seat from Tennessee, and the latter from the Seventh District of Virginia. The report of the same committee in favor of the claims of Messrs. Flanders and Hahn to seats as members from Louisiana was called up and discussed, but the House adjourned without taking a vote on the subject.

On Tuesday, 10th, in the Senate, the bill reorganizing the Post-office Department was passed. A bill to increase the number of Major and Brigadier Generals was reported by the Military Committee. A resolution was offered and adopted requesting the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public interests, to lay before the Senate any correspondence which has taken place between this Government and the Government of France on the subject of mediation, arbitration, or other measures looking to a termination of the existing civil war. The bill to provide a national currency was then taken up. The amendment requiring banks to keep in their vaults specie to the amount of one-fourth of their circulation was rejected. Several other amendments were proposed and also rejected. The bill to prevent and punish frauds on the revenue was reported back with amendments. A bill to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security was introduced, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Committee on Ways and Means was instructed to examine and report on the practical operation of the Excise law upon the interests of manufacturers of limited means. The consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections in favor of admitting Messrs. Flanders and Hahn, members elect from Louisiana, to seats was then resumed, and a lively debate ensued, which continued until the adjournment.

FROM THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

There is nothing new from the Army of the Potomac. Every thing is quiet in that direction.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 6.

First. The division of the army into grand divisions impeding rather than facilitating the dispatch of its current business, and the character of the service it is liable to be called upon to perform, being adverse to the movement and operations of heavy columns, it is discontinued, and the corps organization is adopted in its stead. They will be commanded as follows:

First Corps, Major-General John F. Reynolds. Second Corps, Major-General D. N. Couch. Third Corps, Brigadier-General D. E. Sickles (temporarily). Fifth Corps, Major-General George G. Meade. Sixth Corps, Major-General John Sedgwick. Eleventh Corps, Major-General Franz Sigel. Twelfth Corps, Major-General H. W. Slocum.

Second. Hereafter the corps will be considered as a unit for the organization of the artillery, and no transfers of batteries will be made from one corps or division to others, except for purposes of equalization, and then only under the authority of the chief of artillery.

Third. The cavalry of the army will be consolidated into one corps, under command of Brigadier-General Stoneman, who will make the necessary assignments for detached duty.

Fourth. The foregoing changes in command will be made as soon as convenient. By command of

MAJOR-GENERAL HOOKER.

THE RAM "QUEEN OF THE WEST."

The Union ram Queen of the West ran the blockade gallantly at Vicksburg on Monday morning, 2d, about daylight. A hundred heavy siege guns from the shore and a rebel steamer in the river opened fire on her, and kept up the storm of shot and shell for three-quarters of an hour. The rebel steamer was crippled by the fire of the Union vessel, which ran the gauntlet in safety. We learn from rebel sources that she arrived at Vidalia, opposite Natchez, on the same evening, and then steamed down the river, doing considerable damage.

THE CANAL AT VICKSBURG.

The progress of cutting the canal near Vicksburg goes on rapidly. The largest force which can be employed on it are at work night and day, and will continue so until its completion to that point opposite which a formidable rebel battery is said to be now constructed. It has been decided by the engineers that the canal must be cut by artificial means to its full width, as no reliance can be placed upon the action of the water in washing out the banks. It is ascertained that some weeks, at least, must elapse before the work can be advanced so far as to enable our gun-boats to effect any thing of importance against the rebel stronghold at Vicksburg.

THE REPULSE OF THE REBELS AT FORT DONELSON.

MURFREESBORO, TENNESSEE, Feb. 6, 1863.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington:

The rebels Wheeler, Forrest, Wharton, and Woodward attacked Fort Donelson yesterday, at two o'clock in the afternoon, with four thousand men and eight pieces of artillery. We had eight hundred men in the fort, under Colonel A. C. Harding.

The rebels charged the fortifications several times, but were repulsed by our artillery and infantry with great loss—the enemy, as usual, before and after the fight, demanding a surrender, and offering to spare life if accepted, etc.

Colonel Harding replied that "He was ready for all the consequences."

The enemy's loss in killed was over one hundred, and in prisoners three hundred.

The forces under Colonel Lowe, from Fort Henry, are pursuing the rebels, and others have been sent to intercept their retreat. Our loss is twelve killed and thirty wounded.

W. S. ROSECRANS, Major-General.

OCCUPATION OF LEBANON.

Our troops entered Lebanon, Tennessee, on the 8th inst., and captured six hundred of the rebels, most of them belonging to Morgan's men, including Paul Anderson and a number of field-officers.

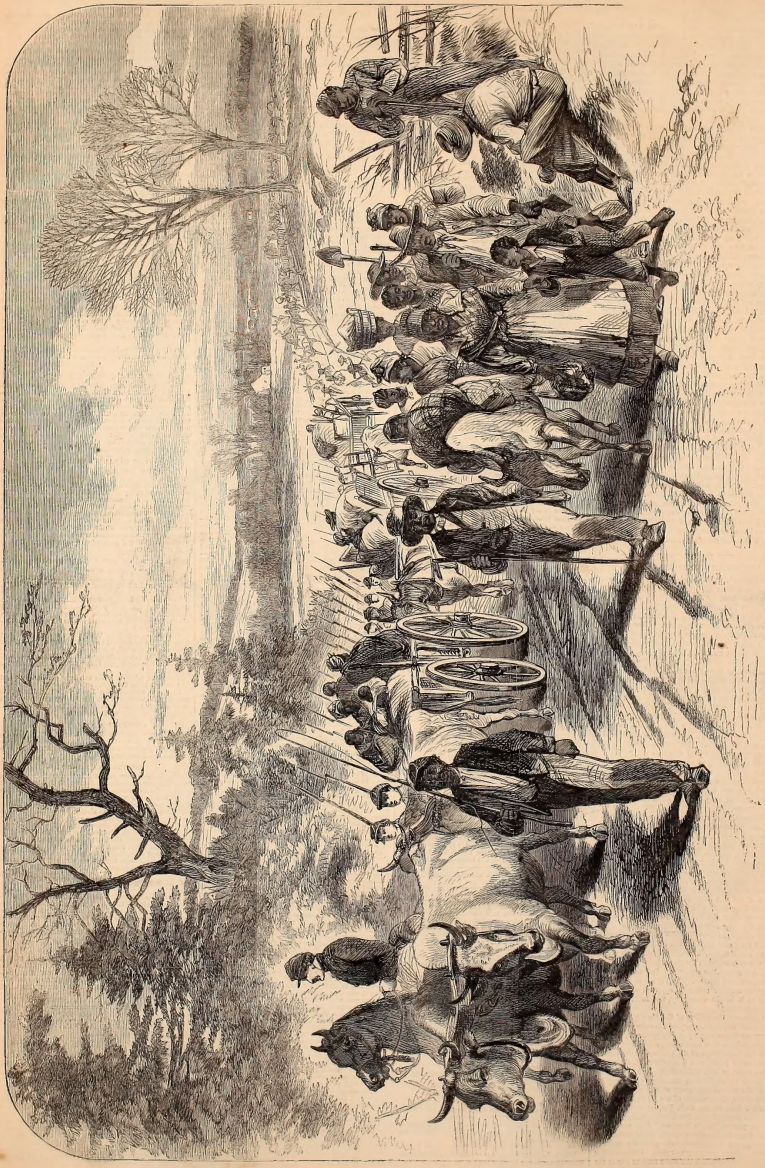
THE PIRATE "ALABAMA."

The pirate steamer Alabama is reported to have turned up at Kingston, Jamaica, on the 20th ult., where she landed the crew and officers of the United States steamer Hatteras, numbering over one hundred. It was reported that the Alabama had suffered severely in her fight with the Hatteras; that she had five shots in her hull, one of which—through her stern-post—was a very bad one. She put into Kingston to repair damages, and expected to be ready for sea in four days. Immediately upon this news being received in Havana, the United States steamers Wachusett and Oneida sailed direct for Kingston, and the Santiago de Cuba and R. R. Cuyler, then on the south side of Cuba, were ordered at once to the same port, and the Tioga and Sonoma were also steering in the same direction.

HOW CHARLESTON WAS WARNED OF OUR ATTACK.

Dispatches in the Richmond Examiner, from Charleston, state that the British frigate Cadmus brought intelligence there that a most formidable naval and land expedition was about to attack Charleston, the preparations being now nearly complete. This vessel brought orders for the British Consul to go on board and get to Havana as soon as possible.

A TESTIMONIAL TO COLONEL THORPE.



The workmen of New Orleans, engaged under Colonel Thorpe in repairing and cleaning the levees and streets of that city, have presented the Colonel with a magnificent service of plate, as a testimonial of their personal regard, and a token of their sense of the great services which he has rendered to the city.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

MORE MEDIATION RUMORS.

THE Paris Pays says that it has reason to state that the Government of the Emperor has addressed a communication to Washington, proposing means of arrangement between the two belligerents which would fully protect the dignity of the Americans. Le Nord also says that France has proposed the convocation of an American Congress with a view to peace. The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that official instructions have been sent by the French Government to Washington suggesting that commissioners be delegated by the Federal Government and by the Southern States to meet on neutral ground and confer together, without hostilities being suspended, so that they might advise mutual concessions and effect a reconciliation, so desirable for the interests of the world.

THE EFFECTS OF THE PROCLAMATION.—FREED NEGROES COMING INTO OUR LINES AT NEWBERN, NORTH CAROLINA.—[See Page 125.]

DEPARTURE OF THE GREAT SOUTHERN EXPEDITION FROM BEAUFORT, NORTH CAROLINA.—SKETCHED BY AN AMATEUR.—[SEE PAGE 110.]

THE REBEL RAMS ENGAGING OUR BLOCKADING FLEET OFF CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, JANUARY 31, 1863.—SKETCHED BY AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.—[SEE PAGE 127.]

THE GHOST AT CEDAR GLEN.

"DULL? I should think so! I never was so lonesome in my life, Sara. And it used to be so different when 'the laddies were in town.' It's of no use denying it, life goes very stupidly without the laddies. We women, I for one, need their society to keep my temper on the right balance."

"They need us quite as much," I exclaimed, rather hastily.

"That's just like you, Sara. You're so tenacious of the dignity of 'our sex.' Sara"—all the time poking the grate fire lazily, lying at her "lissom length" upon the floor—"Sara I wonder you never put on bloomers, and went round lecturing on woman's rights."

I flung my ball of yarn at the speaker. It hit her dark glossy head, and disarranged a braid or two. She revenged the act by trailing the ball along for "Keeps" the Maltese to scamper after. And leaning back in my chair, I watched her and thought about her.

"A dark, handsome little creature," I thought, "but inscrutable. You talk idly," I thought. "You assume carelessness, lightness, frivolity, to cover, if not a memory which hides and hurts, a restlessness, a fever of unquiet, born of an unsatisfied spirit. Which is it?" She was a half-way cousin of mine; we had been correspondents all our lives, off and on, and visited each other at irregular intervals. And this present visit of mine, which had lengthened from a season into a twelvemonth, had passed, and yet I had not yet fathomed her—this inscrutable something still baffled me. If this doesn't give some indication of character, I don't know what does. To live in the same house with a woman, eat at the same table, read a good many of the same books, and have sundry mutual feminine interests, and yet for a year not to find her out!

I had only come for a season—for the winter—then I should return North again, and Jessie would go with me for the summer: that was my plan. But that summer came, with war-clouds hurrying threateningly, and breaking in heavy destruction. I urged departure, never doubting but this gay little cousin would accede. But no. She said coolly, and quite carelessly,

"I sha'n't go and leave Liz and Ned here at school, while such a rumpus is going on about their ears."

"Take them too," I suggested.

"Out of the question. You forget Uncle Rush has their responsibility. He'd be likely to let them go North now, wouldn't he? No, I must stay."

And then she burst out of her coolness, and for a moment I felt the fire of the Radeford blood.

"Stay with me, Sara—stay with me; I shall be lonesome as death if you go."

"You lonesome, with all the Radefords to pay cousinly devoir, and the Kingstons down the street?"

"You simple Sara," she answered, "don't you know that I am only part Radeford? Don't you know that the Chester soul is within me—that it tempers, and tames, and cools, not chills, Sara, this wild Radeford fire? Don't you remember how I have been Aunt Miriam's charge for the greatest half of my life? Aunt Miriam, who is all Chester, soul and body—all Yankee, as Uncle Rush sneers. And so, perforce, don't you see that I should consume myself and die, if left in this fiery atmosphere without a whiff of the Chester air to relieve me? Come stay, Sara; I like you best of any body."

So I staid. Why shouldn't I? I was alone in the world, with no nearer relatives than my aunts and their children. And none of these liked me "best of any body."

It was a fiery atmosphere for me at least, who believed in human freedom, the laws of God, humanity, and the government that most nearly represented these.

It never occurred to the Radeford cousins that there was any thing inscrutable in Jessie Radeford. They thought cousin Jessie "so amusing," "so droll," "rather wild to be sure," and they "wondered what she could see in that cold Sara Chester."

But cold Sara Chester fancied she could see far beneath their ken, and below reserve, and wild wit, and drollery, that she could detect stinging sarcasm and sardonic scorn.

And so, as she lay there "at her lissom length," this inscrutable Jessie Radeford, and played at talking, as usual, while she played with Keeps, the cat, I thought my thoughts about her.

What was it? What set me following on that trail on this night? What, unless as the fire-light struck upon her face as she spoke, I imagined that there was a haggard look about her eyes?—that there were hollows in the cheeks, and that the pomegranate-bloom there was hot fever only.

I was going to follow up my thought, when she began again:

"Sara, your argument isn't sound."

"What argument? I didn't know I had argued."

"My! don't she snap us up on our words, Keeps?" Then to me directly: "Well, your assertion, Sara, that the laddies need us as much as we need them. I don't believe it. They can fight, legislate, and do quantities of things, a good deal better without us than with us. Then, even in social affairs, who ever heard of a woman from choice having a party entirely of her own sex, clubs, and all that—eh, now?"—resting on an elbow, and eying me triumphantly over Keeps's head.

I laughed: "Oh, that's only their bad taste, Jessie. This is a question of needs, and the bad taste doesn't spoil the fact that they need us."

"Oh ho! you wouldn't like to fight, would you, Sara? You don't think your need comes there, do you?"

I had forgotten her first presumption, and only answered the last; but her words touched the fretted string, and I blazed a little, in a passion of words, which relieved me.

I told her I longed to do any thing which would proclaim my belief in the law of right. As to fighting, nobody knew what the necessity might be; and I believed I should begin that target-practice again, which Rick commenced teaching us at Newport two summers ago. The fire must burst out some way, for utter repression wasn't my forte, however it might serve others. And here I darted a keen glance at her. I might as well have looked at the Sphinx.

There she lay, trailing the ball of bright wool round and round a circle of the carpet for that frisky Keeps to spring after; and her face was about as expressionless as the cat's.

Presently she gave a little giggle, as the Maltese clutched the plaything and rolled over with it in feline merriment. Then, as if the play was out, she rose, yawned, and said,

"I've got a plan, Sara. I shall die of ennui if I stay here for the holidays, and preside at Lou Radeford's Christmas-tree, and superintend punch-bowls. So I propose a trip to the Cedars. There we'll have Christmas all to ourselves, and make merry in any fashion that would shock the Radefords. It's a huge old house, you know: wings, gables, and all sorts of queer places; and it's haunted too."

"Hasn't that story died out yet?" I asked.

"Yet? No; it's revived. Since the first of the Radefords—that old wicked Sir Rushton that Aunt Rush takes such pride in—since he used to stalk round, in old colonial times, with spurs and rapier, to the terror of the country folks, I believe the tradition has held until a few years ago, after Spiritualism appeared, when it assumed new form, and it was averred by the neighbors that lights had been seen at unusual hours, and strains of music heard. That's rather agreeable haunting, isn't it? Well, this died away, to be brought up by—who do you think? Jetson! Jetson came up from the old place the other day, declaring that he 'b'lieved the sperrits were round agin,' for 'he was sure that he and Jemimy heard 'em flyin' round in the easterd gable.'

"'Are you afraid, Jetson?' I asked.

"''Fraid! Lor bless you, no, missus! They's won't hurt nobody. They's good sperrits, I hearn tell; but I let 'em have their part all to theyselves. Couldn't think of interferin', you know, with 'em. They mightn't like that.'

"You ought to have seen the old fellow's eyes roll as he said this.

"'Well,' I said, 'you needn't interfere, Jetson; but is that what you came up to tell me?'

"'Well, no,' he answered; 'but if I'd let Jim and Luce come down and spend Christmas 'twouldn't be so lonesome-like. You see sperrits make a place dredful lonesome, 'specially nights.'

"I laughed at him, and told him 'twas nothing in the world but some boards in the east gable—had got loose, probably, and were creaking in the wind; and that old willow, you know. I declare I'll have that willow cut down! It's made more fuss in frightening people than it's worth."

"So you consented to Jim and Luce going down?" I broke in.

"Yes; in company with us I knew you'd like it better than the Radeford party."

"But what will the Radefords say?"

"Say? Oh, laugh at me, perhaps sneer a little at Jessie's odd notions, and then lay it all to that cold Sara Chester."

I laughed. I was quite willing to take the odium.

"And when do we go?" I was impatient to be away.

"To-morrow, if you like."

"And the children?"

"Oh, Ed and Liz are crazy over Christmas-trees yet, and they've dreamed of this one for months; besides, Uncle Rush would feel hurt at my proposing to take them. I'll have 'em down at New-Year's, though. They can spare their sister until then up there with the Radefords."

So "to-morrow" it was. The day was bright and clear; and as we approached the brow of the hill, which commanded a view of Cedar Glen, I thought I had never seen a more romantic spot, or one more fitted to suggest "the fairies tripping on the green," or the "mysterious ghost in pallid moonbeams flitting."

It was high noon, but the house lay half in shadow, showing glimpse of gable and wall spotted with moss and mould; tall chimneys, from two of which issued a faint wreath of smoke, evincing that Jetson and his Jemimy were making hospitable preparations for us. It was the same picture of other days—those of my childhood visits, when I had once or twice been out to the Cedars for Christmas. The same, yet not the same. Then it was filled with gay, grand company, and up the avenue rolled many a fine carriage in place of our old-fashioned and rather dilapidated vehicle. Then, too, saddest loss of all, instead of only these two sable figures to greet us, there were a group of smiling faces, the centre of whom were those whose fading "made the hame gang drear" for those left behind.

I thought of all this as I entered. I wondered did Jessie think of it too. I turned and looked to see. There was a "far" expression in her eyes, and her lips were closed tightly, as if holding back a sigh. Then, of a sudden, she said to me:

"Why not—why shouldn't I keep Christmas here at the Cedars where my father and mother kept it? I have always wanted to since—since—but—" And here she ended a little sharply to stem a softer tide. I hated to have those seventeen Radefords here to yawn and wonder what I could see in this old barn."

Her face grew bright again in a moment, either from resolve or a natural reaction, it was hard to tell which; and we went in under the broad lintel with her gay voice sounding in gay speeches to the grinning welcome of Jetson and Jemimy.

We passed the day quickly enough, much more quickly than when in town, for there was plenty to do in going over the place, sadly changed from the old times, yet still showing a certain care and order, which plainly implied a loving oversight; and I discovered where to attribute this, as I listened to the minute inquiries of my little cousin, and the scarcely less interested answers which that faithful old Jemimy gave.

"Truly," I thought, "circumstances do alter cases wonderfully. In this one day I have found a trait, or a depth of feeling in this Jessie Radeford, which a whole year of town life failed to betray."

Yes, we passed the day quickly, and night found us sitting before the huge fire-place in a room that had once been used to breakfast or lunch in—presenting in its smaller size an aspect of greater comfort than the parlors.

I remember perfectly the conversation of that evening, for it proved curiously significant. And I remember how Jessie looked. Dark, slight, and picturesquely handsome, she sat on the floor—one of her favorite attitudes—presenting a decidedly foreign appearance, something half French and Italian, in a skirt of black silk, and a pointed waist of deep red velvet, with a little flowering of a rich old lace at throat and wrists. Keeps, that never-failing Keeps, was in her lap, winking and purring her satisfaction. Altogether the picture was pretty and amazingly cheerful, and I said so.

"Yes, it's a great deal better being here than at the Radefords', isn't it?" she asked, unheeding my compliment.

"Yes, of course I like it better, but you seem to get on well enough with the Radefords," I answered, a little maliciously.

She replied, without her usual persiflage:

"I get on well enough—that is just it—for I get on lightly, skim the surface, you know. I like Uncle Rush—I love Uncle Rush," she went on, musingly; "but my cousins, they are not like him, excepting Stamford: Stamford has fine qualities, a dash and spirit and generosity, poor fellow!" Why did she say poor fellow?

He wore a gray uniform, with marks of high distinction upon the shoulders! Did this strange girl, who had carried an appearance of thoughtless, childish levity, and disregard of the state of the country—did she own somewhere a feeling deep down in the hidden depths of her heart, which made her consider this young Confederate with pity for his course?

"But the rest of my cousins are not of my 'kith,' Sara," she proceeded. "They don't consider me up to their high-water mark of pride. They lay all my queer notions, vulgar notions they mean, to the Chester blood; my mother's blood." Her tone grew here more vehement. And they said of her—her!—that she wasn't a lady fit to match with a Radeford, because she did not come of a race who had been lords of the soil for generation after generation. A cruel, wicked race in the past, if tradition can be relied upon. My father resented these slights to her as long as he lived; and I have that one trait of the Radefords—I do not forget."

As she ceased her tone was quiet and low, but there was fierce emphasis in it, and a glow on her cheek and fire in her eye.

"No," I thought, "you do not forget; and that is not the only Radeford trait that flashes out occasionally. Happily their more generous qualities fall to your share."

We sat a while after this in a little silence, which I broke by saying,

"Well, I think we are two adventurous damsels who deserve praise for our boldness, Jessie."

She looked up, inquiringly.

"How?"

"Why isn't it rather adventurous, not to say bold, for us to take up our abode here, with only one old man and a boy for defense of the castle, in the present wild condition of the country?"

She laughed, "Oh, this is too far away. There has been no soldiery this side of the hills."

I laughed, too, at her cool decision.

"But there may be, Jessie, any day."

"Well, I'm not afraid. Are you?" with a half contemptuous air.

"No. I'm not afraid, or I shouldn't have come; but I don't think it would be particularly pleasant for us two girls to have a visit from a party of strangers, whatever the color of their coats;" and I glanced significantly at her.

She tossed her fingers in the air with disdain.

"Let them come; let them come. I'm not my father's daughter if I could flinch before a regiment of them, whatever the color of their coats, as you say, Sara. No, I think it would be fine fun—indeed I do; an adventure, sure enough. Do you mind that old ballad,

'And twenty thousand Jacobins
Rose all at once to horse?'

And do you remember how James Barry used to repeat it?"

She got up as she said this, and, walking up and down the room, began reciting the ballad in her curious way of imitation, catching with singular fidelity the voice of which she had spoken. Then pausing before the fire, with her mouth stirring in little half smiles, her eyes filled with dreams, she said, "Oh, how pleasant those days were, Sara! How we strolled, and strolled, on those lovely Newport cliffs in moonlight nights, or at sunset! And how the days went in riding and bathing, and the nights to music! Ah me! I wonder shall we ever see them again—James Barry, and Rick Edwards, and Charley Baynes, and the cliffs, and the sea."

She ceased suddenly, and went to the window, humming over a French air that James Barry sung in those old days, and occasionally saying a word or two of the ballad in precisely his tone. All at once she cried out, in quite another voice,

"Sara, come here!"

I obeyed her.

"Look out there—there, at the edge of the hills where the pines are."

"What is it? I don't see—only the little scrubby pines."

"Only the pines! Pines don't move like that. Look now! They are coming down. They! It's a body of soldiers, Sara."

"Well, what did I tell you?" I retorted; but I must confess that I shivered a little as I recognized the dark moving objects. Who and what were they? It might be some unorganized, lawless band, bent upon depredation. I communicated my anxieties to Jessie.

"Pooh! don't borrow trouble, Sara. Trouble!" she repeated, between her teeth; "perhaps there is a crisis coming to the trouble."

I had suspected all along—I was sure of it now: Jessie Radeford was hiding against her heart some secret, which that insane pride of hers denied all respite of expression.

They came riding quietly down the hill, not over half a dozen mounted men, and as quietly, but surely, approached the house, and at length entered the avenue. There was a clicking of swords, a clink of spurs, and the ring of heels upon the stones without, a murmur of voices, and then the great ponderous brass knocker rang a summons.

"Cool, upon my word!" ejaculated Jessie. "Only six of them; how do they know but it is the strong-hold of their opponents. Bah! 'Tis plain they are acquaintances!" and she darted to the door, saying, "No, no, I will go; Jetson or Jim would act like fools for fright."

In a minute more I heard her light laugh, then a deeper-toned one in response; and they came in together—she slightly preceding—and Harold Kingston, that ambitious young rebel, her companion. Then a lieutenant, one of the Hughes, and all the rest, picked men: "Only part of a detachment lying the other side of the hill," they told us. "Lying in wait for a suspected approach of a force of Federals lurking about the vicinity, unless we can hunt them out and surprise them," said Captain Kingston.

Jessie's eyes shone, and she talked in her old reckless way, humming little drum tunes and martial airs as she stood swaying before the roaring fire. What was in this incomprehensible girl's mind I discovered sooner than I expected to.

The guests were tired, famished; besides a storm was coming up—and what with riding all day, they were quite content to remain where they were.

We served them with meat and drink, and Jetson found them places to sleep in that many-roomed house.

By midnight Jessie and I sat alone in the parlor we had improvised, and "talked over" our adventure. She was excited, but not from the mere events that had just transpired. Fearless and wild in her spirit, she would only take such events coolly and naturally. But there was some deep undercurrent stirred.

"Sara," she said, as the house grew still, "this is not all ended. Something of greater moment is to happen. I feel it. There is fever in my veins, and a curious, expectant flutter about my heart. I know the sign. Twice I have felt this way before, and twice something has happened. But it was not happiness," and she shuddered.

Then abruptly, but with passion: "Sara, the time has come to tell you every thing. Ah, Heaven! what a relief to speak all!" and she pressed her hands with emotion against her heart. "Sara, I have kept silence because I dared not speak before. I knew myself too well. If once I had established a mutual, confessed bond of sympathy between myself and any other being, I no longer had complete control of my actions, nor my words. To betray them would have been madness. And you—all this time—you have not known what to make of me, Sara. So flippant, so childish, so selfishly occupied in the midst of such convulsions! But I was neither flippant nor childish. Sara"—and her voice hushed—"I have thought as you thought, felt as you felt, all along. My sympathies are not with those who sleep up stairs, but with those for whom they wait and watch. You think it strange, you think it sudden? If you had known my mother well you would not be surprised. It was the one point of difference between her and my father. She hated slavery; and as soon as I was old enough to understand the position of things, and keep my own counsel, she instilled her principles into my mind. Ah! do you wonder that I love the North, with my mother ever before me as the type of what is noblest and best there?"

She ceased, in a little passion of loss and yearning, then went on:

"My father suspected all this, and when he died his property was found to be so arranged that we could do nothing but continue living on in the same way. We could neither release the slaves nor sell the landed property; and when every thing was settled, it turned out that we had much less of any other—of available money than we had supposed. Poor mother! It was a great blow to her. Well, it was not long before she left it behind her.

"It was then you began to see more of your half-way cousin. You thought me strangely reserved at the very first—when we met North, Sara. Ah, you little knew how long habit of repression had sealed my lips. Then I had one hope yet. My mother had left me with this charge—if it were possible, to instill into the minds of Ned and Liz what had become her religion. If I babbled much of my feelings I should have made this forever impracticable, under the guardianship, as they are, of Uncle Rush. Well, so time went on, and I spent those summers at Newport—there I met another fate. She raised her head now and looked me steadily in the eyes, and her face burned though her voice was so clear. There I met James Barry, and I loved him, Sara."

"Jessie!"

It was all I could say, for though deeply touched by this confession her will kept me from further demonstration here.

"Yes, I loved him," she proceeded in the same tone, "and he loved me, Sara, but he would not trust me. It was one night down there on the cliffs, and I told him that I could not leave my brother and sister for a good while yet, that I had a sort of charge for them; and so, though I loved him, I would leave him free. Though I loved him! I told him that, Sara, and it is not easy for me to speak. But he would not understand. He misinterpreted every thing, and wronged me by suspicion of coquetry and higher ambition; accused me of pride, and thanked me, all in that quiet, cool way of passionate scorn which he had, for saving his vanity too fatal a blow by my fine reasons of rejection. Because I was rich, he thought, and he was poor; for long before he spoke I knew he hesitated, for very pride, with that feeling. My passion rose too, and I disdained a word more of explanation. To be so judged, and by him! How dare a man ask a woman to marry him when there is any where in his heart the seed of such suspicion?"

Her voice grew vehement again, and again sank to its calmer tone.

"He went away the next morning. I never saw him again. Then you came home with me. Then the war followed. And from this last event, not a day, not an hour have I been free from tormenting anxiety for him. I saw at the very first, in a Northern paper, his name among the volunteers; and any moment—" She stopped, covered her eyes with her hand, and set a white tooth hardly against her lip to crush back the tide of emotion. But all at once she dropped the slight cover, her face full of that expectant look—eager, watchful, listening.

"What is it?" I asked.

"Sara, I can not get rid of that strange feeling—I am haunted. Something unusual is going to happen. I believe I am clairvoyant. It is a trait that the Radefords used to call second-sighted; and in every third generation it appears in one of the descendants."

I drew nearer to her, thrilled at her words. The room was full of ghostly shadows, for the fire burned low, and one dim candle was flaring itself out in a corner.

Looking about me, I saw to my relief that the heavy inside shutters were closed and barred, and over them drooped, in thick folds, the dark old damask curtains.

As I thought of this safety—hist! what was that that broke the deep stillness?

I glanced at Jessie. She had not moved a thread; it was no fold of her dress that made that sound!

And she had heard too; her lips were parted to still her respiration, her eyes expectant. Neither of us spoke nor stirred.

It came again—a soft, dull sound—a footfall. Something flashed over me. I leaned forward and breathed in the lowest whisper,

"Jetson's ghost, Jessie."

She shook her head for silence more than for a denial; and still waited.

Again, distincter now than before, that footfall, nearer yet, and—there was a hand feeling for the door-latch—the door of the room where we sat. I grasped at Jessie, but she rose, and turned to face whoever might be about to enter. I rose too, feeling strangely excited, but not fear-stricken. The next instant the groping hand had found what it had searched for. There came a cautious click—the door swung open; and upon the threshold there stood the figure of a man in some military uniform.

It was but for a second. What happened then? I saw Jessie Radeford spring forward. I saw her seize the intruder by the wrist, and draw him into the room. I heard her exclaim, breathlessly, "James! James!"

James Barry! And how came he here?

I know not by what word or question she asked this; but I remember that hesitation which called forth her passionate reply:

"For God's sake—for humanity's sake—do not distrust me again at such an hour, James Barry!" she ejaculated, in suppressed tones. "Do you think I would betray you? Listen. There sleep up stairs Captain Kingston and five other armed men. They are but a detachment of a greater number lying in wait for a suspected force of Federals in this vicinity. I have but to raise my voice and you are their prisoner; but, instead, because I espouse the cause of the North from my heart and soul, I ask you, as one of her soldiers, to trust in me, that I may render aid—the aid that lies in my power. You are a Federal officer, perhaps in command of this force; let me warn you of their—"

He interrupted her with an eager movement.

"Stay!" he exclaimed. "You have espoused the Federal cause. You wish to aid it. You have now a signal opportunity. Captain Kingston and his men will see you before they depart. Engage them in conversation—a conversation which you will assist me to hear from some unsuspected covert. They will readily disclose their whereabouts, their number, their plan of attack upon us. This is the only way whereby you can aid the Federal cause which you love. Will you do it?"

Her womanly heart shrank a moment; but presently a fire shone in her eyes. Her voice was firm and resolute.

"Yes, I will do it—for the Federal cause which I love!" she emphasized.

"I should not be likely to misinterpret your motive," he said, hastily, but more sadly this time than proudly.

Then we heard how he came there. A fugitive had given him information a few days before of the proximity of the enemy; had told him of the haunted house—as Cedar Glen was known in that region—as a guide-post to the neighborhood. Captain Barry had seized upon this as a fortunate circumstance, and upon several occasions had made that uncanny "east wing," which the negro had fully described, a hiding-place and a point of observation. Knowing the house to be occupied for a long time, only in some remote kitchen corner, by two old domestics, he had sometimes taken a pleasure in exploring the strange mysteries of the ancient apartments.

He hoped Miss Radeford would pardon the liberty; and even then the love that tore and rent this proud heart burst out in the bitter grace of his manner and his voice, as he bowed his stately head before her.

But Jessie felt only the irony; and, with a shade of wrong upon her face, she turned to the subject of his concealment.

There was an old mirror of polished steel, ornamented with deep framings of dark wood, which reached from the ceiling to the quaint table standing under it. Behind this a panel-door slid, and communicated with a press that had once been used, but was now empty.

"Quite a Castle of Otranto," remarked Captain Barry, as he surveyed this refuge, hidden only for convenience' sake.

And his voice had the old music in it now, in its half jesting tone—the old music, that brought those summer days, the cliffs, and the sea so vividly to view. I did not wonder that Jessie trembled as she heard.

The night, by this time, had worn on far toward morning. In a short time the early breakfast, at which we were to play such strange parts, would summon the guests from their slumbers.

As we turned to leave the room to prepare ourselves in something more fitting for breakfast than our evening silks, Captain Barry too turned. A change had come over his face. Its hardness had vanished; and he held out his hand, with these words:

"Miss Radeford, before you go, let me say how much I appreciate the true spirit and courage that enables you to do this. Let me say that I no longer distrust you; that the woman who, under these circumstances, can prove such loyalty and faith, wins for herself all faith in the best, purest of motives, however she may act. In looking back upon the past now, I can, in simple justice, only consider myself unfortunate in not awakening the same emotions that I felt myself."

I was glad that he had done her even partial justice at last; and as I saw them part, she never giving sign of her suffering, I followed her up the stairs to our room, resolved what I would do. They should never part thus.

But, as we stood in the chamber, I could see that her spirits had risen by his words. She stood there arraying herself in her bright merino morning-gown, a flush of excitement on her cheek, a kindling fire in her eyes.

"I feel like a French woman," she said; "a French woman in the days of Richelieu. I hope I may be as wise and far-seeing as they were."

I never doubted her capacity, I told her; and then I stole away. I was cold, I explained to her, and as I had finished dressing first I would not wait for her.

I went straight back to the parlor, where Captain Barry was waiting, and before I left the room again he knew how he had misunderstood. He knew for what noble charge, what sacred responsibility she had left him free. The strong fellow actually groaned at his injustice. "Will she ever forgive me?" he exclaimed, huskily.

And he was for having me beseech her to come to him at once; but I showed him how much wiser it would be to wait until she had performed the part which had been assigned her for the interview that was coming. Wiser not to startle her with any fresh surprises.

A while later, in that same room, gracious, graceful, and piquante, a slim, dark girl presided at a wide and well-supplied table.

The hand that poured the coffee was steady. The voice that asked those marvelously well-chosen questions, or laughed in response to some bright sally, was clear, firm, and even gay; not a note rung falsely. And the manner had its accustomed nonchalance, its careless, even play, from the low chiding of that lazy, blundering Jim, who waited upon us, to the coquettish glance at the steel mirror, which reflected a knot of ribbon awry that her dextrous touch brought into order.

It was marvelous, this cool control, this matchless ease, with such a secret under all.

I, too, thought of French women as I saw her now; dark, fascinating, distracting women, who had sat at the tables of princes, with gay smiles and brilliant jests, while beneath their silken boddices throbbed hearts that held the secrets of a kingdom.

To me the moments seemed leaden-weighted. To her who sat opposite me time appeared to have lost its value. Her spirits actually rose as the seconds ticked audibly past from the old clock upon the mantle. It was the fine sense of the diplomatiste when he sees the success of his finesse. Once I feared that this subtle elation might overdo the nice point of success. Vain fear. To the last—to the very end, when at the door she stood nodding and smiling adieu, it was the same careless, thoughtless gayety; and as they rode down the avenue she leaned against the door-way, beating a little foot upon the stone, and humming a little tune, while she gazed across the hills.

But when the last rider disappeared, like a mask all gayety, all childish thoughtlessness fell from her face as she turned to re-enter the room where another interview awaited her.

For myself, I fled to my chamber. That interview was not for me.

Later a voice, her voice, called me. "Sara, come down!"

I went, and I saw at once that I had done wisely in my revelation. There was peace between them, and love and faith which no more doubts would ever shake.

There was a soft light in Jessie's eyes as she said, simply, "Captain Barry is going, Sara, and he wishes to bid you 'good-by.'"

"To bid you good-by and God bless you, Sara Chester!"

I knew what he meant. I had done wisely.

Then in the next moment he had kissed us both—her last, holding her in lingering arms, and saying:

"I will wait for you all my life if need be, Jessie." And then he was gone.

But they had not to wait so long. There was a crisis coming indeed. Neither of us felt it. She was wrapped in the present. I was dulled by the past excitement from any hope or foreboding. That night she sat gazing dreamily from the window when I saw her face whiten. She called me to look.

A fierce rider was coming at headlong speed down the western range of hills.

What did it mean? She thought of him. I could have counted the strokes of her heart as those hoofs rang on the road and nearer up the avenue. We neither of us looked now until he stood before us.

A messenger from the Radefords! I breathed easier.

But something had happened! She saw it in the man's bearing. Ah, there was a letter. She seized it, tore it open. A grave look passed into her face, but it chased all horror away. It was solemn news, but not what she feared. I took the sheet from her hand and read it. "Uncle Rush" was dead. A sudden but easy death—one of those swift spasms of the heart which stop its beat forever.

It was all a whirl of excitement following this. We went up to town, and there, amidst preparations for the funeral, came tidings of the capture of Captain Kingston and a detachment of the —ths by a force of Federals.

Thank Heaven that was safely over!

Then, at the last, that crowning fate. Those children for whom she had sacrificed so much were left without further prevision of guardianship. To their grateful sister fell the welcome charge.

What was to keep us now in this land of bondage? Nothing but rashness, and we were not rash: we had learned too long the lesson of caution for that.

And one day we found ourselves in far New England—in free New England, for which we had yearned.

And later still, on another day, there was a happy reunion. The ghost of Cedar Glen appeared to us, not in surprise as on that strange night, but heralded by joyful letters.

And again I heard a voice full of manly emotion say, "God bless you, Sara Chester!" And I pray God's blessing upon them—upon James Barry and his wife Jessie—and to all men and women who believe in the cause of God and humanity.

GOING TO WILSON'S CREEK.

Fun, I fancy, must be one of the original elements, though I doubt if it be accredited by schoolmen, for even in the grim game of war, amidst forced marches, half rations, shivering night rounds, massacres called battles, and the deaths of those we love, turns up occasionally such a joke as my going to Wilson's Creek.

Per se, it was hardly a laughing matter, for the rebels keep good watch, and have always a rope or a bullet ready for the unlucky scouts that they catch napping; but the General was urgent to know something more of their position, and however risky I felt it to be, I couldn't disgrace my branch of the profession by backing down, specially as all the other fellows were so kindly afraid of robbing me of the "glory" of the expedition.

How to go was, however, an open question, for they are near-sighted rascals, those rebels, and shallow devices won't go down with them; besides, for some reason or other, I had gotten into a sort of panic, and could think of nothing but the delights of being strung up amidst the jeers of a parcel of rebels; and though I don't think I am much more of a coward than men on the average, to start in that frame of mind on an undertaking requiring all a man's wit and nerve, was simply going to certain death; while to make matters worse, I could no more scare up a disguise or an excuse than if that sort of ware had been entirely out of market.

At last Sue Scott, who is in my confidence, and is going to be my—but never mind that—got vexed at seeing me hesitating there like a girl, and said, sharply,

"Why, George, if you haven't the heart to go like a man, go like a woman, but go somehow."

And the careless speech struck me as a spark does a train of gunpowder, and in ten minutes I had it all planned, and was getting as fast as I could for laughing into a riding dress of Sue's, who, luckily for me, is on an ample pattern, broad in the shoulders, and as tall as I within an inch.

The fun of the thing had driven all thoughts of panic out of my head, and what with Aunt Rhoda's red and white, used, as she solemnly averred, only in painting maps, my short hair turned under at the back in a net, with braids (Aunt Rhoda's again, preserved, she says, as specimens of the vanity and wickedness of New York), fastened on either side of my face, and the whole surmounted by a pork-pie hat with a drooping plume, and one of those misty little things that Sue calls a veil, I think my own mother would hardly have recognized me.

It is true I had a somewhat awkward way of tripping myself in my long skirt, and that Sue insisted that my face was an impudent libel on the modesty of the sex; but I intended not to dismount if possible, and had full faith that the women (the patriotic ones, at least) would forgive me; and with a letter addressed in Sue's handwriting to a supposed brother in Price's army, and a revolver in the bosom of my riding-dress, I started off just after dusk, perched up, woman fashion, on a side-saddle, and allowed to draw about one breath in three by that diabolical instrument of torture called a corset. In fact, since that ride, it is a question with me whether the whole dress wasn't originally a penance devised for some feminine sinner of rank, and ignorantly copied by the sex as the mode; for it pinches you in at the waist, and half throttles you at the neck, and pinches you at the wrists; and their boots stop just where they ought to go on; and the wretched little hats won't stay on; and the veil half blinds you; and— However, there is some old proverb about not abusing the bridge that carries you safely over, and so I will go on with my story.

I reached Wilson's Creek without incident of any kind, and the pickets were civil enough to the pork-pie and riding-skirt, which was about all that they saw in the dim light; while the pork-pie, on its part, conducted itself with becoming reserve, saying no more to the guards than was proper in a young lady of discretion, but using its eyes diligently on the way to the nearest officer—not wary veteran, but, as Fortune (who, like every thing feminine, is generally kind to impudence would have it, a gay young fellow of twenty-on handsome as a girl, and much more attentive t the red and white, and Aunt Rhoda's shining braid seen through the veil, than to the probabilities o my story.

He took the letter carelessly.

"Joseph Lose Berne. Your brother, you say Do you know his regiment?"

"I am not sure, but I think it is the ——th, naming one that I was sure was posted at a di tance.

"And you don't know the company? Well, will try and find him. Why not wait till we ca see if he is near the lines."

"Oh, impossible! they will miss me."

"They?"

"My family are Unionists, and have discarde my brother. I slipped away secretly, and mu get back before I am missed."

"Why go back at all?"

The riding-dress drew itself up indignantly.

"Good-evening, Sir!"

"Stop one moment!" he cried, following m "Pray forgive me! but if you only knew how ra such visits are, and how like angels' visits the seem! You must permit me at least to ride bac with you—a part of the way. You are too pr cious to be left to the mercy of the first straggl that may meet you."

Such fools as we make of ourselves with women We are only equaled by the fools who believe u Not that I said so to him; on the contrary—S Scott forgive me!—but I am afraid that her ridin dress encouraged him—that her snowy gaunt lay unresistingly in the tender clasp into which took it; in short, that while he was so polite showing me all that I most wished to see, I didn conduct myself quite as she would have done u der the circumstances: else how could he hav dared, while pathetically urging me to a corr spondence, to steal his arm about my waist, as blush to say—that is, I would blush, if I could, f having forgotten to do so then) he did, enforcin his arguments with an occasional tender squeez I am aware that I deserve the sentence of deat at the hands of a feminine jury, and that it w due to my costume to have made a show of virt ous indignation; but when, apropos of our corr spondence, he was so exceedingly kind and minu in his details of their future movements, I reall hadn't the heart to stop him.

It was cruel in me, however, when he, at par ing, prayed for a lock of my hair, to give him o of Aunt Rhoda's braids, after a feint of cutting off, neatly rolled up in a small round parcel. H placed it gallantly over his heart, and went awa rejoicing; but I am afraid that the first examin tion of his artificial treasure changed his joy in wrath only equaling that of Aunt Rhoda's, w mourned for her braid like Rachel, and who, I fe will never forgive me my journey to Wilson Creek. The General, however, got the desired i formation, as my gallant friend had unconsciousl afforded me every facility for so doing, and I ha made my peace with Sue, who pouted a little first hearing the story. I have sent also to N York for another pair of artificial braids; and for the rebel officer, it only serves him right. L him learn in future how to treat unprotected f males.

THE GREAT SOUTHERN EXPEDITION.

On page 117 we illustrate The Departure of the Great Southern Expedition from For Macon, North Carolina, from a sketch by volunteer correspondent, who writes as follows:

Fort Macon, January 24, 1863

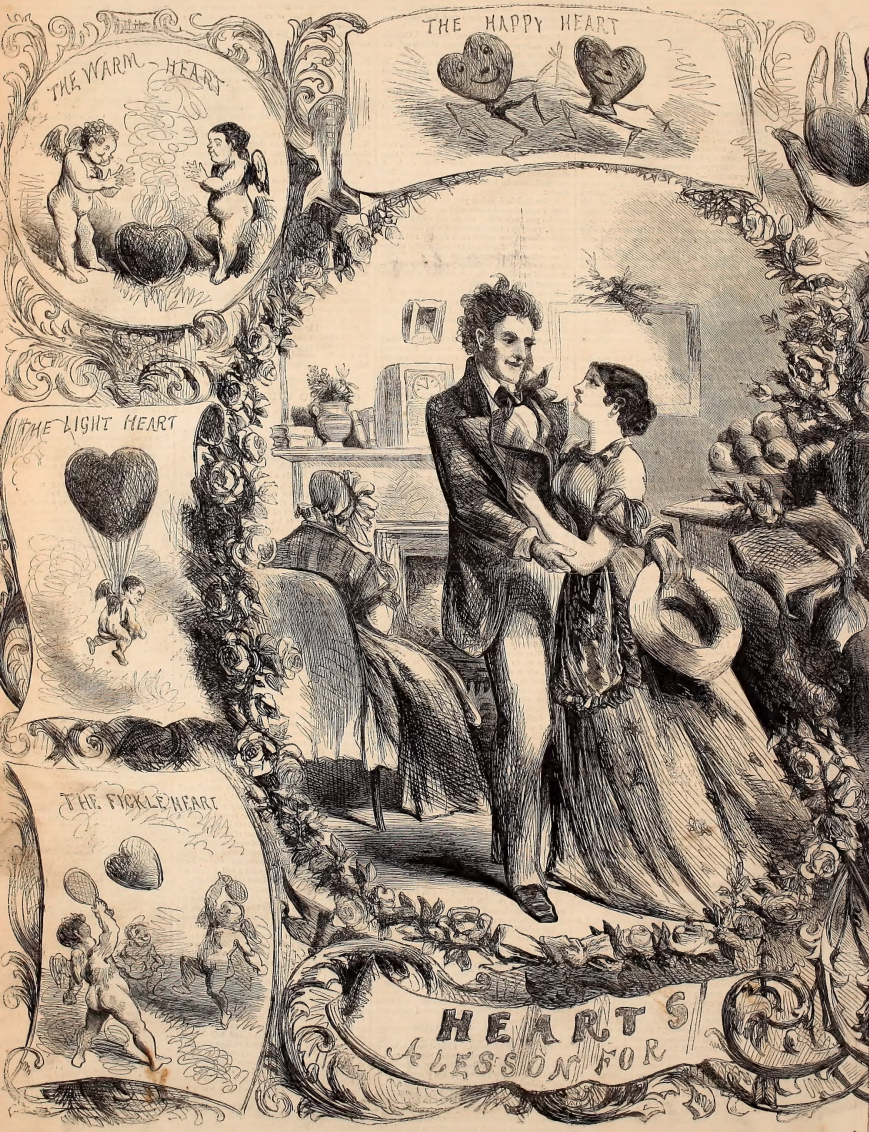
Accompanying this note you will find a sketch of a lar fleet which has been for some time past fitting out here go we know not where, but suspect it is Charleston; are now in ignorance, but perhaps ere this reaches you will have known its destination, and its success or failu Many of our principal steamers are engaged in conveyi the troops; the gun-boats and Monitors left last Saturd but I suppose they will co-operate with the troops n leaving. The view is taken from Morehead City railro landing; the dépôt and part of the railroad are promin on the left; part of a regiment are on the platform t side of the dépôt, and stragglers are to be seen here a there engaged in different occupations, the most noticea at the time being that of cooking; sailing boats, a la schooner (the masts only are visible), and a steamb (the Freeborn, which obtained I believe a reputation running the Potomac blockade), lie at the wharf; the fo ground is marshy grass, so common in the Southern h bors. I have drawn the vessels as they appeared.

Fort Macon can be seen between the shipping, most which having received their complement of troops are chored off the fort, making them quite small from the po from which the sketch was taken. The Guide, Cahaw Convoy, New England, Expounder, ship J. Morton, numerous propellers and side-wheelers are in the numb



THE EFFECTS OF THE PROCLAMATION.

Though the President's proclamation of fr dom has been so often compared to the Pope's B against the comet, it seems to be producing so substantial fruits. We publish on page 116 an lustration of Contrabands coming into Ne bern, North Carolina, from a sketch sent by an amateur, who writes as follows:

Newbern, North Carolina, January 26, 186

I inclose a sketch of a very interesting procession wh came to Newbern from "up country" a few days ago. is the first-fruits of the glorious emancipation procla tion in this vicinity, and as such you may deem it wor of engraving in your illustrated Weekly.

On our late expedition into Greene and Onslow Coun our company (Company C, Fifty-first Massachusetts R ment) was out on picket duty the night before our ret to Newbern, when an old slave came in to us in a dre ing rain; and on being informed that he and his frie could come to Newbern with us, he left, and soon the trabands began to come in, with mule teams, oxen, an every imaginable style. When morning came we had slaves ready to start with their little all, happy in thought that their days of bondage were over. They that it was known far and wide that the President has clared the slaves free.

HEARTS AND HANDS—ST. V.

ALENTINE'S DAY, 1863.

HANDS AND HEARTS.

A Lesson for St. Valentine's Day.

"What now, Alice?" exclaimed Blanche Raymond, tearing into shreds at the same time the delicate-tinted valentine which had absorbed her attention for the last few moments.

"I have arranged the lace as you wish it; do you not think it greatly improved?" and she held up the rich silk with the graceful trimming for the admiration of Blanche, who nervously grasped it, unmindful of the damage to ruches and lace.

"Yes, yes, that will do; now take it away."

"If you have no further need of my services this evening I should like to go home earlier than usual," Alice ventured to say.

"You can not go just yet," replied the proud beauty, "I wish for your undivided attention on some or something done. So you can wait a while."

A crimson flush suffused the cheek and brow of Alice Hastings. Gathering up the rich robe, she quietly passed into the next room to await further orders. Alice had schooled her heart to receive in silence the petty tyranny of her patron. He say she did not feel each bitter word would belie the sensitive nature of one so pure and guileless. Though poor and compelled to work each day, Alice was not unhappy; and when her busy fingers plied the needle through the rich fabric of some exquisite robe destined to deck the graceful figure of Blanche at some grand reception or ball, no jealous feelings came over her heart, no sigh of envy escaped her.

To-day she has been particularly happy, and a bright gleam stole forth from her dark eye, and pleasant memories were lingering over her heart, giving her countenance such a look of sweet content as to excite the envy of Blanche, who had all that mortal could desire but a contented spirit.

Dear reader, if you would learn the reason of Alice's happiness, listen to the little valentine she has hugged all the day long to her beating heart. It is but a rude design, and the uneven characters of the penman show that he is not an accomplished scholar, but the language is that of a true heart, and reads thus:

TO DEAR ALICE

Thy joy shall be my only thought,
Thy excellence my pride;
Thy fate, fair one, shall be my fate,
If thou wilt be my bride.

TRUMAN.

Do you wonder at her happy looks, at that she was anxious to return home early, knowing, as she did, that he, the idol of her heart, would come to make that home a paradise to her? Surely the moments dragged slowly as she sat waiting.

All this while Blanche stood gazing out upon the cold and dreary landscape, her bitterness of spirit unminuffled of Alice. When a neighboring clock tolled the hour of seven Alice began impatient, and at the sound of her name again asked permission to leave, which this time was readily granted.

Quickly the little feet of Alice pit-a-patted over the frozen ground, and soon she reached home. If wealth did not shine out from parlor and hall, there dwelt contented spirits, and the kind welcome she received from the inmates of the day caused her to forget the little annoyances she had to contend with.

Seated by the side of her aged mother before a cheerful fire, her heart was filled with rosy dreams of the future, picturing herself the happy wife of one whose coming she momentarily awaited. Leaving her thus pleasantly occupied, let us return to Blanche Raymond.

Nature to her had been lavish in its gifts. Beheld her as she stands before the mirror arranging her head-dress upon her well-shaped head. What a face to look upon! Beautiful in its chiseled outline! An abundance of soft, wavy hair crowns her polished brow and is shaded by heavy bands at the back. The long brows shade her soft eyes, in whose dreamy depths are shadowed forth all the wild emotions of her untamed spirit. The Grecian nose, the half-parted lips, and rounded chin are as beautiful as some picturel Houri of a poet's dream.

In her own opinion she is exquisite in its appointments that it is a fit habitation for the Queen of Fairy-land, she lingers long after an obsequious servant has announced that his master awaits the word of Mr. Graham. Touching it lightly with her taper fingers, and for one moment glancing at the name in the centre of the pictured screen, she petulantly threw it into the fire. Watching it burn, her lovely form shook with emotion, and, as if angry with herself for the momentary weakness, she exclaimed, "I will not yield to this girlish passion. Oh, why do you return after years of forget-fulness, thinking the world should have as wretched from memory? Why at this moment comes this whisper of discontent, this thrilling tempest of emotion?" Blanche Raymond knows the hand made a vow to forget; but how little can we guess our strength in matters where the heart is concerned! Where find the balm to soothe its bitterness when we feel that all of love is over, when we know that it is wrong to think of the love of the past, when the sound of the footstep must no longer gladden the ear, and the tone of the voice, which had all the power of enchantment, must never fill our hearts again with its sweet music! Closed also must be the gates of memory to every thought of one whom the hand is pledged to another.

In girlhood's happy hours, ere the world had claimed her for its own, Blanche had loved wisely and well; for her cousin Herbert was in every way worthy of the true love of any girl, and he had given her his heart in return—not for a day, month, or year, but forever; for love in him was unchangeable. And in the far-off home there was not a breeze fanned his brow but left him burdened with love for her whom he had left home and kindred to seek fame for her sake; but as years rolled on, Blanche indulged her ambitious views to such an extent that Herbert was seen as a speck upon the horizon of fame, and her eye wandered higher and higher until it rested upon Mr. Graham—one of the great magnates of the land—as one before whom position even her spirit could bow. And with all this she must take his winter of age. There was no elixir in all the catalogue which would once more give the freshness of youth to his face or elasticity to his step.

She must give no answer this evening, and as the moment approaches a sickening dread comes over her, leaving her more an outcast from her own soul than from the world to which she is about to sell herself. Already an hour has elapsed; the interview can be delayed no longer. Clasping a jeweled arm and hand of white and cold, and leading away a tear from her carnation cheek, she descends to the drawing-room and, with a smile upon her lip, glides swiftly to the presence of Mr. Graham's side. Clasping her jeweled hand within his wrinkled palm, he is about to imprint a kiss upon her lips, when she turns aside her head to hide her feelings, and for the moment her thoughts wander to where Herbert, under the blue morning sun, dreams of his betrothed bride, little thinking that she will in that hour barter peace and happiness for fame, and give her life into the keeping of one upon whose wrinkled brow had gathered the frosts of many winters. Leaving her to give her answer, we will once more retrace our steps to the humble home of Alice Hastings.

She had waited but a few minutes ere the well-known step of her lover fell upon her listening ear, and springing to meet him, she was soon folded to his heart, and felt that in all the wide world there was no love of true devotion, no sympathy so sacred for all her hopes and fears as his faithful bosom. And with his strong arm around her, she took with confidence into his keeping a heart that feels that not one of the thousand cords he had woven around her heart would ever know blight or mildew so long as they were true.

Looking down in her up-turned face, he said: "Alice, I have loved you long and well; I know the purity of your life, and my companionship with you has taught me much that has made me what I am. Will you be mine, one and inseparable forever?" The soft response of the head on his manly breast told the story of these loving hearts forever.

Ere many months had elapsed two weddings were celebrated.

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK.

By the Author of "Mary Barton," etc.

With Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER VII.

ELLINOR was awakened by a rapping at her door; it was her maid.

She was half aroused in a moment, for she had fallen asleep with one clearly-defined plan in her mind, only one of her thoughts and cares having no relation to the terrible events we as though they had never been. All her purpose was to shield her from suspicion. And to do this she must control herself—her mind, and body must be ruled to this one end.

So she said firmly:

"Let me lie half an hour longer; and beg Miss Monro not to wait breakfast for me; but let her have an hour from me up a cup of strong tea, for I have a bad headache."

Mason went away. Ellinor sprang up, rapidly undressed herself, and got into bed again; so that when her maid returned with her breakfast there was no appearance of the night having been passed in any unusual manner.

"How ill you do look, Miss!" said Mason.

"I am sure you had better not get up yet."

Ellinor thought: "Is my self-control bad yet shown himself; but this question—so natural at any other time—seemed to her so suspicious under the circumstances, that she could not trust her lips to frame it. At any rate, she must get up and struggle to make the day like all other days. So she rose, and when she did not feel very well, but trying to make light of it, and when she could think of nay thing but the one woe, to say to Mason's questions. But she could not recollect how she behaved in general, for her life hitherto had been simple, and led without any consciousness of effort.

Before she was dressed a message came up to say that Mr. Livingstone was in the drawing-room.

Mr. Livingstone! He belonged to the old world of yesterday, with its billows of the night that swept over his mark on the sands of her memory; and it was only by a strong effort that she could remember who he was—what he wanted. She sent Mason down to inquire from the servant who admitted him whom it was that he had asked for.

"He asked for master first. But master has not rung for his water yet, so James told him he was not up. Then he asked for mistress for a while, and asked could he speak to you—he would wait if you were not at liberty, but that he wished particularly to see Mr. Dunster or you. So James asked him to sit down in the drawing-room, and he would let you know.

"I must go," thought Ellinor. "I will send him away directly; to come thinking of marriage to a house like this—to-day too!"

And she went down hastily, and in a hard, unsparing mood, toward a man whose affection for her, she thought, was like a gourd, grown up in a night, and of no account but as a piece of foolish, brash excitement.

She never thought of her own appearance—she had dressed without looking in the glass. Her only object was to dismiss her would-be suitor as speedily as possible. All feelings of shyness, awkwardness, or maiden modesty were quenched and overcome. In she went.

He was standing by the mantelpiece as she entered. He made a step or two forward to meet her, and then stopped, petrified, as it were, at the sight of her hard white face.

"Miss Wilkins, I am afraid you are ill! I have come too early; but I have to leave Hamley in half an hour, and I thought— Oh, Miss Wilkins! what have I done—"

For she sank into the chair nearest to her, as if overcome by his words; but, indeed, it was by the impression of her own thoughts: she was hardly conscious of his presence.

He came a step or two nearer, as if he longed to take her hand, or support her with his arm; but she rather; but she stiffened herself and arose, and by an effort walked toward the fire-place, and there stood, as if waiting to hear what he would say next. But he was overwhelmed by her aspect of illness. He almost forgot his own wishes, his own suit, in the desire to relieve her from the pain, physical or, he believed it, under which she was suffering. It was she who had to begin the subject.

"I received your letter yesterday, Mr. Livingstone. I was anxious to see you to-day, in order that I might prevent you from speaking to my father. I do not see any thing of the kind of affection you can feel for me—me, whom you have only seen once. All I shall say is that the sooner we both forget what I must call folly the better."

She took the airs of a woman considerably older and more experienced than himself. He thought her haughty; she was only miserable.

"You are mistaken," said he, more quietly, and with more dignity than was likely from his previous conduct. "I will not allow you to misconceive me. I fully expected to be presumptuous on my part. I had no business to presume myself so soon; but which in its foundation was true and sincere. I ask no answer for a month," solemnly. It is a possible though it may not be a usual thing for a man to feel so strongly attracted by the mind and qualities of a woman, even at first sight, as to feel sure that she, and she alone, can make his happiness. My dear Miss Wilkins, you are right—you were dreaming that you could return my feelings in the slightest degree, when you had only seen me once. And I am most truly ashamed of myself. I can not tell you how sorry I am, when I see how you have compelled yourself to come and speak to me when you are so ill."

She staggered into a chair; for, with all her wish for his speedy dismissal, she was obliged to be seated. He put his hand out upon the bell.

"No, don't!" she said. "Wait a minute."

His eyes, bent upon her, with a look of deep anxiety, turned away at that moment, and she was on the point of shedding tears; but she checked herself, and rose again.

"I will tell you. It is the kindest thing I can do. Only, may I write? May I venture to write, and urge what I have to say more coherently?"

"No," said she. "Don't write. I have given you my answer. We are nothing, and can be nothing to each other. I am engaged to be married. I should not have told you if you had not been so kind. Thank you. Now go now."

The young man's face fell, and he became almost as white as she was for the instant. After a moment's reflection he took her hand in his, and said,

"May God bless you, and him too, whoever he may be, for he must be a most a friend, I may be that friend, may I not? and try to prove that my words of regard were true in a better and higher sense than you could think at first." And, kissing her passive hand, he was gone, and she was left sitting alone.

But already she was not what she could bear. She went quickly up stairs, and took a strong dose of sal volatile, even while she heard Miss Monro calling at the door.

"My dear, who was that gentleman that has been closeted with you in the drawing-room all this time?"

And then, without listening to Ellinor's reply, she went on—

"Why, Mason has been here" (it was at Mrs. Jackson's house that Mr. Dunster lodged), "wanting to know if we could tell her where Mr. Dunster was. She has been home last night, it all. And you were in the drawing-room with —who did you say he was?—that Mr. Livingstone. Ellinor, you have been at a better place, and hid good-by, and he has never dined here, had he? so I don't see any reason he had to come bothering us. Mason, if your papa was up, go up. So I said to Mrs. Jackson, 'I'll send and ask Mr. Wilkins if you like, but I don't see any reason why he should tell you just as well as any body that Mr. Dunster is not in this house, wherever he may be, and that nothing would astonish me but that some one must go and look up your papa, and ask if he could tell where Mr. Dunster was.'

"And did papa?" inquired Ellinor, her dry throat huskily forming the inquiry that seemed to be expected of her.

"No! to be sure not. How should Mr. Wilkins know? As I said to Mrs. Jackson, 'Mr. Wilkins has had Mr. Dunster's address where Mr. Dunster was his time when he is not in the office, for they do not move in the same rank of life, my good woman!' and Mrs. Jackson apologized, but said that yesterday they had both been dining at Mr. Hodgson's together, she believed; and somehow she had got it into her head that Mr. Dunster might have missed his way in coming along Moor Lane, and might have slipped into the canal; so she just thought she would step up and ask Mr. Wilkins if they had left Mr. Hodgson's together, or if your papa had driven home. So I asked her why she had not told me all these particulars before, for I could have asked your papa myself all about when he last saw Mr. Dunster; and I went up to ask him a second time, but he did not like it at all, for he was busy dressing, and I'm sure I don't wonder at gentlemen thumping a door, and he could not always hear me at first."

"What did he say?"

"Oh! he had walked part of the way with Mr. Dunster, and then cut across by the short path through the fields, as far as he said I was to send him through the door. He seemed very much annoyed to hear that Mr. Dunster had not been at home all night; but he said I was to tell Mrs. Jackson that he would go to the office as soon as he had had his breakfast, which he ordered to be sent up directly after his own room, and he had no doubt it would all turn out right; but that he had better go home at once. And, as I told her, she might find Mr. Dunster there by the time she got there."

"There, there is your papa going out! He has not lost any time over his breakfast!"

Ellinor had taken up the Hamley Examiner, a daily paper, which lay on the table by her knee in the first instance; but it served a second purpose, as she glanced languidly over the columns of the advertisements.

"Oh! here are Colonel Macdonald's orchidaceous plants to be sold! All the stock of hot-house and stove-plants at Hartwell Park! I must send James over to Hartwell to attend the sale. It is to last for three days."

"But can he be spared for so long?"

"Oh yes; he had better stay at the little inn there, to be on the spot. Three days;" and as she spoke she ran out to the garden, where she was sweeping up the newly-mown grass in the front of the house. She gave him hasty and unlimited directions, only seeming desirous if any one had been suspiciously watching her words and actions—to hurry him off to the distant village where the auction was to take place.

When he was once gone she breathed more freely. Now no one but the three cognizant of the terrible reality, of the disturbance of the turf under the trees in a certain spot in the belt round the flower-garden, could be likely to go into the place. Miss Monro might wander round with a book in her hand; but she never noticed any thing, and was absorbed into the book again. Three days of this moist, warm, growing weather, and the green grass would spring, just as if there was what it had been twenty-four hours before.

When all this was done and said it seemed as if Ellinor's strength and spirit sank down at once. Her voice became feeble, her aspect wan; and although she told Miss Monro that nothing was the matter, yet it was impossible for any one who loved her not to perceive that she was far from well. The kind governess placed her papil on the sofa, covered her feet up with a shawl, darkened the room, and then stole out on tip-toe, fancying that Ellinor would sleep. Her eyes were, indeed, closed; but by no means as she supposed in quiet, she was up in less than five minutes after Miss Monro had left the room, and walking up and down with all the restless agony of which fear arises from an overstrained mind. But soon Miss Monro reappeared, bringing with her a dose of soothing medicine for her own convincing, for she was great in domestic quackery. What the medicine was Ellinor did not care to know; she drank it without any sign of her mind's nervy resistance to physic of Miss Monro's ordering; and as the latter took up a book and showed a due purpose of remaining with her patient, Ellinor was compelled to lie still, and presently fell asleep.

She wakened late in the afternoon with a start. Her father was standing over her, listening to Miss Monro's account of her indisposition. She only caught one glimpse of his strangely-altered countenance, and hid her head in the cushions and shut it from observation; not from love. For in an instant she must have conjectured the interpretation he was likely to put upon her shrinking shame, and she had turned toward him and had thrown her arms round his neck, and was kissing his cold, passive face. Then she fell back. Even all this time their sad eyes met, because they dreaded the look of recollection that must be in each other's gaze.

"There, my dear!" said Miss Monro. "Now you must lie still till I fetch you a little broth. You are better now, are not you?"

"You must not go for the broth, Miss Monro," said Mr. Wilkins, ringing the bell. "Fletcher can surely bring it." He dreaded the being left alone with his daughter—and she felt it less. She heard the strange alteration in her father's voice, hard and hoarse, as if it was long since he had used it. The mental signs of his suffering cut her to the heart; and yet she wondered how it was that they could both be there, and that every day was not rending their garments and crying aloud. Mr. Wilkins seemed to have lost the power of conversation, except through his servant. He wished to leave the room now his anxiety about his daughter was relieved, but really hated to be left alone. He was obliged to think about the veriest trifle in order that, by an effort of reason, he might understand what he should say when spoken to; and he had been free from blood-guiltiness. Ellinor understood all by intuition. But henceforward the unspoken comprehension of each other's hidden motions made their mutual presence a burden to some anxiety to each. Miss Monro was a relief; they were glad of her as a third person, unconscious of the secret which constrained them. This afternoon her unconsciousness was present also, although not after reflection each found in her speeches a cause of rejoicing.

"And Mr. Dunster, Mr. Wilkins, had he come home yet?"

A moment's pause, in which Mr. Wilkins pumped the words out of his husky throat.

"I have not heard. I have been riding. I went on business to Mr. Estcourt's. Perhaps you will be so kind as to send and inquire at Mrs. Jackson's."

Ellinor sickened at the words. She had been all her life a truthful, plain-spoken girl. She held herself high above deceit. Yet here came the necessity for deceit—a snare spread around her. She had not revolted so much from the deed which brought unpremeditated death as she did from these words of her father's. The night before, in her mad fever of affright, she had fancied that to conceal the body was all that would be required; she had not looked forward to the long weary course of small lies, to be done and said, involved in that one mistaken action. Yet, while her father's words made her soul revolt, his appearance melted her heart as she caught it, half turned away from him, neither looking straight at Miss Monro nor at any thing materially else. His hollow, sunk eye seemed to Eldine's fancy a vision of the dead man before it. His cheek was livid and worn, and its healthy coloring, gained by years of prosperous door occupancy, was all gone into the wanness of age. His hair even, to Eldine, seemed greyer for the past night of wretchedness. He stooped, and looked dreamily earthward, where formerly he had stood erect. It needed all the pity called forth by such observation to quench Eldine's passionate contempt for the course on which she and her father were embarked when she heard him repeat his words to the servant who came with her broth.

"Fletcher, go to Mrs. Jackson's and inquire if Mr. Bumpster is come home yet. I want to speak to him."

"To him!" lying dead where he had been laid; killed by the man who now stood in her presence. Eldine shut her eyes, and lay back in despair. She wished she might die, and be out of this horrible tangle of events.

Two minutes after she was conscious of her father and Miss Monro stealing softly out of the room. They thought that she slept.

She sprang off the sofa and knelt down.

"O God! she prayed; "Thou knowest! Help me! There is none other help but Thee!"

I suppose she fainted. For the next scene afterward, Miss Monro, coming in, found her lying insensible by the side of the sofa.

She was carried to bed. She was not delirious, she was in a stupor, which they feared might end in delirium. To obviate this, her father sent for and wide for skillful physicians, who tended her at the side of each other for a little minute.

People said how hard it was upon Mr. Wilkins, that hardly had that wretch Dunster gone off, with no one knows how much out of the trusts of the firm, before his only child fell ill. Then to tell the truth, he himself looked burned and scared with affliction. He had a startled look, they said, as if he never could tell after one experience, from which side the awful proofs of the uncertainty of earth would appear, the terrible pleasantness of unforeseen dress. The old and poor, town and country, sympathized with him. The rich cared not to press their claims, or their business, at such a time; and were considered in their superficial talk, after dinner, how such a good fellow as Wilkins could ever have been deceived by a man like Dunster. Even Sir Frank Holster and his lady forgot their old quarrel, and came to inquire after Eldine, and sent her hot-house fruit by the basket.

Mr. Corbet behaved as an anxious lover should do. He wrote daily to Miss Monro to beg for the most minute bulletins: he postponed everything in town that any doctor even fancied might be of service. He came down as soon as there was the slightest hint of permission that Eldine might see him. He overpowered her with tender words and caresses, till at last she shrank away from them, as from something that was irritating, and past all right comprehension.

But one night before this, when all windows and doors stood open to admit the least breath that stirred the sultry July air, a servant on velvet tips let Wallen up to Eldine's open door, and had beckoned out of the chamber of the sleeper the ever watchful nurse, Miss Monro.

"A gentleman wants you," were the words the housemaid dared to say so close to the bedroom. And softly, softly Miss Monro stepped down the stairs into the drawing-room, and there she saw Mr. Livingstone. But she did not know him; she had never seen him before.

"I have waited all day. I hoped she was ill—was dying. May I just have one more look at her? I will not speak; I will hardly breathe. Only let me see her once again!"

"I beg your pardon, Sir, but I don't know who you are; and if you mean Miss Wilkins by 'her,' she is ill, but we hope and trust that she was very ill, indeed, yesterday; very dangerously ill, I may say, but she is having a good sleep, in consequence of a soporific medicine, and we are really beginning to hope—"

But just here Miss Monro's hand was taken, and, to her infinite surprise, was kissed before she could remember how improper such behavior was.

"God bless you, Madam, for saying so. But if she sleeps, will you let me see her; it can do no harm, and I will tread as if on egg-shells. And I have come so far—if I might just look on her sweet face. Pray, Madam, let me just have one sight of her. I will not ask for more."

But he did ask for more, after he had had his wish. He stole up stairs after Miss Monro, who looked round reproachfully at him, for every irregular sang, or an owl hooted in the trees outside the open windows, yet who paused to say herself, outside Mr. Wilkins's chamber-door.

"Her father's room; he has not been in bed for six nights till to-night; pray do not make a noise to waken him." And on into the deep stillness of the hushed room, where one clear ray of hidden lamp-light shot athwart the floor, where a watcher, breathing softly, sat beside the bed—where Eldine's dark head lay motionless on the white pillow, her face almost as white. Her form almost as still, you might have heard a pin fall. After a while he moved to withdraw.

Miss Monro, jealous of every sound, followed him, with steps all the more heavy because they were taken with so much care down the stairs, back into the drawing-room. By the bed-candle flaring in the draught she saw that there was the glittering mark of wet tears on his cheek; and she felt, as she said afterward, "sorry for the young man." And yet she urged him to go, for she knew that she might be wanted up stairs. He took her hand, and wrung it hard.

"Thank you. She looked so changed—oh! she looked as though she were dead. You will write — Herbert Livingstone, Langham Terrace, Yorkshire; you will promise me to write. If I could do any thing for her, but I can but wait. Oh, my darling! my darling! and I have no right to be with her."

"Go away, there's a good young man," said Miss Monro, all the more pressing to hurry him out by the front door, because she was afraid of his emotion overmastering him, and making him break in his solemn promise. "Yes, I will write; I will write, never fear!" and she bolted the door behind him, and was thankful.

Two minutes after and there was a low tap; she undid the fastenings, and there he stood, pale in the moonlight.

"Please don't tell her I came to ask about her: she might not like it."

"No, no! not I! Poor creature, she's not likely to see to hear of any one for long while. She never roused at Mr. Corbet's name."

"Mr. Corbet's!" said Livingstone, below his breath, and he turned away from her in his trouble for good. But Eldine recovered. She knew she was recovering, when day after day she felt involuntary strength flowing into her limbs. Her body seemed stronger than her will; for that would have induced her to creep into her grave, and shut her eyes forever on this world, so full of troubles.

She lay, for the most part, with her eyes closed, very still and quiet; but she thought with the intensity of one who seeks for lost peace and can not find it. She began to see that it in the mad impulses of the moment, when she and her they had all strengthened each other, and dared to be frank and open, confessing a great fault, a greater danger, and a greatest relief, that the first instance was hardly a crime—their future crime, perhaps, and any thing would have been a simple and straightforward one to them. But it was not for her to undo what was done, and to cover the dead out of sight of her father. Only she, turning anew to God, in the solemn and quiet watches of the night, made a covenant, that for ourselves and our individual life, she would act loyally and truthfully. And as for the future, and all the terrible chances involved in the secret kept from all His hands—if, indeed (and here came in the Tempter), He would watch over one whose life thereafter must be passed in deceit, for the original sin, offered "standing afar off," was, "the lie is said and done and over—it was not for my own sake. Can Him by eyes so severe as the sights of justice and truth as to demand of me that I should reveal my father's guilt?"

His father's sorrow, his remorse, began. He knew why she suffered, what made her young strength falter and tremble, what made her life seem nigh about to be given back to Him, as he could not take his sorrow and care in the natural manner. He was obliged to think how every word and deed might be misunderstood. He fancied that people were watching him with suspicious eyes, when nothing was further from their thoughts. For one thing, he had chosen to look "Awful evenin', sin't it? Thank'ee, I will set a bit nearer to the fire—can't stay but a minute though. Pretty smart, eh? Spite o' the horrid the news?"

"News? no—what news is there?" said Ruth, rather haughtily, for she felt but little interest in such village gossip as the widow Elbury was wont to retail.

"Why, do tell! You hain't heerd, then? Widder Gray's dead—she 's was Anne Moss, you know Walter Gray's mother."

"I know whom you mean," said Ruth, mechanically biting her lip till the blood came.

"Yes, poor soul—been ailed a good a last. She always was a shiftless consarn—and that boy o' hern will have to go to the poor-house, for there isn't a cent to bless herself. Anne was quite a-pull, and doctors' bills do mount up so. He's a pooty boy enough—eight year old last June, jest the picter o' his father, they used to be. Any remember what a chirky feller he was? Folks used to say one while he was courtin' you!"

The widow looked sharply at Ruth to see how she took this house-thrust; but Ruth quietly seamed away at the heel of her blue worsted stocking, and the widow was disappointed.

"Ain't that Steve Rogers's lumber-wagon I hear comin' down the hill? 'Tis, sure enough! Well, Ann, I'm sorry for the poor widder, but I calculated on gittin' a ride over to my sister Almiry's with Steve. Good-evenin'. Do come over and see us a day with our folks!"

Ruth came in from seeing her talkative guest safe into the wagon, and sat down by the window, and stood a moment before the fire, listening to the wild wind.

"Poor Gray's child cast upon the tender mercies of the Poor-House!" she thought, again and again. "I prayed years ago that I might live to see myself revenged: the prayer is falsified; and yet—"

Ah, Ruth, in the fulfillment of such prayers there is but the bitterness of Marah!

"It can not—must not be!" she exclaimed, hysterically, a moment afterward. "I loved Walter once: I can not see his child suffer."

Ruth tied on her little brown bonnet, wrapped the worsted shawl with trembling fingers around her, and went out into the rain and sleet of that dreary, dreary night.

RUTH HOLLIDAY'S VALENTINE.

HARK! was that elfish sound only the wail of the November wind upon the snow-covered hillside? or was it something more than human? Ruth Holliday shivered involuntarily as she sat all alone in front of her bright hearth-stone knitting with mechanical rapidity.

"I must be getting nervous," she murmured to herself. But she rose, nevertheless, to close the window-shutters—as if that could exclude the melancholy moan of the autumn illness—and to replace the blazing fore-stick which had fallen from the bright iron dogs and lay among smouldering sparks and ashes upon the red brick hearth.

All alone, we said, for she was one of that much mentioned class of society—old maids! You might have discovered that for yourself with one glance round the neat little room, where the boards of the floor on either side the hearth-rug had been carpeted with white satin, and the fringe to the window-curtains looked like netted snow! And there was a kitchen, too, where the black-leaded stove actually winked at you with brightness, and the fat copper tea-kettle sat side by side with a brass-pan full of simmering apples, and the overflowing tin pail of "tatter" which was to resolve itself the next morning into golden-brown buckwheat cakes. Ruth Holliday's youthful prettiness and bloom, and "crows-feet" lurked under her eyes, and at the corners of her mouth. Ruth Holliday might have been eleven years or more or less in not for the sad, almost bitter expression that characterized her face.

For to-night, while the melancholy wind sighed in the hollows, and gusts of sleet tinkled ever and anon against the window-panes, something had set her to thinking of old times—of the St. Valentine's eves when she was a rosy girl, and Walter Gray used to sit beside her at the same hearth and hold the ball of yarn while she knit as she was knitting now—of her first Valentine, slipped under the window, while the sweet lilacs just reddening above the forests, and Walter Gray lingered

"——at the casement waiting
To hear the first love-greeting."

How vividly they all came back to her! the days when he was her sweet-heart at singing-school and apple bee, and the neighboring girls used to tease her about the "handsome sailor," and her cheeks were redder than the red-hearted shells he used to bring her from these long, long cruises!

Well, it was over now. They had quarrelled on some slight pretext—Walter had married Anne Moss, and she—she was an old maid! Yet when the news had come—come with the May breezes and sunshine—of his death amidst the shot and hail of that fatal engine on the Inner Reef, Ruth felt as if she too were bereaved as well as the pale, indolent Anne, whom she hated so fiercely in her heart. Ruth had said over, day after day, how never would forgive either Walter or Anne—and she had kept her word.

Ruth's name had was plying the rusty iron knocker without, and Ruth rose to undo the latch.

"Why, Mrs. Elbury, is it you?"

"Yes, it is," said the widow Elbury, emerging from under the shadow of her green hood and scarlet blanket shawl, shriveled and wrinkled, as one might have fancied Old Age herself to look.

"Awful evenin', ain't it? Thank'ee, I will set a bit nearer to the fire—can't stay but a minute though. Pretty smart, eh? Spite o' the horrid the news?"

"News? no—what news is there?" said Ruth, rather haughtily, for she felt but little interest in such village gossip as the widow Elbury was wont to retail.

"Why, do tell! You hain't heerd, then? Widder Gray's dead—she 's was Anne Moss, you know Walter Gray's mother."

"I know whom you mean," said Ruth, mechanically biting her lip till the blood came.

"Yes, poor soul—been ailed a good a last. She always was a shiftless consarn—and that boy o' hern will have to go to the poor-house, for there isn't a cent to bless herself. Anne was quite a-pull, and doctors' bills do mount up so. He's a pooty boy enough—eight year old last June, jest the picter o' his father, they used to be. Any remember what a chirky feller he was? Folks used to say one while he was courtin' you!"

The widow looked sharply at Ruth to see how she took this house-thrust; but Ruth quietly seamed away at the heel of her blue worsted stocking, and the widow was disappointed.

"Ain't that Steve Rogers's lumber-wagon I hear comin' down the hill? 'Tis, sure enough! Well, Ann, I'm sorry for the poor widder, but I calculated on gittin' a ride over to my sister Almiry's with Steve. Good-evenin'. Do come over and see us a day with our folks!"

Ruth came in from seeing her talkative guest safe into the wagon, and sat down by the window, and stood a moment before the fire, listening to the wild wind.

"Poor Gray's child cast upon the tender mercies of the Poor-House!" she thought, again and again. "I prayed years ago that I might live to see myself revenged: the prayer is falsified; and yet—"

Ah, Ruth, in the fulfillment of such prayers there is but the bitterness of Marah!

"It can not—must not be!" she exclaimed, hysterically, a moment afterward. "I loved Walter once: I can not see his child suffer."

Ruth tied on her little brown bonnet, wrapped the worsted shawl with trembling fingers around her, and went out into the rain and sleet of that dreary, dreary night.

Up through the desolate wall of the tempest rose the feeble treble of a child's voice, crying out,

"Must I go to the poor-house?" Oh, mother! mother! why did you die and leave me all alone?"

There was a touch on his shoulder; he shrank back, sobbing and shuddering.

"Oh, not yet! I can not go to the poor-house yet!"

"My boy," said Ruth, softly, "you shall not go at all. Hereafter you shall share my home with me, and be my adopted child!"

Little Walter, looking up through his father's eyes, clung fondly round the old maid's neck; to him she was as beautiful as an angel at that moment.

He ate his supper that night at Ruth Holliday's hearth-stone—white milk, new bread, and Ruth's choicest cranberry preserves—and he played with the light of a new smile illuminating her face.

The old maid had found something to live for.

So the old year died out in white drifts of snow stained with the crimson fire of many sunsets. Ruth made a pilgrimage with little Walter one clear January evening to the church-yard on the hill; but none of the neighbors ever guessed who hung the wreath of golden immortelle over the rude stone that marked Anne Moss's neglected grave.

St. Valentine's Eve—a night of keen wind and driving snow—and the strange pair were sitting together at the cozy hearth, keeping silence and talking by turns.

"Aunt Ruth," said the boy—thus she had learned him to call her—"do you hear the wind? It sounds like a person crying out in pain."

We are warm and snug here, Walter," said Ruth.

"I was thinking," resumed the child, "what a dreadful gale this must be at sea. Aunt Ruth, when I'm a big man, I want to be a sailor, like my father."

Ruth did not answer; she only pressed Walter's hand closer in hers, and he felt the soft palm trembling.

Suddenly there was a step on the floor beside them: some one had entered unheard in the groanings of the storm. Ruth uttered a shriek, as she saw the tall sun-burnt man standing in their midst, then sprang wildly to her feet.

"Walter can it be Walter?"

"Yes, Ruth, it is Walter, and he has heard it all—how you have been a mother to his poor motherless boy. Ruth, I never thought to have stood beside you alive again. I have passed through the Valley of the Shadow of Death; and I thought of you all cheerfully—ay, even gladly—had I looked forward to this.

What a troubled, joyous evening that was!—troubled through its very excess of gladness; and when at length little Walter's heavy eyelids drooped, and he was laid in his little bed at the fireside, Gray rose, reluctantly, to depart.

"Ruth," he said, clasping her hand, as they stood together by the window, "Ruth, dear Ruth, will you be Walter's mother in reality, as well as in tenderness? Will you be my wife, dear Ruth? Ah! look not away from me with such a frown! I was your boy-Valentine, but I love you more dearly than ever, for I have learned your worth. Will you marry me, Ruth?"

When Ruth came back to rouse little Walter and put him to bed he opened his sleepy eyes wide at the lovely smile on her face.

"Why, Aunt Ruth, your cheeks are like that monthly rose in the window. What is the matter?"

But Aunt Ruth, perverse for once in her life, could not answer him.

Verily, the ancient prophecy concerning such things had been fulfilled, and it happened that Ruth Holliday's first Valentine was her last.

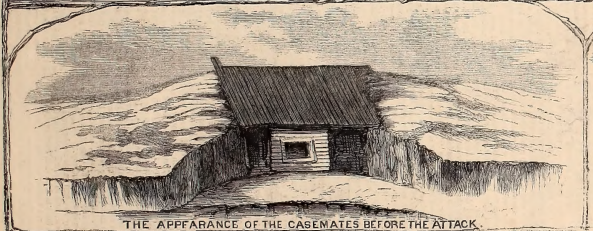
ATTACK ON FORT HINDMAN.

WE are indebted to Mr. Stellwagen, of the Bureau of Ordnance at Washington, for the drawings of the ATTACK ON FORT HINDMAN, at Arkansas Post, which we reproduce on page 124. We have, together with a picture of the Fort, in our number before last, a full description of the work and of our attack upon it, and do not deem it necessary to repeat them again.

THE ATTACK ON FORT MALLISTER.

On page 125 we publish an illustration of the attack of the iron-clad gun-boat Montauk on Fort M'Allister, in the Ogeechee River, on the 28th January. Our picture is from a sketch by an officer of the Dawn. The Montauk was not disabled, as reported by the rebels. She received seventeen shots in her side and twelve on her turret, without receiving any injury whatever, although engaged for five hours. She returned to her anchorage for want of shells. It being foggy next morning she did not return to the attack.

The Herald correspondent thus describes Fort M'Allister:



FORT M'ALLISTER is casemated, and is a strong-built, bomb-proof fort on the Ogeechee River. Shells from the Union fleet could easily be seen bursting inside, and the enemy's forces could be seen running to and fro, but not effectively manned. A brigade from Savannah is reported to have reached the fort on the morning of Thursday, and the battery around is alive with cavalry and infantry.

Of the performance of the Montauk he says:

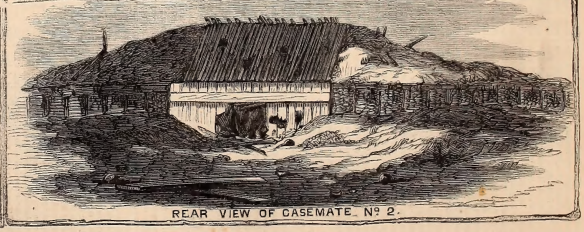
It is said that the Montauk fired in all seventy-six shots, and was struck forty-five times, forty striking the turret, making no further impression than an indentation in the iron from three-eighths to five-eighths of an inch deep, and dinged like a saucer. The enemy's shots were filled with sand to render them more effective, and, when they struck, burst like a percussion cap, exploding the iron and sand around. It is said that one shell entered the smoke-stack of the Montauk, thereby setting fire to her, but no injury to the fort was done than the dismounting of one gun and two.



The attack would be renewed as soon as the obstructions in the river were removed.

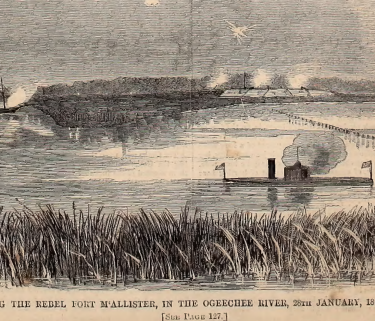
FORT HINDMAN, AT ARKANSAS POST, ARKANSAS.—FROM DRAWINGS AND PHOTOGRAPHS FURNISHED BY THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.—[SEE PAGE 123.]

OUR ARTIST "CORRESPONDENT AT LARGE."

MR. J. ROSS BROWNE is well known by name and works to the literary world. His contributions to Harper's Magazine would fill several volumes. Like most men possessing the faculty of humor, he is fond of caricaturing himself, and he appears in a variety of questionable disguises in his own sketches. The above portrait, for which we are indebted to Mr. Cramer, a young American artist, residing at Frankfort in Germany, barring a slight touch of caricature, is a capital likeness of the man who visited Crusoe's Island, discovered Yusef Badra, "The Destroyer of Robbers," travelled with Doctor Mendoza, "Peeped at Washoe," made a "Dangerous Journey" in California, visited Norway, Poland, Iceland, Russia, and several other countries in behalf of Harper's Magazine, where not a few of his varied adventures have been recorded, and where more, we trust, will be narrated. During more than twenty years of almost constant travel he has supported himself and a large family, and made his way in almost every capacity within the limits of human industry. His journeyings by land and sea amount already to more than six times around the world—no trifling achievement when we consider the various methods of travel which he has adopted. Mr. Browne is a native of Ireland. A generation ago his father was the editor of the Dublin Comet, the leading paper of the day in Ireland. Taking strong ground against the oppressive acts of the English Government, his paper was suppressed and he was thrown into prison. A book written by him called "The Parson's Horn-book," illustrated by Samuel Lover, gained a wide notoriety, and may even now be met with. The elder Browne was finally released from imprisonment on condition of leaving the country. He came to America in 1833, bringing with him his family, among whom was John Ross, then a mere lad. He struck for the Far West, settled in Indiana, where he established himself as the owner of a sawmill and proprietor of a ferry; subsequently he removed to Louisville, Kentucky, where he became editor of a newspaper, in connection with which his son's literary faculties received their first definite impulse.

MR. J. ROSS BROWNE, OUR ARTIST "CORRESPONDENT AT LARGE."

Mr. Browne commenced his adventurous career by starting from Louisville, Kentucky, on foot, and making a tour of several months through the Western States. He made several trading voyages down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers in the capacity of a common boatman. At the age of eighteen he became police reporter to the Louisville Advertiser; then a student in the College of Medicine; and subsequently a stenographic reporter in Congress. In 1842, having saved up fifteen dollars, he started for Europe, put up at the Astor House, and got rid of the last remnant of his money in about two days. He then went down on South Street, saw a sign calling for whalemen, and shipped on a voyage to the Indian Ocean. Browne was one of a crew of thirteen men, chiefly Portuguese, and lived in the forecastle, subject to all the benefits of hard fare and harder labor. During this memorable voyage he visited the Azores, Cape de Verde, and Canary Islands; Madagascar, Makumba, and the Comoros; and finally, on the breaking out of a mutiny, occasioned by cruel treatment of the crew, left the vessel at Zanzibar, near the East Coast of Africa, and lived for three months among the Arabs. From Zanzibar he worked his passage home in a vessel bound to the United States from the Persian Gulf; and touched on the way at St. Helena, where he paid a visit to Napoleon's tomb. Of his perilous adventures in the whale-fishery he has given a graphic account in a narrative published by Harper and Brothers in 1844, entitled "Etchings of a Whaling Cruise," which has been noticed by the Edinburgh Review and other English journals in favorable terms.



Resuming his place as a reporter in the Senate, he followed up his old business till the end of the session, when he took charge of the books in the office of the Ohio Statesman, at Columbus. About that time Mr. Robert J. Walker became Secretary of the Treasury and gave Browne a confidential appointment. This he held until 1849, when he set sail in a passenger ship for California, under a commission as a Lieutenant in the Revenue Service. At Rio Janeiro he was detained some three weeks by a difficulty between the captain and passengers. A new captain was placed in command, and after many storms and adversities the ship rounded Cape Horn, and made the Island of Juan Fernandez. With ten comrades Browne started in an open boat, rowed seventy-six miles, and landed on the island. His adventures in this "Crusoe Land" were published, with illustrations, in the February, March, and April numbers of Harper's Magazine for 1853.

Stopping a couple of weeks at Lima, in Peru, he reached California in August, 1849, with just sufficient change in his pockets to pay the postage on a package of letters. One of them contained notice of a reduction in the revenue service and his own removal. While looking around for a situation as washer-man or mule-driver, he met an influential friend who appointed him a deputy Postal Agent, and he traveled through the southern part of California in that capacity. When the Convention met to form the State Constitution, Browne being the only regular stenographer in the country, was appointed to report the proceedings. For this job he received ten thousand dollars cash in advance. During the debate in the United States Senate, relative to the admission of California, it became necessary to have this report, and the Senate, by resolution, purchased two thousand copies, for which they paid our lucky adventurer three thousand dollars. With the fortune thus acquired, he built a handsome house near Washington, and "retired" for life.

Three months of retirement answered his purpose. He sold out for cost, pulled up stakes, and started for Europe. We next find him, by letters to the National Intelligencer, ranging through Austria, Hungary, the various German States, Italy, Sicily, Greece, Turkey, and the Holy Land. His adventures in Syria and Palestine have been given to the world in a popular book entitled "Yusef—a Crusade in the East," issued by the Harpers in 1853. Yusef Badra, the renowned dragoman who conducted Mr. Browne through Syria, is the most perfect type of his class in our literature. Kinglake's Demetri can not be compared with him. He was a real character, a little idealized perhaps, and might have made his fortune from the celebrity which Browne gave to him, only he fell into bad ways, and after visiting America in charge of some Arabian horses, returned to Beirut, where he died three or four years ago. If we were to select the five most readable books of Eastern travel, we should hesitate whether the first place should be given to Browne's "Yusef" or Kinglake's "Eothen." The third place certainly belongs to Warburton's "Crescent and Cross;" the fourth and fifth place may be fairly contested by Curtis's "Howadji" and Prime's "Tent Life."

On his return from this extensive tour he went to Washington, received an appointment as General Inspector of Custom-houses and Public Depositories; and in that capacity visited all the Collection Districts in the United States, including those of Minnesota, California, Oregon, and Washington Territory.

In 1855 he bought a small ranche, and settled in California, and for the ensuing five years was Special Agent of the Treasury and Interior Departments for the Pacific Coast; and visited all the Indian Tribes, and nearly every acre of ground between the Straits of Fuca and San Diego. He has made altogether six trips to and from California. Before the close of the Buchanan Administration he got himself into trouble with the powers at Washington for exposing the frauds committed in the public service. A spirited account of this part of his career is given in an article on "The Indian Reservations," in the August Number of Harper's Magazine, 1861. On losing his official head he buckled on his pack and blanket, and started on foot for the Silver Mines of Washoe, where he set up an Agency. His hardships, trials, and misfortunes there are amusingly described in a series of papers entitled "A Peep at Washoe," also published in Harper's Magazine. In 1860 he left the Pacific Coast for Europe; and during the last two years and a half has traveled on foot nearly all through Germany; made tours through Spain, Portugal, and Algeria; Poland, Russia, Sweden, and Norway; and Lastly, Denmark, and Iceland. Various sketches of his adventures in these interesting regions have appeared, illustrated by himself.

THE IRON-CLAD "MONTAUK" ENGAGING THE REBEL FORT M'ALLISTER, IN THE OGEECHEE RIVER, 28TH JANUARY, 1863.—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF THE "DAWN."

[SEE PAGE 127.]

Mr. Browne has all the requisites for a traveler —indomitable courage, unfailing perseverance, a quick eye for character, and, above all, unfailing good-humor. Nature has given him the faculty of getting along with all sorts of people. In half an hour he is perfectly at home any where—in an Indian hut, an Italian locanda, a Syrian caravansera, a Russian traktir, a German beer-garden, a Fifth Avenue mansion, an Icelandic cabin, or a Californian cavern. We believe he has never tried a turn among the cannibals; but we have no doubt that a Fijian or a Fan would, in an hour, be ready to give him the best his bones afforded. A good story was told us the other day illustrating his faculty of "getalongativeness." A score of years ago, while on foot-tour with a companion through Kentucky, they chanced to be for a few days at the pretty village of Henderson.

"There seem to be pleasant people here," said one to the other; "we must get acquainted with them."

They had passed one pleasant house, and caught a glimpse of a bright face or two peeping from the window. Upon inquiry at the hotel they learned that the owner was Colonel Attocks, a magnate of the place, a fine old Kentucky gentleman, famous as a boot-maker in old times, and having a host of charming daughters. Their plan was formed at once. Knocking at the door, they inquired if the Colonel was at home. He was soon seen on the farm, they were told by his wife, a well-bred Kentucky lady; wouldn't the young gentlemen walk in and wait for him? Of course they would, and soon fell into pleasant talk with the good lady. A piano stood in the parlor; Browne can his fingers over the keys in the intervals of talk. The street door soon opened, and a young lady entered, followed at intervals by another and another, until the whole family was assembled, and they with their unannounced visitors were soon in full flow of pleasant talk. After an hour or so the Colonel made his appearance, true old Kentucky gentleman. Now came the crisis.

"Myself and friend," said Browne, "allow us to introduce Mr. or Mrs. O'Gorman—Colonel Attocks."

"Happy to meet you, Mr. O'Gorman, and your friend, Mr.—?" replied the Colonel, interrogatively.

"Mr. Browne—Colonel Attocks," responded O'Gorman, introducing his friend in turn.

"Happy to make your acquaintance, Mr. Browne," said the Colonel, bowing.

"Myself and friend," continued Browne, "in traveling through this part of the State have heard that you have in your employ some extraordinary boors, and have taken the liberty of calling upon you, and asking if you would tell us about them."

The Colonel was only too happy to speak on his favorite hobby, and for a couple of hours there were told some of the tallest bear-stories ever narrated; the youngsters enjoying them amazingly, and reminiscences; the young ladies alternating with chat and music. All parties were equally delighted. Browne approached—subsequently to

"Gentlemen," said the worthy Colonel, "you must stay to tea."

They accepted themselves, but, with the Colonel's permission, they would call in the evening. Evening came. Browne put his flute in his pocket, and O'Gorman carried his violin, and were at the Colonel's hospitable mansion. The worthy hosts, delighted with their chance acquaintances, had invited their friends and neighbors, and the parlors were filled with a score or two of the élite of Henderson. The strangers were formally introduced, and a delightful evening followed. The young men were pressed, with true Kentucky hospitality, to visit all their new acquaintances, and were made free use of the best society in the place during the week through which their stay lasted.

The story ought, by rights, to have ended by one or both of the young men falling in love with and marrying one of the acquaintances thus oddly made. But nothing of the kind happened. They pursued their journey, carrying away and leaving kind remembrances of a pleasant time. This was a score of years ago. Doubtless the charming belles of that day have become staid matrons. We trust that some of them are yet living, and will recognize in this anecdote a pleasant reminiscence of their youth. We tell the story as we have heard it from one of the parties, to illustrate that adaptive power of accommodation which has made him at home every where, and enables him to see those charming bits of life which form the charm of his writings.

Mr. Browne proposes now to make another little tour: first to California, to look after his rancho at Oakland, Petaluma, and Tulare, then to India, then Persia and parts adjacent, then back to Germany, where his family now reside. Before many months we dare say that the readers of Harper's Magazine and Weekly will have pleasant sketches from his pen and pencil, describing meetings with Chinese mandarins, Hindoo gentlemen, Arab sheikhs, and Persian emirs.

Meanwhile, for a few weeks, Mr. Browne will remain in the Eastern States, and will deliver lectures upon the various regions which he has visited. One course of Iceland has been received with favor by several intelligent audiences. Geir Zöega, his guide to the Geysers, has taken rank with Yusef, and the English traveler, with their usual facetious appliances for "roughing it" in Iceland, are already classic. If he will only throw his Cruise Adventures into the form of a lecture à la Alfred Smith, it could not fail to be a charming entertainment. As a lecturer, Mr. Browne needs experience. He talks well only when he is in perfect rapport with his audience. When this is the case, his quaint, delicate humor comes out. As he told us the other day, "I have traveled hard roads in my day, but this of lecturing is the hardest. Yet I have never failed in any thing which I have undertaken, and I don't mean to fail in this." We, who know him well, know that he will be successful in this new sphere. His lecture on Iceland is a success, and we are sure that Cruise will be a triumph.

"PECCAVI."

THERE wasn't the shadow of an excuse to serve her as a refuge. She knew it, and knew that a faint sound was a thing not to be thought of; the least possible tinkle had done with itself in that ringing air as shortly as possible, and the dressing-bell rang out so sharply that she must have heard it. Neither were any considerations of the weather to be allowed in her defense, for Marie had kindled the fire long before, and the cozy, crackling heat had driven back the early frosts out on the windowpanes, where it set forth, in sparkling show, silvery intricacies of forest, scathed and barren pines, and branches bearing fantastic fruit quite independently of soil or trunk, after the manner, doubtless, of originals in Fairy-land.

The more sumptuous robe and embroidered skirts hung ready by the long dressing-glass, brushes and china toilet-boxes were arrayed on the marble dish before it, and the scent of Parisian essences had (where our lazy little Sophie, cuddled among great square pillows, lay looking out at window like a meditative feline mouse) wag her paignoir and fascinated slippers.

The shadow? why there wasn't the ghost of an excuse; and she must certainly come at once, for you can put your finger on a shadow, and you can't on a ghost, if there is any faith in tradition: only—for we have found a woman unprovided with an excuse?—it was so pleasant to lie there listening to the gradual waking of the house, the jarring of doors, and clattering of dishes, the hurrying here and there, voices and steps commencing to sound below, and all the while, opposite her window, fog and shadow building in a wall just above the cold hills to keep out the late day, and the splendid light shooting over it, making it waver on the edges, trembling in the air, and, after scattering it at last, and pouring out in triumph just as the second bell rang—the dressing-bell.

And here, if there be any one impatient to know what this idle story is to be about, let him or her take two or three more turns in the room, according to their respective pronouns, while I stop to lament over a phrenological deficiency in that bump, which, if developed at all, should be at an early age to raids on the cat's tail and the bag of indigo, to the wrath and consternation of the family and said cat, to the development of artistic tendencies; for here am I, with my story and my heroine in the cold, and the dictionary bankrupt. Heroine, could I but describe her, with her over the slender fingers of her left hand with a dextrous turn and toss that carried it back from her forehead, and twisted the rich mass of hair as far back of her head, where she made sure of it with a comb. And I should have shown you how, in a face at all times pleasant, and capable of beauty, in the dimples about the mouth, and the melting of the chin into the round throat, in the sudden darkening of white lashes when she smiled, in the softening downward sweep of brown lashes over clear gray eyes, in the contrast of dark brows with the bright hair, and the delicate, pearly incarnation of color in either cheek, all the more piquant because to be waited and watched for, and then, in the orthodox, classic style, I should have come with her down the broad staircase to the breakfast-room, which she entered very quiet and smiling, causing thereby sudden uprising of eyes in the breasts of those ladies who were pale and languid in consequence of Mrs. Pomeroy's soirée the night before.

Sophie's first glance showed her that Lieutenant Hermingly's chair was empty, and Mrs. Livingston's (her aunt's) first question was concerning it.

"Sophie, we were just speaking of George Brundage. Of course you know when he is coming back."

"No; my intuition doesn't extend so far," returned Sophie, bushing, but otherwise imperturbable.

"His regiment is ordered away to-morrow, I doubt if he comes back at all," said Eugénie Leigh, too, maliciously.

"I should think he owed me that civility at least!" answered Sophie, quietly.

"Oh! but Kate Mason is in town; and in cases of that kind young men are apt to forget the civility that is due to old friends," suggested Eugénie. Really you can hardly blame him. They are said to be quite one petits mens."

That epigram quite could have barbed this conversation, and, guided by malicious instinct, struck straight at Sophie's heart, is, on the face of it, manifest; but Sophie's self-control and coolness could regard as pleasant payment of a long score of offenses innocently done their jealous vanity, her burning cheek and filling eyes, is quite incredible. They, of course, had no thought of hurting her; they smiled around the table when she left the room.

"Sophie is a nice girl, and we are very fond of her," explained Eugénie benevolently—"only she is such an incorrigible little coquette I have no patience with her!"

Philip Dupont, who had looked on gravely, now rose and followed her. He knew well enough, even before he opened the library door, how he should find her—nestling in one of the great chairs, her head bent down and face hidden in her hands; knew too that the pain in her quivering face, as she looked up at him in a pitiful, appealing way, was for his rival; but the suffering was hers, and the sympathy that he dared not speak looked down at her from his kindly eyes as he sat down beside her. The conversation, however, might have been retailed from the house-steps.

"Since when have you renounced bills and taken to philosophical meditations?" he asked. "I looked for you every where, unable to believe that you would absent yourself from the most brilliant affair of the season."

"Was it pleasant?"

"I found it intensely stupid."

"Confession is good for the soul."

"That does not follow. Pleasure, or the lack of it, depends on one's stand-point and surroundings. I think I might have been very unpopular."

"You mean you yourself were stupid?"

"If you choose to understand me so."

His quiet patience smote Sophie with sudden penitence.

"Mr. Dupont, I think I am very impertinent and disagreeable."

"No one else agrees with you. If you remain in that opinion utter solitude must be your portion."

"You intend that for the traditional coals of fire?"

"No; only my honest conviction."

Spite of herself a smile dimpled about Sophie's mouth, and she was commencing to reply with something light and interesting, when the click of a heel sounded on the gravel-walk. There was a quick run up the steps, a firm, elastic tread in the hall.

Philip Dupont looked down while Sophie turned quietly enough and held out her little hand in a matter-of-course way to Lieutenant Brundage, just entered, who, however, were not so to be deceived. Color and light had leaped up to her face, dimples struggled in her cheeks to be let loose in a smile, and her eyes were full of that which she looked up at him, and the content with which she sat near him quiet and silent, while he answered Philip's questions concerning, were more to the purpose than a dissertation the size of the Grand Cyrus would have been.

The entrance of Philip's now, and there were none to soothe it, for perhaps the half-mournful glance with which Sophie looked after him as he left them would not be seen by him deeper than all the rest, could he have seen it. George drew a sigh of relief.

"How good of him to go! I have so much to tell, so little time in which to say it, and such a morbid sense of the uncertain proclivity of doors to open just at the wrong time and admit intruders. Yesterday when you asked I would not tell you where I was going. Shall I tell you now?"

Sophie, deep in contemplation of a dingy, uncertain saint over the mantel-piece, signified from the extreme corner of her chair that she was listening.

"I went to see your father," pursued George, low but steadily, "to ask him what you would have known long ago. He was very kind, but said, frankly, that he could not look with the same favor on me as on Philip Dupont, richer, more settled in character, could give you the position you deserved. You, of course, were free to make your choice; but he wished it all to be open and clear, and not made now, but after a year of reflection. I was at liberty to tell you this, as Mr. Dupont will doubtless do, but there was to be no plighting of troths, no giving of rings, no romance, as he styled it. As Philip can see you when he chooses, I, who must be absent many months, will not. Will you, Sophie, only I have given parole d'honneur that my letters shall treat of the war, the weather, gossip, plague, pestilence, and famine, and nothing but love. He, then, he turned out a second Lubin on my hands, though, I think I shall be able to keep it," holding up a little perfumed glove. "I found it here on the floor. May I have it?"

Sophie was quite unfaltered in her reply.

"And you will answer my letters?"

"Certainly."

"Shall we say good-by now? You know I am going this afternoon, and we can not bid farewell before all those prying eyes."

He had taken and was holding out both his hands. She gave him hers timidly, and tried to meet his look, then to break loose from his grasp as the fell heavily on her hand; failing in both, burst out with a pitiful cry,

"Oh, George, how can I bear it! How can I let you go!"

The people were coming from the breakfast-room, Philip talking in a raised voice as he came along the hall with Mrs. Livingston. Sophie took the little hands in one and pressed them against his heart.

"Goodby, precious. Ah!—Sophie—God willing, I will come back."

The Goths were upon them; in saying which we beg the kind pardon, as we have never heard them accused of the ineffable meanness of prying, specially into things sacred; but between Eugénie's malicious gaze and Sophie, faithful, generous Philip interposed, as he would have done had her eyes been several times as malicious; and for his reward, saw Sophie's tearful, quivering face, as he stood pretending to talk with her in the deep window, and heard her low murmur of, "It is more than I can bear!"

It was at home—Sophie's home—and just a little after Christmas. Bitter-sweet filled the vases, pine wreaths still circled the pictures and shadowed darkly over the door, showing most fine and delicate tracery on the white walls, wherever leaped and danced the light of the cheery fire by which she had drawn up her lounge, so that she could look into the quivering flame as she lay there.

There had been a year of waiting and watching, of sickening dread before looking at fateful lists of dead and wounded, only brightened by letters that never treated of love, but were love itself, and that told her he was still safe and well. Just before that Christmas, Philip, spite of a rejection, still her first and self-forgetting friend, had spoken to her again, not for a love that he knew was given to his rival, but for a reprieve of his sentence. He did not say that the intercession of George's letters, and the story that Eugénie told over wines of his betrothal to Kate Mason, spending the winter in Washington, had renewed his hopes, but he showed her enough of his great love to fill her with sadness, and even shake her with doubts of a self that could remain unconquered by such tenderness.

Against such doubts, and against all opposition, spoken or implied, she had hitherto gone on steadily enough; but now that the light went, the chart lost, and ominous whispers of George's unfaithfulness in every breeze, her poor little bark drifted on a miserable way of its own. Dr. Hutchin or Fulton ever were more forlorn than she. Her father made no secret of his wish; her mother and sisters plaintively wondered at her; even he approved of her; she and her love were all alone, and perhaps even that was slipping from her grasp. She was very weary, longing unutterably for rest. Why should she not take refuge in the faithful, patient love Philip Dupont had for her? She had felt when she had asked Philip for a week's delay: and "Chateau qui parle et dame qui écoute va se rendre," though he, joyous, in a moment did it. But alas for him! At the first shadowing of this possibility on her soul, love, faith, and truth rose to her lips and would not; and she had rejected him bitterly, hating her to its end sick in body as well as mind, half despairing, and wholly undecided. Then came the letter, and with it the change; the flames playing about a great log lying sideways in the fire-place, and glowing red, over and about which the fitful light darted and shot its dragons' wings, in tongues of fire, pointed arches, and all manner of flame trickery and somersaulting. Outside, clouds of snow, and the bleak, bare street—faces with eyes wide apart, or entirely given to mouth or nose; there were pits of endless burning; there were extreme cheerfulness and crumbling at the acme of their glory; and most curious of all, in the very centre, a rather dully bedowned out, very square top and bottom, and cushioned seat, of a burning red.

As she looked at it, half smiling at the quaint conceits it suggested, she saw composedly sitting thereon a little figure not lengthen her finger, with a pointed beard and now curious cloak; there on his queer little head, and now gleamed on the tip of his foot, and now went whirling in unimaginable somersaults into the chimney-corner (the brightest at last on his ugly pate), leaning composedly back and returning her stare unwinkingly from its little black eyes, and at grave pauses taking out a pipe not larger than a dew-drop, but out of which rolled smoke, rosy and fragrant, toward the ceiling in such volumes that, although the flue was not can not contain the greater, left Sophie no other why of reconciling the difficulty than by considering this phenomenon individually as a miniature pyle edition of Mount Vesuvius. But everyday smoke, whether of a cigar or a cruiser, makes off with itself in long spirals, and clouds; this, as we said, as Sophie saw it do, arch itself into windows, and drape itself into hangings, and pack itself away in the corners of the room in such a shatter-proof manner that dreamers or Popocatepetl may be thinking about, they don't float out entire libraries, as the Sibyl's leaves in the pipe.

Sophie recognized the room with a quick pang. It was her Aunt Livingston's drawing-room, and the vines near the window were George and herself; not a doubt of it. He looked kindly enough there, as if the "Precious!" that she heard in a low rapture, full music, sounding out apparently from her own thoughts, came from his heart; but before she had time for more than a passing feeling of astonishment, figures, books, bangings, all were gone, melted together, took new forms. The room was full of people, and apparently in the midst of festivity—chattering, though she could not hear a word; pantomiming prodigiously; all manner of doubts and suspicions, changing as fast as the figures; looking like George; in his form laughing at her letters; kneeling before a figure of Kate Mason, to make him at every turn a low bow, and, kissing it; vanishing silently, soundlessly, at the opening of the door as Philip came in and sat down quietly beside her.

Then for the first time she heard how the night had changed—from still, starry quiet to howling, blinding drift and wind; and rain beating against the window, at which the wind raved and clamored as if frantic to get in. There was a change, too, in Philip. His face was pale; his eyes gloomy and restless; his look no longer peaceful or pleasant. He sat with his arms hanging on the back of the chair, still maliciously peering at her from behind his chair. Involuntarily she shrank from him as he took her hand, though she curiously blessed the cause that she could scarcely tell whether it was the wind, his voice, or the wailing music (that still went on in her thoughts) that spoke.

"I am here for your decision; and knowing me as you do, you may judge whether I should have forsaken my fate, were I not in possession of circumstances affecting it. Knowing, so bitterly as I do, how from the beginning you have never loved me, judge what proofs of falsehood and dishonor I must have had to embolden me to anticipate the decision that you were to send me. Remembering how coldly you have heard all that I had to say, how little worth you have esteemed my love, think how bankrupt and forlorn I must believe you, once more to offer what you have so despised."

Was this the generous Philip of old, with mean triumph in his restless eyes, that never looked steadily into hers? Were these the only words that he could find?

She shrank still further from him—answered, coldly,

"You mean that George has forgotten me, do you not?"

And whether it were Philip's voice, or the music that still went on, she was answered,

"Yes."

"Still," she pursued, "love is not a bargain. If we have lost it once it is forever. There can be no second trial."

"Then is indifference, however, and weariness on your part," he returned, "and an active will on mine. You have no longer any thing with which to oppose me; and I can not only willingly, but intend to take you, cold as you are. You have only to choose between meeting 'them,' coming here to triumph over you, fortune and desolate, or as my wife, to seem, at least, in their eyes, unhurt, unharmed. That is your affair, not mine."

This was Philip, the true-hearted gentleman, the faithful lover of truth and right! No longer was there hope of refuge for her in such a heart as that; but she might have rest from struggling, purchase peace from his will, by yielding to it. He had only spoken truth. Sooner or later he must triumph. Why prolong the contest? In his hand he held a ring—"Portis" glittered on it in the firelight, the motto of the line race of Dupants. He had slipped it on her finger, he had kissed the little passive hand, he had called her "his" before he left her. And again, as the door closed after him, she heard with wonder how the storm had grown; with what wild tumult it raved about the cozy little home, and how the air was full of sighing, wailing voices. As she listened to them, she was startled by a sigh close at her side, and looking up with joy, saw a dark, cowled figure within reach of her hand. Her heart beat wildly —stopped—throbbed sickeningly again. What was there in her hand, she had cut out her hands, she cried out in terror, as a sudden jet of flame, shooting up from the glowing embers, shone full on the face of George. She had not heard him come; she could not divine how he had entered; but she sprang to her feet, she clasped him close. She never once questioned his right to claim her homage. It was enough that his eyes looked down on her as tenderly as when they parted; that he called her "darling," as he had done then; that he held her fast in his arm, as if he thought her "precious," as they sat together on the sofa.

"My life! my love! you have been true to me!" were his first words. "God bless you, and forgive me for doubting you; but I heard some hateful rumors of you and Philip, and when I met him coming from here, and looking so exultant, I half believed them."

True! with that circle of guiding fire never to overmore. True! with that device on her third finger striking out into unbearable light in his very sight!

"I have been through a great agony," he went on, not observing her silence. "Only two weeks ago I emerged from pestilence and monotonous chains, that were to be counted by weeks, not days. In all that time you had received no word from me, and the thought that made me so wretched was that I retarded my own recovery. The pain and fever were nothing to the avarice with which I counted the moments as the miserable helplessness with which I have submitted to the creeping of express trains, to the irritation with—with—why, what is this? Let me hand you the ring at first—at last; its boldest lettering had obtruded itself on his sight. He had recognized it; and if it had been an age, and among him, he could not have looked at it with more achy horror—spoken more falteringly: "Sophie, what is this?"

She was raising her downcast head and shrinking figure speaking to him plainly enough.

"Answer," he said, sternly. "Did you ever love me?"

"Yes."

"Then you were too weak to be faithful?"

"I think I was mad."

He rose, casting her aside like an infected thing; but she clung to him.

"Oh! don't hate me."

"Hate you! Not at all. I don't hate the thistle because it has not proved the lily that I expected. I only despise my own folly."

"Alas! I have harmed you as well as myself. You will never again believe in woman's faith and truth."

"Oh yes; only I will apportion my belief better. I will grant women capable of folds for half an hour—truth while they are talking."

He thrust her off as he spoke, pushing away her clinging fingers with scorn. She sprang to him, sobbing, struggling with the arms that held her, still believing in the miserable truth of her dream —looking so piteously into the grave, unrelenting face of Philip—seeing, with wonder, that there were lights in the room, and that her mother was standing near the door.

"Philip!" she cried out, wildly, "be generous. I can not, will not, I can not!" as she was not yet fully awake, still putting forth all her little strength to escape.

"You see," said Philip's deep voice, glancing slightly toward her mother, "how worse than hopeless it is! Then to Sophie: "If any thing that I have ever said or done to hope has gained you, I here renounce it; bury it deep, forget it, and think of me in future as only your friend, but a friend always—till death."

Something in his face told her that the sentence was unfinished—something in the pain of his look, and the way in which her mother glanced at the half-open door, gave her a guess of what was waiting in the shadow of the hall. Before the door slowly opened—before the cause pale and ghastly, also a hasting sickness, but glad and eager—before she sprang into his arms with a cry that pierced the hearts of those who heard it—she was sure that it was George.

And Philip? There must always be pain to bring forth life. Trees fall that fires may burn and homes be joyful; mountains grind away that valleys may be verdant. To some it is given to suffer, as to others to rejoice; and he even his cross as they their crown.

THE FIGHT OFF CHARLESTON.

IN our last we announced, on the strength of rebel telegrams to Richmond, which had found their way into the New York Herald, that the rebel ram at Charleston had attacked our blockading fleet off Charleston, and destroyed the Mercedita. We have since received a sketch of the affair from an occasional correspondent, which we reproduce on page 117, and subjoin the following reliable account of the transaction:

It appears from the statement of an intelligent EYE-WITNESS that the cause of this attack of the rebel ram on our squadron was owing to the capture of the Princess Royal, the captain and pilot of that vessel having escaped ashore during the darkness and confusion, and communicated intelligence to the enemy.

The Princess Royal endeavored to run the blockade by way of Beach Inlet on the 20th ult., but was discovered by the blockaders. The vessel was chased, but the pilot boldly proceeded toward her, and captured the prize without otherwise resistance. It was then discovered that the captain and pilot had succeeded in getting ashore by a small boat, carrying important dispatches to the rebel Government. The Unadilla carried her to the side of the Housatonic, and her three still English crew were transferred to the latter, accompanied by sharp flashes of fire. It was supposed that our fleet was engaged in making up the Admiral's Proclivities were endeavoring to form, an entrance. At daylight the rebel iron-clad ram was seen coming out from the direction of Stono Inlet toward our fleet.

They attacked the Housatonic first. One ram struck her on the water ridge, keeling her over, and at the same time firing a shell which exploded on the deck, carrying away the sixth of three pennons, including a gunner, by a limb and steam. The Housatonic was then abandoned, and Captain Stellwagen lowered one of his small boats, after leaving one of his officers on board, and two men to assist it. The ram answered our hail by replying, "Confederate States of America. Do you surrender?" As we were expected three times, Captain Stellwagen replying at each inquiry, "I can not surrender my colors." The ram then moved, "God damn you to hell, if you don't surrender we will fill all your cots of water. Send your boat."

The boat which Captain Stellwagen lowered then contained the following persons: one officer and four men of the rebel ram, and the officer asked to be admitted on board. He was informed by Captain Stellwagen that Captain Stellwagen's statement that "we are in a sinking condition." He asked, "Will you take us on board?" We replied then the rails; we can not take you aboard." The officer then gave the rebel ram's commander, who refused to ship. The rebels were then successfully deceived as to the condition of the vessel, thinking that we were in a sinking condition. She lay in about water, and hence their sight that "we could not surrender our colors."

The ram then steamed toward the Keystone State, and sent a shot through her boiler, disabling her. Out of her twenty-one persons—twelve by the shot and nine by being scalded to death. Fifteen were wounded, and are now at Port Royal, some in a precarious condition. In the mean time the United States gun boat Housatonic engaged the other ram, driving her away. At half past six o'clock in the morning both rams left the scene and proceeded up to Charleston.

During the attack on our fleet, the Princess Royal, which lay near, and was captured by the rebel fleet of three of contest on both sides, succeeded in getting off, mainly through the energy of Chief Assistant Engineer Thomas Somes, a brother of his son all the inflammable material on board.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Attention Agents: Soldiers, and Masons.

Any one to whom this paper is sent, who will send 1 Will send as sample, on the receipt of $1, together with my wholesale Circular, either a Gold Pen and pencil, Gold Pen and Silver Chaser Pin with Chain attached, or a neat new style Vest Chain. Address, H. B. GOODRICH, 109 Broadway, N. Y.

The Family Circle Glee Book, containing about 200 Songs, Glees, Choruses, &c., including many of the most popular pieces sung at the Opera and Musical Harmonized for Four Voices, with full Accompaniment for the Piano, Seraphine, or Melodeon. The Key of Glee Clubs, Singing Classes, and the Home Circle. By Wm. Bradbury, M. A. Price $1.50 in boards, post-paid, on receipt of price, by DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

Cured by Bates' Patent Scientific Electro appliances—the only known means for the rapid and permanent cure of Stammering, Stuttering, &c. For Pamphlets and Drawings describing the process, address H. C. L. MEARS, 371 West 23d Street, New York. P. O. Box 4,586.

Fine Sleeve and Bosom Studs.

Sleeve and Bosom Studs made of the finest Ivory, brought to a high polish by the use of Gold and Silver Leaf, Initial Letter, Old English, &c. Monograms to order. Free by mail on receipt of price. Sets, $1. Trade supplied. JOHN F. PHELPS, 429 Broadway, N. Y.

The Secret Out!

Humbug Exploded! A "Book of Wonders!" containing Secrets worth Millions! "Secrets of Secrets" and Patents Revealed, "Employment for all," "Secrets worth Knowing Revealed," "Discoveries (Artificial Gold, Silver, and Diamonds, "Whiskers and Hair," "How to Make Money," "Art of Painting, Every's Horse-Taming Method, "Greek Fire," Fluid Lightning, Electricity, Magnetism, Sent free by mail for 25 cents. Address H. C. L. MEARS, 371 West 23d Street, New York. P. O. Box 4,586.

Agents, Male and Female, wanted to sell Articles of real merit and practical utility, needed by every family. Great profits realized.

CATARRH!—Dr. Goodale's CATARRH REMEDY penetrates to the very root of this terrible disease, and exterminates it. Sent to any address, Price $1.00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. Depot 619 Broadway.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

WORTH $500,000.

To be sold for cash or on credit, without regard to value, and to be paid for just till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 00 each.
500 Ladies' Gold Watches	25 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches	15 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 " "	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gold Lockets, Various Styles	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gold Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral Necklaces, and Opal Pins	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys	2 50 to 5 00 each.
3000 Pen and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Silver Thimbles	2 50 to 5 00 each.
5000 Silver Dollars	2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Gold Dollars	2 00 to 6 00 each.
6000 Horse Set Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Ladies' Gold Pens	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Holders	4 00 to 6 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Holders	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All Gold Pens 14 Carats and Warranted.

All of the above Articles will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what they are, will be put in sealed envelopes, mixed well, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail or express. We give all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what it is you are to get. Then if you do not like it, send us one dollar and take the article or not.

Of the Certificates issued, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 20 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; twenty-five for $5; sixty for $10; and one hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to $1 each order. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

203 Broadway, New York.

SALESROOMS COR. JOHN AND NASSAU STREETS, ENTRANCE NO. 54, 1ST FLOOR.

TO OUR PATRONS!—Our prices, on and after date, will be regulated by the following schedule: Should Exchange advance, our prices will advance with it, and vice versa. Be sure and give numbers, imported especially for "the times," and can not be obtained from any other house.

The Magic Time Observer,

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HUNTING AND OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH, COMBINED IN ONE. Have been made a most pleasing novelty, of which the BUNKARD BROS., of New York City, have the honor to be entitled the Sole Time Observer, and is a hunting and open face watch combined in one, and is a most perfect time keeper, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered to the public, and contains a combination of its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The case of the Watch is also composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the appearance of the entire best gold watch, and is warranted an accurate timepiece."

It is made in two sizes, Ladies' and Gents', a half dozen, $204. Sample Watches, in neat morocco boxes, for those preparing to buy or sell, $3 each.

The Improved Duplex In Full Ruby Actions.

A first-class timepiece, of silver material, over which is electro-fire plated fine 18 k. gold, making the imitation to be more than a match for the genuine, and the same material by the most experienced judges; solids will not effect it. Is made in open face and hunting cases, and is not to be excelled in general appearance. Engineers, engineers, and persons desiring a reliable watch superior to any others; alteration of climate will not affect their accuracy. Sent by express, C. O. D., to any place on receipt in good shape and in best running order, only $28 00.

Hunting Composition Cased Levers.

English movements, jewelled in centre, capped and full jewelled, have ruby seconds, and the newest improvements. Have cased with hunting cases, plated with gold. Price per case of a half dozen, $110, or per single one, only $20.

Open Face Ladies' Timepiece.

Jeweled, capped, and all the recent improvements, elegant fire plated with 18 k. gold. A very pretty ornament, for business or as a dress watch. Stands unsurpassed. Price per case of six in good running order, only $90 00; single one $20. Will stand any climate. Sent by express, C. O. D., to any place on receipt of $20 for $50.

The Hunting Silver Plat ed Army Watch.

Superior regulated movement and handsome finish, detached lever, double balance, &c., per case of half dozen, $36. A single one, $15.

The Hunting Composition Cased Army Watch.

Jewelled and full polished cap, handsomely engraved, in engine turned cases. Price per case of a half dozen, $48. Single one, $8.

OUR TERMS ARE CASH IN ALL INSTANCES! Remittances may be made either by draft on Express in Treasury notes or by bank bills. Goods can be sent by Express which will fill collection on delivery. Strangers will please deposit the amount in the hands of the Express Company at the place where they will receive the parcel, or make us a cash remittance of two dollars as a guarantee that the bill will be paid. THESE RULES ARE POSITIVE, and will be strictly adhered to. ALL ORDERS BY MAIL MUST BE CASH IN ADVANCE as we can not collect from persons at a distance. Persons buying promiscuously will be called such commissions. The Express is discharged on the receipt of the money, and we are not liable for loss. Should any article not suit, the money can be refunded if returned in good order, provided we receive such notice within ten days, and the article is sent to us by express, or given up upon our delivery at such express office.

HUBBARD BROS., Importers,

North cor. John and Nassau Streets,

NEW YORK.

READER!—If you want employment, or the best article (two-sided) Sewing Machine ever manufactured, send to ISAAC HALE, Jr. & CO., Newburyport, Mass., for a circular of terms, &c. A liberal salary, or commission, to the Agent may desire.

INDIA RUBBER GLOVES

Should be used by every person who is troubled with Salt Rheum or Chapped Hands, rendering them soft and viable as alabaster. They are impervious to hot or cold water, and for housework and gardening are invaluable.

Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of $1 00 for Ladies' Size, $1 15 for Gents. O. B. GRAY, 201 Broadway, N. Y.

FIRST BRANCH JEWELRY, &c. RUBBER Goods in great variety, Wholesale and Retail.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Genial climate. Orchards, Corn, Forest, &c., within easy, cheap access from Philadelphia. Delightful climate—30 acres Good Farm $75 to $150 per Acre, payable in small sums. Good schools and society. Hundreds are settling. Apply to CHARLES K. LANDIS, P. M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rural News free. Free Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an old-wood land region, offering unusual inducements for ground farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies.

These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Steel Plate Engraving Establishment, 302 Broadway, N. Y. ESTABLISHED 1838. ☞ For Specimen by Mail, send two stamps.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every County in the United States, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machines. Address

S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Beaufort, Newbern, and all Southern and Upper Ports, should be sent, at half rates, by HARDENE'S EXPRESS, No. 9 Wall street. Circulars giving further rates.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.

THE BEST IN THE WORLD.

Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.

Unequalled as a Dressing. Sold by all fair dealers, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

GOLD PENS retailing at wholesale prices. Send for Circular. HENRY E. HALL & CO., 82 Nassau St., N. Y.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils, Grecian Fluid, and 13 other articles. Sample and particulars free. Address, SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

AGENTS!—A New Article! Something worthy of your attention! Full particulars free, or sample sent for 50 cents; sent for 30 cents to those proposing to act as Agents. Address Inventor, P.O. Box II, Hartford, Ct.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, and all claims against the Government, promptly collected. Reliable information furnished, sales of claims not encouraged. Send for circular, containing laws and pamphlet of Laws and Instructions sent by enclosing a 3-cent stamp to CODDINGTON & CO.,

SOMES & BROWN, 2 Park Place, N. Y.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS

AND ARMS. Selpho's Patent. 510 Broadway, N. Y., and 194 Pulton St., Brooklyn Hotel. Send for Circular.

Rheumatism—Who has it?

It has been confessedly acknowledged by thousands who have used them, that the Galvano Electric Metallic Instep Soles are a certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Chilblains, Cold and Frost-bitten Feet, &c. Sold by all Druggists, and by the manufacturer, and sent by mail for $1 25. Secured by English and American Patents. Agent for a circular. METCALF & CO., 429 Broadway.

Light Employment for either Sex. From $2 to $5 can be made in an evening. It requires no capital, and the smallest cost but a few cents. Any person is worth $500 to any person who is unemployed evenings. Full instructions sent free of cost.

G. H. MELLISH, Box 540, Worcester, Mass.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Counsel will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any part of the world, on receipt of P. O. order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 160 Nassau Street, N. Y.

MOUSTACHES AND WHISKERS IN 42 DAYS.—Dr. PERRY'S CELEBRATED Medicated Moustache Secretia, all in the Book of Wonders. 500 pp. 8th Ed. Price only $1 25. Sent by mail. Address Dr. PERRY & CO., 49 Ann St., New York.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The papers of permanent value which have been published in almost every Number render a complete set of HARPER'S MAGAZINE a desirable acquisition to any public or private library. The Publishers can supply complete sets, or any Number from the commencement. For cash, Volumes I. and II. half bound, per Volume, $1 00; post-paid. Any Volume, containing six Numbers, bound in Muslin, 81 cents; sent by mail, post-paid, to any of the United States within 1500 miles of New York, for Two Dollars and Fifty Cents. Cloth cases for binding, comprising Twenty-five Volumes, uniformly bound, will be sent by express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, for One Dollar and Eighty-eight Cents per volume.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
One Copy for Two Years	5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 00 each, for one year.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
One Copy for Two Years	5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.

The Publishers will not be responsible for subscriptions, one year, $5 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.

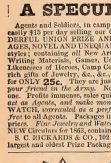
Vols. I., II., III., IV., V., and VI., for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, 1861, and 1862, of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $4 00 each, are now ready.

☞ The Publishers employ no TRAVELING AGENTS. Parties who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly had better remit direct to the Publishers, or pay their subscription to some Postmaster or Country Merchant from whom they are acquainted, and of whose responsibility they are assured.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.



E. M. STANTON'S
PHYSIOLOGICAL HAIR CUTTER
IS EQUAL TO A SHAVER.

UNITED STATES MILITARY SHAVING SHOP.
HEAD BARBER. "Next!"

A SPECULATION.

Agents and Soldiers, in camp or discharged, can make easily $10 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNIQUE,ALL and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions for the Army, rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your Friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp create as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Package in endless variety and at all prices. Fine Jewelry and Watches at low prices. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements.
S. C. HICKADS & CO., 105 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

THE NE PLUS ULTRA.
No Chimney Attachment.
The best and most practical ever invented.—Its all the ordinary burners, of various sizes, now in use. It costs only a trifle more than a single gas chimney. Gives a large, clear light without the least smoke, and can be carried in the strongest draft without going out, therefore being indispensable for portable or hall lights. Agents wanted. Sample sent free for 35 cts. Send for circular. JOS. DIMMICK & Sons', 413 Broadway, N. Y.

Metallic Legs

(Patented Jan. 6th, 1863), by the
UNIVERSAL JOINT AND ARTIFICIAL LIMB COMPANY.
Weighs only 4 Pounds.
Soldiers, price $50; civilians, $75; silver-plated, $100. They will lengthen and shorten, and are self-adjusting. Send for a circular to J. W. WESTON,
No. 491 Broadway, New York.

Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machines.
Highest Premium.
International Exhibition, London, 1862.
See the recent Improvements.
Office 505 Broadway, New York.

STERLING'S
AMBROSIA
FOR THE HAIR.

DRAWN & ENGRAVED FROM LIFE.

DR. STERLING'S AMBROSIA is a stimulating obnoxious of Roots, Barks, and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp, and itchings of the head; entirely eradicates dandruff; prevents the hair from falling out, or turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. Sold by druggists everywhere. Put up in a box containing two bottles. Price $1.
DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor,
Depot No. 403 Broadway.

Portable Printing Offices,
For the use of Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to do their own Printing. Circular sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., on receipt of two 3 ct. stamps.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, N. Y.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.
American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being reliable manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and sent here only for packing and swindling purposes.
We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most substantial manufacture, an accurate and durable time-keeper, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at as low a price as is asked for the trashy Lazars and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.
We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.
Send by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States.
Wholesale orders should be addressed to
ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents of the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY. N. Y.

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlers $40. Rich soil. Mild climate. See advertisement of Vineland, on previous page.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.
Made to Measure at $24, $30, $36 & $42 PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.
FRENCH FLANNEL ARMY SHIRTS, $24, $27, $30 and $33 per dozen.
AGENTS WANTED.
S. W. H. WARD, from London, No. 387 Broadway.

A REALLY VALUABLE MICROSCOPE, one that a child can use, sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.
S. WOODWARD, P. O. Box 3273, Boston.

Lithography,
Engraving and Printing, by LANG & COOPER, 117 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK. Transferring from Copper and Steel Plate to Stone made equal to copper-plate printing at one half the cost. Country orders particularly attended to. Send for samples and prices.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE!
MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 28c. COIN FREE. Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free.
Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

PHYSIOGNOMY;
Or, "Signs of Character, and How to Read them"—Ethnology; or, the Races of Men—Physiology, Phrenology, and Psychology—are Proven, in extenso, in THE FIELD, NOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 1863. $1 a year. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

India-Rubber Gloves cure Chapped Hands, Salt Rheum, &c., making them smooth and white, and are suitable for horse-work. For sale by the trade. Send by mail on receipt of price and 4 stamps for postage.
Ladies' sizes 6½ or per pair; Gents sizes, $1 00.
GOODYEAR'S I. R. GLOVE MFG'G CO.,
205 Broadway, N. Y.
Rubber Goods of all kinds Wholesale and Retail.

ATTENTION, LADIES!
The Lilliputian Wedding,
By special arrangement, we will publish on the 10th February, immediately after their marriage, the Card Photograph of
GEN. TOM THUMB
AND HIS FAIRY BRIDE,
IN THEIR WEDDING DRESS,
with their autographs. No album will be complete without this interesting picture. Price 25 cents. Can be sent by mail. All orders must be sent to
E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
501 Broadway, New York,
Manufacturers of Photographic Albums, and Publishers of Card Photographs of Celebrities.

Buy your Skate Straps with
Fogg's Lever Buckle,
Manufactured by P. STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK,
63 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.
IMPORTANT TO AGENTS!!—We have reduced the wholesale price of our GREAT STATIONERY PURCHASE PACKAGE. We also give better Wholesale to our Agents than any other firm. Send stamp for new circular. WEIR & CO., 54 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

THE "CRAIG MICROSCOPE,"
Of which over 80 dozen, and 250 dozen mounted objects have been sold since the 1st of Oct. in the city of Boston alone, will be sent, postage paid, with C beautiful mounted objects, for $3. Liberal discount to dealers. Address HENRY CRAIG, 183 Centre Street, New York.

$5.—A BEAUTIFUL Engraved Gold Plated Watch, English Movement, perfect time-keeper. Sent to any address for $5. Five Watches and Chains at low prices. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 40 Ann St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED for our Splendid New Illustrated Subscription Books. 100 per cent. profit. Report Watch free to Agents. $18 per day made. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CATLEY & CO., 49 Ann St., N. Y.

Soldiers and Everybody read the "Secret Out," on page 127, inside.

The American Parlor
Or Floor Skate,
Hard Rubber Rollers,
Anti-friction Axles.
On error, each Skate is labeled with the trade mark.
Also, 50,000 pair of Ladies' and Gents' Ice Skates, comprising all the new and improved patterns, made from welded steel and iron hardened. Skate Straps and Leather Goods of every description. Fogg's Improved Lever Skate Buckle. Sole Agent for Williams, Morse & Co.'s celebrated Skates.
FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK.
63 KILBY STREET, BOSTON.

Send for Trade-List, revised Jan. 25, 1863.
PEEKS & BANCKER,
WHOLESALE NEWS AGENTS, Successors to J. F. FREE & Co., 34 Ann Street, New York. All orders for Books, Stationery, and Miscellaneous Articles promptly filled.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to D. Adee, 381 Pearl St., N. Y. Its sale is free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

Now is the Time to Subscribe for THE BEST PAPER FOR THE TIMES!

MOORE'S RURAL NEW YORKER, the oldest and leading and most Popular Farm and Fireside Journal in America, entered upon its Fourteenth Year and Volume in January, 1863. In all the essentials of a first-class Agricultural, Horticultural, Literary and Family Newspaper combined, The Rural has long been pronounced by both Press and People,

THE BEST OF ITS CLASS,

And the immense circulation it continues to maintain throughout the Loyal States, Canadas, &c., proves that the War for the Union has not diminished its standing or popularity. Our aim will be in the future, as it ever has been in the past, to make it superior in all respects, and unquestionably,

The Most Useful Home Journal
Published in America!

Always Loyal, Practical, and Progressive, The Rural has long been the Favorite Agricultural and Family Weekly—largely read and ardently admired in both Town and Country. Its ample pages comprise Departments devoted to, or which treat ably and fully upon,

AGRICULTURE, HORTICULTURE,
ARCHITECTURE, RURAL ECONOMY,
EDUCATION, ARTS AND SCIENCE,
LITERATURE, GENERAL NEWS,

With various minor Departments, and including numerous Illustrations, Tales, Sketches, Music, Poetry, Enigmas, &c., &c.—rendering the paper instructive and Entertaining to the various members of the Family Circle.

The War News, Markets, &c,

Receive special attention—the Rural containing Reports of the principal Grain, Provision, Cattle, Wool, and Fruit Markets in the Country. Remember that the Rural is published Weekly in one of the very best cultivated sections of America, and that its Editors, Contributors, and Correspondents strive to promote the Pecuniary Interest and Home Welfare of its tens of thousands of readers.

☞ In Western Corresponding Editor, Chas. D. Brageon, Esq., whose "Western Editorial Notes" have attracted much attention, and been widely copied during the past year, will hereafter devote still more time and thought for the benefit of the Rural New Yorker and its readers.

Style, Form, Terms, &c.

Volume XIV., for 1863, will maintain the enviable reputation the Rural New Yorker has acquired for both Contents and Appearance. It will be published in Form and Style—with New Type, new White Paper, and many fine Illustrations. Its Form will continue Double-size, with an Index, Title Page, &c., at close of year, complete for binding.

TERMS, Always in Advance.—$2 a year;
2 copies for $3; 4 for $10; 10 for $25—with a free copy for every club of six or more. ☞ Now is the time to Send, Some and Form Clubs. Effective Local Agents wanted in all places reached by the United States and Canada mails, to whom we offer handsome Premiums. ☞ Specimens, Premium Lists, &c., sent free to all disposed to benefit their neighbors and community by introducing the paper to new and good readers and support.
Address D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

Barnum's American Museum.

LITTLE MINNIE WARREN,

The Empress of Beauty,
Sister of the late
MISS LAVINIA WARREN,
Now Mrs. Gen. Tom Thumb,
though not half her size (36 cases each).

25 Inches High and Weighs but 19 lbs.!
The smallest little Lady ever known, yet perfect in her form, beautiful face, and very way charming and pleasing. She will be on exhibition at all hours, Day and Evening, in company with Commodore Nutt, the $30,000 Nutt, the two making by far
The Smallest Pair of Human Beings ever seen—smaller even than the illustrious
Gen. Tom Thumb and Wife.
Also, the Living Hippopotamus, Sea Lion, What is It? Albino Family, &c., &c.

Splendid Dramatic Performances
Every Afternoon at 3 o'clock, and Every Evening at 7½. Admission 25 cents. Children under 10, 15 cents.

Male and Females.—For valuable information send 10 cents to Dr. Wm. Lake, Box 63, Woburn, Mass.

HEIMSTREET'S
Inimitable Hair Restorative.
IT IS NOT A DYE.
But restores grey hair to its original color, by supplying the capillary tubes with natural sustenance, impaired by age or disease. All unsightly appearance is removed of the tonsor canicie, destroying the vitality and beauty of the tonsor canicie, destroying the vitality and beauty of hair, and afford of themselves no dressing. Heimstreet's Inimitable Coloring not only restores hair to its natural color by an easy process, but cures the hair's

Luxuriant Beauty,

promotes its growth, prevents its falling off, eradicates dandruff, and imparts health and pleasantness to the head. It has stood the test of time, being the original Hair Coloring, and is constantly increasing in favor. Used by both gentlemen and ladies. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the country. Depot of the renowned Dyes of D. S. Barnes, 52 Broadway, N.Y. Two sizes, 50 c. and $1.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 322.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MAJOR-GENERAL HOOKER, COMMANDING THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

AOUR BLOCKADE.

(The owner of the steamer Princess Royal, and cargo was an M.P., who but your wanted England to disregard sour blockade, owno it wasn't effabeth. Iguo ble's fasand sout it's blo "block-ded" that is "unoffabetun."

WHAT dye think ov sour blockade now, old feller?
Don't it make your hed feal kind o' meller—
Sly'l, I mean—when yu reed
Of cute Jonathun's deed?
Took yare ship in, as the widder took" old Squire;

Who bev warned yu thet trubble was a brewin'
For fokes thet wood du es yu was duin—
That thare's meany a slip
Twixt the port and the ship—
But yu' wood kum aout tu far, tu yure roin!

I awanye it's the best joke ov the season!
Though yu mite hev expected it, in reason.
Yu bev shown plain enuff
Yu aint quite "up tu snuff"—
Takes a smarter chap then yu tu thrive on treason!

Our blockade is made ov paper, is't? du tell!
Guess a're bin made the "victim ov a sell!"
Seat keep on es yu've begun,
And continue with bev fun.
Prince Johnny Bull hes furnished suit 'em well.

CHARITY GRIMES.

MAJOR-GENERAL HOOKER.

WE publish on the preceding page a portrait of MAJOR-GENERAL JOSEPH HOOKER, who now commands the army of the Potomac.

Major-General Joseph Hooker was born in Massachusetts about the year 1817, and is consequently about 45 years of age. He entered West Point in 1833, and graduated in 1837, standing No. 28 in class which included Generals Benham, Williams, Sedgwick, etc., of the Union army, and Generals Bragg, Mackall, and Early of the rebel forces. At the outbreak of the war with Mexico he accompanied Captain, now General Hamer as Aid-de-camp, and was brevetted Captain for gallant conduct in several conflicts at Monterey. In March, 1847, he was appointed Assistant Adjutant-General, with the rank of Captain. At the National Bridge he distinguished himself, and was brevetted Major, and at Chapultepec he again attracted attention by his gallant and meritorious conduct, and was brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel.

At the close of the war with Mexico he withdrew from the service, and soon afterward emigrated to California. At the outbreak of the rebellion found him there, and he was one of the three who did old Winfield Scott, and the first Brigadier-Generals of Volunteers appointed by President Lincoln on 17th May, 1861; and was, on his arrival, placed in command of a brigade of the Army of the Potomac, and subsequently of a division. From July, 1861, to February, 1862, he was stationed in Southern Maryland, on the north shore of the Potomac, his duty being to prevent the rebels crossing the river, and to amuse them with their river blockade while McClellan was getting his army into trim. This difficult duty he performed admirably.

When the army of the Potomac moved to the Peninsula, Hooker accompanied them in charge of a division. In the contest at Williamsburg his division nearly stood the brunt of the battle, the men of the Excelsior Brigade actually being mowed down as they stood up in line. At Fair Oaks the men again displayed their valor, and the rebels fled fighting qualities. In the various minor contests Hooker took his part, and bravely went through with his share of the seven days' fight. When McClellan's army was placed under the command of General Pope, we find the names of "Fighting Joe Hooker" and the late General Kearney mentioned together in the thickest of the struggle; and again at South Mountain and Sharpsburg he seems to have been ever ready to do his duty. At last fight he was shot through the foot and obliged to leave the field; from this accident, he thinks he would have driven the rebels into the Potomac.

After the battle he sent the following report to General McClellan:

CENTREVILLE, MD., Sept 19, 1862.

Major-General McClellan:

A great battle has been fought, and we are victorious. I had the honor to open it yesterday afternoon, and it continued until dark. This morning, when it was daylight, we could see the enemy in force. The battle was fought with artillery and both sides. The contest was very severe. I only regret that I was not permitted to take part in the engagement after my wound was received. I counted on either capturing their army or driving them into the Potomac. My wound has been painful, but is not one that will be likely to lay me up. I was shot through the foot.

JOSEPH HOOKER, Brigadier-General.

On the reorganization of the army under General Burnside, General Hooker was given the command of the Right Grand Division into which it was distributed. He commanded his corps at Fredericksburg, but took no active part in the fight.

The Herald gives the following memoranda of him:

In person General Hooker is very tall, erect, compactly, but not heavily built, extremely muscular, and of great physical power. He is of light complexion, a fresh, ruddy countenance, full, clear, mild eyes, intellectual head, brown hair, slightly tinged with gray—altogether one of the most commanding officers in his bearing and appearance in the army.

In social intercourse he is frank, unpretending, and courteous, and in conversation reserved. He has a hasty but emphatic way of speaking, but it is only when he is in the heat of his command and in the storm of battle that he arrays himself in the stern and lofty speech of the commanding military dictator.

Perhaps it may not be uninteresting to our readers to learn how the subject of our sketch obtained the nickname of "Fighting Joe Hooker." On one occasion, after a battle, in which General Hooker's men had nobly polished themselves for their fighting qualities, and were fit to the fame of their commander, a despatch to the New York Associated Press was received at the office of one of the principal agencies announcing the fact. One of the copyists, wishing to show in an emphatic manner that this commander was really a fighting man, placed over the head of the manifold copies of the dispatch the words "Fighting Joe Hooker." Of course this heading went to nearly every newspaper office of the country, through the various agencies, and was readily adopted by the editors and printed in their journals. The nickname was also adopted by the army and by the people, and is now well known all over the world. Thus an augmenting, innocent copyist discovered that he was making history, prefixed to this General's name a title that will live forever in the annals of the country.

But it appears that General Hooker does not like his title; for on one occasion, when called to by a friend, he is reported to have said, "Don't call me Fighting Joe, for that name has done and is doing me considerable injury. It makes a portion of the public think that I am a bobtailed, fire-eating young fellow, seeking and making fuss and needless duties at the enemy." By this remark it would appear that, although he has the reputation of undoubted bravery and boldness, he still possesses some of that prudence and forethought which are generally said to be great.

General Hooker's friends in California have prepared a handsome testimonial in remembrance of his past services. It is a piece of the Mexican flag, and the thirty studded sigh diamonds, a emblem of solid silver, heavily and richly mounted with gold. The cost of the magnificent sword will be between $900 and $1000. The inscription is as follows:

MAJOR-GENERAL JOSEPH HOOKER,
FROM THE PRODUCTIONS OF THE PACIFIC SLOPE.
December 25, 1862.
Williamsburg—Fair Oaks—Malvern Hill—Malvern Hill—Bull Run—Germantown—South Mountain—Antietam.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1863.

OUR FINANCIAL POLICY.

BY the time this paper reaches its readers the financial policy of the General Government will have been determined by Congress.

It is impossible to say what amendments of detail may be made in the financial bills before they receive the sanction of the President. But it is certain that, in the main, the ways and means for the prosecution of the war will be derived as follows:

1*st.* By the issue of more legal-tender notes. Of these not more $200,000,000 are authorized by Acts of February and July, 1862, of which $250,000,000 have been issued. The House has voted for a further issue of $300,000,000; the Senate for a further issue of $150,000,000. If they compromise on $225,000,000, the aggregate issue will be $475,000,000, so long as the evil figure one is used with the Secretaries are undisturbed, and $525,000,000 after those loans have been called in.

2*d.* By the issue of new legal-tender notes, bearing interest, and not to be numbered by denomination. Both Houses have agreed upon an issue of $400,000,000 of these notes; the Senate, however, proposes that the interest shall not be payable in paper, while the House voted to pay it in coin. The Senate also proposes to make these notes absolutely a legal tender; while the House confines them exclusively to the loan market, and therefore only indirectly a currency.

3*d.* By the sale of long bonds, bearing not over six per cent. interest. Both Houses have agreed to an issue of $600,000,000 of these bonds. The House proposes to make them 20-year bonds; the Senate grants to the Secretary power to issue them for 5, 10, or 20 years, at his expedient. Both Houses agree that the interest and principal of these bonds shall be payable in coin.

4*th.* By the issue of fractional currency for sums less than a dollar. The House proposes to limit this issue to $50,000,000; the Senate proposes no limit on the issue.

It will become the duty of a Conference Committee to adjust the differences between the House and the Senate plans; their report will appear very soon; and when they have seen the light, if it has not been made public before.

Mr. Chase, in his report, stated that he required $600,000,000 to meet the wants of July, 1864. Mr. Spalding, of the House Committee of Ways and Means, and a guide quite as safe as the Secretary himself, stated that $1,100,000,000 would be required. He argued that the Conference Committee agree upon a further issue of United States notes to the extent of $300,000,000, and that the receipts for that period will be: United States notes, $225,000,000; Treasury Notes, $400,000,000; fractional currency, say, $50,000,000; 20 or 40 year bonds, $500,000,000; total, $1,175,000,000. In other words, Mr. Chase would be compelled to negotiate $425,000,000 of long bonds, at or near par, to pay his debts to July, 1864.

The Secretary's Bank bill has passed the Senate, and is said to be likely to pass the House also—though a majority of both bodies are known to be opposed to it. This measure authorizes the establishment of banks of issue, the issues of which are to be secured by deposit of United States bonds with the United States Treasury Department. The notes of these banks are to be exempt from taxation, not redeemable in coin, and receivable for all public dues. The objection urged by the opponents of this measure is not likely to be acted upon to any general extent. Speculators and some Western wild-cat bankers may avail themselves of the opportunity of issuing irredeemable paper; but no real banks are likely to be started under the new scheme until the war ends.

The practical feature of the Administration policy will be, must be, continued inflation. Great wars can not be waged on a specie basis. Issues of irredeemable paper are as essential to their prosecution as issues of shot and shell from Government arsenals. This is one of the great evils of war. But it is an evil necessary and inevitable; and the part of wisdom is to expect and make allowance for it—not to exclaim against it, or to try to render the Administration responsible for results over which they have no more control than the winds of heaven.

COPPERHEADISM.

MR. CLEMENT VALLANDIGHAM, member of Congress from Ohio, made a speech last week which he avowed himself a "Copperhead." Certain editors nearer home have likewise rejoiced in the title. It becomes interesting to inquire what it means, and how it came to be applied to a class of politicians.

A "copperhead," according to the American Cyclopedia, is a venomous serpent....the head is thick ...the neck contracted, and its scales smooth; there are no rattles, the tail being short ...near the flanks are rounded dark blotches ... it prefers dark and moist places ... It gives no warning of its proximity ... feeds on mice, small birds, etc., and seldom attacks man ... it is slow and clumsy in its motions, and a very slight blow suffices to kill it ... It is also called 'chunkhead' and 'deaf-adder.'"

It can not be denied that the analogy between this loathsome reptile and the mean, sneaking politicians who are now distracting the Northern mind with cries of peace is quite striking. Like the copperhead, the peace party are "venomous" in their attacks on the nation; like it, their "head" is undoubtedly "thick;" like it, their "neck" and reach are "contracted." Their "scales," too, are "smooth;" and they have no rattles to warn the honest traveler of their insidious approach. Like the copperhead, their character is "stained by dark blotches;" and, like it, they "prefer dark places" to the light of day. Like that sneaking reptile, their prey is "small, feeble creatures;" and they "seldom venture to attack" a man. If we add that our political Copperheads, like their reptile type, are so "slow and clumsy in their motions" that they deserve the additional cognomina of "Chunkhead" and "deaf-adder," and that a "very slight blow" makes an end of them, we shall have made the analogy complete. It is creditable to the discernment of our Western fellow-citizens that they quickly realized the resemblance between the copperhead snake and the peace politician, and baptized them by one common appellation.

We shall not waste time in arguing with the Copperheads. Men who are capable of justifying the rebels and espousing their cause when the Rebel Congress declares that every Northern family reddens Southern soil, and the bones of Northern soldiers are worn as ornaments by Southern women, are not likely to be convinced by argument, or to be pervious to any thing short of a bayonet thrust.

But one suggestion we will make. If Mr. Vallandigham, the leader of his fellow-copperheads, will visit any large camp of loyal troops, either in the East or in the West or in the South, and, in the presence of the soldiers, express the sentiments they have uttered at Newark, New York, and elsewhere; and if, without the protection of the generals and provost-marshals, whom they so heartily despise, they could, after delivering their speech, in making their escape alive, and without a coat of tar and feathers, we shall agree that they have materially belied the loyal Northern soldiers are anxious to have the challenge accepted.

THE LOUNGER.

VICTORY OR DEFEAT.

THERE are people who begin to talk about mediation, negotiation, and peace; who think the war is a drawn game, and that we can never subdue the rebels. The Illinois Legislature is in labor with resolutions calling a Convention to adjust matters. The New Jersey Legislature proposes to send commissioners to ask the rebels what they will take to come back again. The Indiana philosophers wish to know why Massachusetts does not go down to Richmond. The Ohio Democrats in English newspapers grin across the water and exhort us to give it up.

Give it up! Say'em back? When the rebels have had enough of it, let them say so. Until then the duty of the Government is like that of small boys in the street when the policeman appears: it is to move on. Any proposition of armistice, negotiation, mediation, or whatever smooth name it may bear, is only a confession of ignorance and ruin to the country. The Government is maintaining its authority, nothing more. Every one who has studied the civil wars of Rome, England, and France, knows that the only way to restore authority is overthrown at one point it falls at all points. If it is successfully defied in Charleston, it ceases in Chicago. If the French Government were obliged to acknowledge the separate independence of any Department of France, a revolution would have been accomplished which would radically change the Government. The case of colonial is different, because they are not integral parts of the national domain.

That the truth is as we state it would be seen in this, that the moment the "Confederacy" were acknowledged, movements in various of the remaining States would begin for the purpose of effecting union with the governments which had proved itself the strongest. There is, therefore, no other ground of treating with the rebels than the consciousness that they have conquered us. Then, like all other evildoers, we must do the best we can. If they will undertake to govern us, we must pray them to be as mild as they think we deserve. If they kick us out, as the "Confederacy" is meanly to crawl back to it. If they refuse us while we are united, each State must singly try to lie most ghastly in the lies, and to make the best terms whatever may see and be satisfied not only that manliness, honor, and decency are utterly extinct in our hearts, but that we richly deserve that we get in the end. The rebels, who have always claimed to be our natural lords and masters, despised us before they took up arms to shatter us, but when they have whipped us in, there will be loathing in their contempt.

This is the feast to which any kind of settlement other than a total submission of the rebellion by military measures invites us. This is the pit which "Conservatism" of every shade is digging for the nation. Better to fight the battle out with whatever result. Better that Liberty be utterly vanquished and overthrown by Slaverythan patch up a separation, an armistice, a peace. Then it is left to the death shows Liberty to be still godlike. To pray to dodge and shirk shows her to be tainted by the devil with which she is struggling.

But between the two essential pair cpiles now contending there can be no question. The behavior yields the truce confesses defeat. There can be no peace between them, because the rule of the one is the ruin of the other. There can be no more any peace between them, for our whole political history is the story of the struggle under forms of law which has now flamed out into civil war. Jefferson Davis knows it, and therefore spits upon every proposal of submission. His hopes from dimision to become a lease for Slavery. Let us not secure it shrewd but hopeless. There will be but one nation, but one Government, but one Union upon our domain. The condition of its peace is the absolute obedience to the lawful supreme national authority, and the moral and permanent basis of that authority will be justice and equal human rights.

ANTIPATHY OF RACE AND RELIGION.

Two or three years ago a noted Hebrew Rabbi delivered a discourse upon the consoling text that intense prejudice was born to a low degree. However, this kind of discourse is always preached by people who consider that they do not belong to that class. There is many a fine gentleman and lady who will tell you how greatly superior the system of foreign society is to our own. They think it an admirable thing to have "the common people" kept in their place. But then they always assume that they themselves belong in another place. It is no contradiction to prove that they may even born to be damned. You may hear one of these placid gentlemen saying, "Yes, we beloved fellow-creatures, are born accursed; but I, by being specially elected to have your children sold by another man to pay his debts, am elected to keep mine, and buy yours if I want to." As one! if we could only hear the lion's story!

Well, it was amusing, as I was thinking of this worthy Rabbi, and of those of his race who doubtless hold his opinions—as, for instance, the great Hebrew bankers, the Rothschilds, who have agents in Madrid the robel commissioner turned over his papers upon leaving—to come upon a few facts in regard to the wild Christian antipathy to the Hebrew race, which was probably the fiercest recorded in history, even worse than that of the Irish and English, or of the Spaniard and the Moor. Indeed it is an antipathy by no means extinct, although disgraceful. Will those who indulge it, or who cherish any prejudice of race, and prove or call it invincible, reflect upon these facts, which are such a pleasing commentary upon the Rabbi's sermon that some people are born to be condemned?

"Circumscribed in their rights by decrees and laws of the ecclesiastics, as well as civil power; excluded from all offices of honor; driven from place to place, from province to province; compelled to subsist almost exclusively by mercantile operations and usury; despised and degraded in the cities; kept in narrow quarters, and hurled in their dress with signs of contempt; plundered by princes and people without justice; an easy prey to all parties during civil feuds; again and again robbed of their pecuniary claims; stripped of all property at the will of princes; butchered by mobs and revolted peasants; chased by the wrecks; burnt by the thousand in their houses; and also burnt their brethren of Jerusalem in their synagogue; tormented by ridicule, abusive sermons, monstrous accusations and false charges; and experiments of conversion—the Jews of England, France, and Germany offer, in their medieval history, a frightful picture of horrors and misery."

You see that they had no rights which any Christian man was bound to respect, because they were Jews. You remember poor old Isaac of York, in Ivanhoe. He was plainly born to have his teeth wrenched out to make him tell where his gold was, because he was a Jew. In London, during a long drought, in 1391, they were murdered in many cities, because they were Jews; and in 1753 all the Jews in Berlin, about 3000 in family, were tabulated—because they were Jews. Can't you fancy a worthy Christian priest preaching to a congregation of his own faith that it is the inscrutable design of God that all Jews should be banished, and have their teeth pulled, and be massacred frightfully—because they were Jews? It was very inscrutable, of course; but it was clearly Providential that Jews should be sold as serfs, and robbed, and imprisoned, and degraded, and outraged—because they were Jews.

That is our logic to-day. The African race is treated with the same ignominy and injustice as the Jews. Why not? They are accursed, you know. They are an inferior race. Good Heavens, what heels! They are much better off than they are enslaved. It is Christianity. Every slave region reeks with the Christian virtues. Every body knows—ask the worthy Rabbi, or any money-changer of his faith, if it is not so—that the Hebr— that is to say, the African, have a natural aptitude for being outraged.

Let the Hebrew Shylock answer for every man of every race whose equal human rights are denied:

"He hath disgraced me, . . . and what's his reason? I am a Jew. Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same summer and winter as a Christian is? If you prick us, do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? If you poison us, do we not die? And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?"

O! worthy Rabbi, is it not, upon the whole, cheaper to treat men as born to be men?

WHO QUOTE THE LONDON "TIMES?"

THE friends of the rebellion at the North are beginning to quote the London Times in support of their political views. They are wise. They have not a stronger ally than that paper. There has been no more constant, false, venomous, and unscrupulous enemy of this country and its Government than the London Times: and those who are engaged in helping the rebels destroy it by insisting that it has a right to use to us all its power to help itself will find their arguments much more strong and reliable stated by the London Times than they are by the Richmond Enquirer or the Charleston Appeal, or by any of the papers which the Democratic Committee proposes to circulate among the troops.

Lest, however, any honest man, who is not in the habit of reading the London Times, or who has no opportunity of knowing its sentiments, should wish to understand what views are entertained in those circles which furnish arms and ammunition to those who are crying to paralyze the Government of the United States, we submit a short extract from a late number, and it is the keynote of all it thinks and says of this country and the war:

"The United States have been a vast burlesque on the function of government: and there is no reason why the fate to behold their transformation cease, and to see the first tumbles of their clowns and pantaloons."

When such sentiments find it convenient to their purpose to quote from a foreign paper which speaks of us in this way, even in a review of a book, what probably is that purpose?

TRUTH PUT TO THE WALL.

A MR. WALL, of New Jersey, who was elected United States Senator by a majority of the Legislature of that State because he had been arrested as dangerously disloyal to the United States Government, in a late speech in the Senate quoted the London Times in support of his resolution of the State old untruth that the West India emancipation had left the negro race in a worse condition than it was in slavery. Mr. Senator Wall ought to know that the London Times is no more an authority upon that question than John C. Breckinridge upon the Constitutional duty of American citizens, or the New Jersey Legislature upon patriotism. The authorities in the Jamaica question is the word of the Governor of the colony; and we commend some passages in his report for 1861 to the consideration of Mr. Senator Wall and other statesmen who devote themselves exclusively to exciting the prejudice of one part of their fellow-citizens against another. Governor Darling says:

"The proportion of those colored men who are settling themselves industriously upon their holdings, and rapidly rising in the social scale, while commanding the respect of all classes of the community, and some of whom are, in a limited extent, becomes the employers of their fellows, paid for either in money or in kind, is, I am happy to think, not only steadily increasing, but at the present moment is far more extensive than was supposed by those who are cognizant of all that took place in that colony in the early days of negro freedom.

"There can be no doubt, in fact, that an independent, respectable, and, generally, trustworthy native class is rapidly forming . . . . If the real object of emancipation was to place the freed man in such a position that he might work out his own advancement in the world, and prove his capacity for the full and rational enjoyment of freedom, I cannot, secured by Constitutional liberty, Jamaica will afford more instances, even in proportion to its large population, than can be produced by any other land in which African slavery once existed.

"Jamaica at this moment presents, as I believe, . . . the strongest proof of the complete success of the great measure of emancipation as relates to the capacity of the emancipated race for freedom."

The Governor then proceeds to speak of the decline in commercial importance of the colony, stating the reasons for it, and ogeping another question. Of course the only answer to these truthful and temperate official statements is that Governor Darling is probably a "d—d abolitionist." For slavery, reduced as it is in the discussion to the last extremity, politically, socially, industrially, and morally, has no other reply left than "d—d abolitionist." And even that valorous and vague cious argument is already staggering on its last legs. For Beauregard the Great calls all Lincoln hirelings and Northern rebels, whatever their views of slavery may be, "abolitionists."

Heavens! Governor Darling's report entirely annihilates the wild talk of the London Times quoted by Senator Wall.

M. MERCIER FS. THE UNITED STATES.

In the French yellow-covered literature which the Emperor has lately published, the letters of M. Mercier, the French minister in the country, are the most interesting pages to us. The sympathies of M. Mercier have been well known from the beginning of the war. They have never been more one set forth in this paper. But there has been no such plain statement of them as he makes in a letter to his chief, M. Thouvenel, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, immediately after the autumn elections. He writes under date of November 10, 1862: "But if it (the war) should be restrained within the limits and principles and rights recognised by the Constitution, it would not completely attain its aim."

That is to say, that the Union can not be constitutionally maintained; that the Government can not defend itself without overthrowing the Constitution.

This is a doctrine which M. Mercier learned from his friends the rebels. It is the doctrine which was held by Mr. Buchanan and his friends. But Buchanan said in his message that people had no right to destroy the Government, but if they tried, the Government had no power to defend itself. And even at all, said Mr. Mason, cheerfully, and Mr. Hunter, and Mr. Slidell, and Mr. Benjamin, at those charming dinners and dinner of which his Excellency the French Minister was an ornament.

Nor was it the doctrine of the President's cabinet and the Washington salons only. Mr. Russell, the London Times, describes a series of agreeable breakfasts and dinners made in his honor in New York upon his arrival, at which precisely the same "Conservative" sentiments were expressed. He found that the general opinion seemed to be that the Constitution could not defend itself, must be saved. If it were only vigorously attacked it had great recuperative powers. And the London Times gives as its last opinion of the very question of the treadle of rebellious circles in Washington, and the imbecile President's message, in New York, and of an imbecile President's message, and a knavish cabinet's counsel, that it is simply a failure of the American Constitution.

M. Mercier gravely writes this failure as a fact. But if he had lived less in the city of Washington and more in the country, if he had mingled—if he had learned that the sentiment of card parties in Washington, and of dinner parties in New York, was not the public opinion of this nation, if he were not have allowed his sympathy and hopes to prevail against his better knowledge and his common sense. But if there be not in him that common sense it is, that so vast and powerful a nation as this does not submit to dismemberment or anarchy without a struggle, that the whole instinct of self-preservation which lends a man to defend himself inspires a great people to maintain their political existence by every means at their command.

M. Mercier may learn something of this truth by watching affairs in Mexico. And his mistake will learn it to their fullest satisfaction by looking sharp at the American people.

MR. RICHARDS'S STUDIES AND SKETCHES.

IT these sober times the painters are still busy in their studios, and it is a curious relief from the stern engagements of the day to enter those quiet rooms and see the tranquil streams, meadows, grazing cattle, and hazy mountains. Mr. T. Addison Richards, formerly Assistant Secretary of the National Academy, proposes a sale of some of his paintings, sketches, and studies—landscapes, chiefly, and those of the most agreeable kind—on the Derby Gallery on the 24th of February. The visitors to the annual exhibitions need no introduction to his name; and whoever has been interested in the collection will prove to be the site-or a gold mine, and that every placid stream may be covered with that choicer game than canvas-backs, green-backs.

"A TALK WITH MY PUPILS."

IN speaking of this pleasant and valuable little volume a fortnight ago, we know not under what misconception we did so. We spoke of it as the author-ess, Mrs. Sedgwick, of Lenox, Massachusetts, as having relinquished her school. We hasten to correct the error. The book tells a well-known pile who are about her, as well as with those who go to her school in the persons of their daughters. And the book is the picture of the thoughtful, the sagacity, and pure tone of all the influences of the school.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A LATE school, well known for his gigantic size and burly deportment, being unexpectedly by a diminutive freshman in the street, with "Hullo, old fellow!" . . . "I say, was not such a little reptile I would kick you down stairs." "Little reptile!" repeated the creditor. "And what if I am? Recollect, sir, that what is little is sometimes strong."

A sentiment/young man thus feelingly expresses himself: "Even as Nature benevolently guards the roe with fleetness, she endows with prolificness the rabbit."

The lady whose heart "swelled with indignation" has had it reduced with poultices.

Not many months ago, a Philadelphia friend, who resides in Chestnut Street, sold his device to a young and attractive widow, named Rachel H——, residing on Long Island. The widow paid him a round sum for the tool, or from some other cause, the offer was declined. Shortly after, a quarrel took place between the two, and the modern lucretia he had known where Rachel refused to be Comforted.

Never quarrel with a lady. If you are troubled with her, retreat; if she abuses you, be silent; if she tears your hair, give her your cane; if she pours dirt upon you, be her in return; if she tears your eyes out, feel your way to the door, and—fly!

A correspondent of a contemporary says: "It is my duty to impress upon you the certain fact that one-half of our young people have their heads turned the wrong way before. One of our party has already written five letters to his lady-love, and has been about growing and signing in a most pitiable manner. She has no opposite, and can get at the top of the house, close to the moon. He can only stand by one of the columns of the piazza without putting on his coat to watch, and I caught him kissing an apple to-day because it had red cheeks."

An Irishman, being a little full, was asked what was his religious belief. "Is it me belafe you're asking about?" said he. "Why, I belafe in Father Mathy. I belafe in twelve shillings for whisky, and she behaves I'll never pay her; and, faith, that's my belief, too."

PATENT SHOCKER.—A young lady was recently cured of palpitation of the heart by a young M.D. in the most natural way imaginable. He held one of her hands in his, put his arm round her waist, and whispered something in her right ear.

A printer out West, whose office is half a mile from any other building, and who hangs his sign on the limb of a tree, advertises that he operates. He says, "A boy from the country preferred."

N'A CURIOSITY.—The very last curiosity spoken of in the papers is a white negro! A slave "sold with his wife and child." The man who has discovered it has retired from public life.

"Doctor, the"re rat's-bane of yours is fast-rate," said a Yankee to a village apothecary. "Know'd it know'd it," replied the latter, "proof of arsenic." "Don't keep nothing but fast-rate doctor's stuff." "And, doctor," said the Jokey, calmly, "I want to buy another pound of you." "Another pound!" "Yes, Sir; I go that pound I bought the other day to a boarding-house myself, and one devoured at sick, and I'm sure another pound would kill him."

After quoting John Locke, that a blind man took his idea of scarlet from the sound of a trumpet, a writer says that a hoop skirt, hanging out of a shop door, always reminds him of the peal of a bell!

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

What was Eve's maiden name?
Per Adam's Express Company.
Why are your nose and your chin always at variance?
Because an expression of feature divides them.
What fruit kept best in the ark?
The preserved pears of creation.
Why should the number 288 never be named before 14?
Because it is too gross (one).

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Wednesday, February 11, in the Senate, a resolution to compensate the sailors of the gun-boat Cairo for loss of clothing was adopted. Mr. Wilkinson offered a resolution for a referendum telegraph along the Southern coast, to the construction of which he pledged himself to Washington to New York, and to the amendment of the Fugitive Slave act, which he promised. The bill to increase the number of major and brigadier generals was briefly discussed. The debate was brief only because it was postponed, and continued till the adjournment.——In the House, bills were introduced for the establishment of a Territorial Government for Nevada, and to repeal so much of the act of 1862 as prohibits the introduction of slaves into the Territories. A resolution was adopted, on the motion of Mr. Colfax of Indiana, calling a report from the Secretary of State, with the correspondence and papers relative to the recognition of Hayti and Liberia on the part of the French Government. The President was requested to furnish the correspondence relative to the mediation he may have regarding the employment of negroes by the French colonies. The bill to increase the number of major and brigadier generals was taken up, and Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, moved to strike out the major and fifty brigadier generals was adopted, and the bill was passed. ——In the Senate, on the 12th, the bill providing a temporary government for the Territory of Montana was taken up. A substitute for the bill providing for the admission of the Territory was rejected—39 against 26—and the bill passed. Mr. Wilkinson offered a bill for the admission of Washington Territory. The consideration of the bill indemnifying the loyal citizens of Louisiana and Arkansas for property of the writ of habeas corpus was postponed. In Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill an amendment to be reported to the House. The bill making appropriations for the support of the Army was taken up, and the sum of $300,000 for the defence of Washington agreed to. The amendment was reported to the House, and the House adjourned.

On February 13, in the Senate, the Military Committee reported back Mr. Sumner's bill to raise three hundred regiments from the slaves of rebel masters, recommending that it do not pass, because the authority intended to be granted is already conferred by the act of July 17, 1862. At the expiration of the morning hour the bill to provide for the payment of claims against the Government was taken up, and the amendment being taken separately, was agreed to—yeas 28, nays 14. The bill was then passed. The Naval Appropriation bill was taken up. The amendment reported from the Committee on Finance to increase the Secretary of the Navy contingent fund was rejected. The House bill to provide for the payment of the Government contingent was taken up. The House bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1863, and for other purposes, was taken up, and after debate a substitute was offered by Senator Grimes and adopted, authorizing the President, in all domestic and foreign wars, to issue letters of marque, and make all needful regulations relating thereto. The bill was then passed by a vote of 37 against 3. The Naval Appropriation bill was reported back by the Finance Committee. A bill to guarantee to certain States a republican form of government was introduced. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Military Committee were instructed to inquire into the efficiency of the medical department of the Army under General Hooker, and to report such legislation as necessary to secure the utmost possible skill and attention in the care of the sick and wounded soldiers. The Indian Appropriation bill was passed. The Loudoun Junction case was discussed, and the report of the Committee, Messrs. Flanders and Hahn entitled to seats adopted by a vote—negative forty-four, affirmative 43. Mr. Dunnell entered upon his duties; but Mr. Flanders was absent. The report of the Committee of Elections, relative to the claim of Mr. McKenzie, of Virginia, was adopted. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency bill, and means for the support of the Government were all acted on, and the House adjourned.

THE FRENCH PROPOSAL TO ARBITRATE.

The President sent into the Senate last week a letter from M. Drouyn de l'Huys proposing to confer with the South with a view to peace.

"If the Cabinet of Washington," says he, "believes that it ought to repel any foreign intervention, could it be brought about in the idea of direct intercourse or intercourse with the authority which now represents the States of the South? . . . The opening of informal conferences between the belligerent parties does not necessarily imply the immediate cessation of hostilities. The unanimously offered or Commissioners of the two parties could assemble at such point as it should be deemed proper to designate, and which could, for this purpose, be declared neutral."

Mr. Seward, in his reply to this proposal, gives a brief survey of the present military situation in this country. He tells the French Minister that the contest is not yet a revolutionary one, and it may well have been thought by the Emperor of Australia one. But, says Mr. Seward, nothing less than a proposition that while this Government is engaged in suppressing an armed insurrection, with the purpose of maintaining the national existence and integrity and preserving the integrity of the country, it shall enter into negotiations which shall be the result to recognize the questions whether that authority shall not be renounced, and whether the country shall not be dismembered over to disunion, to be quickly followed by another. Adds Mr. Seward, in behalf of the Imperial offer, Mr. Seward suggests that the true and constitutional forum for dispute between the people and the Federal Government of the United States, where there are vacant seats awaiting the Senators and Representatives of the insurrectionary States, by who may be constitutionally sent there from the State s in which they reside.

Mr. Seward, in this dispatch, upholds with splendid power the dignity and the right of the Government both the national spirit and purpose. It is a document of extraordinary power and elevation, and of unquestionable meaning, and in every respect is fully up to the height of the great argument.

THE LEVEES CUT.

The levees on the Mississippi side of the river, twelve miles below Helena, Arkansas, have been cut by our forces. They have also been cut at Greenville, and on the Louisiana shore opposite Lake Providence. The object of this is to get to the rear of Vicksburg.

THE BLOCKADE OF CHARLESTON AND NOT BROKEN.

Flag-Officer WILLIAM PRESTON BOYCE, Senior Captain, July 16, 1862.

SIR.—In my letter of yesterday I informed you that the mail was closing. I informed the department I would send a refutation, in letters, of the statements made in General Beauregard's proclamation as to the blockade of Charleston, and I now do so. I have collected from such papers, and accompanied by memoranda made with the approximate dates of the events to which they refer. The requisite letter of Captain Turner No. 1), the clear and decided letter of Captain Turner (No. 2), and the letter of Lieut. Stellwagen, together with the previous inquiries and examination of the books on the subject, all go to show that Captain Turner was the senior officer present previous to the arrival of the Flag-Officer Dupont. I had dispatched the letter to you on the day of the mail, leave no notice to add, save to express my entire satisfaction at the statement to the facts above enclosed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. F. DUPONT,

Rear-Admiral commanding South Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy.

FALL OF THE LOUISVILLE CONVENTION.

The Louisville Convention resolves, adopted by a party vote in the Illinois House, have finally failed in the Senate of that State—the vote in the latter body standing 17 to 17—others voted with the Republicans against pressing the resolutions to a vote. So it is very certain that the Louisville gathering, which was to have convened on the 18th of last month, will not be held. Governor Johnson, of the New Jersey Legislature seems reluctant to inaugurate revolutionary proceedings, while that of Indiana has backed, and even Kentucky has not yet acceded to the proposed convention.

THE "ALABAMA" AT KINGSTON, JAMAICA.

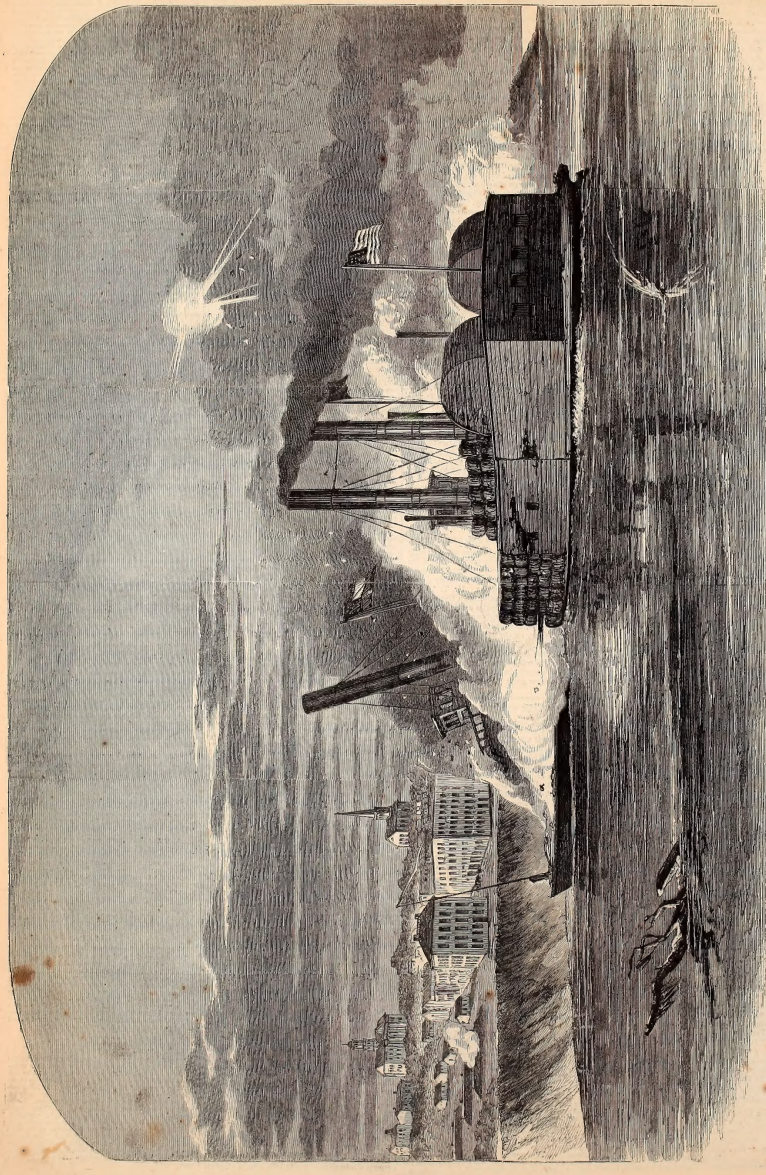
The Alabama arrived at Kingston, Jamaica, on 23d January. A correspondent of the London Times says that officers and citizens of Kingston in the Connecticut Exchange on the 24th "had the pleasure of meeting on board with the distinguished lamer by our "neutral" British friends, who welcomed him on board with the utmost cordiality and courtesies ebcare. The crew of the Hortense, who were landed by the Alabama, were also received on board the American ship Bredelius, chartered by the American Vice-Consul for their passage home.

THE SLAVES TO BE PAID IN LOUISIANA.

The planters of Louisiana are greatly exercised concerning the emancipation scheme. A meeting was held on the important meeting at New Orleans in reference to the latest scheme of the Government. The chief topic was the abuse of the Government, of which they are "registered enemies." They seem to have agreed at last to pay their negroes wages.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.



ANOTHER STEAMER FOR THE REBELS.

THE steamer of the Alabama class, the Alabama, was in the harbor of Holyhead, England, last week to sail for the South. She is described as a very formidable craft of rough-looking men of sinister appearance. She has a crew of twenty-two officers and one hundred and carries out quantity of tea and other necessaries for the use and benefit of the officers. A letter from Holyhead says: "Her crew—rather numerous, by-the-way—are all Danes, Swedes, and Norwegians, and look like the offspring of Cooper's heroes. She is bound for America, and looks just the thing for running a blockade."

MEXICO.

THE WAR WITH FRANCE.

The skeleton notice are getting forth the most vigorous efforts for the defence of the capital. The fortifications and the French invaders are characterized by say that they are the dash and rapidity of movement of the General Forey promised in his proclamation. The Emperor's direction is not promptly and decisively to supersede the leg carried out by the rule of inverse proportion. There have been several skirmishes between the Mexicans and French, in which the former have come off victorious. The attack on Puebla, so often defeated, has again been put off, and by the most time the Mexican Commander has had to fortify it. Gen. Bazaine is at Orizaba. The trains and outposts continually suffer from the depredations of guerrilla bands. Since the 1st of January to the 1st More than 1200 French males have been taken by these

THE FEDERAL RAM "QUEEN OF THE WEST" ATTACKING THE REBEL GUN-BOAT "VICKSBURG" OFF VICKSBURG.—[SEE PAGE 133.]

Capt. Charles Semmanat, Co. D. 1st Lieut. L. D. Larrieu, Co. A. 2d Lieut. J. L. Montieu, Co. A. Capt. E. Davis, Co. A.
2d Lieut. V. Lavigne, Co. D.

OUR COLORED TROOPS—THE LINE OFFICERS OF THE FIRST LOUISIANA NATIVE GUARDS.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

[SEE PAGE 143.]

OUR COLORED TROOPS AT WORK—THE FIRST LOUISIANA NATIVE GUARDS DISEMBARKING AT FORT MACOMBE, LOUISIANA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

[SEE PAGE 143.]

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK.

By the Author of "Mary Barton," etc.

[Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."]

CHAPTER VIII.

STILL youth prevailed over all. Ellinor got well, as I have said, even when she would fain have died. And the afternoon came when she left her room. Miss Monro would gladly have made a festival of her recovery, and have had her conveyed into the unused drawing-room. But Ellinor begged that she might be taken into the library—into the school-room—any where (thought she) but looking on the side of the house on the flower-garden, which she had felt in all her illness as a ghastly presence, lying within call of the close very window through which the morning sun streamed right upon her bed—like the accusing angel, bringing all hidden things to light.

And when Ellinor was better still, when the Beth chair had been sent up for her use by some kindly old maid out of Hamley, who still petitioned that it might be kept on the lawn or town side of the house, away from the flower-garden.

One day she almost screamed when, as she was going to the front door, she saw Dixon standing ready to draw her instead of Fletcher, the servant she usually went. But she checked all demonstration of feeling, although it was the first time she had seen him since he and she and one more had wished their hearts out in bodily labor.

He looked so stern and ill! Cross too, which she had never seen him before.

As soon as they were out of immediate sight of the window she asked him to stop, forcing herself to speak to him.

"Dixon, you look very poorly," she said, trembling as she spoke.

"Ay!" said he. "We did na' think much of it at the time, did we, Miss Nelly? But it will be the death of me, I'm thinking. It has aged me about a bit. All my fifty years afore were but as a forenoon of child's play to that night. Measter, too, I could almost a good deal for measter cuts through the stable-yard, and past me, wi'out a word, as if I was poison, or a stinking toomart. It is that as is worst, Miss Nelly, it is."

And the poor man brushed some tears from his eyes with the back of his withered, horny hand. Ellinor caught the infection, and cried outright—sobbed like a child, even while she held out her hand to shake his hand to say good-by for as soon as he saw her emotion he was penitent for what he had said.

"Don't now—don't," was all he could think of to say.

"Dixon!" said she, at length, "you must not mind [—don't say you're not to mind it, for I know it does not like to be reminded of that, even by seeing me. He tries never to be alone with me. My poor old Dixon, it has spoiled my life for me; for I don't think he loves me any more."

She sobbed as if her heart would break; and now it was Dixon's turn to be comforter.

"Ah, dear, my blessing! he loves you above every thing. It's only he can't abear the sight of us, as is but natural. And if he should fancy being alone with you, there's always one as does, and that is a comfort at the worst of times. And don't ye fret about what I said a bit years ago. I were put out because measter all but pushed me out of his way this morning, without never a word. But I were an old fool for taking eye. And I've really forgotten why I told Fletcher I'd rayther ye a bit about to-day. The gardener is beginning for to wonder ay you don't want to see the annuals and bedding-out things as you were so particular about in May. And I thought I'd just have a word wi' ye, and that if you'd let me we'd go together just once round the flower-garden, just to say you've been, you know, and to give them chaps a bit of rayting. You'll only have to look on the beds, my pretty, and it may do ye sometimes to see summat green."

He began to pull resolutely in the direction of the flower-garden. Ellinor bit her lips to keep in the cry of pain that otherwise rose to them. As Dixon stopped to unlock the door, he said:

"It's not hardness, nothing like it; I have waited till I could get you were better; I'd not for a penny in for a pound wi' us all; and folk may talk; and bless your little brave heart, you'll stand a deal for your father's sake, and so will I though I do feel it above a bit, when he puts out his hand as if to keep me off, and I only going to speak to him. Measter Clipper's house, though I'd own I had wondered many a day when I was to have the good-morrow master never missed giv' he were a stop-time. Well! I said nowt as I seen the beds, and can say they looked mighty pretty; and as done ahs you would [—and were got out again, and breathing fresher air, and you sun-baked hole, with its smelling flowers, not half so wholesome to snoff as as good stable-dung."

So the good man chattered on; not without the apparent object of getting Ellinor into a rage herself; and partly also to drown his own cares, which lay heavier on his heart than he could say. But he steadied himself presently by Ellinor's thanks, and warm pressure of his hand hand as she got out at the front door, and bade him good-by.

The break to her days of weary monotony was the letters she constantly received from Mr. Corbet. And yet, here again lurked the sting. He was all astonishment and indignation at Mr. Dunster's disappearance, or rather flight to America. And now that she was growing well enough he did not scruple to express curiosity respecting the details, never doubting but that she was perfectly acquainted with much that he wanted to know; although he had too much delicacy to question her on the point which was most important of all to his eyes, namely, how far it had affected Mr. Wilkins's worldly prospects; for the report prevalent in Hamley had reached London, that Mr. Dunster had made off with, or carried off trust-property to a considerable extent, for all which Mr. Wilkins would of course be liable.

It was hard work for Ralph Corbet to keep from seeking direct information on this head from Mr. Monro, or indeed from Mr. Wilkins himself. But he restrained himself, knowing that in August he should be able to make all these inquiries personally. By the middle of the June Vacation he had hoped to marry Ellinor; that was the time which had been planned by them when they had met in town the year before her illness had all this misfortune happened. But now, as he wrote to his father, nothing could be definitively arranged until she had paid his visit to Hamley, and seen the state of affairs.

Accordingly, one Saturday in August, he came to Ford Ellinor, this time as a visitor to Miss Monro's home, instead of to his old quarters at Mr. Ness's.

The house was still as if asleep in the full heat of the afternoon sun as Mr. Corbet drove up. The window-blinds were down; the front door open, great masses of roses, jessamine, and rose, and geraniums stood just within the shadow of the hall; but through all the silence his approach seemed to excite no observation. He thought it strange that he had not been watched for, that some did not come running out to meet him. But he allowed Fletcher to take charge and attend to his luggage, and ushered him into the library just like a well-known visitor, any morning caller. He stiffened himself up into a supremely indignant coldness of manner. But it vanished in an instant, on the door being opened, when he saw Ellinor standing holding by the table, looking for his appearance with almost panting anxiety. Her face looked thinner than her last evident weakness, her changed looks, for which no account of her illness had prepared him. For she was standing in shade, and the light that dark eyes seemed unnaturally enlarged, while the cheek in which they were set strangely deep and hollow. But she was dressed with all her pretty closely; she did not usually wear a cap, but with some faint idea of making herself look better in his eye, she had put one on that day; and the effect was that she seemed to be forty years of age; but one instant after he had come in her calm face was lighted up with joy, and her eyes were full of tears. She had hard work to keep herself from going into hysterics, but she instinctively knew that he would not like a scene, and she checked herself in time.

"Oh," she murmured, "I am so glad to see you. I am so glad you have come. It is very good of you to come."

And so she went on, cooing out words over him, and stroking his hair with her thin fingers. When he looked up and met her eyes, he was so much afraid of betraying how much he thought her altered.

But when she sat down, dressed for dinner, this sense of her change was diminished to him. Her short brown hair had already a little wave, and was crossed on her forehead in a line; she wore a large black lace shawl, it had been her mother's of old, over some delicate-colored muslin dress; her face was slightly pale, and had the tints of a wild rose; her lips kept pale and trembling with involuntary motion, it is true; and as the hours went on, and she grew a little hardened by the window, he was aware of a little convulsive twitching at every noise, even while she seemed gazing out of window on the long, long, smooth slope of the newly-mown lawn, stretching down to the little brook that prattled merrily over the stones on its course to Hamley town.

He felt a stronger twitch than ever before, even while his ear, less delicate than hers, could distinguish no peculiar sound. About two minutes after that Miss Monro entered the room. He came up to Mr. Corbet with more cordiality, some of it real, some of it assumed. He talked volubly to Ralph, giving him no notice of Ellinor, who dropped into the back-ground and sat down on the sofa by Miss Monro; for on this day they were all to dine together. Ralph saw that Mr. Wilkins was anxious to spare his daughter any exertion, beyond that, to which indeed she seemed scarcely equal, of sitting at the head of the table. And the more her father talked—so fine an observer was Mr. Corbet—the more silent and depressed Ellinor seemed. Her melody is accounted for this inverse ratio of gayety, as he perceived how quickly Mr. Wilkins had his glass replenished. And Mr. Corbet drew from these his conclusions from the silent way in which, without a word or a sign from Mr. Wilkins, Fletcher gave him more wine—not claret usually; wine that was drained off at once.

"Six glasses of sherry before dessert," thought Mr. Corbet to himself. "Bad habit—no wonder Ellinor looks grave." And when the gentlemen were left alone, Mr. Wilkins helped himself even yet more freely; yet without the slightest effect on the clearness and brilliancy of his conversation. His daughter's presence was, evidently, that Ralph knew, and in this power he now recognized a temptation to which he feared that his future father-in-law had succumbed. And yet while he perceived that this gift led into temptation, he coveted it for himself; for he was perfectly aware that this fluency, this happy choice of epithets, was the one thing he should fail in when he began to enter into the more serious business of confession. But after some time spent in listening, and admiring, with this little feeling of envy lurking in the back-ground, Mr. Corbet became aware of Mr. Wilkins's increasing confusion of ideas, and rather unnatural excitement; and, with a sudden revulsion from admiration to disgust, he rose up to go into the library, where Ellinor and Miss Monro were sitting. Mr. Wilkins accompanied him, laughing and talking incoherently. Was Ellinor aware of her father's state? Of that Mr. Corbet could not be sure. She looked up with grave sad face as they came into the room, but with no apparent sensation of surprise, annoyance, or shame. When her glance met her father's, Mr. Corbet noticed that it seemed to steal Miss Monro immediately. He sat down near the open window, and did not speak, but sighed heavily from time to time. Miss Monro took up a book, in order to leave the young people to themselves; and after a little low-murmured conversation, Ellinor drew a chair just on her father's side of stroll through the meadows by the river-side.

They were sometimes sauntering along in the lovely autumnal weather, by rapid streams and grassy hedge-row bank, or standing still, looking at the great barges, with their crimson sails, lazily floating down the river, making a picture in the glassy opal surface of the water. They did not talk very much, Ellinor seemed disinclined for the exertion, and her lover was unwilling over Mr. Wilkins's behavior, with some surprise and distaste of the habit so evidently growing upon him.

They came home looking serious and tired; yet they could not account for their fatigue by the length of their walk; and Miss Monro, forgetting Autolycus's song, kept fidgeting about Ellinor, and wondering how it was she looked so pale, when she had been as far as the Ashmeadow. To escape from this wonder Ellinor went early to bed. Mr. Wilkins was gone, no one knew where, to Ralph and Miss Monro, and were left to a half hour's tête-à-tête. He thought he could easily account for Ellinor's languor, if indeed she was looking as much as he said she did, of her father's state when they had come into the library after dinner. But there were many details which he could not know of from a comparatively indifferent person, and as soon as he could be passed on from the conversation about Ellinor's health to inquiries as to the whole affair of Mr. Dunster's disappearance.

Next to Ellinor herself, Miss Monro was the person who could give the most connected and satisfactory account of the events universally reported and believed in by the people of Hamley. How Mr. Dunster had been living beyond his means; how every body remembered that he could never look them straight in the face; how he always seemed to be hiding something that he did not want to have known; how he had drawn a large sum (exact quantity unknown) out of the county bank only three days before he left Hamley, and less in preparation for his escape; how some one had told Mr. Wilkins he had seen a man just like Dunster busy at the low docks at Liverpool, about two days after he had left his lodgings; but that this same one, being in a hurry, had not cared to stop to speak to the man; [how, when the affairs in the office were discovered to be in such a sad state that it was no wonder that Mr. Dunster had absconded, that Mr. Wilkins had been so trusted by poor dear Mr. Wilkins. Money gone no one knew how or where.

"But has no one been who can explain his proceedings, and account for the missing money in some way?" asked Mr. Corbet.

"No, none," said she. "He has written every where, right and left, I believe. I know he had a letter from Mr. Dunster's nearest relation—a gentleman in Liverpool, I think—and he could give no information in any way. He knew that about ten years ago Mr. Dunster had had a great fancy for a sea-faring life, and had read a great many travels—all just what a man would do before going off to a country."

"Yet you say he never knew Liverpool," said Mr. Corbet, half smiling; "shows malice prepense with a vengeance!" But then, turning his head away, he knew Hamley in debt?"

"No, I never heard of that," said Miss Monro, rather unwillingly, for she considered it as a piece of loyalty to the Wilkinses, whom Mr. Dunster had injured (as she thought), to blacken his character as much as was consistent with any degree of truth.

"It is a strange story," said Mr. Corbet, musing.

"Not at all," she replied, quickly; "I am sure if you had seen the man, with one or two single-hearted friends, he could ruin his business, as if he were ashamed of it, and his eyes that never looked at you, and his way of eating with his hands when he was in company, proved that he was not educated—oh, and numbers of things!—you would not think it strange."

Mr. Corbet smiled:

"I only meant that he seems to have had no extravagant or vicious habits which would account for his carelessness of the money that is missing—but, to be sure, money in itself is a temptation—only he being a partner, was in a fair way of making it without risk to himself. Has Mr. Wilkins taken any steps to have him arrested in America? He might easily do that."

"Oh, my dear Mr. Ralph, you don't know our good Mr. Wilkins! He would rather bear the loss, I am sure, of all this trouble and care which it has brought upon him, than be revenged upon Mr. Dunster."

"Revenged! What nonsense! It is simple justice—justice to himself and to others—to see that villainy is so sufficiently punished as to deter others from entering upon such courses. But I have little doubt Mr. Wilkins has taken the right steps: he is not the man to sit down quietly under such a loss."

"No, indeed! He had him advertised in the Times and in the county papers, and offered a reward of twenty pounds for information concerning him."

"Twenty pounds was too little."

"So I said. I told Ellinor that I would give twenty pounds myself to know him apprehended, and she, poor darling! fell a-trembling, and said, I would give all I have—I would give my life! And then she was in such distress, and asked so, I promised her I would never name it to her again."

"Poor child—poor child! she wants change of scene. Her nerves have been sadly shaken by her illness."

The next day was Sunday: Ellinor was to go to church for the first time since her illness. Her father had decided it for her, or else she would fain have staid away—she would hardly acknowledge why, even to herself, but it seemed to her as if the very words and presence of God must there search her and find out her sin.

She went early, leaning on the arm of her lover, glad to forget in the past in the present. They walked slowly along between the rows of waving golden corn ripe for the harvest, and Ralph gathered blue and scarlet flowers, and made up a little rustic nosegay for her. She took it and stuck it in her girdle, smiling faint ly when she did.

Hamley Church had, in former days, been collegiate, and was, in consequence, much larger and grander than the majority of country town churches. The Ford Bank pew was a square one, down stairs; the Ford Bank servants sat in a front gallery, in full view of their master. Ellinor was all "hardening her heart" not to listen, not to hearken to what might disturb the devotional calm she was just beginning to feel when she caught Dixon's face up above. He looked worn, sad, soured, and anxious to a miserable degree; but he was straining eyes and ears, heart and soul, to hear the solemn words read from the pulpit, as if in them alone he could find help in his strait. Ellinor felt rebuked and humbled.

She was in a tumultuous state of mind when they left church, she who was so fond of Ruth, yet could not ascertain what it was. Who was to help her with wisdom and advice? Assuredly it is to whom they seem to be most needed. But the case must be stated in an impersonal form. No one, not even her husband, must ever know that she herself was the sinner. Ellinor was so artless herself that she had little idea how quickly and easily some people can penetrate motives and combine together old experiences. She began to speak to Ralph on their slow sauntering walk homeward through the flower-meadows:

"Suppose, Ralph, that a girl was engaged to be married—"

"It is very easily suppose that, with you by me," said he, filling up her pause.

"Nay, but listen. I mean myself at all," replied she, reddening. "I was only thinking of what might happen; and suppose that this girl knew of some one who—who—who—we will call it a brother—who had done something wrong, that would bring disgrace upon the whole family if it were known, and, indeed, indeed, Ralph, it would been so very wrong as it seemed and as it would look to the world—ought she to break off her engagement for fear of involving her lover in the disgrace?"

"Certainly not, without telling him her reason for doing so."

"Ah! but suppose she could not? She might not be at liberty to do so."

"I can imagine supposititious cases. I must have the facts—if facts there are—more plainly before me before I can give an opinion. Who was this thinking of, Ellinor?" asked he, rather abruptly.

"Oh, of no one," she answered, in affright. "Why should I be thinking? Any one but I (utter try to plan out what I should do, or what I ought to do, if such and such a thing happened, just as you supposed I were the sinner? I should have presence of mind in case of fire."

"Then, after all, you yourself are the girl at having a brother; and who has the imaginary brother who gets into disgrace?"

"Yes, I suppose so," said she, a little annoyed at having lost her personal interest in the affair.

He was silent, meditating.

"There is nothing wrong in it," said she, timidly. "is there?"

"I should not better tell me fully out what is in your mind," he replied, kindly. "Something has happened which has suggested these questions. Are you putting cases for the price of any one about whom you have been hearing lately? I know you used to do so formerly, when you were a little child."

"No; it was a very foolish question of mine, and I ought not to have said any thing about it. See! here is Mr. Ness overtaking us."

The clergyman joined them on the broad walk that ran by the river-side, and the talk became general. It was a relief to Ellinor, who had thus attained her end, but who had gone far toward betraying something of her own individual interest in the question she had asked. Ralph had been more struck even by her manner than her words. He was sure that something lay locked behind, and had an idea of his own that it was connected with Dunster's disappearance. But he was glad that Mr. Ness had joined them, as it put a restraint to consider a little. The end of his reflections was that, the next day, Monday, he went into the town, and artfully learned all he could hear about Mr. Dunster's character and mode of going on; and with still more skill he extracted the popular opinion as to the embarrassed nature of Mr. Wilkins's affairs—embarrassment which was generally attributed to Dunster's disappearance with a good large sum belonging to the firm in his possession. But Mr. Corbet thought otherwise; he had accustomed himself to seek out the baser motives for men's conduct, and to call the result of these researches wisdom. He imagined that Dunster had been well paid by Mr. Wilkins for his disappearance, which was an easy way of accounting for the derangement of accounts and loss of money that arose, in fact, from Mr. Wilkins's extravagance of habits and growing intemperance.

On the Monday afternoon he said to Ellinor, "Mr. Ness interrupted us yesterday in a very interesting conversation. Do you remember, love?"

Ellinor reddened, and kept her head still more intently bent over a sketch she was making.

"Yes; I recollect."

"I have been thinking about it. I still think she ought to tell her lover that such disgrace hung over him—I mean, over the family with whom he was going to connect himself. Of course the only effect would be to make him stand by her still more for her frankness."

"Oh! but, Ralph, it might perhaps be something she ought not to tell, whatever came of her silence."

"Of course, there might be all sorts of cases. Unless I knew more, I could not pretend to judge."

This was said rather more coolly. It had the desired effect. Ellinor laid down her brush, and covered her face with her hands. After a pause, she turned toward him, and said,

"I will tell you this; and more you must not ask of me. I know you are as safe as can be. I am the girl, you are the lover, and possible shame hangs over my father, if something—oh, so dreadful!"—here she blenched—"but not so very much his fault—is ever found out."

Though this was nothing more than he expected—though Ralph thought that he was aware what the dreadful something might be—yet, when it was acknowledged in words, his heart contracted, and for a moment he forgot the intent, wistful, beautiful face creeping close to his to read his expression aright. But after that his presence of mind came in aid. He took her in his arms and kissed her, murmuring fond words of sympathy, and promises of faith, nay, even of greater love than before, since greater need she might have of that love. But somehow he was glad when the dressing-bell rang, and in the solitude of his own room he could reflect on what he had heard; for the intelligence had been a great shock to him, although he had fancied that his morning's inquiries had prepared him for it.

He found it a very difficult thing to keep down his curiosity, as to all that Ellinor knew, during the next few days. It was a miserable thing to have this unspoken secret severing them like a phantom. But he had given her his word that he would make no farther inquiries from her. Indeed, he thought he could well enough make out the outline of past events; still there was too much left to conjecture for his mind not to be always busy on the subject. He felt inclined to probe Mr. Wilkins, in their after-dinner conversation, in which his host was frank and lax enough on many subjects. But once touch on the name of Dunster, and Mr. Wilkins sank into a kind of suspicious depression of spirits—talking a little, and with evident caution, and from time to time shooting furtive glances at his interlocutor's face. Ellinor was resolutely impervious to any attempts of his to bring his conversations with her back to the subject which more and more engrossed Ralph Corbet's mind. She had done her duty, as she understood it, and had received assurances which she was only too glad to believe fondly with all the tender faith of her heart. Whatever came to pass Ralph's love would still be hers; nor was he unwarned of what might come to pass in some dread future day. So she shut her eyes to what might be in store for her (and, after all, the chances were immeasurably in her favor); and she bent herself with her whole strength into enjoying the present. Day by day Mr. Corbet's spirits flagged. He was, however, so generally uniform in the tenor of his talk—never very merry, and always avoiding, as on principle, any subject that might call out deep feeling either on his own or any one else's part—that few people were aware of his change of mood. Ellinor felt them, though she would not acknowledge them; it was bringing her too much face to face with the great terror of her life.

One morning he announced the fact of his brother's approaching marriage; the wedding was hastened on account of some impending event in the duke's family; and the home letter he had received that day was to bid his presence at Stokely Castle, and also to desire him to be at home by a certain time, not very distant, in order to look over the requisite legal papers, and to give his assent to some of them. He gave many reasons why this unlooked-for departure of his was absolutely necessary; but no one doubted it. He need not have alleged such reiterated excuses. The truth was, he was restrained and uncomfortable at Ford Bank ever since Ellinor's confidence. He could not rightly calculate on the most desirable course for his own interests, while his love for her was constantly being renewed by her sweet presence. Away from her he could judge more wisely. Nor did he allege any false reasons for his departure, but the sense of relief to himself was so great at his recall home just at this time, that he was afraid of having it perceived by others; and so took the very way which, if his companions had been as penetrating as himself, would have betrayed him.

Mr. Wilkins, too, had begun to feel the restraint of Ralph's grave, watchful presence. Ellinor was not strong enough to be married; nor was the promised money forthcoming if she had been. And to have a fellow dawdling about the house all day, sauntering into the flower-garden, peering about every where, and having a kind of right to put all manner of unexpected questions, was any thing but agreeable. It was only Ellinor that clung to his presence—clung as though some shadow of what might happen before they met again had fallen on her spirit. As soon as he had left the house she flew up to a spare bedroom window, to watch for the last glimpse of the fly which was taking him into the town. And then she kissed the part of the pane on which his figure, waving an arm out of the carriage window, had last appeared, and went down slowly to gather together all the things he had last touched—the pen he had mended, the flower he had played with, and to lock them up in the little quaint cabinet that had held her treasures since she was a tiny child.

Miss Monro was perhaps very wise in proposing the translation of a difficult part of Dante for a distraction to Ellinor. The girl went meekly, if reluctantly, to the task set her by her good governess, and by-and-by her mind became braced by the exertion.

Ralph's people were not very slow in discovering that something had not gone on quite smoothly with him at Ford Bank. They knew his ways and looks with family intuition, and could easily be certain thus far. But not even his mother's skillfulest wiles nor his favorite sister's coaxing could obtain a word or a hint; and when his father, the squire, who had heard the opinions of the female part of the family on this head, began, in his honest, blustering way, in their tête-à-têtes after dinner, to hope that Ralph was thinking better than to run his head into that confounded Hamley attorney's noose, Ralph gravely required Mr. Corbet to explain his meaning, which he professed not to understand so worded. And when the squire had with much perplexity put it into the plain terms of hoping that his son was thinking of breaking off his engagement to Miss Wilkins, Ralph coolly asked him if he was aware that in that case he should lose all title to being a man of honor, and might have an action brought against him for breach of promise of marriage?

Yet not the less for all this was the idea in his mind as a future possibility.

Before very long the Corbet family moved en masse to Stokely Castle for the wedding. Of course Ralph associated on equal terms with the magnates of the county, who were the employers of Ellinor's father, and spoke of him always as "Wilkins," just as they spoke of the butler as "Simmons," without the prefix of his Christian name or title. Here, too, among a class of men high above local gossip, and thus unaware of his engagement, he learned the popular opinion respecting his future father-in-law—an opinion not entirely respectful, though intermingled with a good deal of personal liking. "Poor Wilkins," as they called him, "was sadly extravagant for a man in his position; had no right to spend money, and act as if he were a man of independent fortune;" and then his habits of life were criticised, and pity, not free from blame, was bestowed upon him for the losses he had sustained from his late clerk's disappearance and defalcation. But what different could be expected if a man did not choose to attend to his own business, and so on.

BEAR-HUNTING.

SAM SLICK remarks in the "Clockmaker" that if you ask a fisherman suddenly, "How many fins has a cod at a word?" it is almost a certainty he can not tell you. I am quite sure that not one out of fifty frequenters of our zoological gardens could tell you, if they were asked, "Has a bear got a tail?" Having hunted, killed, skinned, and assisted in eating a great number of our black bears in Texas, I am in a position to state that they have tails, though very short ones.

There is what an old hunter would call "a right smart chance of bar" in the forests of the Southwest, though the numbers vary from their rambling habits, and from the failure or abundance of mast in certain districts. Thus in some years the mast perhaps will fail altogether, or partially, on the Colorado River, and yet be very plentiful on the neighboring Brazos; then the bears migrate, led by instinct, to the banks of the latter stream. It is those seasons when there is a general failure through the country of acorns, nuts, and other fruits, that are most fatal to Cuffee; for then, made bold by hunger, he invades the corn-fields, where the havoc he commits is soon discovered, and various are the methods employed to bring him to account for his larceny. As he always comes over the fence at one spot—for he is a creature of habit—until he has been disturbed or frightened away, he frequently falls a victim to an old musket, the barrel of which is half filled with slugs: to the trigger of it a string is attached; and this, passed round a stick set behind the stock of the gun, is for Bruin to stumble against, who thus commits unintentional suicide. Some of the negroes on the plantations are very expert in setting these guns.

Very often a planter, whose fields have been ravaged in this way, will inform his neighbors that on a particular day he means to have a bear-hunt, and they are invited to meet at his house, an hour before daylight, bringing with them all the mongrels, curs, and hounds that they can individually muster. A substantial backwoods breakfast discussed, the main features of which are usually venison-steaks, hot corn-bread, and coffee; the whisky-flask is handed round, and all having taken a "smile," merely to prevent the morning air from injuring them, "boot and saddle" is the word, and each, gun in hand, mounts his horse. The very dogs on such an occasion feel that something of importance is to be done, and burying their canine war-hatchets, forget to have a free fight among themselves, reserving their powers for the tough business instinct warns them is at hand. The order of the day is usually this: There is generally some one or two in the party who have an old steady dog or two called "start-dogs," broken exclusively to run nothing but bear. These ride in front round the headlands of the field, the rest of the party keeping with the main pack, a hundred yards or so in the rear. When the leaders come to where a bear has either entered or left the field, the "start-dogs" immediately own the scent, and open on the trail; the main pack are cheered on, and then comes a burst of dog-music that would do a cross countryman's heart good. The hunters throw down the fence-rails, which are easily replaced, and pass out. Sometimes the bear's den, generally an old tree-top that has been snapped off in some gale, is not more than two or three hundred yards from the fence, a bear having a decided objection to residing very far from his feeding-ground. On some occasions he is surprised in his hold, where he sits on his hams with quite a Fitz-James "come one, come all" expression on his countenance, and regards the dogs with what they consider a by no means inviting manner. Then comes the excited rush of the hunters, who, hearing the baying of the pack, dismount; and each hurries through the cane or brush as best he may, to get the first shot. At other times the quarry has a shrewd guess as to what is in the wind when he first hears the cry of the hounds, and puts his best leg first to get as far into the impenetrable recesses of the cane-brake as possible; the stout bamboos bend like rye-grass before his weight, and close in his rear, making it very difficult for the dogs to follow, and impossible for the hunters, who have to ride the best way they can, guided by the yelling of the hounds. I have known a bear get clear away very often owing to the impassable nature of the jungle. Clumsy as the beast looks, he is by no means inactive, and can travel very fast.

Occasionally, when very fat, he "trees," that is, climbs a tree, at once, even when not particularly pressed by his foes; at other times he is so bullied and pinched by them that he is forced to ascend. This is always a fatal step, as the dogs remain under the tree and bay him until some of the hunters arrive, when a well-placed ball generally finishes him. The shot, the death-mote sounded on a horn, soon bring up the stragglers of the hunt, when, if the burst has not been too severe or lasted too long, the game is left to be disemboweled by a negro or two, then placed on a mule, and borne in triumph to the platform, the sportsmen starting back to the field, to see whether another bear has visited it. I should here mention that very savage dogs are not the best for this sport; a bull-dog, who would seize a bear and hang on to him, would come to grief instantly; he would be killed, as they say out West, "before he knew what hurt him." The best dogs are those with whom discretion is the better part of valor; curs who will watch their opportunity and jump in, giving the bear a sharp pinch, and bound away again, to enjoy their little practical joke in safety. In wild cattle-hunting the reverse is the case, and I have frequently owed my life to my having had severe dogs.

Bears are never stalked in the same way as deer, although occasionally the "still hunter" comes across one in the woods; it will be as well, then, for him to make a sure shot, for a wounded bear is by no means a pleasant antagonist.

It is not at all an unusual occurrence in the backwoods to hear, toward evening, or early in the morning, the screams of a pig in mortal agony. The planter, overseer, or hunter who proceeds to the spot will find probably either a bear, a panther, or leopard cat making free with the pork; and if he can not then obtain a good shot, the best thing he can do is to return to the plantation, get all the dogs he can collect, and returning to the dead porker, put his pack on the trail of the murderer, who, unwilling to leave his prey, generally trees at once, and it very seldom happens that the guilty animal escapes.

The first bear I ever shot I killed in Brazos County, Texas. I was in search of wild-turkeys; and just as I had disengaged myself from a thicket of rattan vines, I heard a noise at the top of a large tree, the head of which had been blown off, and up it a large sour winter grape-vine had climbed, the fruit of which hung ripe, and in great profusion. The noise I heard was made by a bear, who had ascended the tree to feast upon the grapes, and who had discovered my arrival about the same time that I first saw him. He immediately began his descent on the opposite side to that on which I was, keeping the trunk of the tree very carefully between himself and my gun; and as he came down, at about every two feet, he kept poking his head round, first on one side, then on the other, to see my position, as well as what I was doing. I waited quietly for him till he had reached within about six feet of the ground, holding the gun to my shoulder, ready to fire on the side where I next expected to see his head appear. Sure enough, as I expected, round came his brown muzzle, and, at the same instant, twelve large buck-shot from my right-hand barrel cut half his neck away, severing the jugular vein, from which jets of blood came half as thick as my wrist. My poor pointer-bitch, Rose, who had been away on the scent of some turkeys, had returned just about the time I fired, and threw herself at once upon what she considered was an enormous turkey, but a convulsive blow of the dying brute sent her flying some ten or twelve feet. I shall never forget the expression of her face as she picked herself up, for fortunately she was not much hurt. As she approached very cautiously, she winded the bear, and set up all the hair on her back, uttering sharp barks; then she would look up into my face, and, wagging her tail, whine, asking, as plain as if she had spoken: "What on earth have we got here?" It was the first bear she had ever seen, as, indeed, it was the first wild one I had seen either.

Owing to the open and warm winters the bears do not "house" themselves in the winter, as they do in Canada and the Northern States, although they shut themselves up, when the cold "northers" prevail, for a week or two. It is during the winter that the honey-stores of the wild-bees, and the hogs that roam the forest, suffer most, as there is then very little other food in the woods for them, except the grubs they find in the fallen trees.

As the planters often make prodigious crops of corn, they are sometimes obliged, for want of room, to put it for temporary accommodation into pens, made of rails, and roughly thatched, in the fields. These corn-cribs are frequently visited in the night by the bears, and many a vigil have I kept for them, rendered doubly long, as I could not permit myself the consolation of my pipe, the smell of which would have made all my trouble useless.

There are many good points about the Southern Bruins. They are quiet, harmless fellows, unless attacked and wounded; they then fight any odds bravely. The maternal instincts are very strong in the females, who will wage war to the last gasp in defense of their little ones. The old male is never seen with the female when she has cubs, probably from his having the same dislike to juveniles which some men have; he consequently leaves all the care and trouble of his family to his wife, like a bear as he is. They seem to think that there is luck in odd numbers, too, for three cubs will be oftener found with an old she-bear than any other number.

I was once hunting for a sugar-plantation on Caney Creek, in Matagorda County. The summer had been excessively dry; all the ponds had dried up, and so had the small streams, except here and there where there were deep holes. I had been accustomed both night and morning to seek a large and deep lake which lay in the forest about a mile and a half from the house. To this lagoon wild animals of all descriptions resorted for water, and I had on each visit been able to secure two or three deer, varied occasionally by a wild cow or hog. It was on the 3d of September, 1858, that I rode out to this place one afternoon about four o'clock, and having tied my horse where he could not be observed, repaired to my usual place of concealment to watch for game. The first animal that came within rifle-range was an old Mexican boar, but as he was worthless for meat, I allowed him to drink and depart in peace. Presently, the fluttering of some robins, as they are called, a kind of migratory thrush, showed from their hurry and clucking cry that some intruder had disturbed them. I had not long to wait to see what it was, for out rolled, with their peculiarly droll waddle, an old bear with her three, five, or six months' old cubs. They were about fifty yards from me, and right to windward, and while they were drinking I stretched myself flat on my stomach, resting the rifle in the fork of a peg I had set in the ground, and from which I had made many dead shots previously, and prepared to fire whenever the old lady should turn her head to me, so that I could get a fair shot at her eye. It may seem to those not acquainted with the subject that the eye of a bear is a very small mark to shoot at, and so it is; but the orifice in the skull is very large, although the eye itself is small—a ball, therefore, placed in or near the eye is certain, if fired from the front, to find the brain. She soon turned her head; and taking a very careful aim, I shot her through the corner of her right eye—the bullet, as I afterward discovered, passing out at the base of the left ear. She fell without a struggle, not even a kick of her legs. The cubs did not seem to be aware that any thing particular had happened, as I had hoped would be the case if I made a good shot; and I proceeded to load so that I could dispose of them at my leisure. Those who have never loaded a rifle when lying flat on the ground can form no idea of its difficulty; I have very often had to do this, and speak from experience. I succeeded in killing the three cubs, and then rode into the plantation, to have a cane cart and mules sent out to bring in the game. The house was full of company—several young ladies staying there from neighboring plantations, for a dance which was to be given the next evening. Proud enough I was as I rode in at the head of my prizes, for even in Texas it is not often any one has the luck to bag four bears of an evening. The mother was not in very prime condition, but the cubs were perfect lumps of grease, and would have delighted Poll Sweedlepipe's father or Mr. Finch.

The following anecdote goes far to prove that a bear has only room for one idea at a time in his head. A party of overland emigrants on their way across the plains from St. Louis, Missouri, to El Passo, and thence to California, had arrived somewhere on the Green River. From this train a hunter had strayed off in search of game, and came upon a bear in a creek bottom, who was up a persimmon-tree loaded with ripe fruit, which he was busily eating, while a wild-boar beneath was revelling in the overripe dainties which fell in showers from the bear's clumsy operations in the tree. It was evident from the glances Bruin threw below from time to time that he was jealous of the hog, and by no means relished playing provider even involuntarily for the other; and he often expressed his disapprobation by short and savage growls, which the boar only answered by an occasional satisfied grunt. The hunter noted all these signs, and saw that very little more was necessary to make Cuffee's wrath boil over, which he would be certain to vent upon the pig; he therefore drew the buck-shot from one barrel of his gun, and substituted for it a load of dust-shot, with which, from his ambush, he stung the bear pretty severely. Down came the bear instantly to chastise the boar for adding this injury to insult, fully convinced that the smart he suffered was caused by the pig. The battle was a sharp one, though not of long duration, and Bruin speedily killed his antagonist, but not before the hog had inflicted a mortal wound, by gashing open with his sharp tusks the belly of his opponent, who speedily bled to death.

PAY-DAY IN THE ARMY OF THE

POTOMAC.—[Drawn by Mr. Homer.]

THE HUNGARIAN OFFICER.

In the year 183- (I abstain purposely from giving the exact date), I—then a very young man—had an appointment connected with our embassy at Vienna. At that time the lion of the day was a certain Colonel Bergfeldt. He was a Hungarian, I believe; but I know that he was reported to be a man of good birth, of considerable wealth; and that beyond this little seemed to be known of him. His appearance seemed suddenly in Vienna society; but, once there, he very soon became the rage. Young as I then was, I remember being prodigiously struck with him, and perhaps all the more so because of the disparity of age between us. As to his age, who could tell it? There are some men who, in figure and complexion who are very puzzling in that matter of guessing their age.

This colonel was a tall man, with a hard, thin, perfect figure. Plenty of chest and shoulder, with long fine limbs. It was the figure of the kind of man who, where fatigue and endurance are concerned, is sure to knock every body up; the kind of figure, all others, that one seldom meets but in connection with ill-health, or even sudden temporary disease. There was not flesh enough for inflammatory disorders; there was too much wire for those that spring from debility. It was long, however, before one noticed these particulars, the attention of any stranger being naturally put off by some sort of attempt to fathom the man's countenance, and see what there was there of promise or of warning.

It would be next to impossible to say certainly that there was either. It was a face of stone. Pale, but with no ability at all. A strange phenomenon, with a curious earthy quality about it that was a defect—almost the only defect—by daylight, but which did not appear in candle-light at all. His hair, and mustache were all different shades of the same color, or absence of color. This was what made him look unnaturally remarkable, blended with the regularity of his features, and the want of change about them, would any way have distinguished him from other men. Ability, weakness, nerve, and will were all marked legibly in his countenance; as to any thing else, certainly of that time—that I may be sure—he was not physiognomist enough to be able to go deeper.

The accomplishments of this man were wonderful. Was there any thing he could not do, and do well? He seemed to know every thing. As to languages, I myself knew four of them tolerably well—French and fluency, in French, English, German, Italian, and Spanish in one evening. Then, if we were at the theatre together, his accuracy of aim made us all feel ashamed of ourselves. At billiards we had no chance with him. His horses were the admiration and envy of every body in Vienna. They were tame and manageable in his hands, as if they knew it was no use to resist. His success in every thing, in short, seemed the same, down even to waltzing and lansquenet.

Was it any wonder that a man gifted with such advantages should have been a favorite in the society in which he appeared? He was the rage. No ball, no shooting-party, no banquet or fête champêtre was thought of without him. He was the life and soul of the society of Vienna.

It may be imagined what was the effect upon us all when the colonel, suddenly and without warning, disappeared from among us. The sensation made by his presence—great as it was—was nothing to that caused by his absence. His disappearance, I remember, was first remarked on the occasion of a grand ball at the French Embassy, at which he was to have been present; and which was the consternation among those ladies who had been keeping themselves without engagements throughout the season, for days after hope of him was away and the colonel did not appear. From that time he was seen no more among us. His engagements for a month or fortnight, of different sorts, were all broken through; and this, though one of the colonel's most remarkable characteristics was an almost punctilious attention to duty. It was the strangest thing. He was gone. This same punctuality, of which I have spoken, had, however, appeared in the strangest decline. He left behind no debt behind him. Every thing was paid up by his confidential servant, who left the town a few hours after his master.

The thing was a nine-days' wonder, and every soul among us was for that time occupied with incessant speculations as to what had possibly come become of this man, who had won the admiration of all the men, and turned the heads of half the women in Vienna.

Among my acquaintances made at Vienna was one whom I think I am justified in calling by the warmer title of friend. This was a certain Mademoiselle Stortzer, a lady who at that time occupied a high and influential position in our society, her husband being Minister of the United States Court, and quite one of the great men of Vienna. Had, on first coming out, brought introductions to Madame Stortzer from an old and valued friend of mine, and partly owing to this circumstance, and partly perhaps because my business of enjoyment and good spirits amused her, she had taken me socially altogether under her wing.

Of course at the time I am speaking of it was only natural that our talk should often turn to the subject with which I have said that I, in common with every one else, was so much occupied—the Hungarian colonel and his extraordinary disappearance. Now it so happened that whenever our conversation did take this turn, I could not help observing that a curious expression came over the lady's face. It was quite involuntary, and indeed very slight and little noticeable; but still I did remark it, and that so invariably that I became at last impressed with the idea that some particular and in connection with this matter were known to Madame Stortzer, of which the rest of the world was ignorant.

One day I was sitting talking to her as usual, and, as was also usual, I was for the hundredth time expressing my surprise that this secret of the reason and manner of the colonel's disappearance had baffled all our friends, and that the thing still remained a dead secret to all of us. As I spoke, I looked fixedly at Madame Stortzer's face, and there, sure enough, was the old expression. It was the expression of one bursting with information, full of a secret, able to reveal it, but deterred from doing so. I spoke suddenly, and on the impulse of the moment:

"Dear Madame Stortzer, I am persuaded that you know more about this affair than any one."

"What do you mean?" she replied, trying to look displeased.

"I mean," said I, "that your kindness to me has emboldened me so much that I allow my thoughts to find expression in words. You know what has become of Colonel Bergfeldt."

"I know it," I said, almost unconsciously.

"Hush," she exclaimed, in a low tone. Sit still there on that fauteuil by the stove and listen. What I know you shall know."

I took my place as she had directed me, and she went on:

"My husband, as you know, is a member of the Council, and it is from him that I have learned what I am going to tell you. Judge if secrecy is necessary on your part." I bowed, and she continued:

"Know, then, that some years ago an old friend of mine, the Count Vordenberg, took to himself a young wife, and carried her off to his estates in the old town of Reigersfeldt. How surprised all his friends were! The count was a middle-aged man, and, though not deformed, was in figure and in familiarity called an 'old bachelor.' He was a man, too, of excessively quiet and studious habits, who liked to live shut up with his books, and who, besides, was engaged in all sorts of scientific experiments. In short, he seemed the last man to marry a young lady, such as his wife then was, besides being very pretty, was extremely animated and fond of gayety and change, almost to a fault.

"Well, the marriage took place, and the Count and Countess Vordenberg went off to their château to try the genuine effect of the honey-moon, which threw into the shade all those in which the count had formerly spent so much of his time. I will be the countess the justice to say that I believe her to have been sincerely attached to her husband, and that I also believe that he was sincerely proud of his bride, and a good girl. Her worst faults were a love of admiration and a frantic appreciation of pleasure. Dangerous enough combined as well say. It was almost more wonderful that she should have fallen in love with the count than that he should have fallen in love with her. She was full of fancies, and I suspect that at the particular time when the count made his offer she had a fancy that a husband who was a man of study was the man for her. Be that as it may, she could look up to, and so. At all events she loved her husband, and went away to the old château full of happy anticipations.

"Alas, poor child! she had either miscalculated her forces, or had not measured the strength of will in her whole life. At first it was all very well. There was the old castle to examine, and all its curious nooks and corners to be explored together over all, and it was a pleasure to sport about her other, middle-aged husband, and lighten him up with her almost childish gayety. Sometimes, it is true, even at first, it would happen that misgivings would come into her mind as she thought over the matter—misgivings as to how she was to get on in time between that present hour and the distant period when age should have begun to tone her down, and make her fit to be the wife of a quiet, patstable and even delightful to her. Still, such thoughts as these built but unfrequent sway, and vanished her like passing clouds.

"Time passed—time, that tries our strength so relentlessly—time, the only test—time, that shows us the metal we are made of. Slowly as a cold, curious, or paltry foil, or tinsel lacquer, or dross. Time passed, and Countess Vordenberg began to mope, and to complain that Reigersfeldt was 'worse than Heaven knows,' continued Madame Stortzer, as she glanced up at the memorandums of her many engagements, in that pocket-book of hers—'than no knows I do not blame her. Of course she ought to have remembered that she had committed herself, and to that end had married her husband, who had married her husband because she loved him, that she had had a miserable home before, which was indeed the case, from which she wished at any price to get away, and that now it behooved her to make the very best of the lot to which she had entered. No doubt this would have been only right; but still living such a different existence as she did, and thus her disposition not being at all signed and contented in the old castle at Reigersfeldt.

"And her husband. It is a question how far he was to blame in not trying to accommodate himself and his habits to the requirements of his wife's nature. When two people enter on marriage they each sign a contract which demands of each some amount of concession to the other's peculiar requirements. No doubt if the count had chosen he might very much more have mitigated the dullness of which his wife complained. There was society to be had in the neighborhood if he had cultivated it, instead of rejecting the overtures of well-meaning people whose visits bothered him, and interrupted him in the pursuit of his studies. There were amusements too in the town, on the very outskirts of which the castle stood. There were balls. There was an opera, and a play-house. But the count was lazy, and hated the trouble of going out. Sometimes, indeed—for the count loved with an affection that had something of the parental in it, 'the disturber of his peace,' as he called his wife—sometimes he would for a day or two take compassion on her dullness, and make the great effort of going out to dine with some of their nearest neighbors, a family, the head of which a certain General Brenner, was one of his oldest friends. But he was very rarely, only two or three times in a year, that he could be induced to make even this concession to ordinary sociability.

"It was on the occasion of one of these visits to the general's that the count happened to be seated next an officer in the army who had just arrived to take temporary command of the dépôt quartered in the town of Reigersfeldt. He was a young and singularly handsome man, with a peculiar force and authority expressed in his demeanor, which in his youth must have been remarkable. That youth of his was, however, enough for the count, who had a general idea that all young men were fools; he therefore devoted himself to his neighbor on the other side, who was a learned doctor of the town, and ready to talk of chemistry and science potentially. He scorned the count like, introducing long words enough to interfere with his very digestion.

"It happened that in the course of that dinner the conversation got upon some excavations which had been made in a distant part of the country, and which had led to the discovery of considerable remains of an archeological nature. The young officer seated next to the count had been present when these discoveries were made, and now launched out into some account of all that he had seen and heard in connection with the subject. Nothing could exceed the interest which—unless it was his delight, as he listened to these particulars, and as he discovered that the young man, of whom he had conceived so poor an idea was not only well-informed on this particular matter, but was thoroughly acquainted with other antiquarian subjects. The learned doctor, on the other neighbor, was deserted altogether, and during the remaining time that the company was at table the count and his new friend were completely engaged in conversation, which to the older man, whatever it might have been to the younger, was of the most surpassing interest. Interest, though, in the case of it, an invitation was given to the young officer to ride over, when occasion served, and inspect the different excavations which the count had got together, or in his own private cabinet. That invitation was accepted.

"Lieutenant Bergfeldt"—I started at that name, though I had guessed what was coming—"Lieutenant Bergfeldt had been ways than one of rendering himself welcome at the castle. Besides being able to talk to the count upon scientific matters, he was always ready to be the pet of the countess, and was always prepared to be her escort whenever a protector was necessary to her. The countess, a timid rider, was glad of him to make long excursions on horseback, having for her companion one of the most accomplished horsemen that ever put foot in stirrup. The lieutenant, again, to go to some ball in the neighborhood, to some concert or opera in the town? there was the lieutenant ever ready to serve her in any way for to the carriage, to go all, in short, that her husband ought to have done. Cruel and selfish neglect," Madame Stortzer broke off. "I think sometimes the poor wife of that husband, who so left to stand alone the frail fabric of a woman's weakness. Not," she continued, rapidly—"not that they erred, the Countess Constantia was a true wife."

"It was part of the same selfishness of the count's which made him, on the accidents of which his wife did, so long as she did not interrupt him in his favorite pursuits—that neither would he exercise any of his authority, even half an hour of his night's rest to her constitutional love of pleasure and change. If he did not get to bed early and when his day was over, he, he would not be fit for the labors of the next day. So the countess must be in every night by eleven o'clock. What was she did till midnight was a matter of indifference to her husband, she might go where she liked and do what she liked, provided that by eleven o'clock she must be inside the castle gates. On one or two occasions there had been some slight infringement of this regulation, but the result had been that the count was so seriously displeased as actually to go the length of saying that from that time the porter of the castle should receive strict orders to close the doors at eleven o'clock, and not to open them after that hour to any living soul.

"Things were in this position, one day the intelligence was brought to the castle by the Lieutenant Bergfeldt that a new company of actors of unusual ability had arrived in the town, and were to perform an adaptation of one of those French dramas of extreme interest which at the time I am speaking of were attracting considerable notice at the Paris theatres. The lieutenant had seen the play in Paris, and gave so promising an account of it that the countess was wild to see it, and that very evening it was arranged that Lieutenant Bergfeldt should come to the castle and accompany her at the proper hour to the theatre. I think I have mentioned that the castle was just outside the town—"

Madame Stortzer paused for a moment, as if almost unwilling to go on, and described what followed with something of a hesitating reluctance.

"The play almost exceeded in interest even what the countess had expected, and when in the middle of an act, and at one of the most exciting moments of the story, the lieutenant suddenly leaned over to her and said that he had some inspection to make, some military duty to de—I know not what—he was obliged him to be absent from the theatre for a short time, perhaps half an hour at most—when this occurred, she was so absorbed in watching what was going on upon the stage that she hardly heard what he said, and merely bowing her acquiescence, turned again eagerly to the scene, reluctant to lose a word.

When Bergfeldt returned, after about half an hour's absence, the play was near its termination, and the interest was so completely at its highest that the countess merely turned for a moment to let the lieutenant entered the box and put up her fingers to engage him to silence.

"There was a pause in the acting for a few minutes, and the countess turned to her companion to ask the time. 'How pale you look,' she said; 'are you suffering?'

"No,' he replied. 'I was afraid of being late, and I have been running.'

"What time is it?' asked the countess again.

"It is ten minutes to eleven.'

"I must go,' she said; 'how dreadful to lose the rest!'

"In another quarter of an hour the play will be over, or at least the main interest of it,' said the lieutenant.

"Yes, but that time the gates will be closed.'

"You don't mean to say that you imagine for one moment that the count—that your husband—that such an order as that will really be carried out,' urged Lieutenant Bergfeldt.

"I am sure of it,' she answered.

"And I am equally certain the other way. Why it is ridiculous. Take my advice and try the experiment. You can not always adhere to this arrangement of being in at a certain hour, like a school-girl.'

"The count's arrangements are all good ones and such as he has a perfect right to make,' replied the countess, who never would hear a disparaging word said of her husband.

"At that moment the intermediate scene came to an end, and the interesting part of the story was resumed. Again was evidently close at hand. The countess lingered in her place.

"When she rose to go it was ten minutes past eleven.

"The countess looked at her companion. She was as pale as he now, but infinitely less composed. It ten minutes more they were at the castle gate. It was closed.

"The countess trembled violently, as she said: 'What have I done? I have lost this and will be so.'

"Nonsense,' said the lieutenant, who himself was somewhat discomposed, 'it is only a joke. The thing will never be persisted in. Ring the bell. Lawsa,' he added to the coachman, who had descended from his place.

"The man did as he was told, but no notice was taken of the appeal. He rang again and again, and at last a window was opened in the turret which flanked the gate, and the porter put out his head.

"'Why don't you open the gate?' said the lieutenant, in an angry tone. He had alighted from the carriage, and was now standing beside the coachman. 'How dare you refuse to admit directly, by keeping your mistress waiting here at this time of night?'

"My orders are not to open the gate,' replied the man.

"Do you know who this lady is?'

"I know perfectly,' the porter answered. 'But what can I do?'

"Do! why, open the gate instantly!' cried the lieutenant.

"I dare not do it,' the man replied.

"Hans Traner,' said the countess, speaking for the first time, 'you know me well enough and see her at the risk of my life.'

"The man's head disappeared at the turret-window, and the sound of unfastening bolts and bars was heard behind the great doors.

"The lieutenant took his leave at the door, as his carriage was, and the countess made him good-night, and went into the house. Cautiously, and on tip-toe, she approached the room which her husband was lying, for she hoped that he might still be asleep in spite of the noise which had been made at the gate, and she was very thankful to be offered explanation till the morrow. There was no sound in the room, and the lady approached the bed expecting herself that the count was still soundly asleep. As she drew nearer something strange about her husband's position struck her, and looking at him more closely she observed that his eyes were partly open.

"In another moment the castle was ringing with the countess's shrieks, and the whole household rushed to the apartment in which the count lay—dead.'

Madame Stortzer paused for a moment, but I did not interrupt her, although I was breathless to hear the rest. Presently she went on:

"It was at first thought that the count had died a natural death, but on examination of the body it was found that there were evident signs of suffocation. There were marks on the throat and evidence of heavy pressure on the chest, which left little doubt that violence had been used, though every effort had been made to conceal the signs of it. Of course a most searching inquiry took place with a view to the discovery of the murderer, but it was wholly unavailing. The count had retired to bed at an unusually early hour, and none of the servants had heard any noise in the house, or seen any strange person about the premises. Hans Tranner, the porter, was of course more specially examined, in order that it might be ascertained whether any one had, in the course of the evening, passed through the gate, and it then came out that the lieutenant had entered the castle with the countess, and had left it again in a few minutes, and the countess turned to her companion to ask the time. 'How pale you look,' she said; 'are you suffering?'

"No,' he replied. 'I was afraid of being late, and I have been running.'

"What time is it?' asked the countess again.

"It is ten minutes to eleven.'

"I must go,' she said; 'how dreadful to lose the rest!'

"In another quarter of an hour the play will be over, or at least the main interest of it,' said the lieutenant.

"Yes, but that time the gates will be closed.'

"You don't mean to say that you imagine for one moment that the count—that your husband—that such an order as that will really be carried out,' urged Lieutenant Bergfeldt.

"I am sure of it,' she answered.

"And I am equally certain the other way. Why it is ridiculous. Take my advice and try the experiment. You can not always adhere to this arrangement of being in at a certain hour, like a school-girl.'

"The count's arrangements are all good ones and such as he has a perfect right to make,' replied the countess, who never would hear a disparaging word said of her husband.

"At that moment the intermediate scene came to an end, and the interesting part of the story was resumed. Again was evidently close at hand. The countess lingered in her place.

"When she rose to go it was ten minutes past eleven.

"The countess looked at her companion. She was as pale as he now, but infinitely less composed. In ten minutes more they were at the castle gate. It was closed.

"The countess trembled violently, as she said: 'What have I done? I have lost this and will be so.'

"Nonsense,' said the lieutenant, who himself was somewhat discomposed, 'it is only a joke. The thing will never be persisted in. Ring the bell. Lawsa,' he added to the coachman, who had descended from his place.

"The man did as he was told, but no notice was taken of the appeal. He rang again and again, and at last a window was opened in the turret which flanked the gate, and the porter put out his head.

"'Why don't you open the gate?' said the lieutenant, in an angry tone. He had alighted from the carriage, and was now standing beside the coachman. 'How dare you refuse to admit directly, by keeping your mistress waiting here at this time of night?'

"My orders are not to open the gate,' replied the man.

"Do you know who this lady is?'

"I know perfectly,' the porter answered. 'But what can I do?'

"Do! why, open the gate instantly!' cried the lieutenant.

"I dare not do it,' the man replied.

"Hans Tranner,' said the countess, speaking for the first time, 'you know me well enough and see her at the risk of my life.'

"The man's head disappeared at the turret-window, and the sound of unfastening bolts and bars was heard behind the great doors.

"The lieutenant took his leave at the door, as his carriage was, and the countess made him good-night, and went into the house. Cautiously, and on tip-toe, she approached the room which her husband was lying, for she hoped that he might still be asleep in spite of the noise which had been made at the gate, and she was very thankful to be offered explanation till the morrow. There was no sound in the room, and the lady approached the bed expecting herself that the count was still soundly asleep. As she drew nearer something strange about her husband's position struck her, and looking at him more closely she observed that his eyes were partly open.

"In another moment the castle was ringing with the countess's shrieks, and the whole household rushed to the apartment in which the count lay—dead.'

Madame Stortzer paused for a moment, but I did not interrupt her, although I was breathless to hear the rest. Presently she went on:

"It was at first thought that the count had died a natural death, but on examination of the body it was found that there were evident signs of suffocation. There were marks on the throat and evidence of heavy pressure on the chest, which left little doubt that violence had been used, though every effort had been made to conceal the signs of it. Of course a most searching inquiry took place with a view to the discovery of the murderer, but it was wholly unavailing. The count had retired to bed at an unusually early hour, and none of the servants had heard any noise in the house, or seen any strange person about the premises. Hans Tranner, the porter, was of course more specially examined, in order that it might be ascertained whether any one had, in the course of the evening, passed through the gate, and it then came out that for some time the porter had left the lodge in charge of his little boy, while he went in to look after his wife, who was still suffering from the remains of a severe attack of fever. The man was devotedly attached to his wife, and had in this respect unquestionably neglected his duty. As to the boy's evidence, little could be made of that. He said, indeed, that he had seen a man muffled up in a cloak come into the entry, but that he took no notice of this, as he felt sure at the time that it was Lieutenant Bergfeldt, to whom he knew that the entrance of the castle was accorded at all hours. The child stuck to this statement even in the teeth of the lieutenant's own contradiction of the story: but as by his own account he had been absent part of the time when he ought to have been watching the gate, no importance was attached to the evidence. The lieutenant's word, of course, went for more than that of the porter's little son. I must remark, by-the-by, that no one was more concerned than Lieutenant Bergfeldt in trying to find out the real criminal, but neither his efforts nor any one else's were in this respect successful.

"I will tell you," Madame Stortzer continued, "on the grief and self-reproach of the coutess. Her attachment to her husband had been great, and the thought that she had been disobeying his injunctions at the very moment of his death was almost worse to bear than even the grief with which she accompanied, as he had been appointed by the late count to administer his affairs. The countess has left off, of course, all gayety, with the exception of a few trifling legacies, being bequeathed to her by the will of her late husband.

"I have said that the widow was rich. She is from time to time, in contact with Lieutenant Bergfeldt. It was impossible to imagine any thing more perfect than the relations of respect and sympathy with which this young officer approached the bereaved lady. For some time no allusion was made between them to her affliction, and when reference was confined almost entirely to matters of business: but after a while, and in a manner insensibly, the lieutenant would allow himself to say some sympathetic word, to make some mention of his respect for the deceased count, to allude to the intimacy which had existed between them. By degrees, too, and after a long interval, he would allow, as if accidentally, some expression to escape him indicative of the intense feeling of commiseration with which he was penetrated as he looked on and saw what were the sufferings of the young widow—sufferings all the time so helpless to relieve those sufferings in any way whatever. But why do I speak thus?" said Madame Stortzer, interrupting herself impatiently. "The man laid out his plan like an a 'at, and day by day, hour by hour almost, the o 'ation of his success became more and more necessary to the countess.

"Consolation is a dangerous thing, when the consoler is a man possessed of a personal qualities as this Lieutenant Bergfeldt, and when the consolee is a young and pretty woman, with large means at her disposal. Before the year was out it is became evident to those who stood by and watched that the poor old count would soon have a successor, and not the second year was half over when Lieutenant Bergfeldt was established in the old castle, lord of its mistress and of all the place contained.

"I am now the unwilling narrator of the story," my friend went on. "His object gained, this unhappy woman in his power, and all her possessions within his grasp, it became necessary for him to play his amiable part longer, and very soon this ill-starred lady found to her dismay that she had incurred hatred to a man of whose real will was unfettered by any restraints such as the heart and the conscience exercise over less cold-blooded mortals. Scenes of ill-usage and violence at home were followed by seasons when the poor woman was altogether deserted by her cruel and unscrupulous lord. Sometimes even she was made the hardthing of him for months together, and, indeed, there is little reason to doubt that the less she heard of him generally in such times the better off she was.

"It was during one of these absences from the castle, no doubt, that Colonel Bergfeldt, as he is now called, made his recent appearance in Vienna. You yourself were the witness of his success in society, and you, like every one else, were astonished at his sudden withdrawal. Only I, who have accounted to you for that withdrawal all that I have got to tell in connection with this strange and terrible affair will be at an end.

"It is only a few days since that the people about the palace here were a good deal astonished by the arrival at the gates of a young officer, who came up from a distant part of the country, and desired to have an audience of the emperor, alleging that he had a communication to make of the very greatest possible importance, and which he could or would only make to the emperor himself. It is one of the curious, apparent inconsistencies of our despotic governments that the sovereign is quite accessible; so it was not long before that petition of the old priest's was granted, and he was admitted to an audience with the emperor. The old man said that he had known for a long time that his own end was near, and that he had traveled, in spite of his many infirmities, a long distance, in order that he might disclose to the Father of the People certain secrets which, as they concerned others, he felt ought not to die with him. And then he spoke at once of this man, the Colonel Bergfeldt. The marriage ceremony, which the priest himself had performed between the countess and Bergfeldt, had been a vain and sacrilegious mockery, the latter having at the moment when it was celebrated a wife still living—an unprincipled woman, who consented to keep the thing secret in consideration of a certain annual sum paid to her by the colonel. These circumstances had come to the knowledge of this priest under the seal of the confessional; for it was one of the fantastic elements in Bergfeldt's character that he still held to the performance of some of the rites of religion, or, as it should be called in this case, perhaps, of superstition.

"Under the same seal of secrecy, too," continued Madame Stortzer, "there came to the priest's knowledge the true story of the death of the old count. You have no doubt guessed already who was the perpetrator of that cruel murder. When I told you of that tempest-tossed season of misery and horror intolerable to me. A strange desire took possession of me now to be a witness of that last scene which was to end this strange, eventful history. Now I should shrink from such a thing, do any thing, go any where, to avoid it.

I imagined what was in my lead to Madame Stortzer.

"Do you really wish it?" she said. "Why anxious unnecessarily to be present at a scene of such unutterable misery and terror?"

My friend argued long and earnestly against my desire, but I was not to be shaken. A strange infatuation it was. I seemed unable to resist it. I dreaded the thing unspeakably, yet felt that it must be done.

At last Madame Stortzer's arguments gave way before my obstinacy. It was not difficult for her after all to see that I wanted, like Macbeth, "to know all," and she yielded to my request.

I shall never forget that night, or the scene of horror which followed. The little chapel of the prison was so situated that it was approached by certain passages or corridors communicating with different parts of the main building. Each of these corridors had a separate entrance in the chapel, and it was so arranged, no doubt in order that different classes of persons might enter the consecrated building without being necessarily brought in contact with each other. The chapel was in a dark corner, close to the altar, from which post I could see every thing that passed without being myself observed. The altar was blazing with light and the candles on the altar, and by the faint glimmer of the small hanging lamp which burnt before it, and which was placed in front of and on the steps of the rude altar stood the priest, attended by a single chorister, waiting till the moments should arrive when the mass for the dead formed. One or two jailers and attendants were about the chapel, but one only knew they were there, for I imagined to me that the officer of justice, the guards, the great shadows thrown by the pillars and by the massive stone-work of the building rendered it impossible to see them.

In that dead silence the faintest and most distant sounds were distinctly audible, and it was not long before I heard the sound of bolts and bars shooting of a heavy door in a remote part of the building. By-and-by there were more such sounds, and then I heard the tramping of a body of soldiers, very near to me but behind the wall. In another moment a door opened close to where I stood, and there entered, with a file of the police officers of the prison; and then, walking between two turnkeys and heavily manacled, there appeared the man whom I, and I only of those present, knew. The man who had seemed to me to unite all the qualities which could make life enviable to the man whom I had last seen speaking to him on the night of the gayest saloons in one of the most brilliant capitals of the world.

Just between I what a man this was! Had that inconceivable heroism and strength which belonged to him been employed in some good cause, how glorious his memory would have been! But he was now useful to his fellow-men. He was almost unchanged. He was, as I have said before, always pale, but he was not more so. The change in the lines of his face may have been dug a little, a very little, deeper. Otherwise he was unchanged, save but for the difference in his dress he was still the same man who had carried all before him in the drawing-rooms of Vienna. If I could have seen him in my dark corner, I am pretty sure that it would have appeared that I was infinitely more agitated than the principal in the scene.

For one moment he flinched, and did seem to feel some part of the horror of the situation. It was when, as he passed the open door of the chapel for some short time, with the faint light of the hanging lamp upon his terrible face, a sort of shuddering horror seemed to pass through him as he was approaching, and presently, by a door opening into the chapel, exactly on the opposite side of the building to that by which he had entered, the wife, closely veiled, and attended by two ladies, whose features were also concealed, but one of whom I guessed was Madame Stortzer, was supported into the chapel.

It seems almost wrong to speak or agony so terrible as this of the wife of the murderer. Suffice it to say that she reached the altar the countess lifted her veil, and it was then that that momentary change of which I have spoken must have come the sorry features of the man beside her. As to the countess herself, she absolutely seemed lost; there was hardly recognition in the gaze which she fixed on her husband—as I will call him in anticipation—and which never, I believe, throughout the ceremony, which commenced immediately, was removed for a moment from his face. It is my hope that she was in some sort, by long suffering and the horrors of the situation, reduced to a state of half-stupefaction. I do not know that during the celebration of the marriage she spoke. She may have done so, but the priest must have known, but I heard no sound of her voice, nor saw a movement of her shiny lips. Her eyes were fixed with a scared, side-long glance on her husband; and I believe she took no more part in what went on than we take in our dreams. But when all was over, and the man stooped down to kiss her forehead—then she awoke. Then she knew all. Then she knew that they were to part, that he was already surrounded by the guards who were to take him away, that that parting away was to death; and then the old love for him broke out, and about his neck and his fettered hands she hung, with such cries and lamentations as made the very walls give back the sounds of agony that woke a hence echo yet in the hearts of those who stood by and listened!

It was mercy to bring such misery as this to an end. The governor of the prison whispered the priest to ask if he knew any one when a parting to his man, these two but now united were torn apart, and by those separate ways by which they had come into that terrible place, the husband went his way to death, and the wife back to a home where laughter might never be heard, but where the voices of her children should bring her comfort in the days that were yet to follow.

THE "QUEEN OF THE WEST."

We illustrate on page 132 the attack of the Federal ram Queen of the West upon the rebel ram Vicksburg, off the city of Vicksburg, on February 3. The following letter to the Herald gives a graphic account of the affair:

MISSISSIPPI RIVER, NEAR VICKSBURG, Feb. 5, 1863.

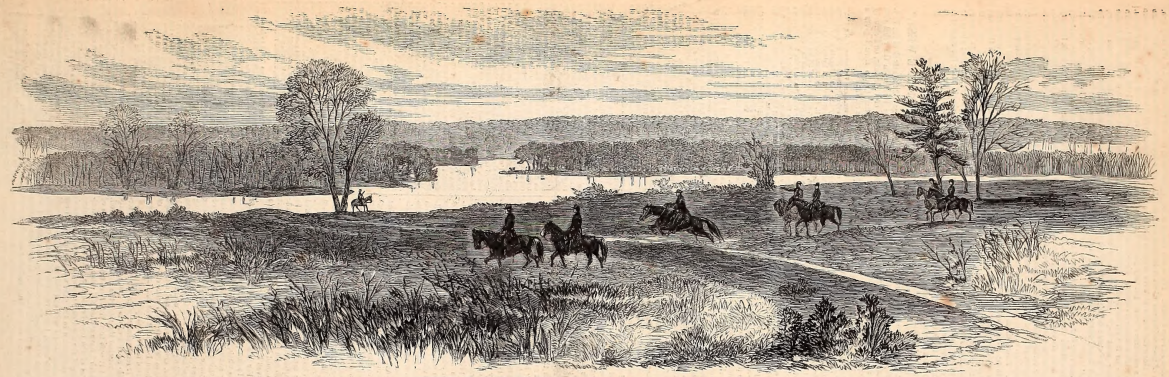
A very exciting scene was witnessed here this morning. The Union ram Queen of the West, Captain E. W. Shifflin, ran the gauntlet the whole of the batteries of Vicksburg. Colonel Charles R. Ellet, commander of the ram Ram, was on board of her, and directed the whole movement. The event has created great excitement in this vicinity. When the rebels saw the ram coming down the channel, near the city, and then pass down the river uninjured, they were not less astonished than chagrined. The ram was believed, by them at least, that no Union steamboat could safely pass their formidable line of batteries.

The following is a partial list of the officers on board the ram: Colonel Charles R. Ellet, Commander; Lieut. Ellet, retired, Captain; J. E. Tuthill, First Lieutenant; Sims Ellet, Master; J. C. Duncan, Master; Reuben Townsend, Engineer.

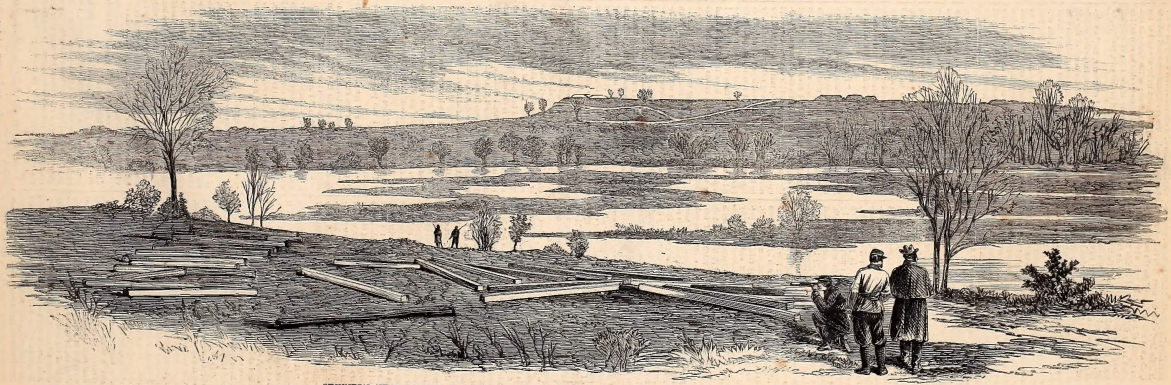
The Queen of the West had been previously provided with all the necessary implements and material for the complete success of the dangerous undertaking. Three immense bales of hay were placed around the wheel to the fever and placed on board, particularly about the machinery, which would have formidable an any obstacle to her shot and shell from the rebel batteries. Read-aboard Admiral Farragut's fleet, which is now lying off Vicksburg, destroy the rebel steamboat City of Vicksburg, and to upwards of 1,000 shot and shell from the rebel batteries. The Colonel was directed to keep close to the west bank going down, and to the east bank coming out. Unfortunately—as it was intended that she should run the gauntlet in the night—the ram—and, indeed, the whole

The Queen of the West had been previously provided with all the necessary implements and material for the complete success of the dangerous undertaking. Three immense bales of hay were placed around the wheel to the fever and placed on board, particularly about the machinery, which would have formidable an any obstacle to her shot and shell from the rebel batteries. Read-aboard Admiral Farragut's fleet, which is now lying off Vicksburg, destroy the rebel steamboat City of Vicksburg, and to upwards of 1,000 shot and shell from the rebel batteries. The Colonel was directed to keep close to the west bank going down, and to the east bank coming out. Unfortunately—as it was intended that she should run the gauntlet in the night—the ram—and, indeed, the whole



The Colonel started with the ram from above the bend a half past two o'clock in the morning, the machinery getting under way he discovered that the change made in the position of the ram had thrown the compass out of the former position to a narrow place behind the bulwarks—rendered almost impossible to see the boat's head by reason of her accompanying. Consequently an hour was spent in effecting the necessary alterations. It was about four o'clock when the sun was rising, when the ram rounded the point of land and twice passed through the fleet of rebel boats through no land to work her, it having been arranged that the commander of the ram should run down the west bank and not on board of her before she had passed the batteries.

When Vicksburg came in sight the batteries were by the rebels. They immediately opened a heavy fire from several of their guns, which threw the water and the shells about the city. The Queen slowly and steadily proceeded down the river, and when the ram came into batteries, until she reached a point opposite the spot where the rebel ram Vicksburg lay. Colonel Ellet then says that steamboat was lying in almost the same position as when she left her on the previous night. She was with that name Queen of the West. If the rebel steamboat had been under the fire of the rebel batteries all night, and the crew instead of penetrating her, would be inclined to believe that she fell down to one of the lower forts. Wishing to make the shock as effective as possible, when the ram had come within a short distance of the rebel steamer partly around, so as to face the city, and then made about the river steadily for the rebel steamboat. The rebels, who had crowded on the banks, scampered off in the most affrighted manner from the ram as she approached up in the city. The ram still went steadily on to the attack, and her destructive crew were ready to strike the rebel steamboat forward of the wheel-house; but at the moment of collision the ram's engines were put in full speed, and seeing her round so rapidly that nearly all the momentum of the blow was lost. To set the steamboat on fire on the transport of the arrangement. That portion of the pre- tentious was intended for the rebel ram Vicksburg. She was directed to fire the forward guns loaded with combustible balls and shells, and the moment the ram swung round he was ordered to fire them. Just at that moment a fire was discovered from the after-part of the ram, some exading into the barricades of cotton near him; but the fire was soon put out by the boldness of the active exertion of the order. The guns were fired, a tremendous blaze was seen on board the rebel steamer, and the ram was in flames.



At that time the ram was found to be on fire, A shell from shore had set her on fire near the starboard wheel-house, which ignited the cotton bales near it. Shells had fired the cotton on her bow. Both steamboats were now on fire at the same time. The flames spread rapidly on both vessels. The smoke from the fires of the rebel ram Vicksburg was so dense as almost to suffocate the engineers. Those on board the rebel steamboat had to take to the water to escape suffocation on their boat. This they soon accomplished. Colonel Ellet had intended to fire the steamboat himself, but was unable to finish the work of destruction; but the spreading flames on the Queen of the West rendered it necessary for him to leave the scene of his own vessel. He therefore ran down stream, and was soon out of the reach of shot and shell from the batteries. Though the cotton had been wet before starting, the fire soon communicated to the woodwork, and the ram was shown overboard in order to save the ram, she then abandoned to the flames. The crew of the ram, all of them, got safely ashore.

All this time the rebels were approaching the city and having fired their batteries were blazing away at the Queen of the West with light guns and small arms, and shells were also thrown from the rebel steamboat City of Vicksburg, which was on the west bank of the Mississippi river. Many rifle-pits on the bank, and, as opportunity offered, the guns from the batteries were fired at the rebels. The ram was now on fire forward on her bow. It was a most one hundred and twenty whole yards from the batteries; but the ram was struck only twelve times, and received no injury from the musketry. She was struck twelve in the hull above the water-line, the cotton was considerably smashed, and one casemated gun was disabled and destroyed.

The steamboat City of the West ran the blockade of Vicksburg harbor, damaged the rebel steamboat opposite the city, and then, having received no material injury, the crew of the rebels endeavored to get steam up on board the City of Vicksburg, but failed, although the appearances indicate that she has been damaged seriously.

CORBIN'S NECK, ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.]

SKINNER'S NECK, ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK, BELOW FREDERICKSBURG, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.]

MAP OF THE SOUTHERN STATES, SHOWING THE RELATIVE PROPORTION OF SLAVES IN THE DIFFERENT LOCALITIES.—[SEE PAGE 142.]

OUR SLAVERY CHART.

On page 141 will be found a chart which represents to the eye the relative slave population in the different parts of the Southern States at the beginning of the rebellion. The depth of shade represents density of the colored in proportion to the white population; and it will be perceived that the shade varies from white to solid black. In several counties in West Virginia, Eastern Kentucky and Tennessee, Northern and Southeastern Missouri, the slaves were less than three per cent. of the whole population. In Western North Carolina, Northern Georgia, Northern Arkansas, and toward the northern part of Alabama, are counties in the population of which the slaves numbered less than six per cent.

The densest proportion of slave population is embraced within the country extending along the Atlantic Ocean, Gulf of Mexico, and bordering the Southwestern rivers. The slaves were more than fifty per cent. of the inhabitants included between the sea and Gulf coasts and a line, nearly parallel, beginning west of Richmond, Virginia, and extending southwardly to near Raleigh, North Carolina; thence southwestwardly to a little north of Montgomery, Alabama; thence northwestwardly to the vicinity of Memphis, Tennessee; thence to Shreveport, Louisiana, and a little to the north of Austin, Texas. Within this region there are counties in Southwestern Georgia, Southeastern Alabama, Central Mississippi, and some parts of Texas, as where the slaves were less than twenty-five per cent. of the whole people. In many of the counties they were from fifty to sixty per cent.; and in nearly all the region along the Mississippi River, Central Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina, and in Virginia south of Richmond, they were more than sixty per cent. of the inhabitants; and in some South Carolina districts along the coast, in parishes in Louisiana, and counties in Mississippi along the Mississippi River, the slaves were over ninety per cent. of the whole population. In Central Kentucky, Tennessee, along the Tennessee River in Northern Alabama, and along the Missouri River was a slave population varying from thirty to sixty per cent., while in Western Kentucky and Tennessee it was scarcely thirty per cent., except in the region northeast and east of Memphis, where cotton is produced in abundance.

In all the Slave States, except those along the northern border, the north and west parts of North Carolina, and the north and east parts of Tennessee, the density of slave population presents a proportionate abundance in the product of cotton. Along the coasts of South Carolina and Georgia rice is an additional product of slave labor; and along the Gulf coast of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, particularly at the Sea-Island State, the slaves were engaged in the production of sugar.

In the western part of Central Virginia, in Central Alabama, Southern and Western Georgia, Southwestern Tennessee, Eastern Arkansas, and Louisiana, and in Middle Texas, the produce of cotton was more than two bales to each slave.

IN THE WATERS UNDER THE EARTH.

PROBABLY very few persons indeed ever think of the risk incurred by thousands of their fellow-countrymen, every day of their lives, in laboring for those things without which they themselves would find it difficult to live, or if they do remember it, it is only when some more than usually fearful accident, where the destruction of life is on a large scale, occurs. In the case of accidents in mines, it is seldom that the sufferers survive to tell the tale. I do not speak of such commonplace occurrences as being crushed by a fall of rock, but where an explosion has taken place near the pitshaft, possibly followed by a fire, thus cutting off egress from the pit, and leaving the unfortunate men in the more distant workings to perish by hunger, or by the combined action of starvation and suffocation. Such an occurrence, when only three or four lives are lost, seldom does more than form the subject of a paragraph for a newspaper, and the matter is then forgotten; and more frequently it is not known beyond the pit.

My own occupation has been of a kind to bring me in frequent contact with miners, and by those employed in coal-mines, but those who are engaged in the less dangerous, but, as I think, more unpleasant kinds of labor for one, I have often seen—poor cripples, who have little to live on except the few shillings a week they get from the owner of the pit in which they were maimed, for the privilege to enter upon an occupation carried on under such miserable conditions, that they might find work. If not in this, at all events in another country, sure for the open sky. One of these men, an old man now, who had, in the time I heard his little narrative been a cripple for fifteen years had escaped unhurt, by what might almost be called a miracle. His name was Henry Spanley, and he, with his brother Richard, another miner named Smale, and a son of the last named, a little fellow barely eight years old, were at the bottom of working number five. The manner in which the boy was employed was a secret among the men themselves, the reason given by the fireman or overlooker for keeping him in the pit with him being, that having no mother to look after him, he wished to keep him out of the way of harm. The part of the pit in which they worked was so distant from the shaft that they never saw any of the overmen more than once a day, and more often not at all; and whenever he did make his appearance in that part of the pit where they were, the boy, who had been on the look-out, gave them notice of his approach, and they would hastily leave the working in which they were actually engaged for another a hundred yards distant, and running in a different direction.

The reason why they were so anxious to conceal the scene of their operations was as follows: The pit was one of those on the west, and the richest, and therefore most profitably worked part of it, was beneath the sea. One of the veins was so high and broad, and the coal so easily worked, that it was extended to a distance under water, which, in the opinion of an inspector, endangered the safety of the mine. In consequence of this opinion the men were ordered to discontinue working it; and most people would have thought that nothing more was necessary than to obey the order, when the miners knew that it could only be disobeyed at the peril of their lives. But considerations of interest in the exercise of their vocation never have and never will deter miners from disregarding orders, when they bring in a remedy for danger, or even inconvenience. The men above named were in the habit of working this vein, though ostensibly, and at times actually, they were employed in a siding, where the overlooker found them when he went in that direction. Their earnings, under these circumstances, were large, but they had to pay for a specific much remark; and, to celebrate their success, they agreed to eat their Christmas dinner together. They had worked on the Monday in the part of the place they were sitting at the extreme end of the working referred to, eating their mid-day meal, when they were startled by a sudden, loud fall, followed by the hollow crackling sound which good coals produce when they crumble together into lumps. There was a pause, and then the fall completely blocked up the vein, and this at a distance of not more than thirty or forty paces from where they had been sitting. Of course they sprang in a cell, as it might be called, about fifty yards long, four wide, and three in height. Fortunately there was no escape of gas at the time, which was enough with such matters to know that the air must in a limited time be rendered incapable of sustaining life. The first thing they did after they had recovered a little from the shock, was to examine their bags, to see what provisions they had left; and this second, by the way, was the only articles they had among them. As regarded provisions, they were more than commonly well off, one of them having brought a large loaf of home-made bread down with him that morning, in order that his mates might taste it. The next source of light, they were badly off; they found that if they put out all except one, in less than twenty-four hours they would be in total darkness.

Of the extent of the fall they could form no idea; but as their only chance of escape was by clearing a way through it they set to work at it without delay. They toiled for hours, but the progress made was slow, owing to the slipping down of fresh pieces in the place of those removed, which, moreover, helped to fill up the not very large space in which they were confined. They rested two at a time, the third relieving one of the others at regular intervals. In this way hour after hour passed, and to all appearance they were as far from getting out as at the beginning, and their alive in the body of the earth, which the imagination is scarcely capable of realizing. The poor fellows then almost despaired, as they began to believe, to a slow but certain death within a few hours, grouped their way together, and sat down on the ground. Silent and motionless they sat, the thoughts of each occupied with those they had left in the morning; suddenly the silence was broken by the voice of the little boy repeating a part of his evening-prayer in

Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep.

The little voice could not but get beyond the second line, but broke down with a deep sob, followed by a passionate burst of tears. The sympathy which his father could be heard trying to console him in a half-choked voice. The others, unable to contain themselves any longer, gave way to their grief; and for some minutes nothing could be heard in the darkness but deep sobs. When these had died away, they could hear the dull, heavy sounds above them, which followed each other in monotonous and slightly irregular succession: it was the beating of the sea on the rocks over their heads overhead, said the poor fellow who told me this, how much the sense of their position was aggravated by those sounds. For hours, in the dark, but the progress they made was hopelessly small; but with the light which shone upon them, increased their agony to desperation, and, with the exception of the child, each reflected within himself whether it would not be better to end it by a speedy act of his own. They agreed that the best plan was to keep working this vein, and would therefore not think of searching for them there. Rather than sit in idle restless despair, they resumed work in the dark; but if the progress they made was hopelessly small by the light, it was still more so now that they had none. They were soon exhausted by the exertion, and, much perhaps, from their hopelessness as from fatigue. Throwing themselves on the ground, they resigned to prepare themselves for the fate which they now regarded as certain. Timidly, as is the wont of men when they address their Creator even in the presence of others for the first time, Stanley uttered a few short sentences of prayer; Smale was the next to follow his example, and after him Richard Stanley. Comforted by their appeals they continued them at short intervals; and presently the child, at the desire of his father, sang a hymn he had been taught at the Sunday school, the men joining their rough voices to his little childish treble. At the conclusion of each verse, the sound of the dashing waves on the shore above filled the hole in which they were buried with its low, thundering, monotonous beat. Soon this was the only sound audible. The two brothers put their arms round each other, and they all lay patiently waiting for the coming of that light which all, even those who daily ask for it, shrink from with inexplicable inconsistency.

By a merciful condition of existence, those unfortunate men who are buried as these were, gradually cease to feel the dread of death, in proportion as hope of rescue fades away from their minds, the exhalement of carbonic acid gas reducing the vitality by degrees till the brain becomes paralyzed, and this long before the vital spark is utterly extinguished. Richard Stanley had already reached the stage of insensibility, when his brother heard a dull, murmuring sound as the coal, hitherto at a further settling down of the mass, under increased pressure from above, or of its being removed by men on the other side. Under the stimulus of this thought, Henry Stanley crawled to the heap and listened with all the eagerness of which he was still capable. His presence of mind soon enabled him to satisfy himself that men were at work on the other side, and he was in the act of turning to crawl back to try and rouse his companions to a peril to a knowledge of the good news, when a heavy shock fell on him from the roof upon his loins, crushing him to the ground beneath its weight, and rendering him completely incapable of moving. The exact position that he was in he soon found him when they had worked their way through the fallen mass. Richard was insensible, and it was some hours by say at eleven o'clock by his arms round his little boy, who was lying on his bosom. The child was past recovery; but that several hours more air, till they could be seen regained their senses, Henry Stanley alone being permanently injured by the accident.

Another accident, a somewhat kind, which likewise occurred in a coal-mine, was related to me by one of the survivors, though how he came to survive is a mystery to himself. The place was a solid winter night, a middle-aged man named William Jamieson was waked by his wife, who was crying and moaning in her sleep, and was unable by her not to go to work the next day. Wondering what had happened to cause her to make the noise, he, after a few minutes, when she had told him that she had dreamed twice that night that she had seen him go down into the pit, take a lamp, and that the lamp had gone out of the mine, and he joined their sons and began work; that while they were at work she heard a dreadful crash, and then a roar like that of the sea, which left a pause of loneliness and workings from one end of the mine to the other, and finally rushed up the shaft in a body, and that she awoke with clouds and darkness all around her.

Without attempting to initiate Jamieson's dialect, which would only worry the reader, I will give the facts he related as nearly as I can remember them.

"That is what she was what she had dreamed I told her it was all nonsense. Our wives are always having dreams of this kind, but in time they get used to them, and take no notice. However, she was so earnest about it, and seemed so frightened, that I promised her at last I would stay at home. I was thinking directly afterward what I should do all day, when I thought it would be a good opportunity to kill our pig instead of putting it off a week or two longer. I got up between six and seven o'clock, and when I went down found my sons having their breakfast, and their mother trying to persuade them not to go to work. They did not pay much heed to what she said; and when they had finished breakfast they took their dinners and started. I went out with my wife just before the door and begged me not to let them go. I was ashamed to say that I had promised not to go to work because of her mother's dreams; so I said that I decided on having the pig killed that day, and that I should not stay at home, as there would make a holiday of it. As they refused to do this, and were too old to be made to do what they did not like, there was no help for it but to let them go. After breakfast I went to the slaughter-man to ask him to come down with me, and on the way I bought some pudding and put some meat in a bottle filled with gin, which I slung over my shoulder. On getting to his house I found that he had gone to Liverpool, and was not likely to be back before the evening. I was uncertain what to do. The promise I had made my wife only made me angry with myself for having to help for her, and nobody I could have a holiday with; so, at last, I made up my mind that I would go to work at once. I had no doubt that when I got to the pit, and I had to wait a while before I could be lowered, and while I was waiting, an overlooker came up, and I told him that I should have a good deal of gas in Delk's Hole—a name that had been given to a spot where a man of that name had been killed.

When I got to the bottom of the shaft I took my lamp and walked to the part of the mine where I had been working, and found it was as we always left it before. It was about as far from the shaft as it could be; but there was plenty of air, the ventilation in the mine being very strong, if any thing, and apt to give the rheumatism. I stood two or three minutes talking to my son Alfred, and then left them to their work and walked off. I was just taking the bottle off my shoulder when we heard a smothered roar. We knew well enough what had happened, and directly set off for the shaft, to get drawn up, if the explosion had been serious and the choke-damp had not extinguished the pit. Before we had got to the shaft we were stopped by a miner named Naylor, who said that the shaft was on fire, and all the workings were filled with gas. We were not to be frightened by such a roar like a whirlwind; and every now and then pieces of burning timber came crashing down, and bounced out of the fire toward where we were standing. As there was no possibility of getting out of the pit before the fire had burned itself out, I and my two boys went back to the place where we had left our things, leaving the other men still standing near the shaft. I knew that several hours must pass before the timber in the shaft would be burned out we staid where we were, calculating how long it would be before we could venture up. When we went back we found that the fire had spread several feet in our direction, which made our situation more desperate; but for what we thought then was the danger from the water into the shaft it would not be long before it would be extinguished. We never thought they would close the shaft, with the deliberate intention of filling the pit with water. The upward draught was strong, the progress of the fire toward us was not slow as to be alarming; and, as for the air, because so heated that we were forced to draw further and further back into the mine, the hot air causing the gas to come out of the coal. Long before there was no chance of our being able to escape for many hours, at least, we went back to the place where we had left the little basket with the provisions, and found that the air was still fresh and cool, in comparison with what it was near the shaft. To economize our food, as much as to conceal from my boys how low down and went to sleep.

When I woke I fancied I could detect unusual dampness beneath my hand, as I rolled over to get on my feet. My son remarked the same thing when I called them; and as we round of together as much as we could, liquor our lamp—for, fortunately, we had matches, as most of us usually have, though it is against pit regulations—hoping to find the fire extinguished. We had not gone far before we felt that water splashing beneath our feet. It was evident the water had been pouring in for some time, and from the quantities, and the suspicion crossed my mind that the pumps had ceased to work, and that they were allowing the water to accumulate in the workings. The air near the shaft was insufferably hot, but the fire had not extended, or but very little. Unfortunately, the floor of the pit there was a little was higher than the surrounding parts, so that the water ran off, and was first helping to flood the mine, while the place we were in was not yet covered uncovered. To remedy this, it was proposed that we should go to work to make a dam of coal-dust; but as it was immediately found that the only effect of this would be to cause the water to flow through the mine in one direction instead of two, the idea was not carried out.

Meanwhile the fire continued to rage as fiercely as ever in and about the shaft; and as it could do no good to remain near it, we went back to our sad air, I proposed to my sons that we should again return to our refuge, where we could retrieve the loss of some of the water, at a time. Alfred agreed to come, but William decided on remaining with the other miners, saying that he would join us presently. The water was not very deep, and the difference in the depth of the water, since we left the place where we had been working, was quite perceptible. We directed our steps to work, and made such a barrier as was sufficient to keep the water from reaching us, as we thought, for many hours to come, and sat ourselves down. My thoughts ran a good deal on my wife's dream, as the most convenient subject at hand, and I wondered at the singular coincidence, and whether there was any chance of our ultimate escape. As there was no use in sitting idle, we began to prepare for the rise in the water by picking away the coal from the roof; and without working very hard, we had raised ourselves in a few hours to a safe level with the roof of the passages throughout the greater part of the mine. In the mean time, the water had been advancing in the shaft very rapidly as the first joint of my forefinger, it had risen while we were at work to the height of the third. We made several journeys backward and forward to and from the shaft, and found it always burning, but the fire in the mine itself was growing less and less. Very few hours would have put the matter out now, and a good many began to complain that they were dying of hunger, though I could not help telling them that they were complaining out on this score had the strongest voices. My son Alfred had noticed the same thing, and followed one of them who was crawling toward the shaft, saying with him a huge piece of one of the ponies. This was a precious resource to us, for careful as we had been with the food we had at the time of the accident, we had only a few ounces left.

As William preferred to remain with the other men, when we left him in the level, Alfred and I were alone in our misery. We sat side by side in the darkness, our hands fast locked together, and our feelings too deep for words. Once I crawled to the edge of the heap of coal we were sitting on to plunge my arm into the water to see how deep it was. The water in this was quite cold, from it had been to the length of my arm, and I found the next time I tried it that my fingers would scarcely bend. I left off doing it.

Of the other men, we saw nothing after we had got too weak to wade through the water to the shaft; but when we first left them we heard them talking to another through the darkness, and ask him how he was. By degrees these inquiries became less frequent, and finally ceased altogether, and were uttered. Another kept on repeating "Lord, have mercy on us!" till his voice grew weaker and weaker at every repetition, and at last died away altogether. I shouted for my son William, and he answered, but he could not join us, not being able to find his way to us. I knew that there were in the dark at intervals we called to each other, but after a while I got no answer, though whether he had perished or had crawled to some other part I could not tell, but I hoped the latter. By degrees all these sounds died away, and at last I could hear my son and I were the only living beings in the pit. Slowly but surely the water continued to rise, for though I could not test its depth, it was easy to ascertain that it was creeping toward us. We had no knowledge of the passage of time, but it seemed as if years had passed, when I was roused by my son, who was making feeble efforts to put his arm round my neck. I was myself too weak to lift him, but I crept close to him and kissed him. A little later, and he was cold and motionless. For hours, or it might have been days, I continued to hold his lifeless body in my arms. Of food I had none, and my only support was a sip of spirits taken at long intervals.

Still the water continued to rise, till I felt it touching my feet. I spent the time in sleep mostly, and when I lay awake, I had just life enough to wonder how long it would be before the water rose above my head. I did not now feel any particular dread of this happening; I had got so familiarized with the fearful reality that I only speculated in a dreamy kind of way on what the sensation would be like when it took place. From what I heard since, I believe I must have slept many hours at a time. I know that when I woke once I felt that my feet were no longer in the water. I stretched them as I judged, passed before I could say with certainty that it had sunk any more. This was about the most dreadful period of my imprisonment. When I lost my poor boy, I was expecting every hour to join him, and passed as it was, it seemed as if we were long separated for the whole while. Now my thoughts were busy with home. What would my wife say when she saw me back once more from the grave? What would she be doing when I got home? These and a thousand other wondering surmises passed through my mind as I sat there in the darkness; I sat at last I got weary, and began to despair of getting out after all, the water rose so slowly. I tried to forget home and wife, but I found this was not half so easy now. Not to spin out my tale any longer than I can help, I will say simply that after what I felt and thought was what resolutions I made for the future, if I only reached the surface of the earth once more alive.

At last the time came when the water nearly reached my knees at a distance of several feet in advance of the hoop on which I had been lying, and I began trying to reach the wall. This I at last succeeded in doing, though it took me a long time, owing to my weak and exhausted condition. Close to the shaft I found two of the air-holders and also several of the miners at work in repairing it. They were so much startled at seeing me as though I had been a ghost, and, indeed, as far as appearances went, I might with good reason have been taken for a skeleton. When I came down into the pit I had left the ground hard and frozen; the first time I saw it the grass was green, there were leaves on the trees, and a bright and warm sun was shining.

OUR COLORED TROOPS IN LOUISIANA

We publish on page 133 two illustrations of THE FIRST LOUISIANA NATIVE GUARDS, taken sketches by our special artist, Mr. Hamilton.

It is now some five months since General Butler's attention was called, by certain free colored men in New Orleans, to the fact that they held commissions from Governor Moore, of Louisiana, as duly-enrolled officers of the Confederate army, and requesting to transfer their services to the United States. General Butler, with that quick perception for which he is so remarkable, at once saw the bearings of this important matter, granted the request of his applicants, and issued the order mustering the regiment into our service, under the command of Colonel (then Lieutenant-Colonel) Spencer H. Stafford, one of his aides-de-camp.

Although ready and anxious for a brush with the enemy, that opportunity has not yet been afforded them. They have hitherto been employed mainly down in the Lafourche District, under the command of General Weitzel, guarding the bridges over important bayous, in a circuit of some fifty miles, and forming the base of Weitzel's late expedition into the Teche District. That affair being over, and the General returned to the main command at Thibodeaux, the Colonel of the Native Guards reported to the Department Head-quarters for further orders. On the evening of the 23d, pursuant to orders, eight Companies (comprising 800 men), embarked upon the Laurel Hill to join the garrison of Forts Jackson and St. Philip—the remaining two of each (ge—the remaining two Companies—A and D —being sent to Fort Macombo, on the Chef Menteur Pass, under Major Lucien Dupuy de Lome) by train.

The point selected by our special artist for illustration is the disembarkation from the steamer J. D. Brown, at Fort Macombe. The special New Orleans correspondent of the New York Times tells the following story of these men:

"You see my men can work, Sir, though people say they can't fight," said the Colonel, indignantly, as he drew a trouble our heads much about transportation. Put me down in a forest with these same officers, and they'll pass a city; for I have every useful trade represented among them."

At this moment a Captain came up to the Colonel, inclined him very respectfully, and, after saluting, said, modest, wait off."

"I understand you, Colonel," said I, "that all your line officers were colored men: there goes one, at any rate, who is white!" The Colonel turned his head, and smiled with a smile:

"And do you really think him white? Well you may, Sir; but that man is a negro—one who carries the solitary drop of African blood in his veins."

I was literally amazed. Often as my senses had been deceived in this matter, they never had been so completely before. This officer, Captain E. Davis, of Company A, this portrait is given in our group,—fair, was a fine-looking young man, not unlike General McClellan in mould of features, with light blue eyes, ruddy complexion, soft, silky hair, and a splendid mustache, of a sandy color, faintly approaching red. I would have defied the most consummate expert in Negrology, by the aid of the most powerful microscope, to discover the drop of African blood in that man's veins. Still there it was upon the record against him.

During this voyage, and after our arrival at the fort, I not only had the best opportunity for observing the general demeanor of these soldiers, but I made a point of conversing with several of the line officers, in order to come at some just conclusion as to their mental stability, manners, etc. Truth and honesty compel me to state that, so far as the privates were concerned, a more docile, orderly, obedient, and soldierly set of men I never saw; while, as regards the officers, I came to the conclusion that a large number of white men, taken at random, I could not have expected to find more general intelligence, education, and refinement.

We present our readers, on the same page, with a group of portraits, five of the line officers of Companies A and D of these Louisiana Native Guards. The central figure, Lieutenant L. D. Lanusse, Company D, and the figure to DAVIS, as before stated, is to all appearances perfectly so. The other three bear, more or less, marks of African origin. The officers all seem to have a clear loyalty and assert their manhood in the field; and, should this infamous rebellion continue, it is to be hoped their desires will not be long ungratified.

SOMETHING WORTH HAVING.

To have the sure esteem
Of those whose worth we know,
The heart will oft redeem
From many a cold throe.
The dearest soul declares
Some good must be in us,
Or by such souls as theirs
We were not valued thus.

When brimming cups go round,
When friends by friends are met,
Where jest and smile abound—
Oh, if we there may meet
Such long-tried friends to share
To wish us the wine—
Tis nectar then—and cheers
With influence divine!

Or, if oppressed with care
Or sickness, low we lie,
What most doth us compare
With friendship's love-lit eye?
One fond plain English word
More cheers our suffering man
Than all the gems absurd
Of doctor's Latin can.

Oh, bliss how bright, how rare,
Where friend like this appears,
With smiles our joy to share,
Or share our griefs with tears:
To have this, is to win
From out our earthly strife
The brightest jewel in
That crown of thorns—called life!

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A Reliable Article for Domestic Use!

ANDREWS' YEAST POWDER has been in constant use in the city of New York for the last twelve years, and found for the immediate raising of BREAD, TEA BISCUIT, PUDDINGS, &c., and ready for use "in one minute!"

The quality of this YEAST POWDER is never changed, and where used, gives the greatest satisfaction. Physicians are half a million cts per annum, and the certificates of Chemists, of Purity and Healthfulness, accompanies each label; also, full directions for use. Sullers are cautioned to ask for the "new and improved" composition" preparation ever made, and is "unfermentable" where kept in any climate. Manufactured and for sale by ANDREWS' "EXCELSIOR" YEAST Powder, and use no other, if you want "The Staff of Life" manufactured in perfection, sale by THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
136 and 138 Cedar St., New York.

Attention Agents, Soldiers, and Masons.

Any one wishing a permanent HOME WITH GOOD WAGES, and an occupation for life, together with wholesale Clothing, a Gold Mounted Watch, Gold Pencil, Gold Chain with Chain attached, or a neat new style Vest Chain, Ring, Pin, Locket, Sleeve Buttons, Gold Pen and Pencil, or a beautiful Engraved Bracelet, or Spring Locket, or a California Diamond Ring free of charge.

B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
No. 119 Nassau Street, New York.

TRUSSES.—Marble's Radical Cure Truss Office, corner of Broadway and ANN STREET. No connection whatever with any other Truss Office of same name. A female attends Ladies.

RAILWAY TIME KEEPERS

ARE SPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES. Superior in Style and Finish to any Watches ever before offered in this or any other country. Small retail at prices from $30 to $50 each. Our assortment of both gold and silver cases, and our gold and beautifully engraved dials, the letters and figures in relief. Sold only by the Company at the above address. Sent by express, with the privilege to examine before paying charges. Also, a large assortment of Watches of other makes, at low prices. Send for a descriptive circular. Address HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
No. 320 Broadway, New York.

Rheumatism—Who has it?

It has been confessedly acknowledged by thousands who have used them, that the Galvanic Electro Metallic Insoles are the most powerful remedy for Rheumatism, Chilblains, Cold and Feet-bitten Feet, &c. Sold by all druggists and shoe dealers throughout the country. Price, small $2 25. Secured by English and American Patents. Send for a circular. DAVIS & CO., 61 Nassau Street, New York.

CATARRH!—Dr. Goodale's CATARRH REMEDY penetrates to the very seat of the terrible disease, and exterminates it, root and branch. Price $1 00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. Depot 612 Broadway.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHIOS?—My Organic will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without injury to the skin. Sent by mail, post free, to any mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 169 Nassau Street, N. Y.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c. WORTH $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 00 each.
200 Ladies' Watches	40 00 each.
200 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	15 00 each.
300 Vest and Pocket Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 "	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Lava Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Lava Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gold Pens, and Gold Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3100 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 8 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 4 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sets of Roven Studs	2 00 to 4 00 each.
3000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
3000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
3000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
3000 Locket Rings	2 50 to 10 00 each.
3000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
1000 Gold Pens, Silver Mounted Holders	4 00 to 6 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Holders	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All Gold Pens 14 Carats and Warranted.

All of the articles in the list will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one also is worth, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed well. These envelopes are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of a certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and have the article sent you.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the certificate, postage, and 7 cents for the letter. Persons, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent to us. Certificates will be issued to any one for seven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every certificate sold, by their sending us the remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
203 Broadway, New York.

Valuable Naval Books.

NAVAL GUNNERY INSTRUCTIONS, SIMPLIFIED FOR VOLUNTEER OFFICERS. By Lieut.-Commander Edward Barrett, U.S.N. Second Edition, revised. 12mo. Cloth, $1 25.

RULES AND REGULATIONS FOR MEN-OF-WAR. By Commodore U. P. LEVY, U.S.N. Third Edition. 18mo. Cloth, 50 cents.

Publisher, No. 192 Broadway, N. Y.

Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, and all Army and Navy Claims, promptly collected. Reliable information furnished, rules of claims registered upon file, blanks, and assistance cashed. A pamphlet of Laws and Instructions sent by enclosing a six-cent stamp to

SOMES & BROWN, 2 Park Place, N. Y.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland, Neb. Soil, Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Potatoes, &c. Situated 30 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate.—19 acres made of from 10 to 50 per acre, payable within 5 years. School schools and society. Hundreds are settling. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rural sent free. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost treat position, and suitable emotion for pleasant farming that is among all the wilds of the Western Prairie.

SOMETHING NEW.

NATIONAL AMERICAN AMUSEMENT CARDS. Issued for Diversion, Instruction and Liberty for Grown-up Children. Sold by the dozen or pack. Sent by mail for 25c. each. Single cards, and Agents wanted. Address, NATIONAL AMERICAN PUBLISHING AGENCY,
No. 192 Broadway, New York.

$10 made from $1. Something entirely new, ingenuity needed in every family. Light and portable. Address, with stamp, R. L. WOLCOTT, Hartford, Conn. Square, N. Y.

Dr. Colborn's

Vegetable Sugar-Coated Universal Health Pills. Free from all mercurial or deleterious substances, active in searching out and expelling every impure thing in the body, perfectly safe for females, and even the most delicate infant. An indispensable Family Aperient for Diseases of the Liver, Dyspepsia, Constipation of the Bowels, and highly efficacious as a general Purifier of the Blood. No Mother, Nurse, Soldier, Traveller, or head of a family should be without them. Price 50 cents per box. Sent, free of postage, on receipt of price.

Also,

Dr. Colborn's

Compound Vegetable Ointment, the Great American Remedy for Scrofula, Scrofulous Diseases, Ulcers, Old Sores, Diseases, Cancers, Fever Sores, Scorbutic or Cutaneous Eruptions, and all Diseases of the Skin whatsoever. This is the grand desideratum in medicine, as it will remove all impurities from the blood, and is justly entitled to be called the Great American Remedy of the age.

Two sizes, 50 cents and $1 per bottle.

L. H. COLBORN & CO., No. 501 Broadway, N. Y.

Magic Pocket-Books for Postal Currency, with elastic bands. Sent, post-paid, for 75 cents per doz. $7 50 per gross. Sample for 10 cents.
J. SNOW & HAYGOOD, 23 Court Street, Boston, Mass.

The Badge,† or valuable recipes by a Pharmacist, 25 cents, post free.
Address, GEORGE RENARD, Philadelphia, Pa.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Entertaining Pencils, Oriental Drawers, and 15 other new articles. 15 circulars free. Address, SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

"MOUSTACHES AND WHISKERS IN 42 DAYS." Hunting, Fishing, and many other Wonderful Secrets, all in the Beadle's Readers. 6000 sold. $25. Free only 20c. 6 for $1. Mailed free. Address C. E. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, New Hampshire.

WEDDING CARDS

Three Colored Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Die Establishment, 302 Broadway, one Square North of the Metropolitan Hotel. 50 Fine Specimens, Mailed, and the stamps.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machine. Address
E. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Hospitals, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Soldiers charged low rates.

GOLD PENS retailing at wholesale prices. Send for circular. Address P. LALLEMAND, 48 Nassau St., N.Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Hours Just Published:

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP on his Way through the World; showing who robbed Him, who helped Him, and to whom He was a Friend. By Harland Bill. Author of "Vanity Fair," "The Newcomes," "The Virginians," "The Adventures of Philip," "The Eighteenth Century," "The Four Georges," &c., &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $1 25.

THE LIFE OF EDWARD IRVING, Minister of the National Scotch Church, London. Illustrated by his Journals and Correspondence. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of My Life," "Chronicles of Carlingford," "The Hons on the Moor," &c. With Portrait. 8vo, Cloth, $2 25.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For March, 1863.

CONTENTS:

CONTINENTAL MEMORY.—
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Riverse of Massachusetts Treasury Note.—Lower Portion of Reverse.—Maryland Bill.—Georgia Certificate.—New York Five-Pound Bill.—Bank of New York Bill.—Bank of Commerce Bill.—Bank of Continental Bill.—Dealers and Mottoes of One, Two, Three, Four, Five, Six, Eight, and Twenty Dollar Bills.—Of Shilling Bill.—Back of Same.—Device of Half Dollar Note.—Of Twenty, Thirty-five, Forty-five, Fifty, Fifty-six, Sixty, Sixty-five, Seventy, and Eighty Dollar Bills.—Continental Bill.—Back of Same.—Genuine and Counterfeit Continental Bill.—Group of Continental Money.

A CALIFORNIAN IN ICELAND. (Concluded.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Herring Fishery.—Artist at Home.—Effigy in Lava.—Lava Fields.—The Thermal Springs Burst Forth.—Sleeping Car.—Sleeping Car Stroker.—Side-Saddle.—Great Geyser and Receiver.—Bath-room and Geyser.—Geyser in Eruption.—Interior of Icelandic Hut.—An Awkward Predicament.—Return to Reykjavik.
DOCTOR HAWLEY. (Concluded.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Miss Hawley and her Friend.—"You shan't Kiss Me!"—Laughing Hawley.—The Reception.
ROMOLA. By the Author of "ADAM BEDE."
CHAPTER XXXIII. Balthassere makes an Acquaintance.
CHAPTER XXXIV. No Place for Repentance.
CHAPTER XXXV. What Florence was thinking of.
CHAPTER XXXVI. Ariadne discovers herself.
CHAPTER XXXVII. The Tabernacle unfolded.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—In Florence.—"You didn't think it was so Fine!"—Enraged.
MUSICIANS OF FIELD AND MEADOW.
FOR DEBATE, FOR WORSE, IN THREE PARTS. PART I.
EUROPEAN SOUVENIRS.
AFTER VICKSBURG.
MRS. HENDERSON'S ANNIVERSARY.
LITTLE JENNY.
OUR PROPHETS.
QUAIL.
LEMORNE verses HUSH.
LIGHT VANE.
THE OLD HOUSE AT ALLINGTON.
CHAPTER XXXI. Mr. Crosbie meets an old Clergyman on his way to Crossjay Patterne.
CHAPTER XXII. Courcy Castle.
CHAPTER XXIII. The Return of First Love-Letter.
ILLUSTRATION.—In Burchester Cathedral.
DIDO.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—A Battle Piece.—Hats on Bonnet Boxes.
FASHIONS FOR MARCH.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Carriage Dress and Girl's Toilet.—Home Toilet.

The papers of permanent value which have been published in almost every number a complete set of HARPER'S MAGAZINE is desirable acquisition to any public or private library. They form, at the end of each complete set, or any Number from the commencement. For Twenty-five Cents they will be sent by mail, post-paid. Any volume, containing six Numbers, bound in cloth, will be sent, postage free, by express, to the United States within 1500 miles of New York, for Two Dollars and Fifty Cents. Complete sets, now comprising Twenty-five Volumes, uniformly bound, will be sent by express, the cost of which is to be paid by purchaser, for One Dollar and Eighty-eight Cents per Volume.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Two Subscribers.
Six Copies for $15 00 each. Ten Copies for $20 00.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.
HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.
Vols. I., II., III., IV., V., and VI., for the YEARS 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, 1861, and 1862, of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $4 25 each, are now ready.
☞ The Publishers prefer no TRAVELING AGENTS. Parties who desire to subscribe to Harper's Magazine or Harper's Weekly had better remit direct to the Publishers, or pay their subscriptions to some Postmaster or General Agent with whom they are acquainted, and of whose responsibility they are assured.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE COPPERHEAD PARTY.—IN FAVOR OF A VIGOROUS PROSECUTION OF PEACE!

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A SPECULATION.

Agents and Soldiers, in camp or discharged, can make easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; embracing 40 New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp can act as Agents, and make money from it. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Fine Jewelry and Watches at low prices. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements.
S. C. BICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being price manufactured vast to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for packaging and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Americus and Lepinus of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new serial No. 1 Watch, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Buy your Skate Straps with

Fogg's Lever Buckle,

Manufactured by F. STEVENS,

215 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK,

68 STREET, BOSTON.

IMPORTANT TO AGENTS!!—We have reduced the wholesale price of our GREAT STATIONERY PACKAGES. We also give better Watches to our Agents than any other firm. Send stamp for new circular. WEIR & CO., 34 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

India-Rubber Gloves cure Chapped Hands, Salt Rheum, &c., making them smooth and white, and are suitable for home-work. For sale by the trade. Sent by mail on receipt of price and 4 stamps for postage.
Ladies' sizes 81 c. per pair; Gents sizes, $1 00.
GOODYEAR'S I. R. GLOVE M'F'G CO.,
205 Broadway, N. Y.
Rubber Goods of all kinds Wholesale and Retail.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to D. Adee, 381 Pearl St., N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

Splendid Engravings.

Gen. Tom Thumb and his Wife,

AND

Commodore Nutt with

Miss Minnie Warren.

Painted in Colors, forming two beautiful pictures, size each 11x14. Mailed free on receipt of 50 cents. Liberal discount to the trade.
AMERICAN PUBLISHING AGENCY,
14 Chambers Street, N. Y.

Send for our Circular of splendid Cartes de Visite of Generals, &c. Magnificent Cartes Portraits of Generals (Union and Rebel). Beautiful Card Photographs, 250 Subjects. Rich and durable Photograph Albums; and every thing else in demand. Special discounts to Jobbers.

ATTENTION, LADIES!

The Lilliputian Wedding.

By special arrangement, we will publish on the 10th February, immediately after their marriage, the Card Photograph of

GEN. TOM THUMB

AND HIS

FAIRY BRIDE,

IN THEIR WEDDING DRESS,

with their autograph. No album will be complete without this interesting picture. Price 25 cents. Can be sent by mail. All orders must be sent to

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

501 Broadway, New York,

Manufacturers of Photograph Albums, and Publishers of Card Photographs of Celebrities.

Male and Females.—For valuable information send 10 cents to Dr. Wm. Collier, Box 63, Woburn, Mass.

The most Perfect Work on Billiards ever Published.—Popular Edition.

Price only 25 Cents.

THE ILLUSTRATED HAND-BOOK

BY

Michael Phelan and Claudius Berger.

This work of 160 pages and elegantly illustrated, contains all the requisites to instruct the novice and make him a proficient in this most elegant and beautiful pastime. It also contains all the rules of all games played with Billiard Balls, a History of, and many delightful and interesting information pertaining to the game. For sale by all Dealers. The Trade supplied by SINCLAIR TOUSEY, 121 Nassau St. Mailed free on receipt of price.
Address PHELAN & BERGER,
67 Crosby Street, N. Y.

Lyon's Kathairon.

This delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is again put up by the original proprietor, and it now made with the same care and attention, which first created its immense and unprecedented sales of over one million bottles annually! It will sold at 25 cents in large bottles. Two million bottles can easily be sold in a year when it is again known that the Kathairon is not only the most delightful hair dressing in the world, but that it cleanses the scalp of rust and dandruff, gives the hair a lively, rich luxuriant growth, and prevents it from turning grey. These are considerations worth knowing. The Kathairon has been tested for over twelve years, and is warranted as described. Any lady who values a beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon. It is finely perfumed, cheap and valuable. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.

D. S. BARNES & CO.,

New York.

$22 Watches. $22

A genuine American Lever Watch, in heavy Sterling Silver Hunting Case, for $22, worth $35. Send for a circular. J. L. FERGUSON, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

GOLD PENS

Retailed at wholesale prices. Goods warranted. Send for a circular, giving list of prices and engravings of Pens. Pens re-pointed on the receipt of 38 cents.
E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office 15 Maiden Lane, New York City.

Stationery Package and Book Agents.

A new wonder, and unsurpassed chances for you! Address Box 301, Syracuse, N. Y.

GREAT TRIUMPH.

STEINWAY & SONS, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, N. Y., were awarded a first prize medal at the late Great International Exhibition, London. There were two hundred and sixty-nine pianos from all parts of the world entered for competition.

The special correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinways' endorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

STAMMERING.

Cured by Bates' Patent Scientific Appliances—the only known means for the rapid and permanent cure of Stammering. Stuttering, &c.

They took the First MEDAL at the last London Exhibition, and of which the Illustrated London News, 2 Aug., 1862, says:—"Mr. Bates, of Philadelphia, shows some small and ingenious instruments for the treatment of Stammering, the effect of which on an individual so afflicted is really remarkable."

For Pamphlets, &c., describing the same, address H. C. L. MEARS, 371 West 23d St., New York. P. O. Box 5076.

Metallic Legs

(Patented Jan. 6th, 1863), by the

UNIVERSAL JOINT AND ARTIFICIAL LIMB COMPANY.

Weighs only 4 Pounds.

Soldiers, price $200; Civilian, $75; silver-plated, $100. They will lengthen and shorten, and are self-adjusting. Send for a circular to J. W. WESTON,
No. 491 Broadway, New York.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $24, $30, $36 & $42 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and diagram of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

FRENCH FLANNEL ARMY SHIRTS, $24, $27, $30 and $33 per dozen.

AGENTS WANTED

S. W. H. WARD, from London, No. 387 Broadway.

THE "CRAIG MICROSCOPE,"

Of which over 80 dozen, and 250 dozen mounted objects have been sold since the 1st of Oct. in the city of Boston alone, will be sent, postage paid, with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $3. Liberal discount to dealers. Address HENRY CRAIG, 152 Centre Street, New York.

A REALLY VALUABLE MICROSCOPE, one that a child can use, sent by mail on receipt of 50 cents.
S. WOODWARD, P. O. Box 5773, Boston.

Rye Coffee

FORCED OUT OF THE MARKET.

Since the recent discovery in Brooklyn of the injurious effects of using Coffee adulterated with meal Rye, many thousands are asking what they shall do, having already suffered so much from the evil effects of this unfortunate war, and now to be deprived of their favorite beverage in consequence of the almost prohibitory price, is indeed really too bad, as it is not only a luxury, but to many thousands almost an absolute necessity, and he who can furnish a good and healthy article of Coffee at a fair price is a public benefactor, and is deserving of the gratitude of the people at large. We have seen and used such an article, known as the "GOLDEN RULE COFFEE," of which there are spurious articles in the market. The genuine is prepared only by GROOM BROTHERS & CO., wholesale grocers, and proprietors of the golden Rule Coffee and Spice Mills, No. 323 Pearl St. and No. 1 Franklin Square. It has been analyzed by the eminent chemist J. R. Chilton, of New York, and we have seen his certificate, in which he says there is nothing in the Coffee injurious, but, on the contrary, it is very healthy and nutritious given for invalids. Drs. Bauer and Palmedo of the Brooklyn eye-passing case make daily also say it is healthy and nutritious. It is sold by many grocers at the low price of 15 cents per pound, and by using we find that it takes no greater quantity than we always use of the pure Java and Mo Coffee. All should try it.

A BEAUTIFUL Engraved GOLD PLATED WATCH, Lever Cap, Scottish Movement, perfect time-keeper. Sent to any address by mail, free for one, $7. Solid Silver, same as above, $8. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 40 Ann St., N.Y.

Lithography,

Engraving, and Printing, by LANG & COOPER, 117 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK. Transfers from Copper and Steel Plate to Stone made equal to copper-plate printing at one half the cost. Country orders particularly attended to. Send for samples and prices.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE!

MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 28c. COIN PREFERRED. Five different powers, $1. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 5230, Boston, Mass.

PHYSIOGNOMY;

Or, "Signs of Character, and How to Read them"—Ethnology; or, the Races of Man—Physiology, Physiognomy, and Psychology—are given, in earnest, in THE FREE NOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 1863. $1 a year. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machines.

Highest Premium.

International Exhibition, London, 1862.

See the recent Improvements.

Office 505 Broadway, New York.

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlement. Rich soil. Healthy climate. See advertisement of Vineland, on previous page.

AGENTS WANTED for our Splendid New Monmouth Cartes Prize Package. $20 per cent. profit. Superb Work Box for agents. $12 per day made. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CATELY & CO., 49 Ann St., N.Y.

Portable Printing Offices,

For the use of Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to do their own Printing. Circular sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., on receipt of two 3 ct. stamps.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 21 Park Row, N. Y.

HARPER'S

Illuminated and Pictorial

BIBLE.

Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely executed by Adams after Designs by Chapman, exclusive of a Series of Rich Illuminations in Colors, comprising Frontispieces, Presentation Plate, Family Record, Title-page, &c. The whole forming a sumptuous Folio Volume.

Prices.—Morocco, gilt edges, bevelled and panelled sides, $25 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $22 50; Full Calf, marbled edges, flush sides, $18 00; Full Roan, marbled edges, $16 00.

Harper's Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard copy of the American Bible Society, and contains Marginal References, the Apocrypha, a Concordance, Selected Table, List of Proper Names, General Index, Table of Weights, Measures, &c. The Illustrations, Frontispieces, Titles to the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, and Initial Letters to the chapters, Ornamental Borders, &c., are from original designs, drawn expressly for this edition, by J. G. Chapman, Esq., of New York. In addition to which, there are numerous large Engravings, from designs by distinguished modern artists in France and England; of which a full list will be found in

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. WINCH, Boston; E. Co., Philadelphia; EGGERS & Co., Philadelphia; CUSHINGS & BAILEY, Baltimore; PARKER, PIKE, Washington; JAMES KILLEBREW & Co., Cincinnati; KERTH & WOODS, St. Louis; S. C. GRIGGS & Co., Chicago; DAWSON & BROTHERS, Montreal.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have Just Ready:

CHRONICLES OF CARLINGFORD. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "The Life of Edward Irving," "The Last of the Mortimers," "The Days of My Life," "The Laird of Norlaw," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00; Paper, 75 cents.

NO NAME. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Queen of Hearts," "Antonina," &c., &c. Illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN. 8vo, Cloth, $1 50; Paper, $1 00.

Eighth Thousand.

MY DIARY NORTH AND SOUTH. By WILLIAM HOWARD RUSSELL. With Illustrations.

Ninth Thousand.

AURORA FLOYD. A Novel. By M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Lady Audley's Secret." 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

LINES LEFT OUT; or, Some of the Histories Left Out in "Line upon Line." This First Part relates Events in the Times of the Patriarchs and the Jews. By the Author of "Line upon Line." "Reading without Tears," "The Young Jesus," "Stories of Light," &c. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

BARRINGTON. A Novel. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Gerald Fitzgerald," "One of Them," "The Martins of Cro' Martin," "Maurice Tiernay," "The Dodd Family Abroad," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

MEMOIRS OF MRS. JOANNA BETHUNE. By her Son, the Rev. GEO. W. BETHUNE, D.D. With an Appendix, containing Extracts from the Writings of Mrs. Bethune. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

☞ Any of the above works sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 323.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE LATE NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

WE publish herewith a portrait of the late Western millionaire, NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, who died at Cincinnati on the 10th inst.

Mr. Longworth was born at Newark, New Jersey, in 1783. In early life it is said that he was brought up to the trade of a shoemaker. He soon abandoned this, and tried his hand at trade in South Carolina. In 1804, when just twenty-one, he removed to Cincinnati, and entered the office of Judge Jacob Burnet as a law student. He pursued his studies about six months, and then dashed into the practice of his hastily-acquired profession in the rough and irregular way peculiar to that primitive period. He forsook, at an early period of his residence in the West, the future greatness of the then insignificant village of Cincinnati; and though unsanctioned in his opinions by those of his fellow-settlers in the new community, took advantage of their unbelief, and began a series of systematic investment of every thing he could make by his services as lawyer and land-agent in the well-wooded acres surrounding the original clearing of Fort Washington and Losantiville. He bought for trifling sums whatever was rejected by every body else, and thus acquired the title, which his heirs still retain, to some of the most valuable portions of the present city and its immediate suburbs. By this means he accumulated, in the course of a few years, an amount of property that, in 1819, he gave up practicing law, that he might devote himself to the management and improvement of his estate.

Perhaps the first step toward the accumulation of his wealth was an incident which occurred to him during his legal practice. The story is told by those who knew him well and kept a careful record of his career. Mr. Longworth once received as a legal fee from a criminal accused of horse-stealing, and who had nothing else to give, two second-hand copper stills. These were in the charge of one Joel Williams, who kept a tavern adjacent to the river, and who was a large property-holder at that time. On presenting his order, Mr. Williams told Longworth that he could not part with the stills, for he was just building a distillery in Butler County; but he would give him a lot of thirty-three acres on Western Row in lieu of the articles. Mr. Longworth, whose view of the value of property was always in advance of public opinion, gladly closed with the proposal. Those thirty-three acres occupied a front on Western Row from Sixth to Seventh streets, running west; and this transaction alone, taking into view the prodigious advance in real estate, in itself furnished the basis of an immense fortune, the ground itself being in 1861 worth nearly two millions of dollars, and of course is of much more value now. His property increased so rapidly that in 1850 he was rated higher than any other man in the United States except William B. Astor, the taxes of the latter amounting to $23,116, while those of Longworth were over $17,000.

It was, however, as a vine-grower and horticulturist that he was most famed. He always manifested a fondness for the cultivation of fruits and flowers, and at an early period astonished the Western people by the beauty and extent of his garden. He took much pains to gather from all parts of the West the most valuable and interesting of our native vegetable productions, and placed them in circumstances best fitted mentally to their improvement by aid of the best systems of garden and green-house culture then known. Many of our beautiful native plants, now familiarly known as favorite florists' flowers, are indebted to him for their introduction into cultivated society, their native homes being the forests and prairies of the Western States. He was always curious after new and interesting things of Nature's producing. It was the remark of an old citizen of Cincinnati that, if Mr. Longworth was to be suddenly thrown, soul and heels, into the Ohio River, he would come to the surface with a new variety of fish in each hand. His chief interest in horticultural matters, however, has been expended upon the strawberry and the grape. The perfection of variety and culture to which he has, by his experiments and labors, brought these two important fruits of the country have established their extensive and systematic cultivation in all parts of the West.

The Catawba Grape is a native of North Carolina, having been first brought into public notice as a wine-grape by Major Adlum, of Washington; and the knowledge of the fact that wine, in an experimental way, had been made from its fruit, induced Mr. Longworth to enter systematically upon its cultivation, and to take measures for manufacturing the wine on a scale extensive enough to encourage the establishment of numerous vineyards, and to afford a market on his own premises for all the Must that could be made and delivered to him in a circuit of fifty miles. At the same time he offered a reward of five hundred dollars to whoever should discover a better variety. It proved a great stimulus to the growth of the Catawba vine in the neighborhood of Cincinnati to know that a man of Mr. Longworth's means stood ready to pay cash, at the rate of from a dollar to a dollar and a quarter a gallon, for all the grape juice that might be brought to him, without reference to the quantity. It was in this way, and by urgent popular appeals through the columns of the newspapers, that he succeeded, after many failures, and against the depressing influence of much doubt and indifference, in bringing the enterprise up to its present high and staple position. When he took the matter in hand there was much to discourage any one not possessed of the traits of constancy of purpose and perseverance peculiar to Mr. Longworth. Many had tried the manufacture of wine, and had failed to give it any economical or commercial importance. It was not believed, until Mr. Longworth practically demonstrated it, after many long and patient trials of many valued varieties from France and Madeira, none of which gave any promise of success, that a native grape was the only one upon which any hope could be placed, and that of the native grapes, of which he had experimented upon every known variety, the Catawba offered the most assured promise of success, and was the one upon which all vine-growers might with confidence depend. It took years of unremitted care, multiplied and wide-spread investigations, and the expenditure of large sums of money, to establish this fact, and bring the agricultural community to accept it and act under its guidance. The success attained by Mr. Longworth soon induced other gentlemen resident in the vicinity of Cincinnati, and favorably situated for the purpose, to undertake the culture of the Catawba, and several of these are now regularly and extensively engaged in the manufacture of wine. The impetus and encouragement thus given to the business soon led the German citizens of Hamilton County to perceive its advantages, and under their thrifty management thousands of acres, stretching up from the banks of the Ohio, are now covered with luxuriant and profitable vineyards, rivaling in profusion and beauty the vine-clad hills of Italy and France. The oldest vineyard in the county of Hamilton is of Mr. Longworth's planting. The annual product of these vineyards may be set down at between five and six hundred thousand gallons, worth at present from one and a half to two dollars a gallon; but the price, owing to the rapidity of the consumption, will probably advance rather than decline. It is the prophecy of Mr. Flagg, Mr. Longworth's son-in-law, that, in the course of comparatively few years, the annual product of the Sparkling Catawba will be counted by millions of bottles, while that of the still sorts will be estimated by its millions of gallons. Mr. Longworth alone bottled annually over 150,000 bottles, and had five years ago in his cellars a ripening stock of 300,000 bottles. These cellars are situated on the declivity of East Sixth Street, on the road to Observatory Hill. They occupy a space ninety feet by one hundred and twenty-five, and consist of two tiers of massive stone vaults, the lower of which is twenty-five feet below the surface of the ground. Here are carried on all the various processes of wine-making, the mashing, pressing, fining, racking, bottling, labeling, and boxing; and beneath the arches and along the walls are the wine butts, arranged and numbered in the order of the several vintages; piles of bottles stand about, ready for the bottlers.

THE LATE NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, THE WESTERN MILLIONAIRE.

The charities and eccentricities of "Old Longworth," as he was fond of calling himself, are a never-ending theme among Ohioans. His charities were unequaled, and he never gave when he did not fully understand the case. He seldom refused work to those who asked for it, devising it for the occasion when he really had none waiting, and furnishing the necessary implements to those who had none of their own. The class to which he was accustomed to give work, chiefly of the sort requiring picks and shovels and garden tools, were not always of the most honest description; and he used to relate numerous instances in which his spades and hoes and similar implements—saws, pickaxes, and what not—had been carried off at the close of the day by those to whom he had loaned them to enable them to earn what he paid them for their day's work. The chief objects of his usual charities were those utterly destitute, and the least likely to obtain assistance from any body else. He had a whimsical theory that those whom every body will help were not entitled to any aid from him, and that he would confine his donations to the worthless and wretched vagabonds that every one else turns away from. A committee of Mormons, on a begging expedition, was once sent to him by a friend, with a note intimating that, as these people were not Christians, and seemed to be abandoned by every body that professed to be, they probably came within his rule, and he could consistently assist them. He did so without hesitation.

Over his immense wine-cellars he erected a large four-story building of brick, for the accommodation of poor laborers of both sexes. The different floors are reached by separate stairs and galleries, and each is divided into fourteen good-sized apartments, suitable for a man and his family, or two or three women. These rooms are generally all occupied, and those who are unable to pay are charged no rent. The building is well known among those for whose use it was built as the barracks. Notwithstanding the really charitable design of this construction, its tenants have been the most uncrateful and troublesome of any he had to deal with. They used to annoy him incessantly, and frequently broke into the winevaults below and stole his choicest wine.

Another of Mr. Longworth's permanent and quiet charities was the weekly distribution at his house, every Monday morning, of three to eight hundred ten-cent loaves of bread to whoever would call for them. Once, when flour was high, and the bakers reduced the size of their loaves, Mr. Longworth thought he would be doing his beneficiaries a good turn by having them made purer and rye, and thus considerably enlarging their size. His customers, however, as soon as they found it out, raised such a clamor, and called him so many disparaging names, and annoyed him so much with their threats and complaints, that he was glad to order a return to the pure wheat. The ingratitude of this kind wearied the kindness of his heart, or distressed him half so much as the sight of destitution and suffering.

When Professor Mitchell took in hand the establishment of an Astronomical Observatory, and went about soliciting popular subscriptions for the purpose, application was made to Mr. Longworth to know whether he would part with his Mount Adams property. His only answer was, in a tone of a white cravat, with a shirt collar sometimes reaching to his ears, sometimes falling over his coat collar. His hair was rough, old, and discolored; his clothes fitting loosely about him; his shoes or brogans rather, were large and unblacked, and his whole air, if they had any, straggling about. This figure, with hands stock in the pockets of a very long coat, with a cigar, twinkling eye, sunny countenance, and a long thin mouth, quivering with fun and sarcasm, could be easily recognized in the streets of Cincinnati as Nick Longworth, the millionaire.

A curious anecdote is related of him, which illustrates his peculiarity of dress and habit. On one of those abominably hot days which this Cincinnati in mid-summer he sat on a stoop to rest for a few moments, and while waiving the perspiration from his forehead held his hat in his hand. A gentleman passing by, judging from his dress and fatigued appearance that he was in need of alms, dropped a quarter into his hat. Nick, with the ancient happy days when quarters formed a portion of the circulating medium. Mr. Longworth put the coin in his pocket, and remarked pleasantly, "Thank you, Sir; I never earned a quarter so easily before in my life." Despising the externals of dress and elegance in his habits of life, Longworth kept a princely home. His gardens and hot-houses abounded in the rarest exotics, and he did not begrudge any one with a struggling taste the public. His beautiful gardens in Pike Street, near Deer Creek, were accessible to every respectable person who wished to enjoy them, and if his gardeners were not on hand to point out their beauties, it is very probable that Nicholas Longworth himself would perform the part of chaperon. Mr. Longworth was a ready writer, full of wit, humor, and sarcasm. His contributions to the agricultural magazines and daily journals were very valuable. In fact, the agricultural and fruit-growing field of the West are highly indebted to him for their progress.

Mr. Longworth had four children—three daughters and one son. One of the daughters married Lafe Anderson, of Cincinnati, brother of the hero of Fort Sumter—a prominent lawyer, at one time a noticeable Whig politician, and a man elegant and accomplished gentleman. The wealth of which Mr. Longworth died possessed is put down at fifteen millions, but it is probable that it may be quoted at a much higher figure. His city lots alone would probably amount to that sum. The value of his property in the suburbs of Cincinnati, and in the different counties of Western Ohio, from Hamilton County to Sandusky, would probably swell his estate to twenty millions. In every sense he was a remarkable man, whose biography is worth preserving.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1863.

WHO ARE OUR ENEMIES IN ENGLAND?

SOME stir has been created in fashionable circles by the eccentric behavior of a British nobleman, the Marquis of, or Lord, Hartington, son, it is said, of the Duke of Devonshire, who lately appeared at an evening party given by the banker Belmont with a miniature secession flag, worn as an order of nobility, on the breast of his coat. He was civilly requested to remove it, but declined to do any thing so reasonable. Thereupon an officer in the United States Infantry, a son of our townsman Mr. Charles A. Heckster, gave him the choice of removing it himself or having it removed for him; and the British nobleman wisely chose the former alternative. It was expected that a hostile meeting would grow out of the little transaction; but, his Lordship has very commendably avoided provoking any such breach of the peace.

Before we condemn this interesting member of the British aristocracy—as many of our fellow-citizens seem inclined to do—we must call to mind his station and the examples he had before him. The favorite motto of the British aristocracy is, "Stand by your Order!" And it is to the faithful adherence of the bulk of British noblemen to this party cry that the British aristocracy has owed its long lease of power. Begotten in corruption, fattened on plunder, and subsisting solely through the inconceivable devotion of the British people to the principles of loyalism, the British aristocracy would have been long since overthrown and destroyed, but for the staunch adherence of all its members to the duty of standing by their order, and opposing, by any and every means, the inroads of the democracy upon their hereditary domains. Every British nobleman is bred in this principle—that, perish what may, he must stand by his party. Like John (now General) Cochrane, who declared himself ready to vote for the devil if he had received a regular nomination at Tammany Hall, every member of that hallowed body, the British aristocracy, is ready to sustain, by word or act, the policy of his order, though that policy proposes him to stand by Satan and all his myrmidons.

This young lord, now, seeking a guide of conduct during his stay here, will naturally have found it in the speeches and writings of the leaders of his party at home. He will have noticed that Mr. Gladstone, who, though untitled, is one of the most reliable leaders of the British aristocracy, has expressed his decided sympathy with the Southern rebels. He has read Earl Russell's smoothing dispatches to our Government, and a speech in which he declared that "the North was contending for power, and the slave-owners for independence." He has doubtless remarked that Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli, the Parliamentary leaders of the British aristocracy though of the party opposed to Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone —have concurred in the opinion that, on the whole, the South was sure to succeed and the North sure to fail. He will have observed that other persons, representing, more or less directly, the British aristocracy, as Mr. Roebuck, Ferguson and Mr. Lindsay, member of the British Parliament, after coming here, and eating their beef, drinking our wine, and accepting the obeisances of our snobs, returned to their home and reviled us, having found no "gentlemen" here outside of the Southern plantation, where men own their mistresses and their children. Finally, if he be an acute and observant youth, he will have perceived that every journal of aristocratic opinion in Great Britain sympathized with the rebels, while every democratic organ gave us its support.

Under these circumstances, what could a young British nobleman do? Why, do as he was order—do but sport a secession flag? We protest that great injustice has been done this young man—should we apologize for calling him mere? It is very—by democratic rule—a mark of vulgar rascal, and a scamp who desired to insult Monsieur Belmont's guests. He merely did what any other British nobleman of his spirit would have done under the like circumstances.

In the general tendency to denounce England —which has been aroused by the Alabama, etc. —it is often forgotten that there are more rebels in England are as palpably divided on the subject of our war as the people of the United States. In London, Manchester, Birmingham, Bristol, and a dozen other British cities, public meetings have been held, at which resolutions of sympathy with the North have been carried by overwhelming majorities. The great majority in England have been challenged to call a single popular meeting to sustain their views, and have wisely declined the challenge. It is believed that there is not a single town in England in which the partisans of the slave Confederacy could venture to face the people on their platform. Wherever the British people have had a fair chance to express their views, the honest British spirit has taken sides manfully with the North.

But the aristocracy—the men who live by other men's labor, like the Southern planters; the lordlings who enjoy fat estates in virtue of the apostasy of their ancestors—the enemies since, or because a dissolute female ancestor of theirs became the mistress of a king or prince; the class which thrives on hereditary privileges and exclusive rights, and which would see its livelihood depend on the exclusion of the yeomen of England from the legitimate reward of their labor—this class is our deadly enemy.

For years, these indecent robbers of other men's bread—European types of Southern slave-drivers —have regarded the United States as the chief source of their prosperity, the very mainstay of their sons' inheritance. They have lived, eaten, drunken, and slept, in terror, lest the people of England should some day discover that American Government was possible without an aristocracy. In times gone by slavery was the stone they used to throw in our face. Now they are fond of quoting Jefferson and not Mason, and they stone us with the pebble—disunion. And every act and every word of theirs is designed to aid the Southern rebels—not that they love them, but that they want to show to the people of England that government without a hereditary aristocracy is an impracticable vision.

The contest we are waging is not fought in our interest alone. We are fighting the battle of democracy throughout the world. If we win, hereditary privilege will have seen its best day. If we fail, the Marquis of Hartington and his class will realize their dearest hope, and the partisans of democracy and free government will be crushed for many a generation.

THE LOUNGER.

LEAH.

WHEN we spoke last week of the hatred of races, and mentioned the fearful persecution of the Jews in Europe three or four centuries ago, we did not know of the powerful sermon that was nightly preached from the same text in the drama of Leah, played by Miss Bateman at Niblo's theatre. It is an English adaptation of a German sensation drama, and there was never a more timely play. It was in its fifth week when we saw it; and it would be well if it could be seen for fifty weeks and always by a crowd as large as that which has thronged the theatre during Miss Bateman's engagement.

The plot is simple, and turns upon the loathing which was felt in Christian Europe for the Jews. It shows the deadly, the terrible crimes, the baseless imbruting of human nature, which necessarily springs from the indulgence of such hate. The effect is great, for the very sensations are aroused once it is remarkable. The play is wrought in bold, coarse strokes. There is never any doubt as to the meaning, or the peculiar frame to the condition of our public affairs is most striking.

The play opens in a village in Germany upon a holiday. The peaceful service in the church-yard pass out, leaving the old magistrate, the priest, the schoolmaster, and a young woman upon the scene. The schoolmaster is a renegade Jew, living in terror lest he should be discovered and betrayed by some of his race, and therefore affecting an extreme Christian zeal. He has the more unscrupulously insist upon banishing all Jews. There is some theological sparring between him and the priest, in which the false convert is painfully zealous for the observance of forms, and the priest mildly asserts the superiority of the Christian spirit. The young girl then tells a story of a poor Christian family relieved by some Jews. The schoolmaster starts with horror, denounces them as unforgivable hate of Jews, and betrays his fear of the consequences of their coming. While they are still talking the young girl's cottage walls are chasing Leah the Jewess, whom they have discovered, and clamor for her death. The priest, having heard her story, and seen her pious humility, gives her protects her. "What has this forlorn woman done to you?" "She is a Jewess," reply the mob, "and that's enough." Driven by the mob, the priest advances and holds them back. "I am your pastor. You are Christians. Christ commands us to live in charity with all men. Why would you harm the innocent, who asks only forbearance?" The crowd are softened by his appeal, and fall back from their violence, but their motionless and silent. But the apostate, fearing lest the priest should prevail, and the Jews be suffered to remain with the means of escape, seeks to shame to himself, turns toward the priest and people and says: "But the laws of our country forbid her to remain. Shall we not obey the laws?" Instantly the cries arise again for the innocent blood. But the priest repeats the law of God commanding the succor of the helpless, and the crowd once more yield.

Then, fierce and malignant, the apostate turns to them, holding up his finger, crouching, glaring, and whispering: "Are not the Jews here? Are not the accursed race here?" Again the clubs are raised, and the hearse cry of the rabble is heard. Again the priest interposes, and the fiend the apostate, glaring once more and scornfully whispering, demands: "Have they come for? To beg; to steal; to take your work and wrest the bread from your mouth! Ha ha! We want no accursed Jews! Not in one eye of the multitude shrieks in reply, and they press more furiously and threateningly upon the pale and terrified Leah. The priest appeals to the ferocious rabble, and the mob are in play, and the apostate hisses again: "Not only to beg; not only to rob; not only to take your work and bread, but to steal your children and murder them for the Passover feast. No Jews here! None of the God-accursed race in our peaceful village!" It is the critical moment. Malignant hate and Christian charity contend for the mastery. The mob rushes on to immolate the unresisting victim, but in the very moments of threatened murder the priest, vicar of God, places his hand upon the head of the Jewess, raises the cross above her in the air, and the crowd of furious peasants at the sight of the holy symbol instinctively fall upon their knees.

The rest of the play develops the course of crime and universal misery which springs from the fear of the apostate and the deep-seated hate of the people for the Jewish race.

It would not be possible to represent the attitude and arguments of the Southern leaders and of the North more perfectly than in the words and conduct of the apostate. The staple of all the speeches against the Government, and in favor of the rebellion and anarchy is, like his, an appeal to the popular prejudice against an outcast race. The argument is simply—Are we going to be a negro man? Will you fight for the negro? Do you want your daughter to marry a black man? Do you want the negro to have your property and do the work from your hands by negroes? Will you have black Senators and a negro President?

Upon this hatred of race the reaction tries to found its political power in order to abase, divide, and destroy this nation. It has no other hope, no other resource, than this desperate pandering to the meanest and most inhuman prejudice. If such a course is not in itself sufficiently revolting—if its exposure in history is not appalling enough—then, whenever and wherever you can, go and see Leah, and have the lesson burned in upon your mind, which may help to save the national life and honor.

OPPRESSION.

At a time when the despotism of party-spirit is endeavoring to make it appear that the liberties of American citizens are endangered by the Government, it is worth while to note an instance of real oppression by a Government that we may understand what tyranny is. From some of the wild articles published in Conservative" China, but fortunately often blessed as well as applauded, it might be supposed that honest people here were really in peril. Long-continued midnight visits, secret enmbonstrated as if there were a system of terror already established. And the loudest cries are raised by those who have instigated all the mobs in the country for the last twenty years, and who have deliberately excused the constant wanton violations of the Constitution, of common right, and of ordinary humanity, which have been always matters of course in this section now in rebellion.

The immediate occasion of the late Polish insurrection against the Russian Government was the conscription for 1863. Instead of being distributed equally among the people it was made to fall, by a special order, upon one class, and resulted in a mixture of the bankers, traders, and professional men of the country, "the main object being to clear the country of all persons likely to disturb the public tranquillity." A general clearance was made upon their houses at night by Cossacks. The victims were seized. Their hands tied. They were dragged to fortresses, and then sent off in gangs to the Caucasus and Siberia to serve for twenty-five years in a foreign army.

Among civilized nations in modern times there has been no such outrage of humanity and civil right as this, except in the rebellious slave section of this country. There a more subtle and benign despotism and universal terror prevails than an American citizen of the free States can believe to be possible. Under the war notices of which he was a crime punishable with insult, danger, and even death to be a Northern man. Now it is a capital offense to be suspected of disloyal to the country. And this is the state of things with which those are in full and active sympathy who are so alarmed by the "Union Leagues." Marshal Lee, who is profoundly concerned for the liberties of American citizens at the North, so it Valladingham, or is May-or is every man who wishes the success of the Rebellion. But upon the fearful and bloody annihilation of every form of liberty, personal and political, under the rebel rule, they have not a word to say except in commendation and sympathy.

Let every man ask himself, in what this means. To what does "Conservatism" of this kind inevitably tend? Let him read the recently published work of Mr. Alison, who is deeply excited of loving his country, escaped from the rebel gallows, and the story of Parson Brownlow, and of Mr. Stevenson in the North Carolina Legislature, Federate Army, and, of Mr. Russell in his Diary at the North and South; let him talk with his neighbors who have had experience before the war of the respect shown the rights of an American citizen by slaveholding communities, and answer.

POLITICAL EXPEDIENCY.

POPULAR politics—to use a convenient term—began with our Revolution. To control the popular sentiment is, therefore, the study of political leaders. How to control it is their problem. The question has been historically answered in three ways.

First, and longest, it was answered by fraud that the general well-being was founded in the perception of natural equal rights, and was to be maintained by constant popular enlightenment as to the close relation between the protection of rights, or justice, and public prosperity. Second, the French Revolutionists of 93 answered it by the iron rule of work of terror"—a policy which ended in anarchy and military despotism. Third, the French Revolution of 1830 answered it by saying that the control of public opinion was to be secured by fear of tumults, and by universal and skillful corruption.

Louis Philippe was the Magnus Apollo of this policy. He is the great progenitor and model of what Mr. Bancroft calls the Democratic party of New York school. Louis Philippe depended upon the timidity of trade, and upon his ability to bribe men by their ambition, to keep his throne in a state of gold. If they wished reputation with action, he gave office at home and abroad. If they wished massive distinction, he covered them with honorary decorations. His reign was the policy of governing by selfish interest, tried by the most skillful hand under the most favorable circumstances. What was the result? Simply that, after a career of eighteen years, his government suddenly ended, not by an overthrow, but by a collapse—a tumbling down. In all France no voice spoke for it—no finger was raised for it. The old Bourbon branch, who often inquired why he call it, at least an insolent, convulsed Europe and the world, and finally, by its foreign alliances, conquered the revolution, seated Louis XVIII. in the Tuileries, and sent his children to St. Helena. But the younger branch simply rotted in its corruption, like a tree decayed entirely and wholly, not in a gale, but because of its utter decay.

The doctrine of Louis Philippe is that of a school of politicians among ourselves. It is what is called the doctrine of expediency. It claims the possession of common sense. It scouts all theories, and impracticable theorists, and visionary philosophers. It assumes to be practical, to take men as they are. It boasts it best deals with facts. It informs us that civilization and progress are slow processes; that we can't hurry God; and that Jefferson tells us to do what we can, and not to spoil every thing by trying to do all we would. In one word, it declares that politics have nothing to do with morals, because politics as a system is the science of expediency.

Granted. But now please to explain your explanation. If there were ever a politician unvexed by any moral qualms, Louis Philippe was he. If there were ever a man of expedients, Louis Philippe was the man. If ever the doctrine that government is an affair of shifts, and arrangements, and concessions, and compromises, and yielding to prejudices, and making all things smooth and profitable in the pocket, for every body had a fair chance, it was during the eighteen years, from 1830 to 1848, in France. By their fruits ye shall judge them. If the success of prosperity, honor, and peace with dignity, be the test of good government, who achieved it, Louis Philippe, the practical man of expedients, or Oliver Cromwell, the enthusiast and religious fanatic?

Is it not clear that when you excuse the appeal to the lowest selfishness upon the plea that politics is a science of expediency you beg the whole question? For what is the question? Given human nature and man in society, what is expediency? That only which is based upon the broadest view of human nature, upon its strongest instincts, upon its most profound emotions. And what are they? What are the tendencies and feelings in human nature that have produced the great epochs in history, the controlling changes in civilization? Did they spring from the pocket or the conscience? Unquestionably the right path is also at last the profitable, but not at first, and it is the first step that costs. Nothing which outrages the common conscience can be expedient. If, for instance, it be a law, it is inexpedient, because it will either remain a dead letter and bring all laws and just authority into contempt, or else it will be executed amidst tumults and protests which will end in revolution. Thus the moral nature of men becomes the most important consideration of all in matters of political policy. Interest, convenience, and all the minor oppositions may be set aside, but conscience is firmer than the everlasting hills, and surer than the law of gravity.

Thus it is the most foolish fallacy to make expediency the counterpart or opposing term in politics to principle; or to evade the moral view of public questions by saying that morality has nothing to do with them. Why, you have only to fortify any cause with a moral conviction and you make it impregnable. The Albigenses, the Cameronians, the early Christians, the later Protestants, might be routed and massacred, but the cause itself, intrenched in the popular conscience, laughed the conqueror to scorn.

The meanness, the timidity, the miscalled "expediency," the total want of principle in our politics have plunged us into this war. Since the days of our fathers, who were forced to know and willing to declare the moral principles upon which they acted, the simplicity and manliness of our public men have declined. The insolent bullying of Congressmen, whose pride it was that they bought and sold human beings in a republic based upon liberty and equal rights, was hardly so mortifying as the hesitating opposition and obsequious bearing of those who thought with Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, Laurens, George Mason, and John Adams, and whose political views and principles were those of the Constitution. In Washington Slavery has cracked the whip and Liberty has cowered and apologized, always with splendid and memorable exceptions. The wretched excuse has been that it was not "expedient" to do otherwise. Was it, then, not "expedient" for John Hampden to refuse to pay twenty shillings, even if he risked a revolution? Was it not "expedient" in the colonies to declare that they would not pay taxes without representation? Is it not "expedient" to declare to-day that either the victory of the rebellion will fortify Slavery, or that of the Government will establish Liberty upon this continent? If Louis Philippe and his school had sat in the seats of Hampden, Pym, and Tiennes—if they had stood in the shoes of Patrick Henry and Sam Adams—if they had been monks with Martin Luther—the work of three centuries would have to be done over again. Until men acknowledge the expediency of equal justice there will be no permanent peace in any nation. Are those, therefore, who insist that justice is the truest expediency blind guides? Our politicians hitherto have insisted that there was no relation between them. But their position in the presence of this war, which is simply the tremendous assertion that there is a relation between them, is more pitiful and ludicrous than that of their great prototype, Louis Philippe, appalled by the mere shadow of a revolution, and fleeing from France as Mr. William Smith with a huge cotton umbrella under his arm.

TWEEDLEDUM AND TWEEDLEDEE.

The attempt of "the Conservative movement" to cut loose from its leaders will not succeed. If Wood, Vallandigham, Cox, Brooks, and the Seymours are not its logical leaders, who are? Who conduct the movement against the Administration and the war? It is these men or nobody. For there are but two parties, there can be but two. That which supports the Government in the war, and that which opposes it. To undertake a third party, which calls itself a war-party, provided the Government will be directed by it, is nonsense. Vallandigham would be satisfied if the Government would be controlled by him.

That the men we have named are the leaders of this new "Conservatism," which would reduce this nation to a mob of contemptible States, like Venezuela, and Ecuador, and Guatemala, and that the rebels regard them as their friends and virtual allies, should be clear enough by this time to the dullest mind.

The influence of "the Conservative movement," as illustrated in the autumn elections, upon the suppression of the rebellion, is seen in all the rebel papers and correspondence.

"Were it not," says a correspondent, writing from Richmond to Knoxville, "for the utter demoralization of the Federal armies; were it not that the quasi rebellion of the Governors of New Jersey and New York had affected Burnside's army as thoroughly as that of Rosecrans, which has felt more seriously the influence of Richardson, Bright, and Vallandigham; were these Federal forces as brave and devoted to the cause they have espoused as they were twelve months ago," etc.

Here are simple cause and effect. "Quasi rebellion" of certain Governors is cited by the rebels as the demoralizing influence of our army. Was, or was not, the election of those Governors hailed as "a Conservative triumph" by those who try to get rid of Vallandigham and Co.?

So in October, pending the elections, the Richmond Examiner said:

"The elections of New York will decide the complexion of the next House of Representatives, and they thus possess an interest which has attached to no other elections that have taken place since the commencement of the war."

Why this great interest? Clearly because of the chance of a Congress which differed in sentiment from this. Could it be more determined upon the war? Certainly not. The interest lay, therefore, in the hope of a House more favorable to negotiation. Could that House be elected except by "a Conservative triumph?" Echo answers, No.

"It is not to be denied," says the rebel writer, "that a Democratic victory at the North would be a subject of much gratification."

Were there more than two tickets at the election? And was not the "Conservative" ticket precisely what is here called Democratic? Why, then, would such a "Conservative" victory be so gratifying to the men who are in arms against the Government and nation? Because it would help them or hurt them?

The identity of the "peace" party with the "Conservative party" is so clearly established that to attempt to prove it is a gilding of fine gold, a painting of the lily. And that the leaders of the one are of necessity the chiefs of the other is equally evident. The attempt to stand between this "Conservatism," which is disunion, and anarchy, and acknowledgment of the rebellion, and the vigorous and hearty support of the Government, whether all its measures and men exactly please us or not, is hopeless. In the English civil war of 1645 the Presbyterians tried to stand between the Independents and the King. They argued that because the King claimed more than his constitutional rights it was not fair for the Parliament to overstep the limits of its power in order to put him down. But the truth was, as Macaulay, and Lord Nugent, and Godwin, and all the historians show, that a middle course was impossible. The King was resolved to overthrow the Constitution. He was fair in talk, and as false as fair. And the Parliament knew it. The game was desperate. The stake was the liberty of the English subject; and Parliament did not hesitate to exceed its normal powers in order to save the Constitution and the nation. And all the people cried Amen! The Constitution was saved, and the rights of the nation secured.

The rebels are as false and haughty as Charles Stuart. They mean the destruction of the Government. Fortunately that Government need not and does not transcend its powers to save itself. But even if it were forced to do so, what man capable of conceiving the disaster of disunion would not cry God-speed? We must stand by that Union, then, or leave it to its enemies. And when the enemy is at the gate, there is no distinction in moral guilt between a foe who fires upon the garrison and one who insists that the garrison shall not fire unless they will use such powder and ball as he has to sell.

A WORD WITH ANY CONNECTICUT VOTER.

No faithful citizen of the United States, in whatever State he may live, will wish to vote for a candidate who is acceptable to the rebels, because to do so is to help them overthrow the Government. Should any Connecticut voter, therefore, whose party sympathies have been Democratic, but whose heart and soul are true to his country, happen to see this paragraph, let him reflect upon the statement of the Richmond Examiner, one of the chief organs of the rebellion, which, in denouncing the Northern Democrats in general for being "as fierce in their apostasy to former principles as Butler himself," says, however, that among them "are to be found one Pierce, one Vallandigham, one Wood, and two Seymours, like the five just men in Sodom."

If, therefore, any Connecticut freeman feels that he can be true to his country by doing what his enemies wish, let him vote for the man whom the rebels praise. It is not a party question. It is the salvation of the country which is at stake.

CHILDS'S NATIONAL ALMANAC.

This work is the best American almanac ever published. It contains full and complete statistics of the General Government, names of the officials, abstracts of the laws, statistics of the Census of 1860, a full account of the Government, population, finances, agricultural and commercial condition of each State; a digest of the history and condition of all the railroads of the United States; statistics of education, crime, crops, etc., etc. and a very good account of the war from its commencement. It is a book every one should have.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"Pray, Sir, of what profession are you?" said a learned counsel to a witness who had come prepared to prove a fact, and who was not deemed a very respectable gentleman. "Sir, I am a shoemaker and wine-merchant." "A what, Sir?" said the learned counsel. "A wine-merchant and shoemaker." "Then," said the counsel, "I may describe you as a sherry cobbler!"

"Why is it," said a young swell, a few days since, "that I can't make my collar sit well?"—"Because it is a standing collar," replied the person to whom the question was addressed.

The man that drew a long breath has taken another chance in the same lottery.

"Is that animal a biped or a quadruped?" asked one of the visitors to a circus, one day, of a by-stander. "I think, Sir," said an evident student of natural history, with bulging eyes and green spectacles, "that the man who shows the animals called it a kangarooped!"

"Shall I have your hand?" said an exquisite to a belle as the dance was about to commence. "With all my heart," was the soft response.

An afflicted husband was returning from the funeral of his wife, when a friend asked how he was. "Well," he said, pathetically, "I think I feel the better for that little walk."

There was an Irish lawyer who invariably wrote at the bottom of his brief, "If any part of the case should fail, or want making out, call my clerk, Tim Donnegan, and he will swear any thing."

"I am happy, Tom, to hear the report that you have succeeded to large landed property." "And I am sorry to say it is groundless."

Why is a lady remarrying like a chimes'-ringer?—Because one rings the changes, while the other changes the ring.

A handsome woman pleases the eyes, a good woman pleases the heart: the one is a jewel, the other a treasure.

"'Tis false," as the girl said when her lover told her she had beautiful hair.

Query for a Debating Society.—What do the sailors do with the knots the ship makes in a day?

The gentleman who has been trying to raise the wind finds himself "blown" all over town.

The Burglar's Aspiration.—A skeleton-key in every cupboard.

"I'll be blessed if I do," as the girl said when her lover asked her to be married.

"I can't support you any longer," as the rotten bridge said to the elephant.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Wednesday, February 18, in the Senate, Senator Foot, of Vermont, was chosen President pro tempore, Vice-President Hamlin having announced his intention to be absent for the remainder of the session. A joint resolution to compensate the crew of the iron battery Monitor for loss of clothing was adopted. The bill making appropriations for fortifications was passed; also the bill to regulate the appointment of midshipmen. The bill fixing the gauge of the Pacific Railroad and branches at four feet eight and a half inches was passed. The bill organizing the courts of the District of Columbia was discussed, and after an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Senate bill granting aid to Missouri for the emancipation of slaves was referred to the select Committee on Emancipation. The House passed the Senate bill for the purpose of removing doubts as to the meaning of former laws. It authorizes the President, when two kinds of punishment are imposed by a court, pecuniary and imprisonment, to remit the one or the other. When the imprisonment is remitted, the fine shall be collected as a judgment of debt in the common forms of law. The bill indemnifying the President and other public officers for the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, and for acts in pursuance thereof, was then taken up, and an interesting debate ensued, which continued till the adjournment.

On Thursday, 19th, in the Senate, the credentials of Mr. Morgan, the new Senator from New York, were presented. A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, exhibiting the debit and credit account of the contrabands of the Sea Island cotton district, was received. It shows a balance of more than half a million dollars in favor of the Government. The bill providing for the discharge of State prisoners, and authorizing the President to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, was taken up. A motion to strike out the section of the bill authorizing a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus was rejected—yeas 13, nays 27. Senators Trumbull and Carlile offered substitutes for the bill, but no further action was taken on the subject. The Senate then went into executive session, and afterward adjourned.——In the House, the bill indemnifying the President and other persons for acts done under the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus was referred to a conference committee. The Senate joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to adjust the equitable claims of contractors for naval supplies and regulating contracts with the Navy Department was adopted. The House passed the Senate's joint resolution expelling ex-Senator Badger from the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution for his giving aid and comfort to the enemy, and appointing Professor Louis Agassiz to fill his place. At the evening session the National Currency bill was taken up, and Messrs. Spaulding and Fenton spoke in favor of its passage.

On Friday, 20th, in the Senate, the House bill providing a government for the Territory of Arizona was passed. The bill enabling the people of Nevada Territory to take preparatory steps for being admitted into the Union was reported back. Similar bills relative to Nebraska and Colorado were reported. The joint resolution directing the payment of troops in hospitals and convalescent camps within sixty days was adopted, and Committees of Conference on the Indemnity and Finance bills were ordered.——In the House, the bill to establish a uniform national currency was passed as it came from the Senate, by a vote of 78 against 74. The Senate Post-Office Reform bill was taken up, and several amendments adopted, among them one establishing a postal money-order system.

On Saturday, 21st, in the Senate, a memorial from citizens of New York, asking for the establishment of a submarine telegraph from Fortress Monroe to Galveston, was presented. Senator Powell offered a resolution that a committee of three be appointed to investigate the facts in reference to the arrest, imprisonment, and release of D. A. Mahony, J. A. Mullen, and Andrew J. Duff. Laid over. Senator Powell also gave notice that he should, at an early day, offer a resolution for a committee to investigate the conduct of General Gilbert in recently dispersing a convention in Kentucky. A resolution to print 10,000 extra copies of the Currency bill was referred. The bill for the discharge of State prisoners, and authorizing the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, was taken up, and an angry discussion ensued between Senators Wilson of Massachusetts and Powell of Kentucky. An executive session was held, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a Committee of Conference was asked of the Senate on the disagreeing amendments to the Finance bill. The Post-Office Reform bill was next considered; an amendment that all soldiers in camp or hospital shall receive and transmit letters free of postage was adopted, and the bill passed by a vote of 72 against 56. The Ways and Means Committee reported amendments to the Internal Tax bill. The Senate's amendments to the Post-Route bill were agreed to. The Senate bill to prevent correspondence with rebels was passed, also the Senate bill to punish bribery. The Senate bill authorizing the issue of letters of marque was then taken up and discussed till the adjournment.

On Monday, 23d, in the Senate, Senator Willey presented a resolution from the Constitutional Convention of West Virginia, accepting the constitution as amended by Congress, and also resolutions asking for an appropriation in compensation for the emancipation of slaves in West Virginia. Senator Collamer called up the resolution relative to the payment of foreign postage in coin, and offered a substitute authorizing the Postmaster-General to take such measures as he may deem necessary to provide for the payment in coin of the balances against the United States. The substitute was accepted and the resolution adopted. After disposing of several unimportant subjects, the bill relative to the discharge of State prisoners and authorizing the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus was taken up and passed by a vote of 24 against 13.——In the House, the report of the Committee on Elections, adverse to the claim of Mr. Jennings Piggott to represent the Second Congressional district of North Carolina, was accepted. The Naval Appropriation bill was taken up, and several Senate amendments not being concurred in, the bill was returned to that body. The consideration of the Senate bill enrolling and calling out the National militia was then resumed. Amendments were cut off by the ordering of the previous question, but an exciting and acrimonious discussion was kept up till after eleven o'clock at night.

On Tuesday, 24th, in the Senate, a conference committee was appointed on the Naval Appropriation bill. The Indian Appropriation bill was discussed and amended and laid aside. Ten thousand extra copies of the Currency bill were ordered to be printed. A bill was introduced authorizing the President, in certain cases, to take possession of steamboats and other vessels.——The House was engaged in discussing the bill providing for calling out and arming the militia of the nation. It was agreed that a vote should be taken on the bill on the following day. During the debate Mr. Stevens attacked General M'Clellan, and read a letter from General Scott accusing General M'Clellan of insubordination.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF VICKSBURG.

The mortar boats of the expedition against Vicksburg were towed into position on the 18th inst., and opened fire upon the city on that day. They were answered by the rebel batteries, three in number. The position of the gun-boats was found to be too much exposed to the fire of the enemy, and they accordingly withdrew to a safer place, from which they renewed the bombardment.

A COAL BARGE RUNS THE BLOCKADE.

A barge containing seven thousand bushels of coal followed the example of the ram Queen of the West, and ran the blockade at Vicksburg on the night of 14th, passing harmlessly through in the dark. The gun-boat Conestoga destroyed Bolivar Landing, a scattered village fifty miles above Memphis. The river is rapidly overflowing its banks on the Louisiana side to such an extent that the little town of De Soto, opposite Vicksburg, is now nearly under water, and it is thought that the whole peninsula will ere long be submerged. The Queen of the West has gone up Red River on the hunt for rebel boats supposed to be lying there.

REPORTED CAPTURE OF THE "QUEEN OF THE WEST."

We have from rebel sources a report of the capture of the Union ram Queen of the West, whose gallant exploits in running the blockade at Vicksburg are already known to our readers. She is said to have been captured under Fort Taylor, at Gordon's Landing, on the Red River—the pilot, who was taken off the rebel steamer Eva, having treacherously run her within range of the guns while asserting that the fort was fifteen miles away. Her steam-pipe was knocked off, and she was otherwise so disabled that she drifted to the opposite shore, and all of the crew except thirteen escaped. The boat and the rest of the hands fell into the power of the rebels.

A SECESH MEETING DISPERSED IN KENTUCKY.

A crowd of secessionists in Frankfort, Kentucky, met last week in the theatre of that city for the ostensible purpose of nominating candidates for the August elections; but Colonel Gilbert, with a regiment of Union troops with bayonets fixed, made his appearance, took the chair himself, and dispersed the meeting by declaring that they should then and there prove by oath their loyalty to the Government, as he believed they were nothing but Democrats and secessionists. With the fear of fixed bayonets before their eyes, and remembering, no doubt, the story of Cromwell and the Rump Parliament in the good old times of free and merry England, the citizens of Frankfort wisely resolved to separate, and they did so.

THE SOUTH DON'T WANT FRENCH INTERFERENCE.

We find an interesting commentary upon the diplomatic correspondence of M. Drouyn de l'Huys and Mr. Seward in the Richmond papers. The plans of the French Minister for mediation and peace are pretty roughly handled; in fact, they are rather uncivilly declined. The Emperor himself is somewhat snubbed. The Southern Confederacy, we are told, needs no commissioners to settle the difficulty, either of French or any other suggestion; the commissioners already exist in the persons of Generals Lee, Beauregard, Longstreet, Jackson, and Joe Johnston.

BEAUREGARD PREPARING FOR THE WORST.

General Beauregard, as military commander of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, has issued a proclamation declaring it to be his solemn duty to announce to the citizens and authorities of Charleston and Savannah that an attack by the land and naval forces of the United States is about to be made upon either or both cities, and warning those who are not able to take up arms for their defense to retire to some place of safety. He urges, however, upon every one who can join in the struggle at "this hour of trial" to do so without regard to the kind of weapons they may have in their possession. Pikes and scythes, he says, will do for the destruction of their enemies, and spades and shovels for the protection of their firesides, altars, and the graves of their fathers.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

The British Parliament met in session on the 5th of February. The Queen's Speech contains very little of importance, excepting the following:

Her Majesty has abstained from taking any step with a view to make a cessation of the conflict between the contending parties of the North American States, because it has not yet seemed to her that any such overtures could be attended with a probability of success. Her Majesty has viewed with the deepest concern the desolating warfare which still rages in those regions, and she has witnessed with heart-felt grief the severe distress and suffering which that war has inflicted upon a large class of her Majesty's subjects, but which have been borne by them with great fortitude and exemplary resignation. It is some consolation to her Majesty to be led to hope that this suffering and this distress are diminishing rather than increasing, and that some renewal of employment is beginning to take place in the manufacturing districts.

PARLIAMENT.

During the debates on the address, in reply to the speech in both Houses, Lord Palmerston's course was generally sustained, although Earl Derby and Mr. Disraeli regretted that England had not made an effort in conjunction with France to induce an armistice. All parties agreed in opinion, however, that the attempt would fail. Earl Russell, in the House of Lords, however, expressed the opinion that the Union would never be restored. Mr. Disraeli, in the House of Commons, agrees with him, and says he foresees that the future America will be one "of armies, and turbulence, and wars."

POLAND.

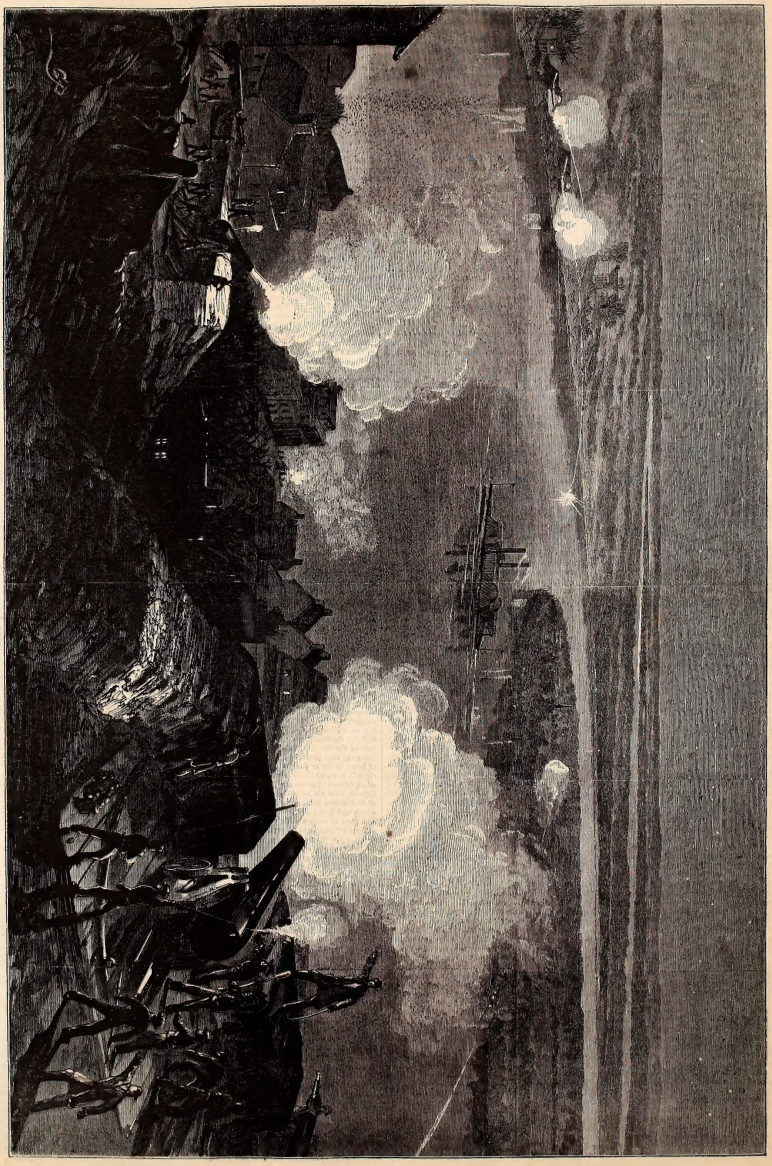
THE INSURRECTION.

The insurrection in Poland is spreading. The city of Wengrow has been taken by the Russians, after a sanguinary battle.

COCHIN CHINA.

THE FRENCH IN TROUBLE.

The people of Cochin China have revolted against the French, and made desperate attacks on the Emperor's troops. The natives were repulsed with heavy loss. The Queen of Spain, it was said, had refused to send her troops back to Cochin China at the request of the Emperor Napoleon.



NASSAU.

ANOTHER PIRATE ENTERTAINED.

Captain Maffit, of the Oreto, waited on the Governor of Nassau at his official residence, and obtained permission to remain off Nassau for twenty-four hours, during which time he laid his ship alongside the English war-steamers Galatea and Barracouta. The Oreto was thought to be looking out for the American ship Eliza Bonsall, which had left Nassau the day before for Abaco to take away United States troops lately wrecked there. Her capture by the Oreto was considered as very probable.

PAYING OFF THE TEAMSTERS IN THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 150]

THE UNITED STATES GUN-BOAT "INDIANOLA" (IRON-CLAD) RUNNING THE BLOCKADE AT VICKSBURG.

PAYING THE TEAMSTERS.

On page 148 we reproduce an illustration by Mr. Waud, representing The Payment of the Negro Teamsters. Mr. Waud writes: "In the Army of the Potomac there are probably from 8000 to 10,000 negroes employed as teamsters. This is a business they are well fitted for, and of course it relieves an equal number of white men for other duties. A teamster's life is a very hard one, particularly at this season of the year. It does not matter how much it storms, or how deep the mud, subsistence must be hauled to the camps, and day and night, toiling along with tired horses and mules, the creaking wagons are kept busy carrying to and fro commissary, quarter-master, and ordnance stores, in addition to keeping the camps supplied with fire-wood. White teamsters have $25 a month. Colored men are paid $20, an increase of $10 a month on 'Contrabands pay' previous to the proclamation of emancipation.

"To a negro slave the ideal of social existence is to have their labor paid for as the white men do; consequently 'pay-day' has unusual charms for them. It is amusing to watch the effect of a handful of bills on the countenances of the colored ones as they receive their dues. Captain Howard, who is fond of a joke, would sometimes hand a particularly unsophisticated-looking darkey his money in large bills, tendering the next one a like amount in ones and half-dollar bills, thereby producing temporary but complete mystification in their souls. Some, like the old fellow represented in the sketch, would be so comically overcome by the joke of the whole performance that they hardly knew how to approach their funds, especially as they had been immensely overawed by the solemn ceremony of holding the end of the pen, while the clerk, Mr. Fury, wrote their names at the foot of the pay-roll.

"No band of nigger minstrels could hope to equal in comic effect a party of these fellows, with their wonderfully held together rags, their comic heads of wool, often encased in a turban, their black-snakes (technical for whips), and great variety of expression. Many of them are very wild, and need strict management to keep them in order. They appear, however, in most cases to realize the advantages of their new position, and do as well as can be expected."

HOW A FREE PEOPLE CONDUCT A LONG WAR.

A CHAPTER FROM ENGLISH HISTORY.

BY CHARLES J. STILLE.

"History, if it be not the merest toy, the idlest pastime of our vacant hours, is the record of the onward march of Humanity toward an end. Where there is no belief in such an end, and therefore no advance toward it, no stirrings of a Divine Word in a people's bosom, where not as yet the beast's heart has been taken away, and a man's heart given, there History can not be said to be. They belong not, therefore, to History, least of all to sacred History, those Babels, those cities of confusion, those huge pens, into which by force and fraud the early hunters of men, the Nimrods and the Sesostrises drave, and compelled their fellows: and Scripture is only most true to its idea while it passes them almost or wholly in silence by, while it lingers rather on the plains of Mamre with the man that 'believed God and it was counted unto him for righteousness,' than by 'populous No' or great Babylon, where no faith existed but in the blind powers of nature, and the brute forces of the natural man."—Trench's Hulsean Lecture, The Unity of Scripture.

We have known hitherto in this country so little of the actual realities of war on a grand scale, that many are beginning to look upon the violent opposition to the Government, and the slowness of the progress of our arms, as signs of hopeless discouragement. History, however, shows us that these are the inevitable incidents of all wars waged by a free people. This might be abundantly illustrated by many remarkable events in English history, from the days of the great Rebellion down through the campaigns of the Prince of Orange, and of Marlborough, to the wars which grew out of the events of the French Revolution. War is always entered upon amidst a vast deal of popular enthusiasm, which is utterly unreasoning. It is the universal voice of history, that such enthusiasm is wholly unreliable in supporting the prolonged and manifold burdens which are inseparable from every war waged on an extensive scale, and for a long period. The popular idea of war is a speedy and decisive victory, and an immediate occupation of the enemy's capital, followed by a treaty of peace by which the objects of the war are permanently secured. Nothing is revealed to the excited passions of the multitude but dazzling visions of national glory, purchased by small privations, and the early and complete subjugation of their enemies. It is, therefore, not unnatural that at the first reverse they should yield at once to an unmanly depression, and, giving up all for lost, they should vent upon the Government for its conduct of the war, and upon the army and its generals for their failure to make their dreams of victory realities, an abuse as unreasoning as was their original enthusiasm.

Experience has taught the English people that the progress of a war never fulfills the popular expectations; that although victory may be assured at last to patient and untiring vigor and energy in its prosecution, yet during the continuance of a long war there can be no well-founded hope of a uniform and constant series of brilliant triumphs in the field, illustrating the profound wisdom of the policy of the Cabinet; that, on the contrary, all war, even that which is most successful in the end, consists rather in checkered fortunes, of alternations of victory and disaster, and that its conduct is generally marked by what were evidently, when viewed in the light of experience, blunders so glaring in the policy adopted by the Government, or in the strategy of its generals, that the wonder is success was achieved at all. The English have thus been taught that the true characteristic of public opinion, in its judgment of a war, should be, not hopefulness nor impatience of immediate results, but rather a stern endurance—that King-quality of heroic constancy which, rooted deep in a profound conviction of the justice of the cause, supports a lofty public spirit equally well in the midst of temporary disaster, and in the hour of assured triumph.

We have had no such experience here. Our people are perhaps more easily excited by success, and more readily depressed by reverses, than the English; and it is, therefore, worth while to consider how they carried on war on a grand scale and for a protracted period. It will be found, if we mistake not, that the denunciations of the Government, so common among us of late, and the complaints of the inactivity of the army, have their exact counterpart in the history of the progress of all the wars in which England has been engaged since the days of the great Rebellion. He who draws consolation from the lessons of the past, will not, we think, seek comfort in vain when he discovers that in all those wars in which the government and the army have been so bitterly assailed (except that of the American Revolution), England has at last been triumphant. It is worth while, then, to look into English history to understand how war is successfully carried on, notwithstanding the obstacles which, owing to a perverted public opinion, exist within the nation itself. These difficulties, although they inhere in the very nature of a free government, often prove, as we shall see, more fruitful of embarrassment to the favorable prosecution of a war than the active operations of the enemy.

We propose to illustrate the propositions which we have advanced by a study of the series of campaigns known in English history as the Peninsular War. We select this particular war because we think that in many of its events, and in the policy which sustained it, there are to be observed many important, almost startling parallelisms with our present struggle. We have, of course, no reference to any similarity existing in the principle which produced the two wars, but rather to the striking resemblance in the modes adopted by the two people for prosecuting war on a grand scale, and for the vindication of a principle regarded as of vital importance by them.

The Peninsular War on the part of England, as was contended by the Ministry during its progress, and as is now universally recognized, was a struggle not only to maintain her commercial supremacy (which was then, as it is now, her life), but also to protect her own soil from invasion by the French, by transferring the scene of conflict to distant Spain. The general purpose of assisting the alliance against Napoleon seems always to have been a subordinate motive. It is now admitted by all historians, that upon success in this war depended not only England's rank among nations but her very existence as an independent people. The war was carried on for more than five years, and on a scale, so far as the number of men and the extent of the military operations are concerned, until then wholly unattempted by England in her European wars. The result, as it need not be said, was not only to crown the British arms with the most brilliant and undying lustre, but also to retain permanently in their places the party whose only title to public favor was that they had carried on the war against the most serious obstacles, and brought it to a successful termination. Thus was delayed, it may be remarked, for at least twenty years, the adoption of those measures of reform which at last gave to England that place in modern civilization which had long before been reached by most of the nations of the Continent by passing through the trials of a bloody revolution. If we, then, in our dark hours, are inclined to doubt and despondency as to the final result, let us not forget the ordeal through which England successfully passed. We shall find that, in the commencement, there was the same wild and unreasoning enthusiasm with which we are familiar; the same bitter abuse and denunciation of the government at the first reverses; the same impatient and ignorant criticism of military operations; the same factious and disloyal opposition on the part of a powerful party; the same discouragement and despondency at times on the part of the true and loyal; the same prophecies of the utter hopelessness of success; the same complaints of grievous and burdensome taxation, and predictions of the utter financial ruin of the country; the same violent attacks upon the government for its arbitrary decrees, and particularly for the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus; the same difficulties arising from the inexperience of the army; and the same weakness on the part of the government in not boldly and energetically supporting the army in the field. These are some of the more striking parallelisms between the Peninsular War and our own struggle, which a slight sketch of the progress of that war will render very apparent.

The insurrection in Spain which followed immediately upon a knowledge of the intrigues of Napoleon at Bayonne, in April, 1807, by which the royal family was entrapped into an abdication of its right to the throne, and Joseph Bonaparte made king of that country, roused universal admiration and enthusiasm in England. It was thought by all parties that an obstacle to the further progress of Napoleon's schemes of the most formidable character had at last been found. It was the first popular insurrection in any country against Napoleon's power, and consequently, when the deputies from the Asturias reached England imploring succor, their appeals excited the popular feeling to the highest pitch, and the opposite parties in Parliament and the country vied with each other in demanding that England should aid the insurrection with the whole of her military power. It is curious to observe that, when the question of aid was brought before Parliament, Mr. Canning and Mr. Sheridan, who had probably never acted together before on any political question, rivaled each other in their praise of the Spaniards, and in their expressions of hope and belief that Napoleon had at last taken a step which would speedily prove fatal to him. Large supplies were voted by acclamation, and an important expedition, afterward operating in two columns, one under the command of Sir John Moore, the other under that of Sir Arthur Wellesley, was dispatched to the Peninsula to aid the insurgents. It is not our purpose to trace the progress of this expedition, but merely to notice the effect which its immediate results, the retreat to Corunna and the Convention of Cintra, produced upon popular feeling in England. As we look back on the history of that time the folly and madness which seized upon the popular mind when the terms of the Convention of Cintra became known can only be explained by recalling the high-wrought and extravagant expectations of immediate success with which the war had been entered upon. By this Convention, and as the result of a single battle, Portugal was wholly evacuated by the French; yet such were the unreasonable demands of public opinion that, because the whole French army had not been made prisoners of war, the Ministry was almost swept away by the outburst, and it could only control the storm by removing the two generals highest in rank. It required all the family and political influence of the third, Sir Arthur Wellesley, to enable him to retain his position in the army. The disastrous retreat of Sir John Moore's army to Corunna, and the easy triumphs of the French at that period throughout all Spain, plunged the English into despair. Going from one extreme to another, men who, only three months before, had quarreled with the army in Portugal because it had not given them the spectacle of a French marshal and twenty thousand of his soldiers as prisoners of war at Spithead, now spoke openly of the folly of any attempt at all on the part of England to resist the progress of the French arms in the Peninsula. In Parliament there was the usual lame apology for disaster, an attempt to shift the responsibility from the Ministry to the General in command; but the great fact that all their hopes had been disappointed still remained, and after the explanations of the Government the general despondency became more gloomy than ever. It is not difficult in the light of history to see where the blame of failure should rest. Any one who is disposed now to sneer and cavil at the shortcomings of our own Administration, to impute to it views short-sighted and impracticable in their policy, and to blame it for want of energy and vigor in the prosecution of the war, has only to turn to Colonel Napier's account of the stupid blunders of the English Government, its absurd and contradictory orders, its absolute ignorance not only of the elementary principles of all war, but of the very nature of the country in which the army was to operate, and of the resources of the enemy, to be convinced that, had its mode of carrying on hostilities (which was the popular one) been adopted, in six months not an English soldier would have remained in the Peninsula except as a prisoner of war. The history of this campaign contains important lessons for us; it shows conclusively that the immediate results of war are never equal to the public expectation, and that if this public expectation, defeated by the imbecility of the Government, or soured by disaster in the field, is to be the sole rule by which military operations are to be judged, no war for the defense of a principle can long be carried on.

Fortunately for the fame and the power of England, the Ministry, although ignorant of the true mode of prosecuting hostilities, had sense enough to perceive that their only true policy was perseverance. They were strong enough to resist the formidable opposition which the events we have referred to developed in Parliament and the country, and, undismayed by the experience of the past, concluded a treaty with the Provisional Government of Spain, by which they pledged England never to abandon the national cause until the French were driven across the Pyrenees. The army was placed upon a better footing, was largely reinforced, and Sir Arthur Wellesley was appointed to the chief command. The Government, not yet wholly awakened from its illusions, still thought it practicable to reach Madrid in a single campaign, and to that end the efforts of Wellington were directed. It became necessary first to dislodge Soult at Oporto, and the magnificent victory of the English, gained by the passage of the Douro at that point, went far to revive confidence at home in the invincibility of their army. Yet so clear is it that victory in war often depends upon what, for some better name, we may call mere good fortune, that we have the authority of the Duke of Wellington himself for saying, that this army, which had just exhibited such prodigies of valor, was then in such a state of demoralization that, although "excellent on parade, excellent to fight, it was worse than an enemy in a country, and liable to dissolution alike by success or defeat." Certainly no severer criticism has ever been justified by the inexperience and want of discipline of our own raw levies than that contained in this memorable declaration. A little reflection and candor might perhaps teach us, as it did the English, that nothing can compensate for the want of experience, and that every allowance is to be made for disasters where it is necessary to educate both officers and soldiers in the actual presence of the enemy. Wellington soon afterward moved toward the Spanish frontier, hoping by a junction with the army under Cuesta to fight a battle with the French which would open to him the road to the capital. The battle was fought at Talavera, and although it has since been claimed by the English as one of their proudest victories, and the name of Talavera is now inscribed upon the standards of the regiments who took part in it with those of Salamanca and Vittoria, yet the result was, in the end, that Wellington was obliged to retreat to Lisbon just three months after he had set out from that place, having left his wounded in the hands of the French, having escaped as if by a miracle from being wholly cut off in his retreat, and having lost one-third of his army in battle and by disease. Of course the blame was thrown upon the want of co-operation on the part of the Spaniards. This we have nothing to do with; it is the result of the campaign with which we are concerned. Dependence upon the Spaniards was certainly, as it turned out, a fault; but it was one of the fair chances of war, and it was a fault in which Wellington, made wise by experience, was never again detected.

When the news of the untoward result of this campaign reached England, the clamor against the Government and against Wellington was quite as violent as that excited by the disasters of Sir John Moore's army. The Opposition in Parliament took advantage of this feeling to rouse public opinion to such a manifestation as might compel the termination of the war in the Peninsula and drive the Ministry from office. The Common Council of London, probably a fair exponent of the opinions of the middle class, petitioned the King not to confirm the grant of £2000 a year which the Ministry had succeeded in getting Parliament to vote to Wellington. The petitioners ridiculed the idea that a battle attended with such results should be called a victory. "It should rather be called a calamity," they said, "since we were obliged to seek safety in a precipitate flight, abandoning many thousands of our wounded countrymen into the hands of the French." In the opinion of the strategists in the Common Council and of their friends in Parliament, Wellington might be a brave officer, but he was no general; he had neglected the protection of his flanks and his line of communication. When it is remembered that at this very time, Wellington, profiting by the experience of the past, was diligently making his army really effective within the lines of Torres Vedras, from which strong-hold it was in due time to sally forth like a giant refreshed, never to rest until it had planted the English flag on the heights of Toulouse, we may perhaps smile at the presumption of those who, sincere well-wishers to the cause, displayed only their ignorance in their criticism. But what shall be said of those who, knowing better, being quite able to understand the wisdom of the policy adopted by the General to insure success in the stupendous enterprise in which the country was engaged, yet with a factious spirit and with the sole object of getting into power themselves, took advantage of the excitement of the ignorant multitude to paralyze the energies of the Government?

That hideous moral leprosy, which seems to be the sad but invariable attendant upon all political discussions in a free government, corrupting the very sources of public life, breeding only the base spirit of faction, had taken complete possession of the Opposition, and in its sordid calculations, the dishonor of the country, or the danger of the army, was as nothing, provided the office, the power, and the patronage of the Government were secured in their hands. It mattered little to them, provided they could drive the Ministry from office, whether its downfall was brought about by blunders in Spain, or by the King's obstinacy about Catholic Emancipation, or by an obscure quarrel about the influence of the Lords of the bedchamber. The sincerity of these declamations of the Opposition was curiously enough put to the test some time afterward, when the Ministry, wearied by the factious demagogism with which all their measures were assailed, and understanding perfectly their significance, boldly challenged their opponents, if they were in earnest, to make a definite motion in the House of Commons, that Portugal should be abandoned to its fate. This move completely unmasked their game, and for a time silenced the clamor, for it was perfectly understood on all hands, that deep in the popular heart, undisturbed by the storms which swept over its surface, there was a thorough and abiding conviction of the absolute necessity of resisting the progress of Napoleon's arms, and that the real safety of England herself required that that resistance should then be made in Spain. Still this noisy clamor did immense mischief; it weakened the Government, it prolonged the strife, it alarmed the timid, it discouraged the true, and it so far imposed upon Napoleon himself, that thinking that in these angry invectives against the Government he found the real exponent of English sentiment, he concluded, not unnaturally, that the people were tired and disgusted with the war, and that the privations which it occasioned were like a cancer, slowly but surely eating out the sources of national life.

In the midst of these violent tumults at home, Wellington was silently preparing for his great work within the lines of Torres Vedras. It would not be easy to overrate the difficulties by which he was surrounded. He was fully aware of the outcry which had been raised against him; he knew that from a Cabinet so weakened by internal dissensions as to be on the verge of overthrow from the vigorous assaults of the Opposition, and from its own unpopularity occasioned by the failure of the Walcheren expedition, and the disasters in the Peninsula, he could expect no thorough and reliable support. Indeed the Government, almost in despair, threw the whole responsibility for the military measures on the Continent on him alone. He accepted the responsibility in a most magnanimous spirit. He writes:

> "I conceive that the honor and the interests of the country require that we should hold our position here as long as possible, and please God, I will maintain it as long as I can. I will neither endeavor to shift from my own shoulders on those of the ministers the responsibility for the failure, by calling for means which I know they can not give, and which, perhaps, would not add materially to the facility of attaining our object; nor will I give to the ministers, who are not strong, and who must feel the delicacy of their own situation, an excuse for withdrawing the army from a position which, in my opinion, the honor and interest of the country require they should maintain as long as possible."

Animated by this heroic sense of duty, the Commander-in-Chief prepared to contend against the 200,000 men under Massena, whom Napoleon had sent to chase him into the sea. He had, to oppose this immense force, only 25,000 English soldiers, and about the same number of Portuguese tolerably organized. Secure within the lines of Torres Vedras, he quietly waited until the want of provisions, and the utter hopelessness of an assault upon his position forced upon Massena the necessity of retreating. Then instantly pursuing, in a series of battles, of almost daily occurrence, he drove Massena out of Portugal, and reached once more the Spanish frontier in May, 1811, nearly three years after the English had sent an army to the assistance of the Peninsula. Here he rested for a long time, making preparations for the siege of

Badajoz and Ciudad Rodrigo, operations requiring time, and the success of which was essential to the safety of the army in its further progress. Still, so little was Wellington's position, military and political, understood in England even at that time, after all the proofs he had given of consummate ability, that public clamor was again roused against the mode adopted by him for conducting the war. As there were no disasters at which to grumble, people talked of "barren victories," because like those of Creçy and Azincourt, they brought no territorial acquisitions, forgetting then what they have never been weary of boastingly proclaiming since, that these victories were the best proofs that their army was distinguished by the highest military qualities, which, properly directed and supported, were capable of achieving the most glorious results. So profound was the conviction of the immense superiority of the French, both in numbers and in the quality of their troops, that the public mind was in a state of feverish anxiety, and many of the stoutest hearts gave way to despair. About this period Sir Walter Scott writes to Mr. Ellis:

"These cursed, double cursed news (from Spain) have sunk my spirits so much, that I am almost at disbelieving a Providence: God forgive me, but I think some evil demon has been permitted in the shape of this tyrannical monster, whom God has sent on the nations visited in his anger. The spring-tide may, for aught I know, break upon us in the next session of Parliament. There is an evil fate upon us in all we do at home or abroad."

So Sir James Mackintosh, writing to Gentz, at Vienna:

"I believe, like you, in a resurrection, because I believe in the immortality of civilization, but when, and by whom, and in what form, are questions which I have not the sagacity to answer, and on which it would be boldness to hazard a conjecture. A dark and stormy night, a black series of ages may be prepared for our posterity, before the dawn that opens the more perfect day. Who can tell how long that fearful night may be before the dawn of a brighter morrow? The race of man may reach the promised land; but there is no assurance that the present generation will not perish in the wilderness."

As if to render the situation more gloomy, if possible, the Marquis of Wellesley, the brother of Wellington, left the Ministry upon the avowed ground that the Government would not support the war with sufficient vigor. History has stripped his conduct of any such worthy motive, and shown that the real trouble was his anxiety to supplant Mr. Perceval. At the same time the attack was kept up in the opposite quarter. "No man in his senses," said Sir Francis Burdett, "could entertain a hope of the final success of our arms in the Peninsula. Our laurels were great, but barren, and our victories in their effects mere defeats." Mr. Whitbread, too, as usual, was not behindhand with his prophecies. "He saw no reason," he said, "to alter his views respecting peace; war must otherwise terminate in the subjugation of either of the contending powers. They were both great; but this was a country of factitious greatness. France was a country of natural greatness." So General Tarleton "had the doctrine of Mr. Fox in his favor, who wished for the pencil of a Cervantes to be able to ridicule those who desired to enter upon a Continental war."*

Thus, from universal enthusiasm in favor of the Spanish war, public opinion, at first manifesting itself through the factious spirit of the Opposition, at length spoke through all its organs, in tones of despondency and despair, of the situation and prospects of the country, and simply because there had not been that sort of military success which it could understand to sustain and direct it. Universal distrust seized upon the public mind; and had it not been for the heroic constancy of that great commander, whose task in supporting the Ministry at home was at least as difficult as that of beating the French in Spain, the glory of England had sunk forever.

Yet it happened, as it so often happens in the order of Divine Providence, in the moral as in the physical world, that the night was darkest just before dawn. Amidst all this universal despondency and sinister foreboding, events were preparing which in a few short months changed the whole face of Europe, and forced back that torrent of revolutionary success which had spread over the whole Continent, until it overwelmed the country where it had its source in complete ruin. The discussions in Parliament to which we have referred took place in February, 1812. With the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo on the 18th of January of that year, with the fall of Badajoz on the 26th of March, the first battle of Salamanca on the 20th of July, and Napoleon's invasion of Russia in June in the same year, began the downfall of the French Empire.

Wellington at last reached Madrid in August, 1812, more than four years later than he ought to have done, according to the strategists of Parliament and the Press. This was all forgotten at the moment, so magic a wand is held by success. The fickle voice of popular applause was again heard, echoing the spirit of confidence which his persistent and undaunted conduct had revived in the hearts of his countrymen. His career of victory, however, was destined not to be unchecked; and when, after his occupation of Madrid, his unsuccessful assault upon the Castle of Burgos rendered a retreat to the Portuguese frontier, and the evacuation of the capital, a proper military movement, although that retreat was compensated for by the abandonment of Andalusia by the French, in order to concentrate their whole force against him, still the blind multitude could not be made to understand it, and began again to murmur.

It is not now difficult to see that the victory at Salamanca was really what the far-seeing sagacity of Marshal Soult predicted at the time it would become, "a prodigious historical event;" that it was the pivot on which at that time hinged the destinies of England—one of those battles, of which we see perhaps a dozen only in the whole course of history, which are really decisive of the fate of empires. It completely unloosed the French power in the Peninsula, and prepared the way for the great success of Vittoria, the next year, which gave the coup de grace to the French military occupation of Spain. It is not our present purpose to trace the history of the next campaign, but it is curious to observe the effects produced by assured success upon that public opinion which had shifted so often and so strangely during the progress of this eventful struggle. The Opposition, as their only hope of escape from political annihilation, and thinking to swim with the popular current, abused the Ministers for not supporting Wellington with sufficient earnestness, complaining that they had taken the advice which they themselves had so often and so eloquently tendered. But it was of no avail. This wretched charlatanism was too transparent to impose upon any one; and of the great party who opposed the war, no one ever after rose to office or power in England. It required a whole generation, in the opinion of the English constituencies, to expiate the faults of those who had sneered at the great Duke, and had called the glorious fields of Vimeiro, Busaco, Talavera, Fuentes d'Onor, Ciudad Rodrigo, and Badajoz, names which had become associated with the proudest recollections of English renown, "mere barren victories, equal in their effects to defeats."

We pass now to the consideration of another class of difficulties inherent in the prosecution of every war, and generally of far greater magnitude than any other—those connected with the raising of the vast sums of money required for the support of military operations. In this important matter, if we mistake not, there are some striking points of resemblance between the English experience during the war, and our present situation. It is the fashion among many who seek to excite the public alarm on this subject from unworthy, and sometimes, it may be feared, from treasonable motives, to represent the enormous outlay of the nation's wealth which is poured out to save the nation's life, as wholly unparalleled in history. Yet it may be asserted, without any fear of contradiction, that England, with a population then little more than half of that which now inhabits our loyal States, with resources infinitely less in proportion at that time than our own, her manufacturing industry, so far as external outlet was concerned, wholly crippled by the operation of the French Continental system, and her own Orders in Council, expended, during every year of the Peninsular war, as large a sum as has been required here each year to create and keep up the gigantic force now in arms to put down the Rebellion. During the five years that the war lasted her average annual expenditure exceeded ninety millions of pounds sterling, or four hundred and fifty millions of dollars, which is about the same sum which is demanded of us. No one, of course, pretends to say that this rate of expenditure is not appalling; yet it concerns us to know that it is not unprecedented, and that these vast amounts have been raised from national resources far inferior to our own. It should not be forgotten, also, that they represent the money price of England's independence; and if ours is secured by a far greater outlay, we certainly are not disposed to quarrel with the wisdom of the investment.

The question is, how were these immense sums raised in England? The man who would have predicted, at the commencement of the war with France, that the English national debt would at its close exceed one thousand millions of pounds sterling, and that the country would be able to bear such a burden, would have been regarded as a visionary as wild as he who in this country, two years ago, might have foretold the present amount of our national debt, and have contended that, in spite of it, the public credit would remain unimpaired. The difficulty in England of raising these vast sums was ten-fold greater than it is here. Napoleon, looking upon England as the Southern people have been taught to regard us, as a purely commercial nation, undoubtedly placed more reliance for ultimate success upon the instinct of money-getting, which would shrink from the pecuniary sacrifices necessary in a prolonged struggle, than upon the mere victories of his army. Hence he pursued, during his whole career, an inflexible purpose of ruining English commerce, and by a series of measures known as the Continental system, endeavored to exclude English ships and English products from the markets of the world. The effect of these measures, although not so serious as he wished and had anticipated, nevertheless crippled enormously the resources of England just at the period when they were most needed.

Taking the three years before the issuing of the Orders in Council and the vigorous enforcement of the Continental system, which were coincident in point of time with the commencement of the Spanish war, the average annual exports sank from fifty-seven millions to twenty-three millions, taking the average of three years after they had been in operation. Taxes were laid on at a most burdensome rate. The income tax was ten per cent., and besides, specific war taxes amounting to more than twenty millions a year were imposed. Notwithstanding all these taxes, the debt increased more than one thousand millions of dollars during the Peninsular War. Discontent and violence among the laboring classes became universal, and it was remarked that the achievement of the greatest victories in Spain was celebrated in England "amidst a population who had been prevented by the burden of taxation on the absolute necessaries of life, from securing a livelihood by the strictest industry, and thus pauperism had been generated throughout the land, a pauperism aggravated by a spirit of pillage, which it required a strong military force to repress." Bankruptcy and ruin fell upon the trading classes, and absolute exhaustion of the resources of the country seemed almost reached. The public stocks had sunk to such a degree that the three per cents., which are now always above 90 per cent., were rarely higher during the war than 65 per cent., and so depressed at last had the public credit become, that the last loan of the Continental war, that of April, 1815, was taken by the contractor at 53 per cent., and paid for in the depreciated paper of the day; and yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer was congratulated even by the Opposition for having made "a good operation." The Bank was in a state of chronic suspension, the buying and selling of gold were prohibited to the public under severe penalties, and yet every gold guinea which was sent by the Government to the army in Spain (and nothing else would answer the purpose of money in that country) cost thirty per cent. premium. How England survived all this complication of troubles is one of the marvels of history, but it is not our purpose to discuss that question. The great fact that the money required was somehow raised is all that we have to do with at present. When we have been at war for twenty years, and are forced, in order to raise the means of carrying it on, to submit to one tithe of the sacrifices which were endured by the English, we may then perhaps begin seriously to consider the money value of the Union.

The lesson which this review of the progress of the Peninsular War teaches, is, it seems to us, one of hope and encouragement; for if it shows any thing, it proves clearly that in the support of public opinion, and in the means requisite to maintain a great army, those fundamental essentials of real military success, our Government is immeasurably stronger than the English ever was at any period of the war. It teaches also another important lesson, and that is, that there is such a thing as public opinion falsely so called, which is noisy just in proportion as its real influence is narrow and restricted. One of the most difficult and delicate tasks of the statesman is to distinguish the true from this false opinion, the factious demagogue from the grumbling but sincere patriot, and to recognize with a ready instinct the voice which comes from the depths of the great heart of the people, in warning it may be sometimes, in encouragement often, but always echoing its abiding faith in the ultimate triumph of the good cause.

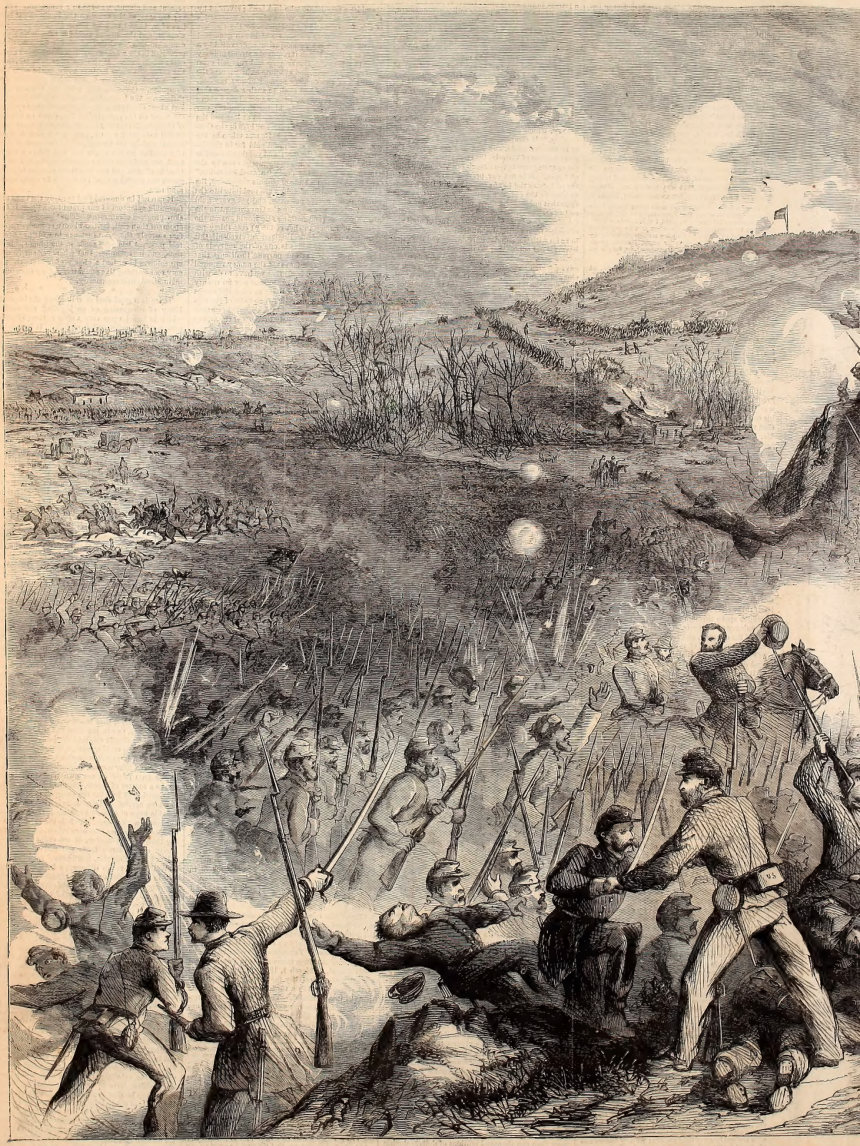
[After some remarks on military efficiency, Mr. Stillé goes on to say:]

Much inconvenience has necessarily resulted in our case from the ignorance of Regimental Officers, to a greater degree probably, however, from a want of proper care and attention on their part to the troops when in camp, than from any gross incompetency or misconduct on the field of battle. Instances of such misconduct there have undoubtedly been, but, considering the number of the officers and their want of experience, those instances are extremely rare, and when we call to mind the number of officers who have fallen, while leading their men in battle, out of proportion, as it undoubtedly is, with the losses in other wars, we may well palliate deficiencies in this respect, out of considerations for their heroic gallantry and devotion. We do not underrate, certainly, the value of good officers; but history tells us that great victories have been achieved by armies who were no better led than ours. The incompetency of his officers was one of Wellington's standing complaints in Spain. Most of them knew absolutely nothing beyond the mere routine of garrison duty; they were all what is technically called "gentlemen," for each one had purchased his commission at a high price, but they had had no systematic training in military schools; nearly all of them had had no actual experience of war, and their average intelligence was undoubtedly below that of the men who hold similar positions in our army.* All accounts agree that at that period the scientific branches of the great art of war were almost wholly neglected in the British army, and such was the happy ignorance of the elements of strategy, that at a court-martial composed of general officers for the trial of General Whitelock, in 1808, for his failure at Buenos Ayres, it was necessary to explain to the court what was meant in military phrase by the "right bank" of a river.

[We omit here some remarks on the superior morale of our soldiers to the rank and file of foreign armies.]

One of the most cruel statements which party rancor has circulated in regard to the condition of the army is, that the rate of sickness and mortality is excessive, and that this is due to the neglect of the Government. Fortunately we have the means of showing that these statements are false. From June 1, 1861, to March 1, 1862—nine months—the annual rate of mortality for the whole army is ascertained to be 53 in a thousand, and the sickness rate 104 in a thousand. The returns for the summer campaigns are not yet printed, but it will appear from them, that in the army of the Potomac on the 10th of June, after the battle of Fairoaks, and while the army was encamped on the Chickahominy, the whole number of sick, present and absent, compared with the whole force of that army present and absent, was 128 in a thousand. During the stay of the army on the Peninsula it lost less than 14,000 men by death from disease and wounds, and the annual sickness rate during the campaign was about that which has for some time prevailed in the whole army, less than ten per cent. of the whole force. It appears, strange to say, that the army was more healthy when in the trenches before Yorktown than at any other period of the campaign. Compare this with the English experience. We have already said that Wellington lost about one-third of his whole army from malarious fever on his retreat from Talavera: on the 1st of October, 1811, the Anglo-Portuguese army had 56,000 men fit for duty, and 23,000 sick in hospitals; and in the Crimea, while the annual rate of mortality for the whole war was 232 in a thousand, the period of active operations, the last three months of 1854 and the first three months of 1855, shows the fearful rate of 711 deaths in every thousand men.

It can not be doubted that to many the most unfavorable symptom of our present condition is the slow progress of our arms. This slowness is more apparent than real, for the history of modern warfare scarcely shows an instance in which so great real progress has been made in the same space of time, and it is manifest that whenever our Northern soldiers have had a chance of fighting the enemy on any thing like equal terms, they have fully maintained their superiority.



* * * * * * *

There is a good deal of talk about the impossibility of conquering or subjugating the South, which is based upon very vague notions of what conquest and subjugation signify. It is surprising to find how even intelligent men have been imposed upon by this favorite boast of the rebels and their sympathizers. A pretended saying of Napoleon is quoted, that "it is impossible to prevent any people determined on achieving its independence from accomplishing its purpose; and it is confidently asked whether any one ever heard of the subjugation of twelve millions of people determined to be free. We reply that history, ancient and modern, is full of instances of the only sort of conquest or subjugation which any sane man proposes shall be submitted to by the South. No one thinks it possible or necessary, for the purpose in view, to occupy the whole South with garrisons, but simply to destroy the only support upon which its arrogant pretensions are based, namely, its military power. This gone, what becomes of all the rest? and this remaining, where is there any hope of permanent peace and safety to us? For what is all war but an appeal to force to settle questions of national interest which peaceful discussion has failed to settle? and what is an army but only another argument, the ultima ratio, which, if successful in decisive battles, must give the law to the conquered? To say nothing of instances in ancient history, Poland, Hungary, and Lombardy, in our day, were just as determined to be free as the South is, and quite as full of martial ardor; and certainly Prussia, Spain under the Bonaparte dynasty, and the French Empire, are all examples of nations which valued their independence, and had ten-fold the resources for maintaining it which the South possesses; yet the capture of Warsaw, the surrender of Villagos, the battles of Novara, of Jena, of Salamanca, and of Waterloo, respectively, settled as definitively the fate of the inhabitants of those countries, and their future condition, as if the terms imposed by the conquering army had been freely and unanimously agreed upon by the representatives of the people in Congress assembled. And, in like manner, can any one doubt, looking at the present comparative resources of the two sections, that if we should gain two decisive battles, one in the East and the other in the West, which should result in the total disorganization of the two rebel armies, and thus enable us to interpose an impassable barrier between them, we should soon hear a voice imploring in unmistakable accents peace on our own terms? It would not be a matter of choice, but of necessity; a simple question of how far the progress of exhaustion had been carried, and that once settled, and no reasonable hope of success remaining, the war would not last a week longer. This is the experience of all nations, and our Southern rebels, notwithstanding their noisy boasting, do not differ in their capacity of resistance from the rest of mankind. "Hard pounding this, gentlemen," said the Duke of Wellington to his officers, as he threw himself within one of the unbroken squares of his heroic infantry at Waterloo, "but we'll see who can pound the longest;" and the ability of that infantry to "pound the longest" on that day settled the fate of Europe for generations.

Let us bend, then, our united energies to secure, as much as in us lies, success in the field, and that success gained, we may be sure that all things will follow. Let us recognize with confidence as co-workers in this great object all, never mind what opinions they may entertain about the causes of the war and the new issues which its progress has developed, who desire in all sincerity, no matter from what motive, the success of our arms. Upon such a basis, the wider and more catholic our faith becomes the better. "In essentials, Unity; in non-essentials, Liberty; in all things, Charity:" this should be our motto. The only possible hope for the South is in our own divisions. Let us remember that with success all things are possible; without it, all our hopes and theories vanish into thin air. With success in the field we should not only disarm the rebellion, and rid ourselves forever of the pestilent tribe of domestic traitors by burying them deep in that political oblivion which covers the Tories of the Revolution, and those who sneered at the gallant exploits of our Navy in the war of 1812, but also force public opinion abroad, whose faithlessness to the great principles which underlie all modern civilization has been one of the saddest developments of this sad war, to exclaim at last, "Invidiam gloriâ superâsti."

* The following description of the Opposition of that day, taken from the Annual Register for 1812, bears so striking a likeness to the peculiarities of the leaders of an insignificant but restless faction among us, that, omitting the old-fashioned drapery of the proper names, they seem to have sat for the photograph. "It may be remarked as a most singular circumstance, that those persons in this country who profess to have the greatest abhorrence of ministerial tyranny and oppression, look with the utmost coolness on the tyranny and oppression of Bonaparte. The regular Opposition do not mention it with that abhorrence which might be expected from them; but the leaders of the popular party in Parliament go further. They are almost always ready to find an excuse for the conduct of Bonaparte. The most violent and unjustifiable acts of his tyranny raise but feeble indignation in their minds, while the most trifling act of ministerial oppression is inveighed against with the utmost bitterness. Ready and unsuspecting credence is given to every account of Bonaparte's success; while the accounts of the success of his opponents are received with coldness and distrust. Were it not for these things, the conduct of Mr. Whitbread and his friends would be hailed with more satisfaction, and inspire more confidence with the real lovers of their country; for they deserve ample credit for the undaunted and unwearied firmness with which they have set themselves against abuses and against every instance of oppression."

* We have no room to enumerate in detail the complaints made by the Duke of the officers of his army. Those who are interested in the subject may consult Colonel Gurwood's 4th volume, pages 343, 346, 352, 363, 385, 399, and 407. The whole story is summed up, however, in the general order occasioned by the disorderly retreat from Burgos, in which the Duke said "that discipline had deteriorated during the campaign in a greater degree than he had ever witnessed, or ever read of in any army, and this, without any disaster, or any unusual privation or hardship; that the officers had from the first lost all command over their men, and that the true cause of this unhappy state of affairs was to be found in the habitual neglect of duty by the Regimental Officers." This is the army of which the Duke said later, that "with it he could go any where and do any thing," and, good or bad, it saved Europe—in the English sense.

A SCENE IN ONE OF THE BATTLES

BEFORE VICKSBURG.—[See Page 156.]

THE BATTLE OF VICKSBURG.

We illustrate on pages 152 and 153 a SCENE IN THE FOUR DAYS' BATTLES BEFORE VICKSBURG. These famous battles, which have caused so much distress throughout the West, and done so much to create dissatisfaction with the Government, really developed an amount of courage and self-devotion on the part of our troops which have rarely been paralleled during the present war. Rarely has an attempt been made to storm intrenched works under so great difficulties. The enemy were in all probability more numerous than their assailants under Sherman, and they had the advantage of a superior position, elaborate earth-works, and countless batteries of artillery. Our brave fellows had to scramble up bluffs under a terrible fire, positively working their way on their hands and knees, and pulling themselves up by the rancid bridges with their nails. At every step of the way they were shot down by concealed foes: when the decimated remnant reached the crest of the hill, they found themselves opposed to a superior force, fresh, confident, and well armed. A storming party under similar circumstances is usually covered by a heavy artillery fire. The assailants under Sherman had no such ally. The memory of their repulse will nerve the remainder of the army to wipe out the disgrace when the assault is renewed.

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK

By the Author of "Mary Barton," etc.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER IX.

THE wedding went by, as grand weddings do, without let or hindrance, according to the approved pattern. A cabinet minister honored it with his presence, and, being a distant relation of the Morants, remained for a few days after the grand occasion. During this time he became rather intimate with Ralph Corbet; many of their tastes were in common. Ralph took a great interest in the manner of working our political system, in the balance and value of parties; and had precisely the right appreciation of the exact qualities on which the minister piqued himself, in return, the latter was always on the look-out for promising young men, who, either by their capability of speech-making or astute devotion, might advance the views of his party; and recognizing the powers he most valued in Ralph, he spared no pains to attach him to his own political set. When they separated it was with the full understanding that they were to see a good deal of each other in London.

The holiday Ralph allowed himself was passing rapidly away; but before he returned to his chambers and his hard work he had promised to spend a few days with Ellinor; and it suited him to go straight from the duke's to Ford Bank. He left the castle soon after breakfast—his luxurious, elegant breakfast, served by domestics who performed their work with the accuracy and perfection of machines. He arrived at Ford Bank before the man-servant had quite done the dirtier part of his morning's work, and he came to the glass-door in his striped cotton jacket, a little soiled, and rolling up his working apron. Ellinor was not yet quite strong enough to get up and go out and gather flowers for the rooms, so those left from yesterday were rather faded; in short, the contrast from entire completeness and exquisite freshness of arrangement struck forcibly upon Ralph's perceptions, which were always critical rather than appreciative; and as his affections were always subservient to his intellect, Ellinor's lovely face and graceful figure flying to meet him did not meet with his full approval, because her hair was arranged in an old-fashioned way, and her waist was either too long or too short, her sleeves too full or too tight for the modes of fashion to which of late he had been accustomed while scanning the bridemaids and various high-born ladies at Stokely Castle.

But as he had always piqued himself upon being able to put on one side all superficial worldliness in his chase after power, it did not do for him to shrink from facing and seeing the incompleteness of moderate means. Only matrimony might make the means was gradually becoming more distasteful to him.

Nor did his intercourse with Lord Bolton, the cabinet minister before-mentioned, tend to reconcile him to early matrimony. At Lord Bolton's house, he found the highest intellectual society, and all that smoothness in ministerial society, lower wants in eating and drinking which seems to provide that the right thing shall always be at the right place at the right time, so that the wants of it shall never impede for an instant the feast of wit or reason. Also, if he went to the houses of his friends—men of the same college and standing as himself, who had been seduced into early marriages—he was uncomfortably aware of numerous inconsistencies and hitches in their messages. Besides, the idea of the possible disgrace that might befall the family which he had in thought of allying himself haunted him with the tenacity and also with the exaggeration of a night-mare whenever he had over-excited himself in his search after available and profitable knowledge, or had a fit of indigestion after the exquisite dinners he was learning so well to appreciate.

Christmas was, of course, to be devoted to his own family; it was an unavoidable necessity, as he told Ellinor; while, if the truth must be told, he was learning to feel absence from his betrothed something of a relief. But the misgivings and folly of his home, even blessed by the presence of a Lady Maria, made him look forward to Easter at Ford Bank with something of an old pleasure.

Ellinor, with the fine tact which love gives, had discovered his annoyance at various little incongruities in the household at the time of his second visit in the previous autumn; and had labored to make all as perfect as she could before his return. But she had much to struggle against. For the first time in her life there was a great want of ready money; she could not dismiss the old servants' wages, and the bill for the spring seeds was a heavy weight on her conscience. For Miss Morgan's methodical habits had taught her rapid great exactitude as to all money matters under her control.

Then, her father's temper had become very uncertain. He avoided being alone with her whenever he possibly could; and the consciousness of this, and of the terrible mental secret which was the cause of this estrangement, were the reasons why Ellinor never recovered her health and strength during the winter. Her opinion it was to it that the outside world attributed her changed appearance. They would shake their heads, and say, "Ah, poor Miss Ellinor! What a lovely creature she was before that fever! To see her now, one would never think that she was almost a beauty only twelve months ago."

But youth is youth, and will assert itself in a certain elasticity of body and spirits; and at times Ellinor forgot that she had been ill many hours together. And even when her father's averted eye brought it all once more before her she had learned to endure with more composure, and to regard Mr. Dunster's death as only the consequence of an unfortunate accident. But the tried to put the mystery of the circumstance entirely out of her mind; to go on from day to day, thinking only of the day's work, and leaving it so as to cause the least irritation to her father. She would so gladly have spoken to him on the one subject which engrossed her thoughts in intercourse: she fancied that by speaking she might have been able to banish the phantom, or at any rate to work out the reality of what she supposed to be the due proportion. But her father was evidently determined to show that he was never going to allude to the subject himself, and as she could do in her helpless perplexity was to follow his lead on the rare occasions that they fell into something like a tête-à-tête conversation. As yet, to her, he had never given way to anger; but before her he had often spoken in a manner which she could not bear to think of. Sometimes his eye in the midst of his passion caught on her face of affright and dismay, and then he would stop short, and make a effort to control himself as sometimes ended in tears. Ellinor did not understand both these phases of temper owing to ignorance of the world in his daily life at home, how it should go on with oiled wheels, neither a jerk nor a jar. It was no use telling him that Mrs. Dunster was dead and cold, with all she had shut up in her poor weary heart. Miss Morso was her great comfort; she kept unconsciously a sort of check on her and any thing below the surface; and yet her full and delicate recognition of all the little daily cares and trials which fell to the lot of a woman such as Ellinor, while there was no need to fear that it would ever even give Miss Morgan that power of seeing into the heart of things which it frequently confers upon imaginative people, who are deeply absorbed in some one of the arts of peace.

There was a strong bond between Ellinor and Dixon, although they scarcely ever exchanged a word but on the most commonplace subjects. Yet their silence was based on different feelings from that which separated Ellinor from her father. Ellinor and Dixon were silent from love; Ellinor because their hearts were full of pity for the faulty man whom they both loved so well, and tried so hard to respect.

This was the state of the household to which Ralph Corbet came down at Easter. He might have been happier in the more brilliant society met by this time; but he could not afford to throw his life away in fine-works; he calculated his means, and considered that, as much as such as might be, only visiting where he was likely to meet men who could help him in his future career. He had been invited to spend the Easter vacation at a certain country-house which would be full of such human stepping-stones; and he declined it to go to Ellinor, to bring the fever to Ford Bank. But he could not help looking upon himself a little in the light of a martyr to duty; and perhaps there was a little of the feeling in him chafe under his future father-in-law's irritability of manner, which now showed itself even to Ralph. He forgot, in his unconsciousness, that he had suffered himself to be engaged so early in life; and having become conscious of the temptation, and having resisted it for a time, of course it returned and returned, and gradually assumed the proportions of a duty which was to be gained by keeping to his engagement to Ellinor? He should have a delicate wife to look after, and even more than the common additional expenses of married life. He should have a father-in-law whose character at best had but only a loose fabric of principle to govern it, which it was now daily losing by habits which were both sensual and vulgarizing: a man, too, who was strangely ignorant of the common action into moody sullenness. Besides, he doubted if, in the evident change in the prosperity of the family, the fortune to be paid down on the occasion of his marriage to Ellinor could be forthcoming. And above all, and around all, there hovered the shadow of some unrevealed disgrace, which might come to light at any time and involve him in it. He thought he had pretty well ascertained the nature of this probable disgrace, and had little doubt but that it would turn out to be that Dunster's disappearance to America or elsewhere had been an arranged plan with Mr. Wilkins. Although Mr. Ralph Corbet was capable of suspecting this mean crime (so far removed from the impulsive commission of the past sin, which was dragging Mr. Wilkins daily lower and lower down), it was of a kind that was peculiarly distasteful to the acute lawyer, who foresaw how such base conduct as he considered would taint all whose names were ever mentioned, even by chance, in connection with it. He used to lie awake, tossing on his sleepless bed, turning over all these things in the night watches. He was tormented by all these thoughts; he would bitterly regret the past events that connected him with Ellinor, from the day when he first came to see with Mr. Ness up to the present time. But when he came down in the morning, and saw the faded Ellinor flash into momentary beauty at his entrance into the dining-room, and when she blushingly drew near with the one single flower, freshly gathered, which it had been her custom to place in his button-hole when he came down to breakfast, he felt as if his better self was stronger than temptation, and as if he must be an honest man and honorable lover even against his wish.

As the day wore on the temptation gathered strength. Mr. Wilkins came down, and while he was on the scene Ellinor seemed always engrossed by her father, who apparently cared little enough for the fair attentions. Then there was a complaining of the food, which did not suit the sickly palate of a man who had drunk hard all his life, and possibly these complaints were extended to the servants, and their incompleteness or incapacity was brought thus unpleasantly before the eyes of Ralph, who would have preferred to eat a dry crust in silence, or to have gone without breakfast altogether, if he could have had intellectual conversation of some high order, to having the greatest dainties with the knowledge that they were to feel in all the pecuniary position thus coarsely discussed before him. By the time such breakfasts were finished Ellinor looked dusky, and as if she were going to cry all day. It had become difficult for him to contract his mind to her small domestic interests, and she had little courage to listen to him about any thing beyond them. She sat down to breakfast, and he responded but curtly to all her questions about himself, and was weary of professing a love which he was obliged to feel in all the passionate nothings which usually make up so much of lovers' talk. The books she had been reading were old stories to him, and in literature he no longer admitted of keen discussion; the poor whom she cared for were all very well in their way; and if Ellinor had been more gifted as to illustrate a theory, hearing about them might have been of some use; but, as it was, it was simply troublesome. And after day of Mrs. Palmer's rheumatism and Mrs. Day's baby's fits. There was no talking politics with her forever, and Ralph was quite aware that she always agreed with what he said.

He even grew to find luncheon and Miss Morgan one and the same, and learn to hate unconscious tête-à-tête. Then came the walk, generally to the town to fetch Mr. Wilkins from his office; and once or twice it was pretty evident now he had been employing his hours. One day in particular his walk was so unsteady and his speech so thick that Ralph could only wonder how it was that Ellinor did not perceive the state of affairs. She was openly anxious about the headache of which her father complained to have been at all aware of the previous self-indulgence which had occasioned it. When they got very afternoon, as ill-luck would have it, the Duke of Hinton and a gentleman whom Ralph had met in town at Lord Bolton's rode by, and recognized him; saw Ralph supporting a tipsy man with such quiet friendly interest as must have all appearance that they were gentlemen friends. Mr. Corbet chafed and fumed inwardly all the way home after this unfortunate occurrence; he was more thoroughly evil respective they reached Ford Bank, but he had too much self-command to let this be very apparent. He turned into the drawing-room, leaving Mr. Wilkins to take her father into the quietness of his own room, there to lie down and shake off his headache.

Ralph walked along, ruminating in gloomy mood as to what was to be done; how he could best extricate himself from the miserable relation in which he had placed himself by giving way to impulse. Almost before he was aware, a little knock at the door, his folded arms, and Ellinor's sweet and eyes looked into his.

"I have put papa down for an hour's rest before dinner, Ralph dear. His head seems to ache terribly."

Ralph was silent and unsympathizing, trying to nerve himself up to be disagreeable, but finding it difficult in face of such sweet trust. At length he began—

"Do you remember our conversation last autumn, Ellinor?"

Her head sank. They were near a garden seat, and she quietly sat down without speaking.

"About some disgrace which you then fancied must hang over you?" No answer. "Does it still hang over you?"

"Yes!" she whispered, with a heavy sigh.

"And your father knows of this, of course? Does he?"

"Yes!" again in the same tone, only lower, more silent.

"I think it is doing him harm," at length Ralph went on, decidedly.

"I am afraid it is," she said, in a low tone.

"I wish you would tell me what it is," he said, a little impatiently. "I might be able to help you about it."

"No! you could not," replied Ellinor. "I was sorry to be very hurt to tell you what I did; I did not tell you because I wanted help; all that is past. But I wanted to know if you thought that a person situated as I was was justified in marrying any one ignorant of what might happen; what has been done and trust never will."

"But if I don't know what you are alluding to in this mysterious way, you must see—don't you see, Ellinor, I am in the position of the ignorant man, whom I think you said you could not feel it right to marry. Why don't you tell me straight out at it is?" He could not help his irritation betraying itself in his tones and manner of speaking. She bent a little forward, and shaded that with his face, as though to prove to the very heart's truth of him. Then she said, as quietly as she ever had spoken in her life,

"Ralph, you with to break off our engagement?"

He reddened, and grew indignant in a moment.

"What nonsense! Just because I ask a question and make a remark! I think your illness must have made you fanciful, Ellinor. Surely nothing I said deserves such an interpretation. Have I ever said a word that ought to lead you to think so? On the contrary, have I not shown the sincerity and depth of my affection to you by clinging to you through—through every thing?"

He was going to say "through the wearying opposition of my family;" but he stopped short, for he knew that the very fact of his mother's opposition had only made him the more determined to have his own way in the first instance; and even now he did not intend to let out what he had concealed up to this time, that his friends had regretted his imprudent engagement.

Ellinor sat silently gazing out upon the meadows, but seeing nothing. Then she put her hand into his. "I quite trust you, Ralph. I was wrong to doubt. I am afraid I have grown fanciful and silly."

He was content: put to it for the right words, for she had precisely divined the dim thought that had overshadowed his mind when she had looked as cheerful as him. But he pressed her, and reassured her with fond words, as incoherent as lovers' words generally are.

By-and-by they sauntered homeward, and when they reached the house Ellinor left him and flew up to see how her father was. When Ralph went into his own room he was vexed with himself, both for what he had said and what he had not said. His mental look-out was not satisfactory.

Neither he nor Mr. Wilkins were in good-humor with the world in general in general next time, and it needs little in such cases to condense and turn the lowering tempers into one particular direction. At dinner, as Ellinor was still absent, staid in the dining-room a sort of moody peace had been kept up, the ladies talking incessantly to each other across the vista of silence and their daily life, with an instinctive consciousness that if they did not chatter on something would be said by one of the gentlemen which would be distasteful to the other.

As soon as Ralph had shut the door behind them Mr. Wilkins, who went to the window, and took out a bottle which had not previously made its appearance.

"Have a little Cognac?" asked he, with an assumption of carelessness, as he poured out a wine-glassful. "It's a capital thing for the stomach; and this nasty bowling we have had given me a racking headache all day."

"I am sorry for it," said Ralph, "for I had wanted particularly to speak to you about business—about my marriage, in fact."

"Well! speak away; I'm as clear-headed as any man, if that's what you mean!"

Ralph bowed, a little contemptuously.

"What I wanted to say is that I am anxious to have all things arranged for my marriage in August. Ellinor is so much better now; in fact, so long that I think we may reckon upon her standing the change to a London life pretty well."

Mr. Wilkins stared at him rather blankly, but did not immediately speak.

"Of course I may have the deeds drawn up in which, as I understand, you propose to advance a certain portion of Ellinor's fortune for the purposes therein to be assigned; as we settled her years ago, when I hoped to have married in August?"

A thought flitted through Mr. Wilkins's confused brain that he should find it impossible to produce the thousands required without having recourse to the money-lenders, with ruinously high discounts, and of swearing him usurious interest for the advances they had lately made; and he would have tried to obtain a diminution in the sum he had originally proposed to give Ellinor. "Unwisely," because he might have read Ralph's character better than to suppose he would easily consent to any diminution without good and sufficient reason being given, or without some promise of compensating advantage in the future for the present sacrifice asked from him. But perhaps Mr. Wilkins, dulled as he was by drink, thought he could display a good self-sufficient reason, for he said:

"You must not be hard upon me, Ralph. That property was made before—before I exactly knew the state of my affairs."

"Before Dunster's disappearance, in fact," said Mr. Corbet, fixing his steady penetrating eyes on Mr. Wilkins's countenance.

"Yes—exactly—before Dunster's—" mumbled out Mr. Wilkins, red and confused, and not finishing his sentence.

"By-the-way," said Ralph—(for with careful carelessness of manner he thought he could extract something of the real nature of the impending disgrace from his companion in the state in which he then was; and if he only knew more about this danger he could guard against it; stand others—perhaps himself)—"By-the-way, have you ever heard any thing of Dunster since he went off to America? Isn't it thought?"

He was startled beyond his power of self-control by the instantaneous change in Mr. Wilkins which his question produced. Both started up; Mr. Wilkins white, shaking, and trying to say something, but unable to form a sensible sentence.

"Good God! Sir, what is the matter?" said Ralph, alarmed at these signs of physical suffering.

Mr. Wilkins sat down, and repelled his nearer approach without speaking.

"It is nothing, only this headache which shoots through me at times. Don't look at me, Sir, in that way; it is very unpleasant. Can I tell you, to find another man's eyes perpetually fixed upon you."

"I beg your pardon," said Ralph, coldly; his short-lived sympathy, thus repulsed, giving way to his curiosity. But he waited for a minute or two without daring to renew the conversation at the point where they had stopped: whether interrupted by bodily or mental discomfort on the part of his companion, he was not quite sure. While he hesitated how to begin again on the subject, Mr. Wilkins pulled the bottle of brandy to himself and filled his glass again, tossing off the spirit as if it had been water. Then he tried to look Mr. Corbet full in the face, with a stare as pertinacious as he could make it, but very different from the keen observant gaze which was trying to read him through.

"What were we talking about?" said Ralph, at length, with the most natural air in the world, just as if he had really been forgetful of some half-discussed subject of interest.

"Of what you'd a d—d deal better hold your tongue about," growled out Mr. Wilkins, in a surly, thick voice.

"Sir!" said Ralph, starting to his feet with great passion at being so addressed by "Wilkins the attorney."

"Yes," continued the latter, "I'll manage my own affairs, and allow of no meddling and no questioning. I said so once before, and I was not minded, and had cause of it; and now I say it again. And if you're to come here with such impertinent questions, and stare at me as you've been doing this half hour past, why, the sooner you leave this house the better!"

Ralph half turned to take him at his word, and go at once; but then he "gave Ellinor another chance," and resolved in his heart-of-hearts, but I was in no spirit of conciliation that he said,

"You've taken too much of that stuff, Sir, and you don't know what you're saying. I'll not do it. I should leave your house at once, and never to return."

"You think so, do you?" said Mr. Wilkins, trying to stand up and look dignified and sober. "I say, Sir, that if you ever venture again to talk and look as you have done to-night, why, Sir, I will ring the bell and have you shown the door by my servants. So now you've made my fine fellow!" He sat down, laughing a foolish, tipsy laugh of triumph. In another minute his arm was on the mantel-piece, and his head forward as we as strangers to each other. As to Ellinor"—his tones softened a little, and he sighed in spite of himself—"I do not think we should have been happy. I believe our engagement was formed when we were too young to know our own minds, but I would have done my duty and kept to my word; but you, Sir, have yourself severed the connection between us by your insulting conduct. I, to be turned out of your house by your servants!—I, a Corbet of Weasley, who would not submit to such threats from a peer of the realm, let him live or ever so drunk!" He was out of the room, almost out of the house, before he had spoken the last word. Mr. Wilkins sat still, first fiercely angry, then astonished, and lastly dismayed into sobriety.

"Come, Corbet! Ralph!" he called in vain; then he got up and went to the door, opened it, looked into the fully-lighted hall; all was so quiet therein that he could hear the voices of some of the women in the drawing-room talking together. He thought for a moment, and went to the hat-stand, and missed Ralph's low-crowned straw hat.

Then he went back and sat down once more in the drawing-room, and endeavored to make out exactly what had passed; but he could not believe that Mr. Corbet had come to any ordering for food and wine to break off the engagement, and he had almost reasoned himself back into his former state of indignation at impertinence and injury when Ellinor came in, pale, hurried, and anxious.

"Papa! what does this mean?" said she, putting as many notes into his hand. He took up his glasses, but his hand shook so that he could hardly read. The note was from the parsonage to Ellinor only three lines and a half. The old servant, who had come to fetch Mr. Corbet's things. He had written three lines with some consideration for Ellinor, even when he was in his first flush of anger against her father, and it must be considered of relief as being the first distraught about by the act of another, and not of his own working out, which partly saved his conscience. The note ran thus:

"DEAR ELLINOR,—Words have passed between your father and me which have obliged me to leave his house; I fear never to return to it. I will write more fully to-morrow. But do not grieve too much, for I am not, and never have been good enough for you. God bless you, dear, dear Nelly, though I call you so for the last time.—R. C."

"Papa, what is it?" Ellinor cried, clasping her hands together, as her father still sat silent, vacantly gazing into the fire, after finishing the note.

"I don't know!" said he, looking up at her, piteously; "it's the world, I think. Everything goes wrong with me and mine; it went wrong before THAT night—so it can't be that, can it, Ellinor?"

"Oh, papa!" said she, kneeling down by him, her arms round his neck, her face hidden on his breast.

He put one arm languidly round her. "I used to read of Orestes and the Furies at Eton when I was a boy, and I thought it was all a heathen fiction. Poor little motherless girl!" said he, laying his other hand on her head, with the caressing gesture he had been accustomed to use when she had been a little child. "Did you love him so very dearly, Nelly?" he whispered, his cheek against hers. A confession of love he has not seemed to me to be good enough for thee. I am sure he has got an inkling that something has gone wrong; and he was very inquisitive—I may say, he questioned me in a relentless kind of way."

"Oh, papa, it was my doing, I am afraid. I said something long ago about possible disgrace."

He pushed her away; he stood up and looked at her with the eyes disdain, of misery, and in fierceness, of an animal at bay; he did not heed that his abrupt movement had almost thrown her prostrate on the ground.

"You, Ellinor! You—you—"

"Oh, darling father, listen!" said she, creeping to his knees, and clinging round him with her hands. "I said it as if it were a possible case of some one else—last August—but he immediately applied it to me, and asked me if it was over me the disgrace, or shame—I forget the words I used—hung; and what could I say?"

"Any thing, any thing, to put him off the scent. God help me, I am a lost man, betrayed by my child!"

Ellinor let go of his knees and covered her face. Every one stabbed at that poor heart. In a minute or so her father spoke again:

"I don't mean what I say, Ellen don't mean it now. Ellinor, you must forgive me, my child!" He stooped and lifted her up, and was down, taking her on his knee, and smoothing her hair off her hot forehead. "Remember, child, how very miserable I am, and how miserable I shall be if you don't forgive me, and yet he must have seen I had been drinking."

"Drinking, papa?" said Ellinor, raising her head, and looking at him with sorrowful surprise.

"Yes. I drink now to try and forget," said he, blushing and confused.

"Oh, how miserable we are!" cried Ellinor, bursting into tears—"how miserable! It seems almost as if God had forgotten to comfort us!"

"Hush, hush!" said he. "Your mother said once she did so pray that you might grow up religious; you must be religious, child, because she prayed for it. And I—I am very, very glad I am that you are dead!" Here he began to cry like a child. Ellinor comforted him with kisses rather than words. "Let me alone, child," after a while, and said, sharply, "How much does he know? I must make sure of that. How much did you tell him?"

"Nothing—nothing, indeed, papa, but what I told you just now!"

"Tell it me again—the exact words!"

"I will, as well as I can; but it was last August. I only said, 'Was it right for a woman to marry, knowing that disgrace hung over her, and keeping her lover in ignorance of it?'"

"That was all, you are sure?"

"Yes. He immediately applied the case to me—to ourselves."

"And you never wanted to know what was the nature of the threatened disgrace?"

"Yes, he did."

"And you told him?"

"No, not a word more. He referred to the subject again to-day in the shrubbery, but I told him nothing more. You quite believe me, don't you, papa?"

He pressed her to him, but did not speak. Then he took her head between his hands and it will as much care and attention as he could collect in his agitated state of mind.

"Nelly," said he, at length, "he says true he is not good enough for thee. He shrinks from the thought of the disgrace. Thou must stand alone, and bear the sins of thy father."

He shook so much as he said this that Ellinor had to put any suffering of her own on one side, and try to comfort him. Gradually the thought of getting her father immediately up to bed. She sat by him till he went to sleep and she could leave him, and go to her own room, to forget fulness and rest, if she could find those priceless blessings

TIM BLANEY'S COURTSHIP.

TIM BLANEY was fireman in a large hotel. From 6 o'clock in the morning till late in night he knew little of life excepting as reflected from a coal grate and dinned into his ears by the heavy growling bass of Boniface, who was every inch a part of the house, signified that Mrs. So-and-So's fire, up in the fourth story, needed poking, or Mrs. Somebody else, in the farthest wing, wanted a few cinders on hers.

He was a little man, evidently having spent the five-and-thirty years of his existence in the midst otherwise than in adding to his own dimensions. Whether bread-and-butter was too scarce in his growing days, or whether it felt an instinctive feeble reluctance to being converted into Irish bone and sinew, the result was the same, and Tim remained at the stature of a boy of twelve.

He was never seen excepting as attended by a coal-hod, and I question if he even did not eat and sleep surrounded by the signs of his calling. His face as well as his hands and clothes were always grimy with soot and coal-dust; and altogether he looked, with his comical figure and twinkling eyes, like some burrowing creature just unearthed.

That he was more than an intelligent, cultivated woodchuck, or a highly-trained and tractable dwarf gorilla, was evident by the fact of his possessing a thumb, which, according to Dr. Kirk, is the distinguishing feature and decisive test of manhood.

He was, therefore, indubitably a human being, like the rest of us, capable of culture and infinite development, which he had as yet received in a very limited degree. That he was a being with a depth of generous warm-heartedness and unruffled good-nature was not to be questioned. You might know that by the way he patted down the coals in the grate with a kind of dumb caress, as though he put the children to bed, analytic, after the fire place in the mineral kingdom was giving its recognition; or, what was more likely, as though he felt an affectionate tendency out toward the companion of his toils and object of his cares. You might know it too by his cheery "good-morning," as sprightly as the chirp of a little brown snowbird coming out after a winter storm to find what blessing returning sunshine might have brought down. He showed it also, even in the little act of tugging his heavy hods around old Lion, the shaggy watch-dog, not to put him to the trouble of barking.

Notwithstanding, you would sooner look to see the tongs make love to the shovel, and the fender propose to the grate, than that smutty little Tim should presume to feel a glow of the sentiment by which much purer natures are inspired.

We might, with a great stretch of fancy, imagine, remembering the story of Beauty and the Beast, that a drop-scene in the water in the coffee-drinking-trough is capable of mirroring the stars, thus one of the fair-faced, sweet-voiced ladies in the house would, some moonlight night, have her dazzled him with the brightness of her shining, as the unshaded sun does the sharpest, strongest eyes of an old gray-headed man in the belief of gazing at it. It might possibly be that he, in blind unconsciousness, could feel, at his low level, the beauty and the grace of the waving locks and the hearts of men high up on the ladder of birth and breeding; and so come to find a double willingness and attractiveness in his work, in his cheery, unbent understanding why, a flash of pride and joy when she spoke to him, or when his foot touched the spot of carpet where she had moved.

Such things have been and may be again, but Tim fell a victim to no such delicate and enchanting moment.

Neither did his affections, as was more probable, wander toward some one of the trim, red-cheeked maid-servants who were enjoying his future tranquillity—nor in the direction of the fat pastrycooks or the frouzy laundresses.

Oh no! Tim's affections, so much greater and stronger than his head, went down instead of up to the cook in the kitchen, as he did full in love, and with the sorriest piece of womanhood one could ever think to exist among the honest poor.

This unhappy girl had fevered to money above her level, was called Cat Green. Not that her mother named her so; her real name, if she ever had one, was probably buried somewhere, and forgotten as the story of the mysterious Western mounds and the history of the old mill at Newport.

Cat had probably been born beneath a hedge, been born into the world, nobody had felt at liberty, seeing no sufficient occasion, to send her out of it; and therefore, very injudiciously, was left to lay kitchened extinguished, her sides thin, and her face rough and coarse, she slinks about as though quite ashamed of her forced existence.

Thus also should Cat have been—a quiet, appropriate filling-out of some simple domestic economy, had she been left to it when she was not. Her nature, kindly and loving, had been repressed and thwarted by pain and misery, and still not much but the animal life looked from the dull eyes, and showed in the unattractive figure.

But she was a woman, a mere beast after all; she had a thumb, and could write her name by the help of it, and even make a shift at spelling out a little in easy words.

Occasionally she came to the hotel where Tim built fires to get washing to do, which she did in Bridget Jolan's kitchen over her sink. Then she was above her strength, without being equal to her necessities; yet so low down was she that any hope of better could not enter her mind, or know how unless it was that she sometimes considered if she was rich enough to own a tub she shouldn't have to pay for the use of Bridget's, besides having the first right to its use, and maybe money coming in from somebody for the hire of it.

Happening to be in the scrub-gi-wai was wanted to clean the floors and stairs at the hotel, Cat was employed for an hour every morning; and thus the romance and history of Tim's love commenced.

Tim saw her, of course, as he patted up and down with his hods; and, of course, pitied her. Those face and eyes were such as would have pitied any an overladen horse.

Cat had a cough, as was natural she should have with no feet and scanty clothing; and Tim wished he had some hot drops for her. Thus the romance of Tim's love-life commenced. Tim thought of her the more he pitied her; and the more he pitied her the more he thought of her.

It is a big answer for a stout chap like me to be slaping in a tid ivery night, and ateing my dinner like a torn lord, while that poor crayter has nayther the one nor the other?" cogitated he, puzzled how to right this existing wrong.

"If some gintleman would be giving me his garden to tend, and a couple of cows with maybe a horse to look after, that might do her and me; I've always heerd two can kape themselves cheaper than one," he soliloquized at last, in the height of his perplexity and from the depth of his generosity.

After the idea had once found a resting-place in his thoughts it grounded itself there, and became more and more settled. So while Cat coughed and scrubbed away, quite unconscious, Tim had established in his own mind entire claim and guardianship of her; and she was therefore already growing comely in his eyes. This state of things might have gone on indefinitely, but suddenly Cat failed to appear, and Tim was nothing of her for a week, by which time he was quite uneasy, and so absent-minded that he left Mrs. Balquidder's blower up full three minutes too long, thus greatly exercising the temper of that lady.

At the end of the week Cat came again, coughing much worse than ever—and still more ragged.

Tim gave one look at her; then, filled with selfreproach, trotted off to the landlord.

"If you please, Sir," said he, "I'm like to be married, and it's me discharge I'll be after having, may it plase you," said he.

"Married, are you? But what if I don't plase?" returned the landlord.

"Sure and it's not yerself will be so cruel, Sir. I'm sure the missus will not be after her the poor crayter needs; it is indade, Sir!" replied Tim, beseechingly.

"But it is for only a month longer you are engaged; can't you stay that out?"

"Indade and I'm thinking the cough will kill her before the month is up, Sir; and I could niver look mesilf in the face again if I left her to die," said Tim, fairly crying.

"But what can you do to take care of a wife? You can't keep yourself in whole clothes. How do you expect to keep her?" asked the landlord, who was so hard-hearted as to recollect that tears would not buy coal at eleven dollars a ton.

"Indade and it is mysilf I thought maybe would give me some jobs among the porters till I could look about a bit. I'm a dale stronger than I looks to be, Sir."

The absurdity of Tim aspiring to the holy sacrament of marriage so tickled the landlord's fancy that he could scarcely forbear to laugh outright, and give Tim some odd jobs of work till he could do better. So the next morning, after the round of the building fires was made, he sent for Tim, and paying him the accumulations of his earnings for the winter, which was twelves dollars, told him the situation he had made; giving him the day to himself, and directing him to be on hand early for what work he might have on the morrow.

Tim went upstairs inarticulately, ducked his little black head, and trotted off to find Cat, chuckling the while with delight at the success of his benevolent scheme.

The bride-cleat was on her knees scrubbing off the last stair.

"Come, Cad! get through with yere washing as quick as iver ye can, for I'm going to marry ye this blissed morning!" said Tim, abruptly.

Cad looked up with as much astonishment as her lustreless eyes, so unused to expressing emotion, were capable of. Tim, with the full sense of his own generous intentions, it was not strange that she stared and opened her mouth wider than was lovely in a young girl, but not in Cat Green.

Her comprehension was dull and darkened, and her ideas few; yet there lurked among her limited perceptions the faintest impression, common to most girls, that marriage means something better and freer than the present life; so Cad was not averse to accepting Tim's novel and unexpected offer when she fairly understood it. For her it brought indeed the emancipation which so many girls long for.

"We will make baste for the prasts at once," said Tim, and Cad decided Cad's life was not unbearable and come legally under his protection.

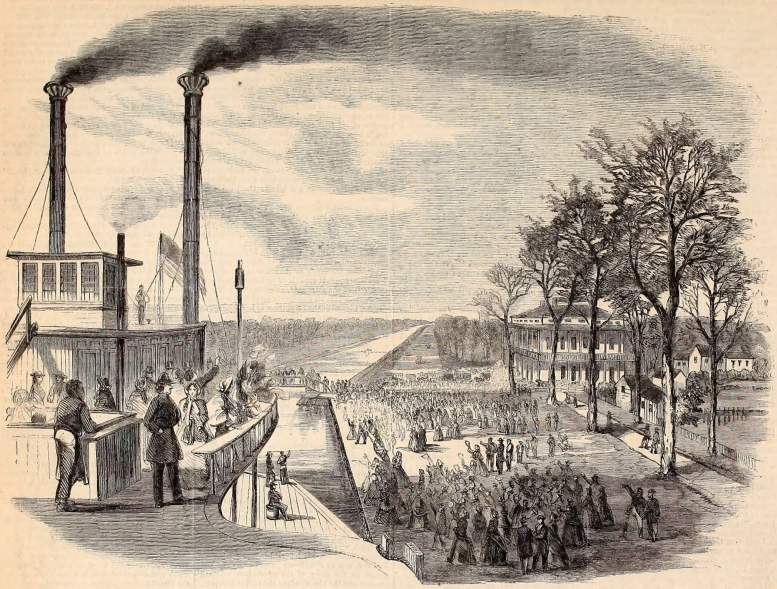
But the girl, with some dim notion of the finery beneath her notice, looked at her tattered, splashed-up gown, drew back, and said,

"I ain't fit; I'm too nasty!"

"Don't ye be thinking of such as that; I'll get ye a gowud since," said the bridegroom, cheerily, as he led the way, drawing Cad by the force of his will after him, as a tug draws a ship unwillingly.

The simple, ragged pair trudged first to the city clerk for a license; then to the priest's, where they were speedily made one flesh, according to the service.

Then Tim's honeymoon commenced, and here it ended; but not so the moon which followed. Tim of course had no accommodation for his wife, who was raised in a factory in a large village outside the great city, got him the place of fireman there after three months.



Wages were better, as well as the air, and in time Tim went to housekeeping in a cabin with a garden and the store-pigs common to building the roof, as independent as any landholder.

Such a sight as dandlions and daisies were to Cad, who had never seen anything in the city limits before! And so proud as she was of her home, her husband, and her housewifery!

The improvement effected in the way of food might have been more savory and toothsome, but Delmonico's dainties never meet with a more satisfied and delighted appreciation than Tim gave them; while, in the light and warmth of his praises and affection, Cad improved in many not only in domestic accomplishments, but in person.

The pinched, hungry look faded out from her face, and there came at length some degree of intelligence into it, with an abundance of faithful devotion and admiration for her Tim, which last quality he had always had in large measure.

Then Cad beamed a grateful smile upon him, and went about her duties as happy and as proud a wife as any since the days of Eve.

DEPARTURE OF REGISTERED ENEMIES OF THE UNITED STATES FROM FORT HICKOK, TO MADISONVILLE, LA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

LANDING OF REGISTERED ENEMIES OF THE UNITED STATES AT MADISONVILLE, LA., FEBRUARY 2, 1863.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

AFFAIRS IN NEW ORLEANS.

Our special correspondent, Mr. Hamilton, keeps us supplied with illustrations of affairs in General Banks's Department. We reproduce some of them herewith. The cuts on the opposite page illustrate the

RETURN OF REGISTERED ENEMIES TO DIXIE.

Mr. Hamilton writes:

After about half an hour's ride, by railway, from New Orleans, we arrived at Port Hickok, on the south shore of Lake Pontchartrain, where the Lake House is situated, at the end of the famous shell-road, the "Bloomingdale" of New Orleans. The scene presented here was really very striking and beautiful. The day was bright and lovely; hundreds of people—a large proportion of them gayly-dressed ladies—had collected there, some to leave for Dixie, and others to say farewell to those who were going. The J. D. Brown was there, rolling out its dense volumes of smoke, and an immense array of vehicles of all sorts were congregated. In the balconies, on the bridge, and in the large white space in front of the Lake House, the whole place was swarming.

This was the second trip of the kind, and, owing to its having been discovered that the first had been used as a means for smuggling goods into Secessia, the authorities had caused it to be published in the papers that every body—ladies included—would undergo a rigid search. This caused no little flutter and excitement among the crinoline.

They were ushered into a separate room, where ladies of high respectability were employed to conduct the necessary investigation. I saw many a pretty pair of rosy lips curved, pouting dreadfully at having been obliged to prove whether her plump little figure owed all its sweetness to the gifts of nature, or to sundry packages of bitter quinine stuffed artfully about her; and whether in that cunning little envelope, so stealthily concealed in her bosom, the balls alluded to meant fancy balls or cannon-balls. I heard some very angry comments made upon their searching "even the stockings of children;" but this was very natural, for a vast amount of knowledge about infantry can be conveyed by a small slip of paper in a baby's stocking.

When we had all got on board the J. D. Brown, at about 10 A.M., and she began to move off, the scene was really picturesque and exciting. Such a waving of handkerchiefs, red and white scarfs, and other secesh emblems—such adieux and kissing of hands—I never saw before. I noticed some few weeping on the shore; but the general feeling, both on board and on land, was one wild, open, defiant outburst of disloyalty, in which no check whatever was put upon expressions for the rebel Government, though in the hearing of our own officers.

"Feel humiliated?" shouted one female from the shore.

"No, indeed!" scornfully replied a fair one near me at the bulwarks.

"That's right, dear; never say that word."

"I've seen him, dear; you'll be comfortable enough," screams another in the crowd.

"Who?" asks the lady on board as addressed.

"Colonel Clark,* to be sure. Who else did you think?"

"Give my love to all our friends, Mary," cries an old lady.

"Yes, ma; I'm going to give my love to every body and every thing I meet."

So they went on, running along a steep slip of land to keep pace with the boat, about a hundred of them, ladies and all, scrambling through the mud, until the land coming to an abrupt stop, they could go no farther; and they gave a parting cheer as we got out of the basin on the broad surface of the lake.

We steered due north, right across Lake Pontchartrain, and, entering the small Chefuncteer River or Bayou, got up to the little village called Madisonville about noon. Here we saw the Stars and Bars flying, and the place in command of Lieutenant M. Cassard. Madisonville is very picturesque, the shore being covered with fine live-oak trees, whose enormous gnarled trunks and twisted roots look as if they have been defying the storms of centuries.

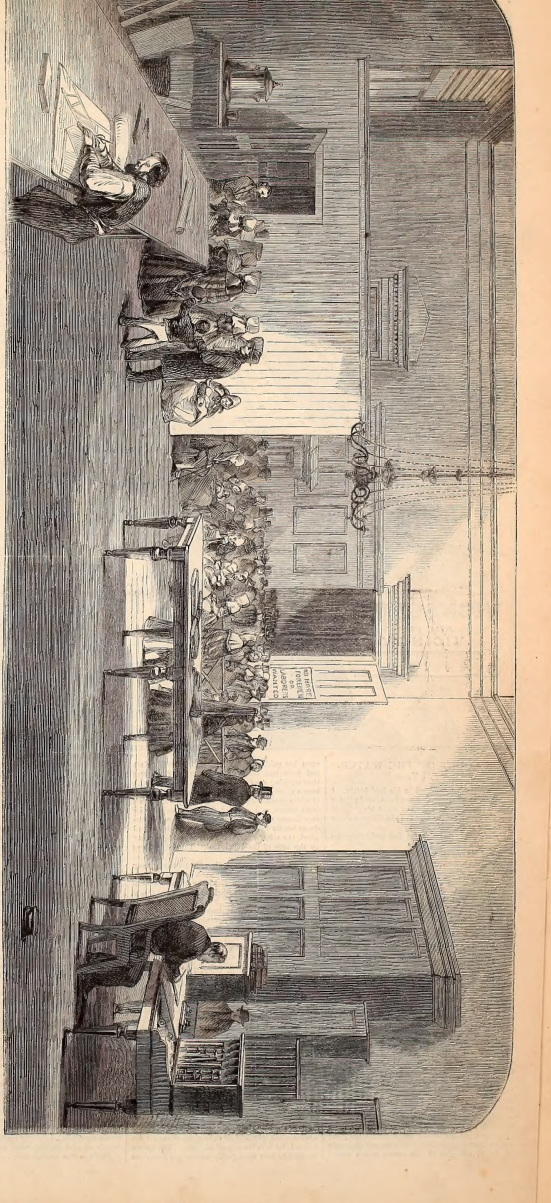
The enthusiasm and excitement of friends and relatives meeting were, of course, only a counterpart of what we had just seen at starting. We went ashore, but did not remain more than an hour. There was little information of any value to be obtained, beyond the fact that they were suffering much for many of the necessaries of life. Still, on the surface, there was no outward show of wretchedness.

On this page we give an illustration of

THE POOR OF NEW ORLEANS.

There are few questions of greater importance at present engaging the attention of General Banks than how to find food and employment for the 50,000 poor of New Orleans.

Previous to the change of administration in that city, General Butler had adopted a very simple and summary mode of overcoming this difficulty, which he often said outweighed all the other duties of his administration. He merely levied a per-centage upon the contributions which the rich secessionists of New Orleans had subscribed toward the rebellion, thus compelling them to alleviate the very misery they had caused.



Having thus raised the necessary funds, he issued his famous Special Order No. 244, authorizing the City Surveyor, Colonel T. B. Thorpe, to employ not less than 1000 workmen upon the streets, levees, canals, etc., married men with families to be always preferred, and such one to have the oath of allegiance in his pocket. By this admirable process, 30,000 people were weekly relieved, at an average cost (for labor and rations) of $28,000 per week; $10,000 for labor only, and $18,000 for provisions. Out of this large number of people only 1400 were really residents of the North; the remainder being foreigners or citizens of Louisiana and other Southern States, and over 5000 of these were women (old and young) who had openly acknowledged themselves to be the mothers and wives of Confederate soldiers in actual war against us!

As soon as General Banks arrived this policy was changed; the works on the streets were immediately suspended, the following week on canals, and by the commencement of February the whole had ceased.

The result of this was immediately felt. Hundreds of men of all ages and conditions collected every day round the City Hall, from morning till night, vainly imploring employment. In the interior of the building the scene was no less painful. Then the crowds perpetually besieged the powerless City Surveyor, and it was in vain he assured them that he had no longer the means of giving them aid or employment. Mothers came there with babes in their arms, tottering old men were there also, and also many a poor lady who—until this dreadful war broke out—had homes of comfort if not of luxury. It is one of these scenes in the City Surveyor's office which our artist has made the subject of his illustration.

We are glad to find, however, by our latest advices from New Orleans, that this serious state of affairs, if not completely removed, is now undergoing a change. The poor workmen, unable to hold out any longer, petitioned General Banks, who received them very kindly and promised to do all he could to assist them. He has taken steps to have 1400 men employed upon the Government works—a measure that will go far toward removing a source of evil that was really becoming quite alarming.

* General Banks's Chief of Staff, who was on board, and represented in the fore ground of our sketch.—Ed.

THE COURT OF THE WATER-LILY.

Poon Robert was killed in his first battle. I felt sure that he would be when he enlisted; but it would have made no difference about his going if he could have read his doom in the Records above before he put down his name.

My sister Lucy sent me to find and bring him home.

One of his comrades showed me the spot where he found him when the search for dead and wounded began. The poor fellow had crept out of the great highway of battle (leaving a bloody track behind him, to show where he fell), into a corner, and lay there peacefully asleep, with his cheek pillowed upon a little clover-clump. "There had been little pain in his death," the soldier said; "his face was calm and quiet. I buried him near where he fell. Here!" Marking the place where he was laid, I rode back for permission and assistance in disinterring the body.

As I crossed a bright little stream, which widened away to sedges on its farther side, I loosened my horse's rein that he might drink. I had lingered so long that the full moon was shining brightly, and the air was redolent of forest odors distilled by the dewy night; and feeling confidence in my good steed, I "hoppled" him and let him graze, while I asked in the summer moonlight.

There was a great commotion going on in the stream.

Slowly out of its crystal depths rose a green, foam-crested wave, dashing itself upon the grassy bank, where it remained fixed—no longer a wave merely, but a stately throne of the purest emerald, carpeted with downy foam, and canopied with an inverted water-lily. Up in the snowy dome the many golden stamens trembled ringly rang out with melodious chime the hour of midnight; and a being, fairer than mortal tongue could tell, arose from the sparkling stream and ascended the royal dais. Gems of water, brighter than any diamonds of Earth, sparkled in the crown which rested upon her golden curls; and while her tiny face and form had much of regal grace, there was that winning smile of tender love which won the hearts of all who saw her. Her coronation robes, of white velvet relieved with green, swept the rich foam carpet, and mingled their softness with its own downy texture. One hand and arm of wondrous beauty held the sceptre of moonlight-colored pearl, the other extended itself in snowy beauty on the arm of the royal seat. The Lily Queen waited to hail her court.

There was a pause, and then the tiny bells rung a merry chime. Swiftly the summons was obeyed, and the air was tremulous with the flutter of many-colored wings and the rustle of the feet of insect steeds upon the grass.

From far and wide regions they came—Rose, Lily, Tulip, Heliotrope, Geraniums and Fuschias, Cacti and Thistles, Violets, Orange-buds, and a countless host of others.

Now who could not guess that the stiff Court Chamberlain, in his many-colored robes and palegreen trousers, was a Tulip on ordinary occasions? or mistake the Rose, with her blushing cheeks and regal port, her sweet odor and magnificent attire, for any but her own lovely self? or that fair band of sisters, who, arrayed more gorgeously "than Solomon in all his glory" disposed themselves about their royal cousin? A shade of anxiety rested on each tiny face, for the Emerald Crown would be awarded to-night, and there was a flutter of expectation among all who had come to strive for the prize, for every blossom that loves the sun or seeks the shade, that blooms by day or weeps at night, bowed its dew-gemmed head before the throne.

The Honey-suckle herald sounded his bugle. The ushers of the Golden Rod marshaled the brilliant crowd, and the royal proclamation went forth.

"Oyez! oyez! oyez! All true and loyal subjects of the Lily Queen are to be given speech and audience to-night, and all evil spirits of the air are banned, for it is the eve of St. John. The Queen would fain hear what goodly service had been done to men by her subjects, to comfort those who have so tenderly cared for us. Oyez! oyez!"

"Fair sister," said the Queen, as the Rose bent low before her, "thou art a queen, like ourself, in other lands; therefore speak first. Or hast thou idled, listening to the song of thine own nightingale?"

The Rose blushed to the edge of her crimson robe. "Even had I such idle thoughts as your Majesty implies, my nightingale is far over the seas, and mine has been too varied a duty to spare time for lighter-love songs. Time will not suffice to tell how often I have cheered the sick-room; or how I have blanched my cheek that it should be a fit companion for the wearer dead, on whose chilly breast they laid me to sleep. And how, borne in fair ladies' hands, I have heard the gay rattle of the ballroom; or, decking the walls of the brilliant salon, I have trembled to the throbbing waltz. I come now with no such idle tale; though I come, indeed, from such scenes. I was borne to-night in a hand —a fair one, too—whose touch should have withered me, for it was hot with treason. I felt a billet placed in my green arms, and I felt that secrets were intrusted to my keeping. I raised my eyes—made, as your Majesty knows, of the lens of the eye of a lightning-bug—and saw, oh, horror! a map of the Union defenses, a list of the Union forces, and a perfect transcript of the Union plans for the next campaign! She let the rebel spy, in the guise of a gallant, attend her to her carriage, and suffered him to keep the flowers—as if they had been a tender love-token, instead of bitter treachery!"

"You but discovered the treason, good sister," replied the Queen, sadly. "You had no power to prevent the consequences. Worthier service than this must deserve the royal guerdon, much as it grieves us to say it."

"Ho! ho! ho!" sounded a goblin laugh close beside me, and I dimly discerned an eerie shape cowering dimly and darkly behind the willow clump near me. I felt the pestilential odor of his breath as of a charnel house as he growled out, "That's a true enough story. The Confederates have got it all safe by this time. I saw to that. The whole of it isn't bigger than a silver quarter, if I haven't forgotten the size of one."

And his rattling laugh sounded like thin ice crackling under the skater's heel.

The purple Heliotrope, leaning on the arm of her faithful Geranium, had a little story, not a new one, to tell. There have been such tales ever since young people found that flowers could tell of gentle hopes easier than lips. The fair Queen smiled, and the goblin shape hissed out a sneer.

The Geraniums fluttered their fans, and spoke much of the delights of gay society, and the select circles in which they moved. In turn they were chilled with the icy hauteur of the snowy Camelia, who, scarcely bending her head, and vouchsafing not a word, swept past the fragrant but parvenue throng.

There were pure white flowers in crowds, and side by side with them I saw a Blue Violet from the garden of a crippled child. There was a Scarlet Bean, grown in a window-box, from a poor tenement house, in New York, side by side with the light-blooming Cereus from the great hothouse. The Mistletoe, in the guise of a white-haired gentleman of the old school, violently ogled the blushing Holly, who appeared in a rich green satin, tastefully ornamented with coral, while Miss did not in the least resent the liberty, but was evidently pleased with her ancient friend. The demure Lavender, in the character of a pretty German chamber-maid, was covertly carrying on a flirtation with a tall and slender Sweet Clover, who was trying to assist her in her passage through the crowd. The Sweet-Pea, looking for all the world like one's own pretty country cousin, clung for support to the Purple Lilac, who, in the similitude of a rustic schoolmaster, took the best care of her that he could. This pair, being in turn severely snubbed by his cousin, the White Lilac, who, having lately been promoted at the court of Eugénie, gave herself immense airs in consequence. The Crimson Peony, who was accompanied by her contemptive sister, was severely injured by the rudeness of a Prickly Pear, who had nearly destroyed her best rod satin gown on his spurs.

"The less I see of men the better I like them," was his uncourteous address to the Queen. "Let us alone and we do no harm; but woe to him who tramples on my rights!" And he swung his reliow cap defiantly, and actually put it on his head.

It being evident that he had partaken too freely of the private bottle of ayuardiente which it was known he was in the habit of carrying, the Grand Chamberlain signed to two stout Scotch Thistles, who guarded the throne with fixed bayonets, to remove him. He struggled violently, but the stout Highlanders carried him to a distance and gave him a severe ducking, which, being at variance with his usual habits, effectually cooled his impudence.

"There was small chance for an argument then —bayonets against spurs," I remarked to the shape.

"They had no right to meddle," growled the Dark One. "He had as good right to his spurs as they to bayonets. Let him alone, and there would have been no row."

I could but dimly discern his figure in the pale light, but I fancied I could see—no matter what kind of feet. He wore no boots, and had the C. S. A. buttons.

Now each fair plant and tender blossom had spoken a few words, and the Emerald crown had glittered and paled as each testimony was of greater or less valuable service; yet it still remained immovably fixed upon its velvet cushion.

Then the Herald sounded again on his fragrant bugle:

"Oyez! oyez! oyez! Inasmuch as the crown hath not been awarded to the Flowers, nor to all the green tribes who feed mankind, or comfort his heart with drink or drug, come forth, and declare what deed of signal service they have done! Let them now speak! Oyez! oyez! oyez!"

And now, to be sure, arose a tumult, as the motley crowd began to jostle toward the throne.

Here a portly dame, in flaming yellow gown and green gaiters, tried hard to push herself ahead of another, evidently of her own family, though of a more elegant shape.

"Don't push yourself airs, Miss Squashblossom," she panted; "you're no better'n what I be, if you ain't quite so big!"

"Do, ma'am, you yourself airs, Miss Squashblossom," she panted; "you're no better'n what I be, if you ain't quite so big!"

"Don't push yourself, you lumbering porpoise!" roared out a sturdy Potato. "It's enough to bring the tears to my eyes to tramp on a fellow's corns at that rate!"

"I shall certainly cry in two minutes!" moaned the poor Onion, who was getting the worst of it, as the crowd pushed her on one side.

"I shall certainly exhale in this vulgar jam!" sighed the Tobacco.

"Don't you exhale yourself, Cousin Tobacco!" growled a Tomato vine. "I wonder which of us smells the worst, or is hardest to learn to like at first, you or I—hey?"

"Ah me!" sighed the Poppy, to her gallant cousin, Cannabis Indica, "would I were at home in my native East. Late hours were always much for me!"

"There will be merry work ere long," whispered the Hazseed, leaning across to a Shamrock, who covertly fingered his shillalah a little on one side.

"Ay, wait a bit!" was the exulting answer; but the two, like those, knowing their characters, quietly dipped them a warning wink, and they relapsed into quiet.

"I will you just see the airs Cauliflower is taking on," whispered the Cabbage, as he bowled along with the Turnip on his arm, while the Cauliflower scornfully cut her ancient relative.

With much difficulty the Usher and the Royal Guards succeeded in arranging the order of presentation.

The Potato plead hard for the reward. She claimed she had fed more people, and "better ones," too, than any other vegetable on the ground, and she glanced appealingly toward the Shamrock, who quickly responded, "Throw for ye, darlint!"

The Pumpkin had unctuous tales of Thanksgiving to relate; but she and the Squash differed, as only relations can, and the two were quickly silenced. Then the Beans spoke out, with a strong New England accent, but were interrupted by Messrs. Dill, Fennel, and Carraway, who appeared in white chokers, and claimed to represent the ecclesiastical interests. "They had always been to mestin' reg'lar, and had assisted more by keepin' people awake than any other yarbs that grew."

"Hold on!" sputtered Peppermint; "don't talk about what you don't understand. If I don't sweet a white chicken I get to mestin' too, and every body knows I'm better for wind—"

"On the stomach, perhaps," sneered Tobacco. "When it rises to the brain, I am your humble servant then."

"There's some yarbs," mumbled old Sage, in her everlasting green fustian and dowdy blue ribbons—"there's some yarbs that has faculty, and some that hav'n't. Some kin take night hold, and cook and nuss like nothin', and some jest stan's 'round in the way. Now thyme, n Savory, 'n Marjoram—most as good's what I be at gettin' up Thanksgivin': but as for nussin'—"

"Jest shet up, granny!" cried Catnip and Pennyroyal; "what do you know about babies, for example? Lord! I've put more to sleep and saved 'em more span—"

"Now then, all of you," growled "Lobely," while the Cardinals actually turned pale with disgust.

"And what would you all do without me?" scornfully ejaculated Cinchona (Jesuit's Bark). "Shiver and burn! shiver and burn!"

"I 'm quite the opposite!" yelled Wormwood.

"Not a bit better than I," retorted Arnica.

"Take that, then!" And Arnica carried a black eye for a week.

"Whoop! Shillahs! never miss fire!" shouted the Shannon, joyously twirling his stick at the prospect of a general row; while the Grape broke out into "Sparkling and bright," and called vociferously for a song.

Then the Queen rose in her majesty. "Silence, ye insolents! Shall even our royal presence be invaded and insulted by such unseemly riots? Guards, do your duty. Herald, the crown moves not. Let the third call be sounded."

While our faithful friend was borne off, yelling vigorously, and consigned to a dungeon under a damp stone, at the imminent risk of a "cowld in his head," as he pathetically remonstrated with his guards, the Herald sounded the third summons.

"Oyez! oyez! oyez! Forasmuch as none others have joined the Emerald Crown, now late all grains and grasses and all way-side weeds now speak, if perchance they have deserved the royal guerdon! Oyez! oyez! Now let the fields and way-sides speak!"

Then, in tassels and wampum, gilded past me the Indian Corn; the stout Barley, with his belt full of barbs; the golden Wheat, with her generous smile; the trembling Oat, with her classic voice; the Rice, with her gleaming pearls; the Millets and Grasses, whose honest worth spoke for itself; and the luxurious Grass, in her sweet simplicity. There was the "modest crimson-tippit flower," the golden Dandelion, childhood's favorite blossom, the Scotch Gowan, and the Alpine Rose.

"I," said the Wheat, with a beaming smile, "I went to idle Lancashire, and heard the gaunt men and starving women solemnly whisper, 'God bless America!' and the wolf at their doors was not so hideous as the treason in the hearts of their richer neighbors. I feel the armies too."

I heard a low groan escape the dark shape which cowered beside me.

They went on with their testimony. How they fed starving Ireland; how the land smiled and glowed with thankfulness at the abundant harvest. All but one had spoken, yet the crown had not moved.

One little creature stood alone, in a pale crimson robe, with no fern-crown in her hair, no flower in her breath. Trembling she stood while the Lily Queen addressed her:

"Little one, friend Clover, hast thou no word to say? All have spoken but thee."

"Alas!" replied the little creature, "this so little I am ashamed—"

We ourself will judge of that; and perhaps thou hast good reason for coming unjeweled and unperfumed into our presence."

Then a redder flush came into the little lady's cheeks as she answered, in a low and broken voice,

"I grew in a lonely field-corner, O Queen! and never till yesterday had I seen the face of a man to serve. But then came the crash of muskets, the booming of cannon, and rattle of drums, and men met in dreadful rage, and many died, and others suffered so wildly that I was sure it would have been your Majesty's heart could you have heard them cry out for 'help' and 'water!'"

"Ho, ho, little one!" Queen Bella mused. "It was a great day! I was there!"

"I'll warrant you"! I thought, beginning to understand the character of my neighbor.

"One poor lad fell near me, and crawling out of the trench, left a bloody trail behind him, buried his poor face in my blossoms. I gave him my dew-crown to moisten his parched lips, and my perfume seemed to cool his dying breath.

The Queen and her ladies listened eagerly.

"And what then?" she demanded.

"Oh, that was sweet!" he murmured. 'That was like the cold spring by the granite ledge Lucy, I thought I felt your soft curls! Mother dear Lucy!' and so the sweetest of smiles came over his face as he died with that word. It was only my blossoms; but he thought it was his Lucy's curls. This, O Queen! is why I crown thus unjeweled before thee."

Then slowly the hitherto invisible wings unfolded, the Emerald Crown rose lightly in the air and gently settled down upon the little Clover blossom's blushing brow. Then the Herald blew a blast upon his bugle, and the Queen spoke:

"My loyal subjects have all done well, nobly, each in his own way, either of beauty or use. But know that whoever by the giving of his or her own life or substance shall cheer the death-couch of the Brave and True shall evermore deserve and receive the Emerald Crown."

Then, while the "horns of Elfland" all sounded the merry peal of revelry and dainty feasting, and the lily-bells rang their joyous peal, a low, shivering moan went up beside me, and a sigh, as of unutterable woe, escaped his anguished breast.

"Now I must go back to fire and darkness! There is no room for me!" The words of the forest serve them, and the Fays of Fairy-land are their friends. Despair!" A faint, unwholesome mist rose in the air, vanishing away, sighed, as it exhaled in the early morning.

There was a peculiar chill in the air, a pale light in the east, and the distant crow of a cock. Trusted the Fays were gone!

As the brilliant cloud of wings faded away I caught sight of the Shamrock, as, released from his damp dungeon, he laid his finger knowingly beside his nose and gave me a significant wink!

ADVERSEMENTS.

Just Published.

THE IRON FURNACE;

Or, Slavery and Secession.

Being Mr. Augher's Thrilling Narrative of his Outgoings, Imprisonment, and Escape from the Rebels.

Illustrated by
WILLIAM S & ALFRED MARTIEN.

Price, in paper cover, fifteen cents.

The Bird Work and Napkin Holder.

Heavily Gold and Silver Plated. Sold by Fancy Goods Dealers. Trade Circular sent free. ALLYN & PHELPS, Inventors & Manf., Dept 423 Broadway, N.Y.

TRUSSES.—Marsh's Radical Cure Truss Office, 2 Vesey street, Astor House. Also, at 3 Fulton street, and over sixty other Truss Offices of same name. A female attends ladies.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, Special Reserve, and Fancy Goods. Address SHAW & CO., Biddeford, Me.

Magic Pocket-Books for Postal Currency, with elastic bands. sent, post-paid, for 75 cents per doz. $7 per gross. Samples for 10 cts.
SNOW & HAGGOOD, 22 Court Street, Boston, Mass.

READER!—If you want employment, or the best Paper, Novelties and Selling Medicine ever manufactured send to ISAAC HALE, JR. & CO., Newburyport, Mass., for a sample terms of terms. A liberal salary, or commission, as the Agent may choose.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, and all Army and Navy Claims, promptly collected. Soldiers' information Blanks sent free. Claims negotiated upon the best terms, and accounts cashed. A pamphlet of Laws and Instructions sent by enclosing a one-cent stamp to pay postage.
SOMES & BROWN, 2 Park Place, N. Y.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machine.
S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

GOLD PENS retailing at wholesale prices. Send for circular. GEORGE F. HAWLEY, 64 Nassau St., N.Y.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Average Crop of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to acre.—only 30 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate.—26 acre tracts of from $10 to $50 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good schools and society. Hundreds are settling. Apply to ISAAC E. LANDIS, P. O., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rural, and free. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost ideal position, and suitable condition for thousand farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies $1000.—A fortune secured for $1. Address Box 217, Taunton, Mass.

10,000 Barrels of the Lodi Manufacturing Company's

P O U D R E T T E .

JAMES T. FOSTER, No. 66 Courtlandt St., New York.

This article, prepared from the night soil of the city of New York, is the CHEAPEST, BEST, and most POWERFUL FERTILIZER offered in market. It greatly increases the crop, and hastens the harvest from one to two weeks earlier, at an expense of from $3 to $4 per acre.

FORTY TUNS OF POUDRETTE to a FULL load, a mixture of bone and night soil, ground fine, at $45 per ton. A superior article of Bone Dust, $60 per ton.

A pamphlet containing direction, &c., may be had free. Address as above.
Agent for the Lodi Manufacturing Co., No. 66 Courtlandt St.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS

AND ARMS. Selphes Patent. 816 Broadway, N. Y., Opposite St. Nicholas Hotel. Send for a Circular.

Rheumatism—Who has it?

It has been conclusively acknowledged by thousands who have used them, that the Galvano Electric Metallic Insoles are the only remedy that can cure Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Gout, and all Nervous Affections. Sold by all druggists and shoe dealers throughout the U. S. Sent by mail for $1.25. Secured by English and American Patents. Send for a circular. METTAM & CO., 402 Broadway.

SOMETHING NEW.

NATIONAL AMERICAN AMUSEMENT CARDS. Colored for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Knave. 50 counted cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Three packs mailed free on receipt of One Dollar. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD MANUFACTORY,
14 Chambers Street, New York.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

WORTH $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches..... 60 00 each.
100 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 50 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches..... 15 00 each.
1000 Gold Vest Chains..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Pins..... 3 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gold Stone Set Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Jet Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Jet Mosaic and Lava Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Jet, and Pearl Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
5100 Gent's Breast Pins..... 2 00 to 8 00 each.
5100 Gent's Rings..... 2 00 to 8 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Gold Set Bosom Studs..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Medallions..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets..... 2 50 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension..... 3 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.

All Gold Pens 14 Carats and Warranted.

All of the above list of goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can be had for, are put in envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then have it at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions with us we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and one hundred for $15.

Agents.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to $2 or more. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great exertion should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State, in full.

Address
J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

WEDDING CARDS

These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Old Establishment, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane St., N. Y. Specimens and Estimates furnished by Mail, on receipt of Stamp.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT

WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Compound will force them to grow on the smoothest face or cranium in six weeks (upon the smallest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 209 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Fifth Street, Pittsburgh, Pa.

FOUNDED IN 1840.

INCORPORATED BY LEGISLATIVE CHARTER.
Being the only COMMERCIAL COLLEGE in the Union conducted by a

PRACTICAL MERCHANT.

OVER SIX THOUSAND STUDENTS
Have been educated in the Principles and Practice of all the details of a business education from DUFF'S system of Mercantile Book-Keeping.

Awarded four Silver Medals and the sanction of the highest Educational Authorities in the country. Also, DUFF'S

Steamboat Book-Keeping.

"A perfect system for such books and accounts." Also, DUFF'S per cent system of Railroad Book-Keeping.

After the forms of the Pennsylvania Railroad. Also, DUFF'S new system of Private Bank Book-Keeping.

The only Bank Book-Keeping in which the correct state of accounts are all taught under the daily supervision of the Principal, and, it is believed, to a degree of perfection never attained elsewhere.

12 FIRST PREMIUMS

for best Business and Ornamental Penmanship awarded to our present Penman by the United States Fair at Cincinnati in..... 1860.

United States Fair at Wyoming..... 1860.
Western Penn's Fair at Pittsburg..... 1860.
And the Ohio State Fair at Cleveland..... 1860.

All of which are exhibited at our office.

HARPER'S ENLARGED EDITION OF DUFF'S BOOK-KEEPING.

Price $1 50. Sold by Booksellers generally.

For Full Description and Terms for our New Circular, pp. 68, and samples of our Penman's Business and Ornamental Writing, enclose 25c. to

P. DUFF & SON, Principals.

A Reliable Article for Domestic Use!

ANDREWS' YEAST POWDER has been in constant use for the last ten years, and is the most perfect compound for the immediate raising of BREAD, TEA BISCUIT, PANCAKES, &c., and ready for use "in one minute."

The quality of this Yeast Powder is never changed, and it does not lose its strength by exposure to climate. Our sales are half a million cans per annum, and the certificate of Eminent Physicians, Chemists and Analysts,always accompanies each label; also,full directions for use. Sisters to the Lodies, may it be your comfort and satisfaction, per cent age that ever was made, and is "indispensable" where lightness and health are desired. Ask your grocer for ANDREWS' "EXCELSIOR" Yeast Powder, and see no other. If you want "THE BEST," buy the Excelsior, and sold wholesale by THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
138 and 140 Cedar St., New York.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by Adams' Express, to HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Butter charged at 20c.

CATARRH!—Dr. Goodale's CATARRH REMEDY positively is the very best of the Nostrum Genera, and exterminates it root and branch. Price $1 00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. Dept 423 Broadway.

This Day Published:

UNION FOUNDATIONS: A Study of American Nationality as a Fact of Science. By Capt. E. B. Hunt, Corps of Engineers U. S. Army.
Octavo, paper, price 50c. D. VAN NOSTRAND,
192 Broadway, N. Y.
Sent free by mail on receipt of price.

Attention Agents, Soldiers, and Masons.

Any one wishing to purchase JEWELRY, I will send as sample, on the receipt of $1, together with my wholesale Circular, either a Gold Masonic Pin or Ring, or a Gent's Cluster Pin with Chain attached, or a neat new style Vest Chain, or Neck Chain, or a splendid Gold Pen and Pencil, or a beautiful Engraved Bracelet, or Spring Locket, or a California Diamond Ring or Pin.
R. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
208 Broadway, N. Y.

Milligan's Patent Mess Kettle.

Arranged for four Officers, weight 15 pounds, price $12.

Milligan's Army Tent Stove.

The most portable stove in service. When packed measures 5 inches high by 13½ inches in diameter. Weight 10 pounds. Price $6 00.

Sold by all Dealers in Army Equipments. Wholesale Depot, No. 4 Platt Street, N. Y.
Send for circular. MILLIGAN BROS.

THE AUTOMATON COMPANY;

Or, Infantry Soldiers' Practical Instructor for all Company Movements in the Field. By G. D. Brewerton, U. S. A. Price in boxes, $1 25; when sent by mail, $1 95.

THE AUTOMATON REGIMENT;

Or, Infantry Soldiers' Practical Instructor for all Regimental Movements in the Field. By Dr. Brewerton, U. S. A. Price in boxes $1 25; when sent by mail, $1 95.

THE AUTOMATON BATTERY;

Or, Artillerists' Practical Instructor for the Manœuvres of all Mounted Artillery in the Field. By G. D. Brewerton, U. S. A. Price in boxes, $1 00; when sent by mail, $1 40.

D. VAN NOSTRAND,
Publisher, 192 Broadway, New York.

Ladies, Read this Attentively.

Give up the use of that vile compound called rouge. It can deceive no one, no matter how skillfully it is applied. Nothing is more beautiful and worthy of admiration than a skin white as alabaster, rosy cheeks, lips red as coral; in short, a complexion of dazzling beauty and purity. Do away with your paraphernalia of Cosmetics, Pearl Powders, Blooms of Rose, and other frauds. Follow my directions, and you will find to your surprise that in a very short space of time you can become possessor of a beautiful complexion.

Send your address and one stamp to
A. G. LAMONT, Perfumer, Box 4673,
New York City.

Circular sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type for 6 cents.

THE TUNER'S GUIDE.

A TREATISE ON
TUNING THE PIANO-FORTE,
Organ, Melodeon, and Seraphine, containing many concise rules in
Specification of Defects and their Remedies.

Price 40 cents, on receipt of which it will be sent, postpaid. DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED
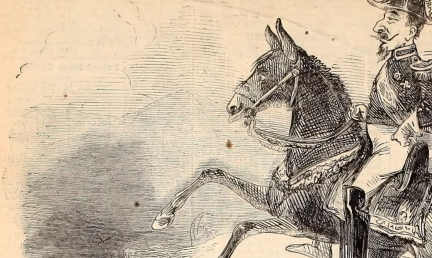
STOMACH BITTERS.



If the stomach is wrong all is wrong. It is the baleful wheel of body and mind. The dyspepsia is the most miserable of human beings. The first thing necessary to re-establishment is healthful digestion, and the first means of intellect, to activity, to the enjoyment of life, is a sound digestion. If the stomach does not perform its duty, discipline it into regular and healthy action by the use of this genial TONIC. Persons of feeble habit and diffusive stimulant ever administered. It is mild and pleasant. It is certain and safe. It imparts elasticity and energy to the whole system. Its action upon the coats of the stomach is removing in a wonderful degree. Use it for a week and you will find the sense of oppression alter or disappear, and dizziness and faintness become strange, which are the distinguishing features of dyspepsia, entirely relieved, the bowels regular, the appetite good, and the pulse firm and even.

Depot, 628 Broadway, New York.

MARK YOUR CLOTHING!

A Stencil Plate, with your name neatly cut in a brush, and a bottle of the best Indelible Ink
For Marking Clothing.
Sent by mail, post paid, on receipt of FIFTY CENTS. Write plain, to avoid mistakes. Address
N. E. BAKER, Lebanon, Mass.

"MOUSTACHES AND WHISKERS IN 42 DAYS." Hunting, Fishing, and many other Beautiful Secrets, all in the Book of Wonders. 500 Gold. 9th Ed. Price only 20c. by Mail. Mailed Free. Address
C. E. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, New Hampshire.

DESIGN FOR A MODERN HISTORICAL PICTURE.
NAPOLEON III. crossing the American Continent on his Mexican Mule.

THE "ARKANSAS TRAVELER,"
As lately performed with Rapturous Applause by General HINDMAN.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A SPECULATION.

Agents and Soldiers, in camp or discharged, can make easily $10 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions of the Army, Rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp can act as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Fine Jewelry and Watches at low prices. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements.
S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

THE NEC PLUS ULTRA.
